START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

June 1994

Camera Operator:
John Sullivan

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-039

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: IA IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 14X

FILM STOCK:

REEL 39

Volumes 71-72

BSO
1941-42
to BSO
1942-43

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

9.0

10.0

11.2

12.5

14.0

16.0

18.0

20.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

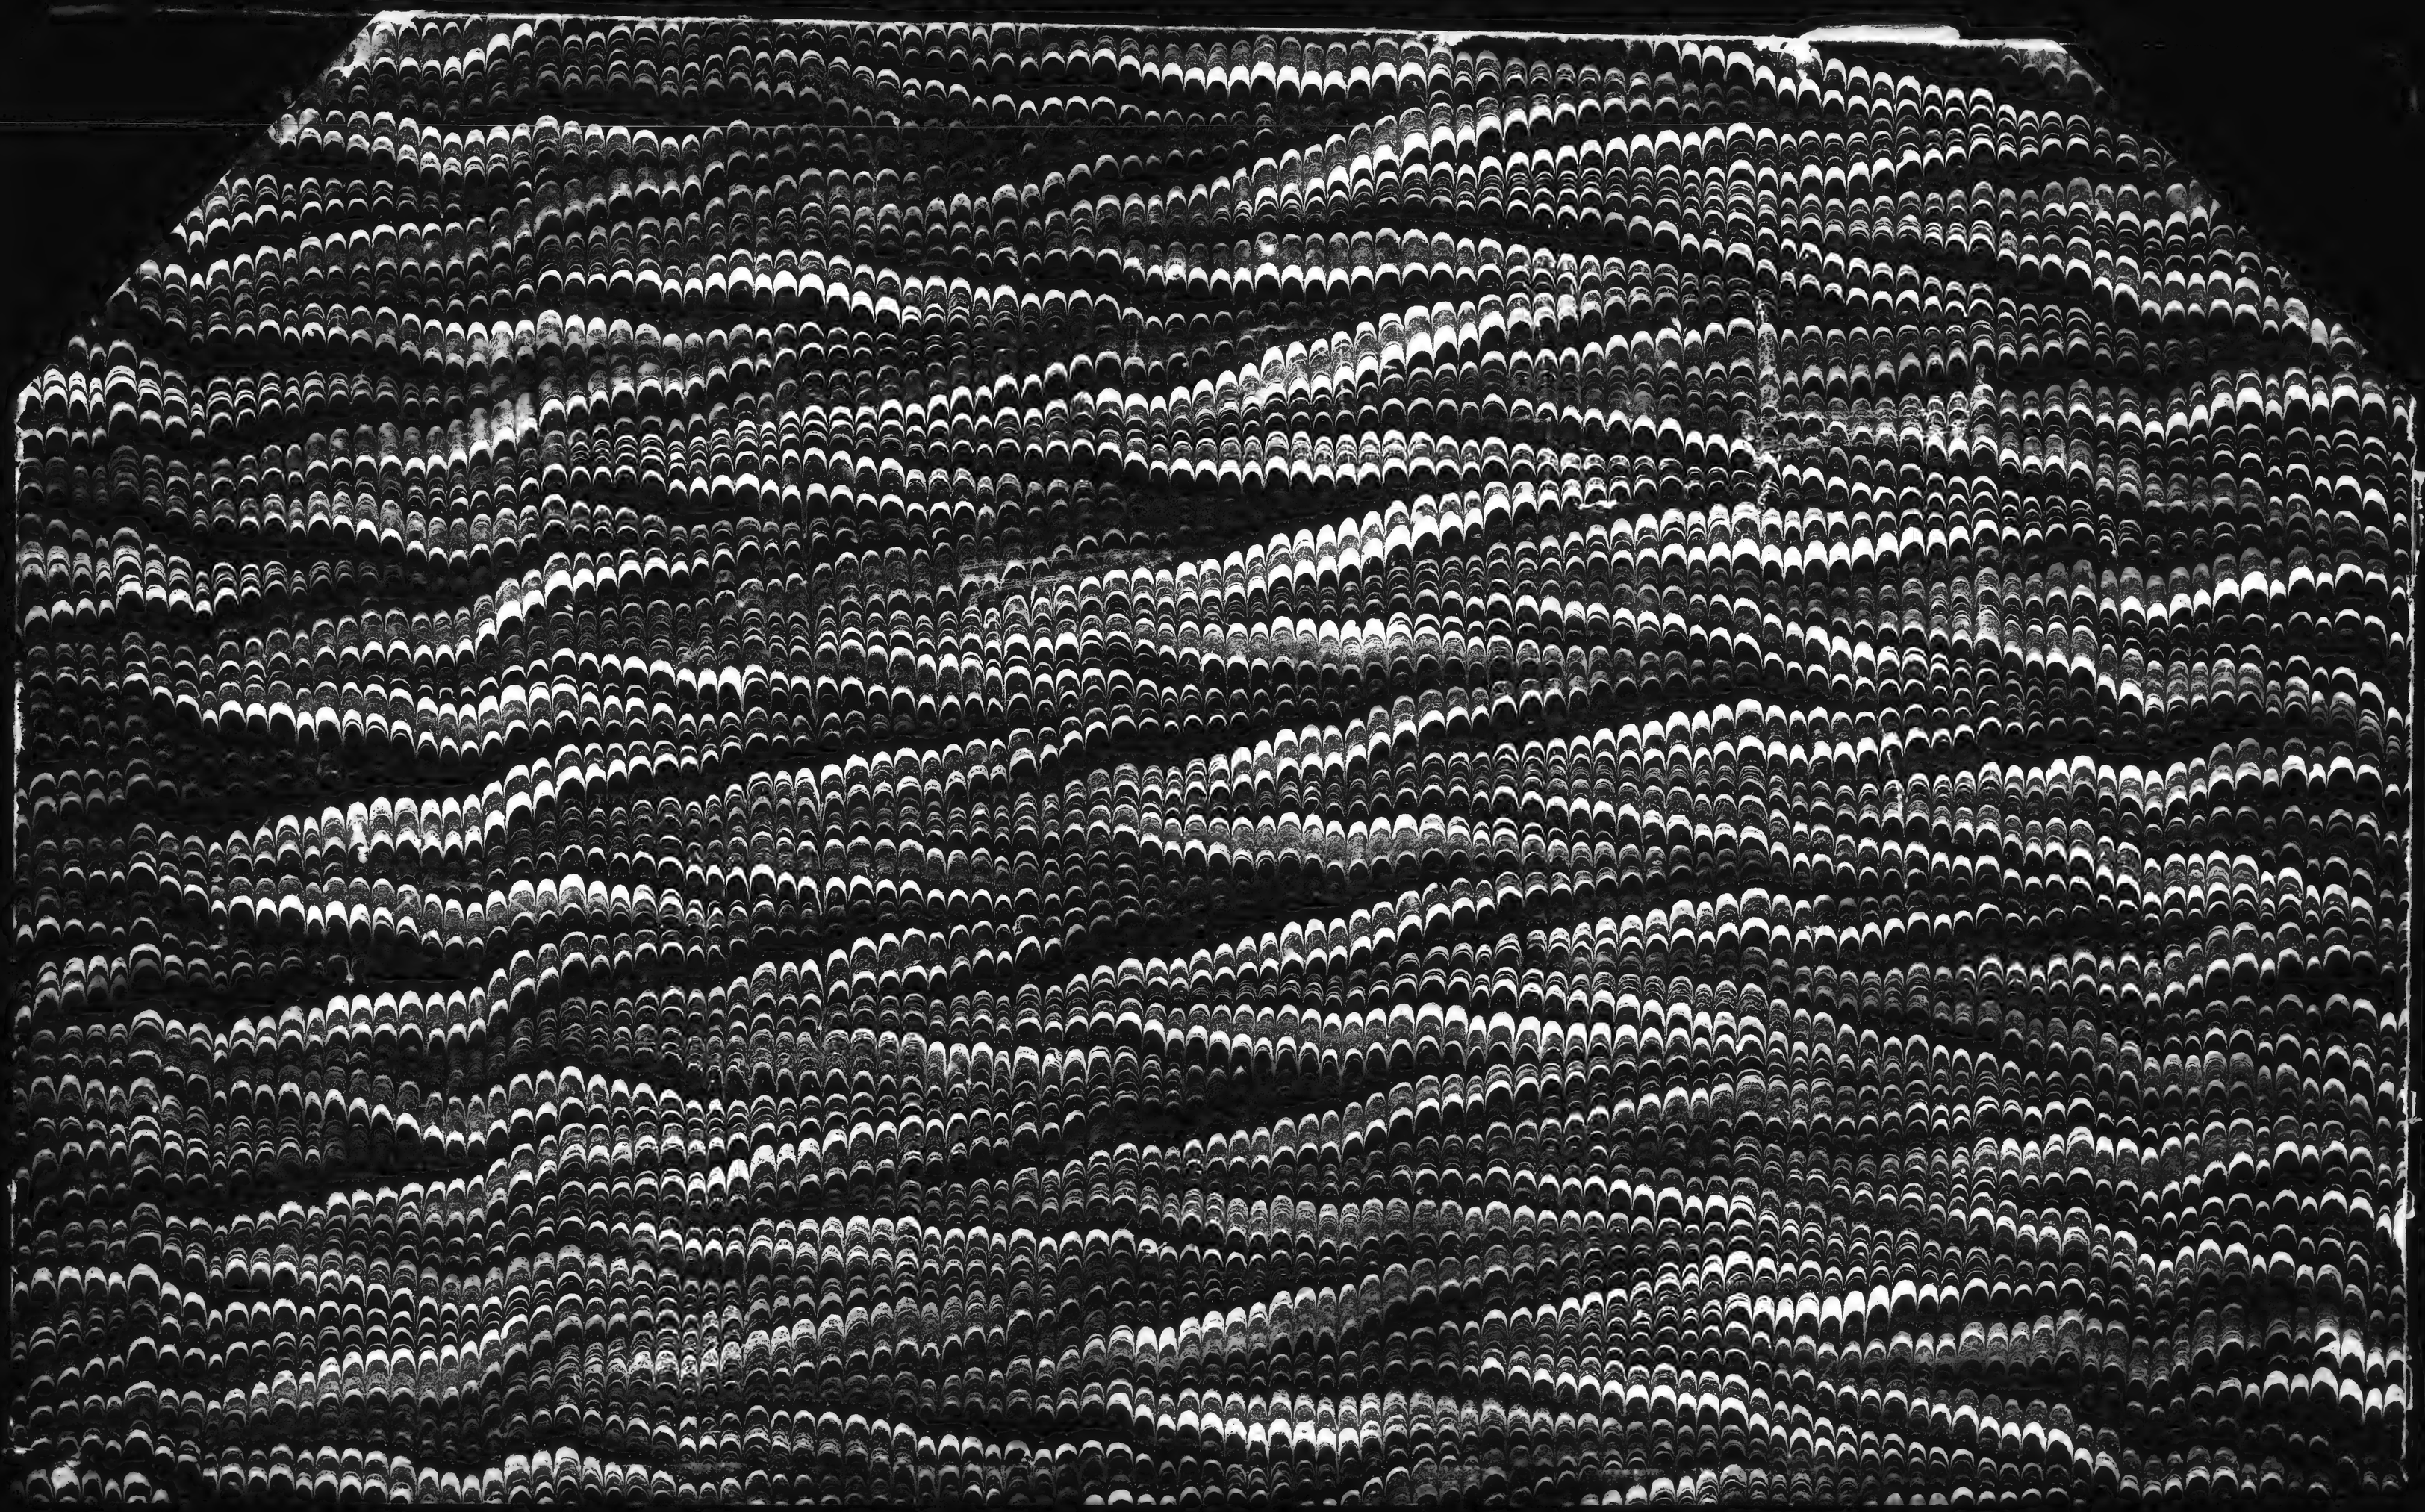
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 71

BSO

1941 - 1942



BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
SEP 19 1941

Modern A… Disregar… Early Tr…

Sixty-First Season Of The Boston Symphony Opens On Oct. 12

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 61st season in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 10. Serge Koussevizky will then begin his 17th successive season as conductor of the orchestra. The concerts of Oct. 10-11 will be the first of 24 pairs of concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. The shorter series of six Monday evening concerts and six Tuesday afternoons will begin on Oct. 27-28.

The soloists are announced for the Friday and Saturday series. They will include two famous artists who have not appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a long time: Efram Zimbalist and Alexander Borovsky. Zimbalist, born in 1889 and yet the first of the succession of outstanding violinists who were the pupils of Leopold Auer, made his American debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1911. His last appearance with this orchestra was in 1924. Alexander Borovsky is remembered for his notable performances with the Orchestra in the Bach Festival of 1931. Since then, this pianist has toured in other parts of the world, returning to the United States last spring. Yehudi Menuhin, the violinist, last heard at these concerts in 1938, will also return. Artists more recently remembered are Rudolf Serkin, the pianist, and Joseph Szigeti, the violinst.

There will be two great conductors in mid-season. Desire Defauw, the conductor from Brussels, Belgium, who was guest for a week in the season past, will return. Bruno Walter, unheard as a symphonic conductor in Boston since his single appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1923, will conduct the orchestra for the concerts of two weeks. During this time Mr. Koussevitzky will be the guest conductor of the Philharmonic Symphony Society in New York. Mr. Walter was in Boston last spring as conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD
SEP 24 1941

To the Editor:

I see in the Record of September 17 that Mr. Charles B. Gray asks, "What is the orchestra without Stokowski?" I would like to answer him.

With or without Stokowski, the Philadelphia Orchestra is still the second best orchestra in the world. I say second best because Dr. Koussevitsky has created up Boston way the greatest virtuoso orchestra in the world. However, we have a magnificent orchestra here in Philadelphia and, with or without Stokowski, it is still the same.

Of course what we lost when Stokowski left was the almost world-wide publicity that only he among the present conductors seems able to attract. We lost that impressive mop of platinum hair and those sensitive, artistic, photogenic hands. We lost the dynamic entrances of Stokowski and the after-concert speeches. We lost that well-tailored figure on the podium. Why, we lost a movie star!

But we still have that orchestra and a man who can make it sing as eloquently as anyone has. Perhaps with not that theatrical flourish that was Stokowski's own personal touch, but with a sincerity and sound musicianship equal to any.

Our orchestra may have lost some of its glamour, but it has lost none of its ability to play the music of Brahms and Beethoven and Bartok with a richness that only comes from an old instrument that has perfect craftsmanship.

Don't mourn, Mr. Gray, that Stokowski has left us. Mr. Ormandy may not be as pretty as his predecessor but, Mr. Grey, he is as fine a musician.

MARTIN ZIPIN.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
SEP 23 1941

Capital's First 'Pop' Symphony Concert A Notable Success—So Is the Beer

Post Staff Photos

DRINKING IT ALL IN—Christian Heurich, 99-year-old Washington brewer, and Mrs. Heurich drink beer as they listen to the National Symphony's first "pop" concert. Lower—Dr. Hans Kindler directs the orchestra as listeners drink it in

3600 Enjoy Brew And Keep Kindler Late With Encores

Washingtonians last night took to the Boston "Pops" as they have in the past to Boston baked beans, cream pie and codfish.

The 3600 music lovers, entertainment seekers and curious who turned out at Riverside Stadium to participate in the National Symphony's experiment of mixing Bach and Bizet with beer, drank it all in.

The crowd, particularly the 1100 who filled every available seat at every available table, at first felt somewhat ill at ease. It was not sure how it was supposed to behave. Table sitters took extreme care not to tinkle bottles or glasses, and for the most part waited for between numbers and intermissions to eat and drink for fear of being discourteous.

But as the program progressed, the table throng warmed up to Conductor Hans Kindler's beaming encouragement, relaxed and recognized that at the "Pops" it was not a sacrilege to have ham (on rye) with Handel, and chili with Chaikovsky. The idea quickly got around that "Pops" also meant popcorn, so that the 37 tiptoeing rubber-soled waitresses were sent scurrying for refills.

Bleacherites also had their suds, but, as in Boston, had to restrain themselves for two intermissions set aside so they could get theirs at the under-bleacher stands—where they had to sit on high chairs, boxes and cases to drink the beer in conformance with the District's alcohol beverage control laws.

Statistical proof that the first-nighters enjoyed both the concert and beverages is offered as follows:

After the National Symphony had finished its regular program, the folks refused to go home, and thunderously demanded more. Conductor Kindler, obviously pleased by the reception, assented and gave five encores, until he remembered he had to make the 11:04 p. m. train for Toronto. A police motorcycle escort was quickly formed, and it got him to Union Station with seconds to spare. So much for the music.

As to the beer, ale, pop, etc., 5064 bottles were consumed, as were 17 cases of wine and a slew of ham sandwiches, hot dogs, popcorn and chili.

No longer an experiment, "Pops" will go on for the second time Thursday night with Rudolph Ganz as guest conductor, and Elsie Houston, Brazilian soprano, the soloist.

Postlude

By Ray C. B. Brown

Opening Attendance Presages Success of Pop Concert Series

Hans Kindler conducts the National Symphony Orchestra in its first "Pop" concert on Monday night in Riverside Stadium. Program: "Pomp and Circumstance" March No. 1 in D major (Elgar), "Comes Autumn Time" Overture (Sowerby), Air in D major from Suite No. 3 (Bach), Third Movement from Symphony in F minor (Chaikovski), "Gold and Silver" Waltz (Lehar), Suite from "Carmen" (Bizet), "Summertime" from "Porgy and Bess" (Gershwin), "Dagger Dance" from "Natoma" (Herbert), Overture to "Der Zigeunerbaron," "Pizzicato Polka," "Donner und Blitzen Polka," "Wiener Blut Walzer" (Johann Strauss).

Timing its entrance with the autumnal equinox, the National Symphony Orchestra began its first series of "Pop" concerts last evening in Riverside Stadium with Hans Kindler on the podium as the genial initiator of a new undertaking by the organization he has so sedulously guided for a decade. While not crammed to capacity, the auditorium was so well filled as to justify roseate hopes for the success of the venture, and the mood of the listeners was one of hearty enjoyment once they had relaxed into the informality of the occasion.

BROWN

Dr. Kindler opened the program with an aid-to-Britain item, Sir Edward Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," which is the only one we ever hear of his five marches by that name. The timeliness of this music was realized by those who have not forgotten their Shakespeare, for the title comes from Othello's remark about the "pride, pomp and circumstance of glorious war." The adjective is not as applicable as it was in the days when war retained a certain chivalry in its conduct.

Timely, too, was Leo Sowerby's fine overture, "Comes Autumn Time," which has a tang of tinted woods and frosty air in its robust measures. Atmosphere in music is a difficult thing to analyze but immediate in its effect upon the emotions. The tunes which Sowerby devised for this overture have a freshness that sets the blood tingling, and the profiles of these melodies are authentically American.

For a touch of sedateness and serenity, Dr. Kindler chose the Bach theme known as the "Air on the G String," thanks to Wilhelmj's transcription for violin. This gave place to the "Pizzicate Ostinate" movement from Chaikovski's F minor symphony, and the first of the program closed with the pleasant "Gold and Silver" waltz by Franz Lehar.

An operatic section was to have started with "Ombra mai fu" from Handel's "Xerxes," but his selection was deferred until later to make the concert conform to a broadcasting commitment. The experts included the familiar suite from "Carmen" and two American numbers: the dagger dance from Victor Herbert's "Natoma" and "Summertime" from George Gershwin's "Porgy and Bess." The last was repeated in response to prolonged applause.

Johann Strauss was accorded the third part of the program with the overture to "Der Zigeunerbaron," the sprightly "Pizzicato Polka," the amusing "Donner und Blitzen" polka, and the "Wiener Blut" waltzes. By this time the auditors were ready to demand some extra numbers, and they did so with enthusiasm. What they received were the Handel number, the polka from Weinberger's "Svanda Dudak," and repetitions of the Aragonaise from "Carmen," the Gold and Silver" waltz and "Donner und Blitzen."

Although the Boston Orchestra generally gets the credit for having originated "Pop" concerts in the United States, it was Theodore Thomas who actually started them. The Boston Orchestra was not founded until 1881, and it was in 1868 that Thomas took this way to stimulate public interest in symphonic music. Remembering the popular concerts in Bilse's beer garden in Berlin, he inaugurated a similar form of entertainment in Central Park Gardens in New York.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 28 1941

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose position in regard to the American Federation of Musicians has lately brought it plenty of publicity, will inaugurate its 60th season of Providence concerts on Oct. 21, in the Metropolitan Theatre. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct and will also lead two of the subsequent four concerts in the series slated for Nov. 25, Jan. 20, Feb. 17 and April 7.

The other two concerts will be played under the baton of Desire DeFauw, who made a guest appearance with the orchestra here last winter, and Bruno Walter, who has led symphony orchestras on both sides of the ocean, and last season made a great hit as a conductor of the Metropolitan Opera. He has never before conducted in this city.

New music by composers of this country and of the other Americas will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, some of which may be heard in Providence. Carlos Chavez, the Mexican composer, will conduct music of his own in Boston. The Choros No. 10 of Villa-Lobos of Brazil will be repeated. Composers of our country will include William Schuman, whose new Third Symphony will have its first performance; John Alden Carpenter and Leo Sowerby, whose symphonies will be played. A new symphony by Arthur Lourie will have its first performance. Prokofieff's Third Symphony, as yet unheard in America, will be played, and the First Symphony of Shostakovitch, which Koussevitzky has not yet performed. The great symphonies and other works of the established symphonic repertory will, of course, predominate upon the season's programs. Bach's "Passion According to St. Matthew" will be revived at a Boston choral concert in the spring.

Other special programs will include a pair of concerts to be devoted to Dvorak's music, in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the Czech composer. Another anniversary is the 150th of the death of Mozart, which occurs in December, when selections from his "Requiem" will be performed. The orchestra will launch its season in Boston, Oct. 10, with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Prokofieff's Suite from "Romeo and Juliet" and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated by Ravel.

This Clipping From TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES
SEP 28 1941

Boston Group Lists Season

Koussevitzky Lists Special Works

BOSTON, Mass., Sept. 27—Special works to be played at the coming 61st season of the Boston Symphony orchestra are announced by Serge Koussevitzky from his home at Lenox. The conductor will return to Boston over the week end to assemble the orchestra for rehearsal in preparation for the season's opening Oct. 10.

The opening program for Oct. 10-11 will be as follows: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Prokofieff's Suite from "Romeo and Juliet," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Ravel. One pair of concerts will be devoted to the music of Dvorak, in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of the Czech composer. Another anniversary is the 150th of the death of Mozart, which occurs in December, when selection from this composers Requiem will be performed.

New music by composers of this country and of the other Americas will figure upon the programs. Carlos Chavea, the Mexican composer, will conduct music of his own. The Chords No. 10 of Villa-Lobos of Brazil will be repeated. Composers of our country will include William Schuman, whose new Third Symphony will have its first performance, John Alden Carpenter, and Leo Sowerby, whose symphonies will be played.

A new symphony by Arthur Lourie will have its first performance. Prokofieff's Third Symphony, as yet unheard in America, will be played, and the First Symphony of Shostakovitch, which Koussevitzky has not yet performed. The great symphonies and other works of the established symphonic repertory will, of course, predominate upon the season's programs. Bach's Passion According to Saint Matthew will be revived at a choral concert in the spring.

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
SEP 19 1941

Modern A… Disregar… Early Tr…

Sixty-First Season Of The Boston Symphony Opens On Oct. 12

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 61st season in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 10. Serge Koussevizky will then begin his 17th successive season as conductor of the orchestra. The concerts of Oct. 10-11 will be the first of 24 pairs of concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. The shorter series of six Monday evening concerts and six Tuesday afternoons will begin on Oct. 27-28.

The soloists are announced for the Friday and Saturday series. They will include two famous artists who have not appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a long time: Efram Zimbalist and Alexander Borovsky. Zimbalist, born in 1889 and yet the first of the succession of outstanding violinists who were the pupils of Leopold Auer, made his American debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1911. His last appearance with this orchestra was in 1924. Alexander Borovsky is remembered for his notable performances with the Orchestra in the Bach Festival of 1931. Since then, this pianist has toured in other parts of the world, returning to the United States last spring. Yehudi Menuhin, the violinist, last heard at these concerts in 1938, will also return. Artists more recently remembered are Rudolf Serkin, the pianist, and Joseph Szigeti, the violinst.

There will be two great conductors in mid-season. Desire Defauw, the conductor from Brussels, Belgium, who was guest for a week in the season past, will return. Bruno Walter, unheard as a symphonic conductor in Boston since his single appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1923, will conduct the orchestra for the concerts of two weeks. During this time Mr. Koussevitzky will be the guest conductor of the Philharmonic Symphony Society in New York. Mr. Walter was in Boston last spring as conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD
SEP 24 1941

To the Editor:

I see in the Record of September 17 that Mr. Charles B. Gray asks, "What is the orchestra without Stokowski?" I would like to answer him.

With or without Stokowski, the Philadelphia Orchestra is still the second best orchestra in the world. I say second best because Dr. Koussevitsky has created up Boston way the greatest virtuoso orchestra in the world. However, we have a magnificent orchestra here in Philadelphia and, with or without Stokowski, it is still the same.

Of course what we lost when Stokowski left was the almost world-wide publicity that only he among the present conductors seems able to attract. We lost that impressive mop of platinum hair and those sensitive, artistic, photogenic hands. We lost the dynamic entrances of Stokowski and the after-concert speeches. We lost that well-tailored figure on the podium. Why, we lost a movie star!

But we still have that orchestra and a man who can make it sing as eloquently as anyone has. Perhaps with not that theatrical flourish that was Stokowski's own personal touch, but with a sincerity and sound musicianship equal to any.

Our orchestra may have lost some of its glamour, but it has lost none of its ability to play the music of Brahms and Beethoven and Bartok with a richness that only comes from an old instrument that has perfect craftsmanship.

Don't mourn, Mr. Gray, that Stokowski has left us. Mr. Ormandy may not be as pretty as his predecessor but, Mr. Grey, he is as fine a musician.

MARTIN ZIPIN.

…t 'Pop' Symphony Concert …ccess—So Is the Beer

Phone ME. 4585
…istrative Law & Taxation
…t Bachelor of Laws
Three-Year Day Course
Four-Year Evening Course
Register Now for Beginning Classes
Devoted Exclusively to the Teaching of Law
Co-Educational Forty-Sixth Year
Washington COLLEGE OF LAW SCHOOL
Nine Month Unit Evening Course
Columbia "Tech" Institute
1319 F St. N.W. ME. 5626
Start Now—Send for Catalogue
AIR COND. ENG.
Nine Month Unit Eve. Course
Columbia "Tech" Institute
1319 F St. N.W. ME. 5626
Start Now—Send for Catalogue
Nine Month Engineering Course
ENGINES
AVIATION—AUTOMOBILE—DIESEL
Shop, Lab, and Theory
Columbia "Tech" Institute
1319 F St. N.W. ME. 5626
Eve. Class—Send for Catalogue
COLUMBIA DRAFTING AIRCRAFT ELECTRICAL MECHANICAL PATENT OFFICE
SHEET METAL ARCHITECTURAL TOPOGRAPHIC
STATISTICAL SHOP
Hundreds of graduates in U. S. Civil Service and private positions.
Practicing Professional Instructors—
Columbia "Tech"
Recognized 31 Yrs.—Employment Service
Starts Now—Day or Eve. Classes
Send for Catalog.
Nine Month Engineering Course
MACHINE
Design—Shop—Lab.—Theory
Columbia "Tech" Institute
1319 F St. N.W. ME. 5626
Eve. Class—Send for Catalogue
Nine Month Unit Evening Course
RADIO ENG.
Columbia "Tech" Institute
1319 F St. N.W. ME. 5626
Start Now—Send for Catalogue

Smith signed and tried the manshal again. "All right, boy, keep quiet, and let this trial go ahead," he was told.

So the man at the table with the papers was his lawyer! Smith repeated his denial. Attorney James K. Hughes nodded.

"Yes, I have that in my notes. That's what you told me at the jail, right after Justice O'Donoghue assigned me to defend you. That is the defense we shall offer."

"Well, tell your lawyer about it," said the guard.

"Listen, Cap'n," he protested then to the marshal who was guarding him. "There's some mistake about this. I never killed nobody with no wine bottle. I don't know nothing about this here case . . ."

trial for manslaughter.

"Listen, Cap'n," he protested that it was he, Smith, who was on hand for the hearing which quickened into fascination as it came to him that the Smith, who was on trial for manslaughter.

The trial was only about an hour and a half late in starting and probably will finish today.

was brought up to answer the manslaughter charges.

heard these facts with a certain amount of interest, which quickened into fascination as it came to him that it was he, Smith, who was on

Nine Month Engineering Course
ENGINES
AVIATION—AUTOMOBILE—DIESEL
Shop, Lab, and Theory
Columbia "Tech" Institute
1319 F St. N.W. ME. 5626
Eve. Class—Send for Catalogue

For Errol Flynn
Beverley Hills, Calif., Sept. 22 (AP)—Jimmie Fidler, movie gossip writer and commentator, appeared before Justice of the Peace Cecil D. Holland today, seeking unsuccessfully a complaint against Actor Errol Flynn, his opponent in a night club tiff early Sunday.

Judge Holland declined to issue a complaint until he had discussed the matter with Flynn.

"I want Flynn forced to keep the peace," Fidler said. "I'm not afraid of him, even though he's younger and heavier and taller than I am. But I make my living with my mouth and if he should punch me so hard I couldn't talk, it would cost e thousands of dollars. "It is ungentlemanly of Flynn to say that my wife stabbed him in the ear with a fork. She didn't use a fork, she used her fingernails. I'm proud of her."

BERLITZ
65th Year—French, Spanish, Italian, German or any other language made easy by the Berlitz Method—available only at the BERLITZ SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES. 8th Bldg. 17th & Eye Sts. National 0270.
THERE IS A BERLITZ SCHOOL IN EVERY LEADING CITY OF THE WORLD.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 28 1941

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose position in regard to the American Federation of Musicians has lately brought it plenty of publicity, will inaugurate its 60th season of Providence concerts on Oct. 21, in the Metropolitan Theatre. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct and will also lead two of the subsequent four concerts in the series slated for Nov. 25, Jan. 20, Feb. 17 and April 7.

The other two concerts will be played under the baton of Desire DeFauw, who made a guest appearance with the orchestra here last winter, and Bruno Walter, who has led symphony orchestras on both sides of the ocean, and last season made a great hit as a conductor of the Metropolitan Opera. He has never before conducted in this city.

New music by composers of this country and of the other Americas will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, some of which may be heard in Providence. Carlos Chavez, the Mexican composer, will conduct music of his own in Boston. The Choros No. 10 of Villa-Lobos of Brazil will be repeated. Composers of our country will include William Schuman, whose new Third Symphony will have its first performance; John Alden Carpenter and Leo Sowerby, whose symphonies will be played. A new symphony by Arthur Lourie will have its first performance. Prokofieff's Third Symphony, as yet unheard in America, will be played, and the First Symphony of Shostakovitch, which Koussevitzky has not yet performed. The great symphonies and other works of the established symphonic repertory will, of course, predominate upon the season's programs. Bach's "Passion According to St. Matthew" will be revived at a Boston choral concert in the spring.

Other special programs will include a pair of concerts to be devoted to Dvorak's music, in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the Czech composer. Another anniversary is the 150th of the death of Mozart, which occurs in December, when selections from his "Requiem" will be performed. The orchestra will launch its season in Boston, Oct. 10, with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Prokofieff's Suite from "Romeo and Juliet" and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated by Ravel.

This Clipping From TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES
SEP 28 1941

Boston Group Lists Season

Koussevitzky Lists Special Works

BOSTON, Mass., Sept. 27—Special works to be played at the coming 61st season of the Boston Symphony orchestra are announced by Serge Koussevitzky from his home at Lenox. The conductor will return to Boston over the week end to assemble the orchestra for rehearsal in preparation for the season's opening Oct. 10.

The opening program for Oct. 10-11 will be as follows: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Prokofieff's Suite from "Romeo and Juliet," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Ravel. One pair of concerts will be devoted to the music of Dvorak, in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of the Czech composer. Another anniversary is the 150th of the death of Mozart, which occurs in December, when selection from this composers Requiem will be performed.

New music by composers of this country and of the other Americas will figure upon the programs. Carlos Chavea, the Mexican composer, will conduct music of his own. The Choros No. 10 of Villa-Lobos of Brazil will be repeated. Composers of our country will include William Schuman, whose new Third Symphony will have its first performance, John Alden Carpenter, and Leo Sowerby, whose symphonies will be played.

A new symphony by Arthur Lourie will have its first performance. Prokofieff's Third Symphony, as yet unheard in America, will be played, and the First Symphony of Shostakovitch, which Koussevitzky has not yet performed. The great symphonies and other works of the established symphonic repertory will, of course, predominate upon the season's programs. Bach's Passion According to Saint Matthew will be revived at a choral concert in the spring.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
SEP 21 1941

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON OPENING

Efrem Zimbalist, returning to the Boston Symphony orchestra after more than a decade, will be the first soloist of the season at the Friday and Saturday concerts, appearing in Brahms' Violin Concerto. This first of the famous Auer pupils came to this country and made his American debut with the Boston Symphony orchestra in 111. Other soloists will be the pianists Alexander Borovsky, and Rudolf Serkin, and the violinists Joseph Szigeti and Yehudi Menuhin. Serge Koussevitzky will open the sixty-first season on Friday afternoon, October 10. Soloists for the series of six Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts, which begin at October 27, will shortly be announced. During the two weeks in January when Serge Koussevitzky appears as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony society of New York, then conducting another orchestra than his own for the first time in America, Bruno Walter will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts in Symphony hall. Desire Defauw, the Belgian conductor, will also be the guest of a week.

The new Federal Revenue Act, which has just been passed, makes all sympony concerts taxable. The act becomes effective October 1. Until that date, season tickets for each of the four series may be purchased tax free. The season ticket sale will close September 30, and after that date tickets must be bought at the single rate with the tax added. The combined season rate and tax exemption will effect a saving of approximately thirty per cent on season tickets.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
SEP 28 1941

THE ORC…

Boston Symphony Plans

The opening programs in Boston on Oct. 10 and 11 under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will comprise Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Prokofieff's Suite from "Romeo and Juliet," and Moussorgorsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated by Ravel. One pair of concerts will be devoted to music by Dvorak in observance of the hundredth anniversary of his birth. Excerpts from Mozart's Requiem will be performed in December on the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of his death.

New music by composers of this country and of the other Americas will figure upon the programs. Carlos Chavez, the Mexican composer, will conduct music of his own. The Choros No. 10 of Villa-Lobos of Brazil will be repeated. Composers of our country will include William Schuman, whose new Third Symphony will have its first performance; John Alden Carpenter, and Leo Sowerby, whose symphonies will be played. A new symphony by Arthur Lourie will have its first performance. Prokofieff's Third Symphony, as yet unheard in America, will be played, and the First Symphony of Shostakovitch, which Koussevitzky has not yet performed. The great symphonies and other works of the established symphonic repertory will, of course, predominate upon the season's programs. Bach's Passion According to Saint Matthew will be revived at a choral concert in the spring.

This Clipping From
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
SEP 25 1941

Koussevitsky Hides Away In South For Perfect Vacation

A flight by airplane to an unnamed place in the south in order to obtain complete relaxation, was described today by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who found his estate, Serenac, in Lenox, too accessible to autograph seekers, travelers, and even friends, for proper quiet.

Koussevitsky's romantic story of flight and self-exile took him to a cottage by the seashore where he had no telephone.

"That was beautiful," he said. "I was a complete exile from publishers, composers, and even my secretary and my manager. My only companions were a negro chef and two little children who met me every day. And all I did was nothing—just sun bathing and carrying one child under each arm down to the water for wading. Such a wonderful vacation!"

The conductor has been devoting his time at Lenox to the study of new scores. He will return to his Boston home at the end of next week and will assemble the Boston Symphony orchestra on Oct. 6th for the first rehearsal. The 61st season will open in Symphony hall on Oct. 10th. An early program will be devoted to the music of Dvorak, whose 100th birthday occurred this month. The 150th anniversary of the death of Mozart fall in December and in that month, excerpts from this this composer's "requiem" will be performed.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

SEP 25 1941

Koussevitzky Refreshed After Runaway

Conductor Now Sojourning at Lenox Home

LENOX — A romantic story of flight and self-exile in quest of relief from his too-well-known summer home, was revealed today by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

After strenuous summer weeks of Festival rehearsing and conducting at Tanglewood, combined with teaching and administrative conferences at the Berkshire Music Center, Koussevitzky sought relaxation at his estate, Serenak. But there was no peace to be had—the place was too easy to find.

"And so," Koussevitzky said with a grin, "I took an airplane, which left me in a pleasant place in the South, which I will not name. There I had a cottage by the seashore. I did not have a telephone. That was beautiful. I was a complete exile from publishers, composers and — even my secretary and my manager. My only companions were a Negro chef and two little children who met me every day. And all I did was nothing—just sun bathing, and carrying one child under each arm down to the water to go wading. Such a wonderful vacation."

It is understood that this is probably the first time in his career as musician that Koussevitzky ever spent a vacation in complete relaxation. The conductor has been devoting his time at Lenox to the study of new scores. He will return to his Boston home at the end of next week and will assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra Monday, Oct. 6, for the first rehearsal.

The 61st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in Symphony Hall, Friday, Oct. 10, with the following program:

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Prokofieff's Suite from "Romeo and Juliet," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Ravel.

This Clipping From CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

SEP 21 1941

KOUSSEVITZKY PAYS TRIBUTE TO THE MAGIC OF FM

Boston, Mass., Sept. 20 [Special].—An unusual tribute was paid to frequency modulation recently here by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky after he had heard the Boston Symphony orchestra, which he conducts, broadcast over the new noise free, full fidelity system.

Dr. Koussevitzky asserted that F-M marks the beginning of a new era in symphonic broadcasting. He added that he had never heard the various instruments so clearly reproduced.

"Heretofore," he said, "a clarinet always has been an awful instrument over the radio. Now it is beautiful. The timbre of the different choirs comes over with exceptional fidelity. Never before in a broadcast have I been able to pick out each instrument individually."

The conductor heard the broadcast via W1XK at Hull, Mass.

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

OCT 3 - 1941

Special Works Are Announced For Boston Symphony's 61st Season

Special works to be played at the coming 61st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are announced by Serge Koussevitzky from his home at Lenox. The conductor will return to Boston late this week to assemble the orchestra for rehearsal in preparation for the season's opening on Oct. 10.

The opening program for Oct. 10-11 will be as follows: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Prokofieff's Suite from "Romeo and Juliet," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Ravel. One pair of concerts will be devoted to the music of Dvorak, in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of the Czech composer. Another anniversary is the 150th of the death of Mozart, which occurs in December, when selections from this composer's Requiem will be performed.

New music by composers of this country and of the other Americas will figure upon the programs. Carlos Chavez, the Mexican composer, will conduct music of his own. The Choros No. 10 of Villa-Lobos of Brazil will be repeated. Composers of our country will include William Schuman, whose new Third Symphony will have its first performance, John Alden Carpenter, and Leo Sowerby, whose symphonies will be played. A new symphony by Arthur Lourie will have its first performance. Prokofieff's Third Symphony, as yet unheard in America, will be played, and the First Symphony of Shostskevitch, which Koussevitzky has not performed. The great symphonies and other works of the established spmphonic repertory will, of course, predominate upon the season's programs. Bach's Passion According to Saint Matthew will be revived at a choral concert in the spring.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

OCT 4 - 1941

Patriotism and Music

"The Star Spangled Banner" was never played at any of the concerts during the regular three weeks series of the Berkshire Music Fesival this summer. It was rumored that Dr. Koussevitzky emphatically stated such a composition had no place on a symphonic program and that he would have none of it.

Here in Philadelphia a little bird is spreading the story that the Board of Directors of the Philadelphia Orchestra has ordered this dreadful jangle for breakfast, lunch and dinner, so to speak, for the docile Philadelphia audience. If we must have patriotism mixed with our music, could it not take a silent form? Instead of "Oh Say Can You See" why not set the thermometer in the Academy of Music at 68? We could thus conserve fuel, help to save the British Empire, as well as improve the health of the audience and members of the Orchestra.

REBECCA WINDSOR EVANS
Malvern, Pa.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

OCT 5 - 1941

WITH THE

NOVELTIES by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, this season will include William Schuman's Third symphony and a new symphony by Arthur Lourié, both of which will receive their first performances. Prokofieff's Third symphony, as yet unheard in America, also will be presented, as will the First symphony of Shostakovich, hitherto unperformed by Dr. Koussevitzki.

Boston Herald Oct. 5, 1941

Random Thoughts on the Symphonic Season of 1941-42

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The Boston Symphony will slide into its 61st season this week with remarkably little fanfare. Mr. Koussevitzky returned from a solitary vacation recently and gave out a few of the works that he intended to play. Previously the management released a modest list of soloists. Even this mild announcement provoked the thunder of Mr. Petrillo, czar of the Musicians' Union, who uttered a fierce declaration of war for war's sake.

Undisturbed by these demonstrations the orchestra is going its own way. As a matter of fact at no time in its history, possibly, is it so immune from outside influences of this description. A marvellously perfect ensemble, with a conductor undeniably at the top of his bent, the Boston Symphony is pretty generally regarded as the best there is. For once it does little harm to deny it its share of famous soloists, for the latter are the ones who are destined to lose by the union's machinations. Economically in this case there is no justification for a labor fight. The men, of course, can do as they choose in the matter. At any rate for the time being the orchestra is as invulnerable as any body can be from the arrows of sharp practice.

MUSIC IN PROSPECT

As we intimated Mr. Koussevitzky has been rather chary of mentioning new scores. Carlos Chavez, William Schuman, John Alden Carpenter, Leo Sowerby, Arthur Lourie—these are for the most part unknown quantities as far as their new works are concerned. Specific mention of them merely testifies once again to Mr. Koussevitzky's persistent interest in American music. At the outset of the season we expect such a list, though we may be excused from wild enthusiasm over its announcement. Its absence only at this proper time might cause editorial comment or raised eyebrows from the jealous guardians of our culture.

Mr. Koussevitzky will revive an interesting suite by Prokofieff for the first program and he also announces the Third Symphony by the same composer, which is as yet unheard in this country. Moreover his new found delight in Shostakovitch will give us that composer's First Symphony. Emphasis on Prokofieff is of deep interest to us, not only for the chance to hear his music but also, now that the diplomatic situation between the United States of America and Russia has so radically changed, because of the rumor—totally unconfirmed—that he may come to this country again.

For the rest we are told that the two centenaries of this year will be faithfully observed—that of Dvorak, who was born in September, 1841, and of Mozart, who died in December, 1791. There is still a lot of music on the shelves of the Boston Symphony's library which would be well worth reviving. What of some of the scores composed for the 50th? What of that difficult work, Florent Schmitt's Symphonie Concertante? What of Roussell's Fourth Symphony? What of Falla's Nights in the Gardens of Spain, which would provide a welcome contrast and also a good role for Mr. Sanroma? Well, we could all of us make up programs by the barrel; and doubtless Mr. Koussevitzky is as sorely tempted and pulled this way and that in his own preferences as any one else. We have all trusted him for 16 seasons and he has not conspicuously let us down yet.

THE PHILHARMONIC

If the Boston Symphony has been reticent about its publicity this year, the Philharmonic, with a centennial on its hands, has been just the reverse. It opens its season this week, with the volatile Mr. Stokowski in charge. You will be absolutely astounded to learn that his opening program includes two of his own Bach transcriptions, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, a work by Henry Cowell, which was a special number with his Youth Orchestra, and—you will never guess—the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan." Such devotion deserves something or other.

As you may know, the chief aspect of the Philharmonic's celebration was the engagement of more guest conductors than ever had been signed on in one year for one orchestra before. Our own Mr. Koussvitzky, Mr. Walter, Mr. Mitroupoulos, M. Barbirolli, Mr. Rodzinski are some of the lucky ones, though Mr. Petrillo has breathed fire and vowed that the first named shall not pass. When this policy was announced a sort of agonized groan arose from many of the music critics, who tended to ask, "Where is the music?" Promptly the management suggested that each conductor include an American work on his programs, at which was heaved a sigh of relief that the cause of the American composer would not suffer. Some of the conductors have already set forth fairly elaborate plans, which make the Philharmonic's season look much more interesting than the original announcement of the "ministry of all the talents." Consequently we may expect up here to be rather out of the lime-light for a spell, a condition said to be the envy of good Bostonians.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 5 - 1941

SYMPHONY SEASON TO OPEN FRIDAY

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Serge Koussevitzky will open his seventeenth successive season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony hall. The programme for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts will begin with Beethoven's in E-flat major, the "Eroica." There will follow the second Suite which Prokofieff has drawn from his Ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." The Suite was introduced to Boston by the composer when he conducted this orchestra in the spring of 1938; it has not hitherto been conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston. The concluding number will be the "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgski, the Piano Suite as set for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel. The movements include Promenade-Gnomus-Il Vecchio Castello-Tuileries-Bydlo-Ballet of Chicks in their shells-Samuel Goldenburg and Schmuyle-Limoges: The Marketplace-Catacomba (Con mortuis in lingua mortua)-The Hut on Fowl's legs—The Great Gate at Kiev

Herald Oct 9, 1941

Symphony as Usual

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its 61st season tomorrow. At the same time Serge Koussevitzky enters his seventeenth year of successful command. The public has perhaps been alarmed for the orchestra's safety by reason of the hostility expressed by President Petrillo of the American Federation of Musicians. But the orchestra itself is proceeding calmly under its own power, and is paying little attention to the threats from Chicago.

Possibly at no time in its history has the Boston Symphony been so immune against the problem of popular soloists and their effect upon the box office. The public is aware of the orchestra's prowess and the inspiration of a great leader in Dr. Koussevitzky. Other orchestras in announcing their plans have laid particular emphasis on their soloists. The Chicago Orchestra, for instance, listed so many that it is difficult to see how there can be a concert during the season without one.

The New York Philharmonic, which is celebrating its 100th anniversary this year, has called attention to itself as America's oldest orchestra by engaging more guest conductors than any orchestra ever has done before. It is a curious way for an institution to rejoice—to summon in and advertise a roll of eminent guests who have had little or nothing to do with its history. Meanwhile we here in Boston can go back to the pleasant routine of attending Symphony Hall each week with the comforting realization that "things are as they have been." A touch of smugness there may be in this reflection, but occasion for it is so rare these days that it seems pardonable.

BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER GREEN MAGAZINE, OCT. 5, 1941 — 24

'Eroica' Opens the Symphony

Inaugurating his 17th successive season as conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of the season's concerts next Friday afternoon.

Beethoven's Third Symphony, the "Eroica," based on the life and exploits of Napoleon, will comprise the first half of the opening program.

Prokofieff's Second Suite from the Ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," first introduced to Boston by the composer himself in the spring of 1938, and the Ravel orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," make up the second half of the program.

The concert will be repeated on Saturday evening.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Sunday Advertiser Oct. 12, 1941

Orchestra In Mozart Symphony

With Dr. Serge Koussevitzky leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a masterly performance, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony ushered in the season at Symphony Hall.

As was to be expected this was a magnificent reading of the "giant" symphony, presented to a season that holds brilliant promise.

For the second pair of concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the program holds Mozart's "Prague" Symphony in D major, the first performance of William Schuman's Symphony No. 3, and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique."

On Thursday evening the Cambridge series of concerts opens at Sanders Theater.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

SEP 25 1941

Koussevitzky Refreshed After Runaway

Conductor Now Sojourning at Lenox Home

LENOX — A romantic story of flight and self-exile in quest of relief from his too-well-known summer home, was revealed today by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

After strenuous summer weeks of Festival rehearsing and conducting at Tanglewood, combined with teaching and administrative conferences at the Berkshire Music Center, Koussevitzky sought relaxation at his estate, Serenak. But there was no peace to be had—the place was too easy to find.

"And so," Koussevitzky said with a grin, "I took an airplane, which left me in a pleasant place in the South, which I will not name. There I had a cottage by the seashore. I did not have a telephone. That was beautiful. I was a complete exile from publishers, composers and — even my secretary and my manager. My only companions were a Negro chef and two little children who met me every day. And all I did was nothing—just sun bathing, and carrying one child under each arm down to the water to go wading. Such a wonderful vacation."

It is understood that this is probably the first time in his career as musician that Koussevitzky ever spent a vacation in complete relaxation. The conductor has been devoting his time at Lenox to the study of new scores. He will return to his Boston home at the end of next week and will assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra Monday, Oct. 6, for the first rehearsal.

The 61st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open in Symphony Hall, Friday, Oct. 10, with the following program:

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Prokofieff's Suite from "Romeo and Juliet," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Ravel.

This Clipping From CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

SEP 21 1941

KOUSSEVITZKY PAYS TRIBUTE TO THE MAGIC OF FM

Boston, Mass., Sept. 20 [Special].—An unusual tribute was paid to frequency modulation recently here by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky after he had heard the Boston Symphony orchestra, which he conducts, broadcast over the new noise free, full fidelity system.

Dr. Koussevitzky asserted that F-M marks the beginning of a new era in symphonic broadcasting. He added that he had never heard the various instruments so clearly reproduced.

"Heretofore," he said, "a clarinet always has been an awful instrument over the radio. Now it is beautiful. The timbre of the different choirs comes over with exceptional fidelity. Never before in a broadcast have I been able to pick out each instrument individually."

The conductor heard the broadcast via W1XK at Hull, Mass.

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

OCT 3 - 1941

Special Works Are Announced For Boston Symphony's 61st Season

Special works to be played at the coming 61st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are announced by Serge Koussevitzky from his home at Lenox. The conductor will return to Boston late this week to assemble the orchestra for rehearsal in preparation for the season's opening on Oct. 10.

The opening program for Oct. 10-11 will be as follows: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Prokofieff's Suite from "Romeo and Juliet," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Ravel. One pair of concerts will be devoted to the music of Dvorak, in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of the Czech composer. Another anniversary is the 150th of the death of Mozart, which occurs in December, when selections from this composer's Requiem will be performed.

New music by composers of this country and of the other Americas will figure upon the programs. Carlos Chavez, the Mexican composer, will conduct music of his own. The Choros No. 10 of Villa-Lobos of Brazil will be repeated. Composers of our country will include William Schuman, whose new Third Symphony will have its first performance, John Alden Carpenter, and Leo Sowerby, whose symphonies will be played. A new symphony by Arthur Lourie will have its first performance. Prokofieff's Third Symphony, as yet unheard in America, will be played, and the First Symphony of Shostskevitch, which Koussevitzky has not performed. The great symphonies and other works of the established spmphonic repertory will, of course, predominate upon the season's programs. Bach's Passion According to Saint Matthew will be revived at a choral concert in the spring.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

OCT 4 - 1941

Patriotism and Music

"The Star Spangled Banner" was never played at any of the concerts during the regular three weeks series of the Berkshire Music Fesival this summer. It was rumored that Dr. Koussevitzky emphatically stated such a composition had no place on a symphonic program and that he would have none of it.

Here in Philadelphia a little bird is spreading the story that the Board of Directors of the Philadelphia Orchestra has ordered this dreadful jangle for breakfast, lunch and dinner, so to speak, for the docile Philadelphia audience. If we must have patriotism mixed with our music, could it not take a silent form? Instead of "Oh Say Can You See" why not set the thermometer in the Academy of Music at 68? We could thus conserve fuel, help to save the British Empire, as well as improve the health of the audience and members of the Orchestra.

REBECCA WINDSOR EVANS
Malvern, Pa.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

OCT 5 - 1941

WITH THE

NOVELTIES by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, this season will include William Schuman's Third symphony and a new symphony by Arthur Lourié, both of which will receive their first performances. Prokofieff's Third symphony, as yet unheard in America, also will be presented, as will the First symphony of Shostakovich, hitherto unperformed by Dr. Koussevitzki.

Boston Herald Oct. 5, 1941

Random Thoughts on the Symphonic Season of 1941-42

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The Boston Symphony will slide into its 61st season this week with remarkably little fanfare. Mr. Koussevitzky returned from a solitary vacation recently and gave out a few of the works that he intended to play. Previously the management released a modest list of soloists. Even this mild announcement provoked the thunder of Mr. Petrillo, czar of the Musicians' Union, who uttered a fierce declaration of war for war's sake.

Undisturbed by these demonstrations the orchestra is going its own way. As a matter of fact at no time in its history, possibly, is it so immune from outside influences of this description. A marvellously perfect ensemble, with a conductor undeniably at the top of his bent, the Boston Symphony is pretty generally regarded as the best there is. For once it does little harm to deny it its share of famous soloists, for the latter are the ones who are destined to lose by the union's machinations. Economically in this case there is no justification for a labor fight. The men, of course, can do as they choose in the matter. At any rate for the time being the orchestra is as invulnerable as any body can be from the arrows of sharp practice.

MUSIC IN PROSPECT

As we intimated Mr. Koussevitzky has been rather chary of mentioning new scores. Carlos Chavez, William Schuman, John Alden Carpenter, Leo Sowerby, Arthur Lourie—these are for the most part unknown quantities as far as their new works are concerned. Specific mention of them merely testifies once again to Mr. Koussevitzky's persistent interest in American music. At the outset of the season we expect such a list, though we may be excused from wild enthusiasm over its announcement. Its absence only at this proper time might cause editorial comment or raised eyebrows from the jealous guardians of our culture.

Mr. Koussevitzky will revive an interesting suite by Prokofieff for the first program and he also announces the Third Symphony by the same composer, which is as yet unheard in this country. Moreover his new found delight in Shostakovitch will give us that composer's First Symphony. Emphasis on Prokofieff is of deep interest to us, not only for the chance to hear his music but also, now that the diplomatic situation between the United States of America and Russia has so radically changed, because of the rumor—totally unconfirmed—that he may come to this country again.

For the rest we are told that the two centenaries of this year will be faithfully observed—that of Dvorak, who was born in September, 1841, and of Mozart, who died in December, 1791. There is still a lot of music on the shelves of the Boston Symphony's library which would be well worth reviving. What of some of the scores composed for the 50th? What of that difficult work, Florent Schmitt's Symphonie Concertante? What of Roussell's Fourth Symphony? What of Falla's Nights in the Gardens of Spain, which would provide a welcome contrast and also a good role for Mr. Sanroma? Well, we could all of us make up programs by the barrel; and doubtless Mr. Koussevitzky is as sorely tempted and pulled this way and that in his own preferences as any one else. We have all trusted him for 16 seasons and he has not conspicuously let us down yet.

THE PHILHARMONIC

If the Boston Symphony has been reticent about its publicity this year, the Philharmonic, with a centennial on its hands, has been just the reverse. It opens its season this week, with the volatile Mr. Stokowski in charge. You will be absolutely astounded to learn that his opening program includes two of his own Bach transcriptions, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, a work by Henry Cowell, which was a special number with his Youth Orchestra, and—you will never guess—the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan." Such devotion deserves something or other.

As you may know, the chief aspect of the Philharmonic's celebration was the engagement of more guest conductors than ever had been signed on in one year for one orchestra before. Our own Mr. Koussvitzky, Mr. Walter, Mr. Mitroupoulos, M. Barbirolli, Mr. Rodzinski are some of the lucky ones, though Mr. Petrillo has breathed fire and vowed that the first named shall not pass. When this policy was announced a sort of agonized groan arose from many of the music critics, who tended to ask, "Where is the music?" Promptly the management suggested that each conductor include an American work on his programs, at which was heaved a sigh of relief that the cause of the American composer would not suffer. Some of the conductors have already set forth fairly elaborate plans, which make the Philharmonic's season look much more interesting than the original announcement of the "ministry of all the talents." Consequently we may expect up here to be rather out of the lime-light for a spell, a condition said to be the envy of good Bostonians.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 5 - 1941

SYMPHONY SEASON TO OPEN FRIDAY

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Serge Koussevitzky will open his seventeenth successive season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony hall. The programme for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts will begin with Beethoven's in E-flat major, the "Eroica." There will follow the second Suite which Prokofieff has drawn from his Ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." The Suite was introduced to Boston by the composer when he conducted this orchestra in the spring of 1938; it has not hitherto been conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston. The concluding number will be the "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgski, the Piano Suite as set for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel. The movements include Promenade-Gnomus-Il Vecchio Castello-Tuileries-Bydlo-Ballet of Chicks in their shells-Samuel Goldenburg and Schmuyle-Limoges: The Marketplace-Catacomba (Con mortuis in lingua mortua)-The Hut on Fowl's legs—The Great Gate at Kiev

Boston Herald Oct. 9, 1941

Symphony as Usual

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its 61st season tomorrow. At the same time Serge Koussevitzky enters his seventeenth year of successful command. The public has perhaps been alarmed for the orchestra's safety by reason of the hostility expressed by President Petrillo of the American Federation of Musicians. But the orchestra itself is proceeding calmly under its own power, and is paying little attention to the threats from Chicago.

Possibly at no time in its history has the Boston Symphony been so immune against the problem of popular soloists and their effect upon the box office. The public is aware of the orchestra's prowess and the inspiration of a great leader in Dr. Koussevitzky. Other orchestras in announcing their plans have laid particular emphasis on their soloists. The Chicago Orchestra, for instance, listed so many that it is difficult to see how there can be a concert during the season without one.

The New York Philharmonic, which is celebrating its 100th anniversary this year, has called attention to itself as America's oldest orchestra by engaging more guest conductors than any orchestra ever has done before. It is a curious way for an institution to rejoice—to summon in and advertise a roll of eminent guests who have had little or nothing to do with its history. Meanwhile we here in Boston can go back to the pleasant routine of attending Symphony Hall each week with the comforting realization that "things are as they have been." A touch of smugness there may be in this reflection, but occasion for it is so rare these days that it seems pardonable.

BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER GREEN MAGAZINE, OCT. 5, 1941

24

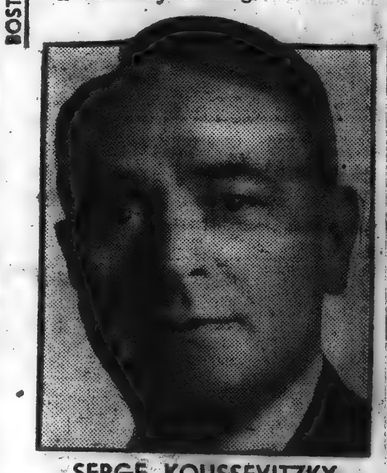
'Eroica' Opens the Symphony

Inaugurating his 17th successive season as conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of the season's concerts next Friday afternoon.

Beethoven's Third Symphony, the "Eroica," based on the life and exploits of Napoleon, will comprise the first half of the opening program.

Prokofieff's Second Suite from the Ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," first introduced to Boston by the composer himself in the spring of 1938, and the Ravel orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," make up the second half of the program.

The concert will be repeated on Saturday evening.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Orchestra
Sunday Advertiser
Oct. 12, 1941

In Mozart Symphony

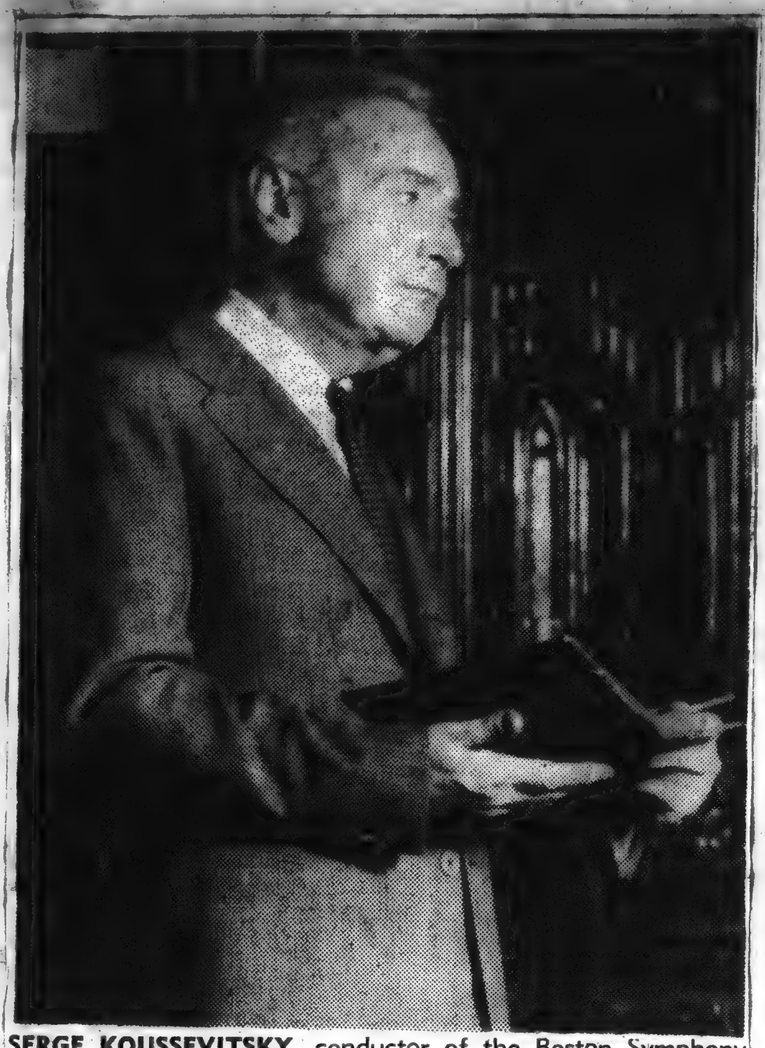
With Dr. Serge Koussevitzky leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a masterly performance, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony ushered in the season at Symphony Hall.

As was to be expected this was a magnificent reading of the "giant" symphony, presented to a season that holds brilliant promise.

For the second pair of concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the program holds Mozart's "Prague" Symphony in D major, the first performance of William Schuman's Symphony No. 3, and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique."

On Thursday evening the Cambridge series of concerts opens at Sanders Theater.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which begins its 61st season at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.



SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens its 61st season at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon.

SYMPHONY OPENS 61ST MUSIC YEAR

Conventional Pieces Played With Rare Brilliance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Either Mr. Petrillo's pickets were discouraged by the rain or the music czar has decided to use more subtle methods in his attempt to unionize the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Anyway there was nothing untoward going on outside Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, save for the work on the new underpass, while inside things were quite unchanged, and the first Symphony Concert might well have been the previous season's last.

OF UTMOST BRILLIANCE

At one time it was customary for the reviewers to expatiate on the fact that the newly assembled orchestra played as smoothly as though there had been no break in its routine. But that was before the days of Esplanade concerts and Berkshire Festivals. Now it would be pertinent to remark that the men were as fresh, their playing as zestful as though their vacation had been a longer one. There were no signs yesterday that either players or conductor had gone stale.

On the contrary, Dr. Koussevitzky was unusually pepful and the orchestral playing was of the utmost tonal brilliance. Particularly was this true of the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition," which brought matters to a close with a rarely sonorous version of the final tableau, "The Great Gate at Kiev." As one auditor remarked, Dr. Koussevitzky gave the impression that he personally was winning the war for Russia.

Prokofieff's "Romeo"

Brilliant, too, was the performance of four numbers from the Second Suite made by Prokofieff from his music for a ballet after Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet"—a long way after, as the ancient wheeze has it. When Prokofieff himself conducted this music here in the spring of 1938 it fell as a pancake. Yesterday it was anything but flat, though it is far from being first-rate Prokofieff, but it seemed as inappropriate as ever to its subject matter.

Possibly Berlioz, Gounod and Tchaikovsky have given us a conditioned reflex in regard to "Romeo" music. In his own way, each of these composers has captured the spirit or caught the flavor of Shakespeare, of the period of the play, of youth or young love or of bitter tragedy. Prokofieff's score, on the other hand, summons none of these images. As Four Pieces for Orchestra, yesterday's excerpts would have made a far stronger impression and at the same time have relieved the critical listener of the necessity of trying to reconcile the irreconcilable.

A Revised "Eroica"

Beethoven's "Eroica" served as opening number and Dr. Koussevitzky was plainly minded to give its thrice-familiar measures a new or, at least, an intensified reading. So far as externals were concerned he accomplished his purpose admirably. Or, to put it differently, he seemed to have approached the problem from the outside rather than the inside. In the first movement accents were sharpened; staccato chords become tonal explosions, suggesting in one instance an engine letting off steam.

By these revisions the less inward Scherzo and Finale profited more than the aforesaid Allegro con brio and the mighty Funeral March.

Symphony Season Opens This Friday

On Friday afternoon next and Saturday evening, October 10 and 11, Serge Koussevitzky will open his 17th successive season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall. The program for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts will begin with Beethoven's third symphony in E-flat major, the "Eroica." There will follow the second suite which Prokofieff has drawn from his ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." The suite was introduced to Boston by the composer when he conducted this orchestra in the spring of 1938. The ballet was composed in 1935; it has not hitherto been conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston.

The concluding number will be the "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgsky, the piano suite as set for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel. The movements include Promenade—Gnomus, Il Vecchio Castello, Tuileries, Rydlo, Ballet of Chicks in

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN & CITIZEN-LEADER
OCT 7 - 1941

Music

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

(Greater-Lowell music lovers having news of interest to the musical world are respectfully invited to address to Mr. Fleet, care of The Sun and Citizen-Leader office.)

Heralding the opening of the musical season in Massachusetts this week are the first concerts in the regular season of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and the annual Worcester Music Festival in the Heart of the Commonwealth.

Worcester's week of music, the 82nd festival in the long list, was ushered in last night, as has been in recent seasons, by a stage performance of opera. Two works were presented on this occasion, one a genuine American work, both in theme and treatment, Douglas Moore's "The Devil and Daniel Webster," set to the text of Stephen Vincent Benet, and the other "L'Heure Espagnole" (The Spanish Hour) by Ravel, the eminent French composer of Bolero fame. These compositions enlisted the services of an interesting group of principals, the festival chorus and orchestra, all under the direction of Albert Stoessel who, for many seasons, has carried the festival to success. In the American work David Otto sang the role of Webster, Donald Dame that of the sinister Scratch and Harriet Henders that of Mavy.

Mr. Benet's story, it may be recalled, first appeared in a popular weekly magazine. It suggested operatic possibilities to Mr. Moore. And his composition, which has been produced in New York, was the result. Since then it has been done into a motion picture under the title "All That Money Can Buy." Commenting on the story, Mr. Benet makes no claims to historical accuracy. But he reminds us that while there was the Webster of the great speeches, there was also the Webster whose legend still lingers in the rocks of New England, the farmer, the hunter, the fisherman. The story is an attempt at telling one such legend. In effect it is an American "Faust." But in this case doughty Daniel foils the Devil.

The Worcester series continues this evening with a program of choral and instrumental music in which J. M. Sanroma will be the featured soloist in the MacDowell Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra. Novelty in Worcester will be the much discussed Choros No. 10 by H. Villa-Lobos.

There are no programs on Wednesday. On Thursday evening Anna Kaskas, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, will be featured with the women's chorus and orchestra in Gustav Holst's "Hecuba's Lament" and also in a group of operatic arias.

Artist's night on Friday will introduce in solo and concerted numbers Jarmila Novotna, soprano; Michael Bartlett, tenor; Anna Kaskas, contralto and Norman Cordon, baritone. The festival comes to a close Saturday night with a stage performance of Verdi's "La Traviata" in which Susanne Fisher, Clifford Menz and Clifford Harvuot will sing the leading roles.

Boston Symphony

As is his custom, Serge Koussevitzky has chosen familiar musical material for the programs of the opening concerts of the season this week Friday afternoon and Satur-

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The first concert of the 61st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Herald - Oct. 11

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, Op. 55, "Eroica"
Prokofieff..."Romeo and Juliet," 2d Suite from the Ballet, Op. 64
Moussorgsky..."Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestration by Maurice Ravel

It is always good to have the Symphony start up again in the fall. The familiar traffic jam on Massachusetts avenue, the same orchestra on the stage, the same old audience filling the hall, these things give one a sense, perhaps false, of security. At any rate in these days it is a pleasant sense, and we might as well bask in it while we can.

Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday started his 18th season in command of the orchestra. The usual rising welcome was given him before the concert, and richly does he deserve it. He is a miraculous man, and no music is ever lifeless or dispirited when he is there to direct it. He demands from the men much; he refuses to let them grow stale; he insists on and gets mid-season form at the very outset. He has doubtless learned much in the past 17 years from being in such close contact with as fine a body of musicians as the personnel of the Boston Symphony. But he has given it all back and more. He has inspired performances that those of us who have had the luck to hear them will never forget. We shall do well not to take for granted the genius of such a leader as Serge Koussevitzky.

Yesterday's concert was an exemplary beginning for the season. A brilliant and vital performance of the Eroica Symphony could not be better for such an occasion. Familiar as the music is to most of us it does not pall for an instant in such an interpretation as this.

Prokofieff himself conducted his "Romeo and Juliet" Suite in his last memorable visit to this country, when he scolded us for not being serious minded. We liked the Suite then and liked it even more as Mr. Koussevitzky unfolded it yesterday afternoon. Like all great composers Prokofieff has certain easily recognizable tricks of style, and you will have no difficulty when listening to the Suite in noting a similarity here to the 2nd Violin Concerto, there to "Peter and the Wolf."

It is amusing to see how in the "Juliet" movement Prokofieff has no qualms about being, as Sir Donald Hovey remarked once about Schumann, "recklessly pretty." With another man this might easily slop over into sentimentality, but Prokofieff handles the dangerous stuff with the most acute skill. Again, the Dance might be too trivial for words. But it isn't, and that is the difference creatively between genius and just plain talent.

The last movement heard yesterday contains some of the noblest and most emotionally serious pages that Prokofieff ever wrote. As a rule he is generally best when he is being entertaining, but he can pull a long face also with the best of them. There were passages that reminded us of Richard Strauss, strange bedfellow for Prokofieff! The Suite is a fine work and was a happy choice for Mr. Koussevitzky to have down from the shelf.

Last year, it will be remembered, Mr. Koussevitzky moved his audience deeply by playing Vaughn Williams' London Symphony; and this year, with an eye, doubtless, for the appropriateness of it in world history, he offered us the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition" with its stunning climax in the Great Gate at Kiev. There were cries of "bravo" when the last tremendous chords had ended, and well there might be.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week three symphonies will be played: Mozart's in D major, William Schuman's Third and the 6th of Tchaikovsky.

Boston Herald Oct. 8, 1941

Symphony Season Starts on Friday

The ceaselessly active Serge Koussevitzky in a rare quiet moment in his home in Brookline, as he examined a volume of bound early programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the 61st season of which he opens Friday afternoon. The occasion will also mark the start of his own 17th year as its conductor. The program will open with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, followed by the Second Suite from the "Romeo and Juliet" ballet of Prokofieff, who, incidentally, has now reached his 50th year. For conclusion of the program there will be heard Ravel's orchestration of the piano pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition," by Moussorgsky, who died 80 years ago. A timely note, the "Pictures" come to a climax with "The Great Gate at Kiev."

Spiritual Uplift of Koussevitzky's Music Praised

'Sane, Joyous Beauty in a World Gone Mad,' Rev. Dr. Cole Asserts

Herald Oct 13

Following his first attendance at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a resident minister in this city, Rev. Dr. Walton E. Cole, now minister of Second Church in Boston, yesterday morning used part of his sermon period to pay an eloquent tribute to the orchestra and to its leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

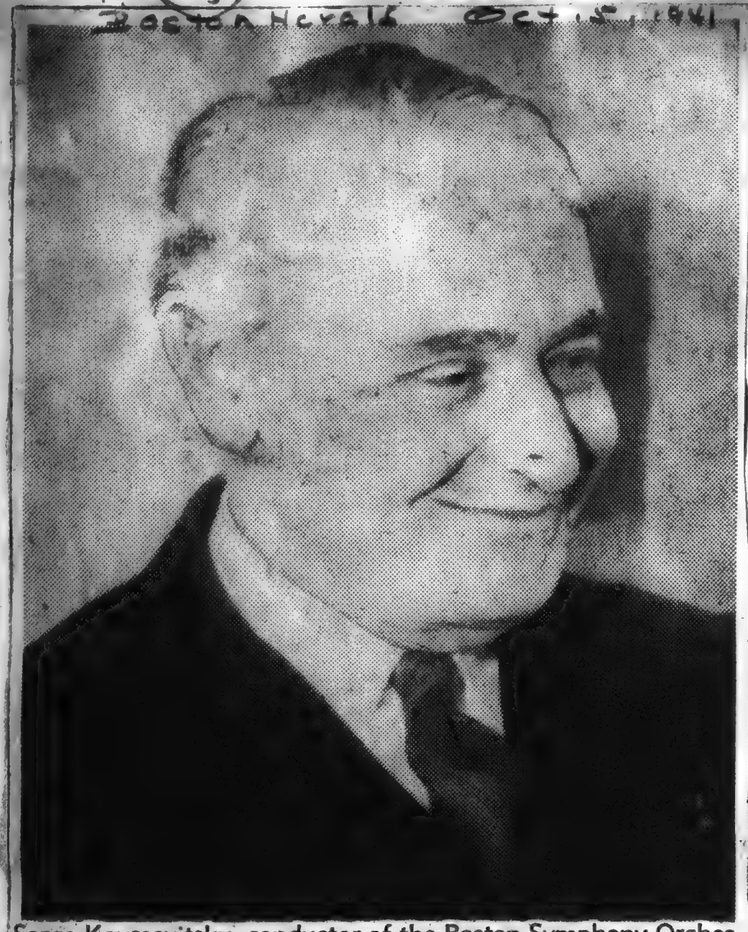
"One of the satisfactions of moving to Boston is that I am able now to say 'our' symphony instead of being content with saying 'your' symphony. What a spiritual experience Dr. Koussevitzky gave us last night! It was sane, joyous beauty in a world gone mad," he said.

"At a moment when the fate of Europe and the rest of the world hangs in the balance, when Germany and Russia are locked in the embrace of death, it was significant to find the genius of the German Beethoven and the Russian Prokofieff and Moussorgsky united in the same program. From the challenging opening notes of the "Eroica Symphony" to the majestic crashing chord at the conclusion of "The Great Gate of Kiev," one felt the triumphant power of the human spirit. Dr. Koussevitzky's genius and the incomparable playing of America's greatest orchestra gave one a feeling of faith in the victory of the spiritual side of our civilization.

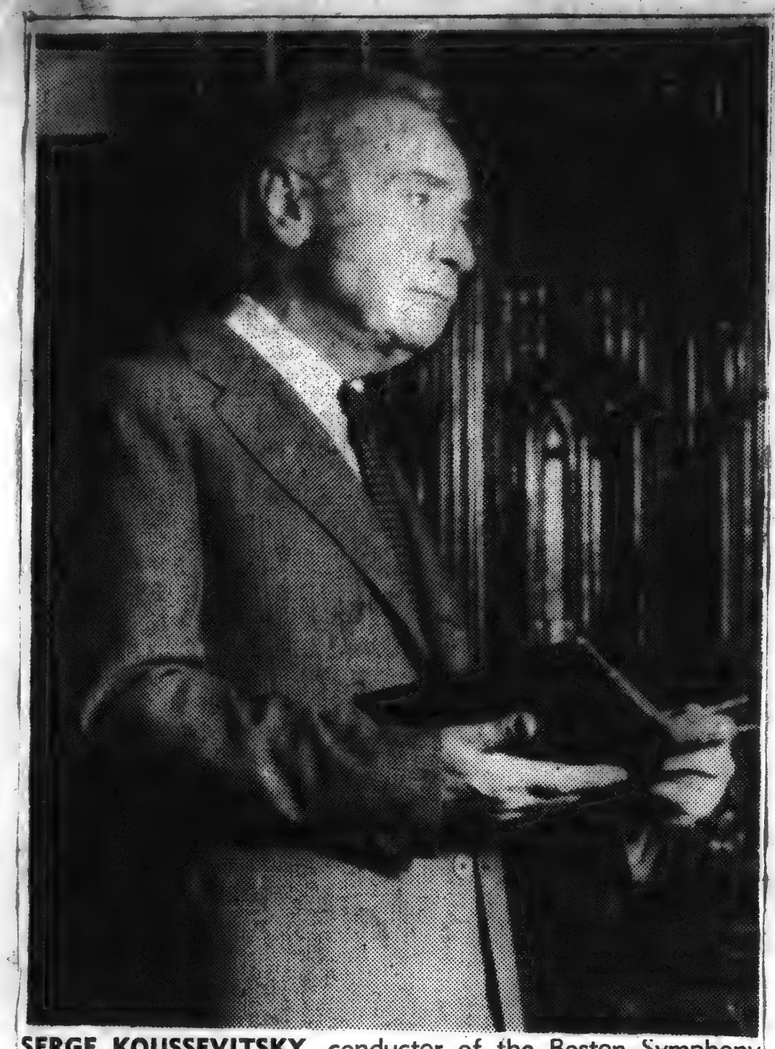
"It was interesting to recall as one listened that Beethoven's great works were composed while Europe was terrorized by Napoleon's conquering power. One remembered that Napoleon is dead in defeat while Beethoven's vision of beauty was being re-created under the baton of Boston's Koussevitzky."

In his more formal sermon which followed, Dr. Cole declared that "the self-centered life is the self-defeated life. The most satisfying life is the life adequately prepared for serving."

Boston Herald Oct 5, 1941



Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which begins its 61st season at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.



SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens its 61st season at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon.

SYMPHONY OPENS 61ST MUSIC YEAR

Boston Post Oct 11, 1941

Conventional Pieces Played With Rare Brilliance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Either Mr. Petrillo's pickets were discouraged by the rain or the music czar has decided to use more subtle methods in his attempt to unionize the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Anyway there was nothing untoward going on outside Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, save for the work on the new underpass, while inside things were quite unchanged, and the first Symphony Concert might well have been the previous season's last.

OF UTMOST BRILLIANCE

At one time it was customary for the reviewers to expatiate on the fact that the newly assembled orchestra played as smoothly as though there had been no break in its routine. But that was before the days of Esplanade concerts and Berkshire Festivals. Now it would be pertinent to remark that the men were as fresh, their playing as zestful as though their vacation had been a longer one. There were no signs yesterday that either players or conductor had gone stale.

On the contrary, Dr. Koussevitzky was unusually pepful and the orchestral playing was of the utmost tonal brilliance. Particularly was this true of the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition," which brought matters to a close with a rarely sonorous version of the final tableau, "The Great Gate at Kiev." As one auditor remarked, Dr. Koussevitzky gave the impression that he personally was winning the war for Russia.

Prokofieff's "Romeo"

Brilliant, too, was the performance of four numbers from the Second Suite made by Prokofieff from his music for a ballet after Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet"—a long way after, as the ancient wheeze has it. When Prokofieff himself conducted this music here in the spring of 1938 it fell as a pancake. Yesterday it was anything but flat, though it is far from being first-rate Prokofieff, but it seemed as inappropriate as ever to its subject matter.

Possibly Berlioz, Gounod and Tchaikovsky have given us a conditioned reflex in regard to "Romeo" music. In his own way, each of these composers has captured the spirit or caught the flavor of Shakespeare, of the period of the play, of youth or young love or of bitter tragedy. Prokofieff's score, on the other hand, summons none of these images. As Four Pieces for Orchestra, yesterday's excerpts would have made a far stronger impression and at the same time have relieved the critical listener of the necessity of trying to reconcile the irreconcilable.

A Revised "Eroica"

Beethoven's "Eroica" served as opening number and Dr. Koussevitzky was plainly minded to give its thrice-familiar measures a new or, at least, an intensified reading. So far as externals were concerned he accomplished his purpose admirably. Or, to put it differently, he seemed to have approached the problem from the outside rather than the inside. In the first movement accents were sharpened; staccato chords become tonal explosions, suggesting in one instance an engine letting off steam.

By these revisions the less inward Scherzo and Finale profited more than the aforesaid Allegro con brio and the mighty Funeral March.

Symphony Season Opens This Friday

On Friday afternoon next and Saturday evening, October 10 and 11, Serge Koussevitzky will open his 17th successive season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall. The program for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts will begin with Beethoven's third symphony in E-flat major, the "Eroica." There will follow the second suite which Prokofieff has drawn from his ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." The suite was introduced to Boston by the composer when he conducted this orchestra in the spring of 1938. The ballet was composed in 1935; it has not hitherto been conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston.

The concluding number will be the "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgsky, the piano suite as set for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel. The movements include Promenade—Gnomus, Il Vecchio Castello, Tuileries, Rydlo, Ballet of Chicks in

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN & CITIZEN-LEADER
OCT 7 - 1941

Music

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

(Greater-Lowell music lovers having news of interest to the musical world are respectfully invited to address to Mr. Fleet, care of The Sun and Citizen-Leader office.)

Heralding the opening of the musical season in Massachusetts this week are the first concerts in the regular season of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and the annual Worcester Music Festival in the Heart of the Commonwealth.

Worcester's week of music, the 82nd festival in the long list, was ushered in last night, as has been in recent seasons, by a stage performance of opera. Two works were presented on this occasion, one a genuine American work both in theme and treatment, Douglas Moore's "The Devil and Daniel Webster," set to the text of Stephen Vincent Benet, and the other "L'Heure Espagnole" (The Spanish Hour) by Ravel, the eminent French composer of Bolero fame. These compositions enlisted the services of an interesting group of principals, the festival chorus and orchestra, all under the direction of Albert Stoessel who, for many seasons, has carried the festival to success. In the American work David Otto sang the role of Webster, Donald Dame that of the sinister Scratch and Harriet Henders that of Mavy.

Mr. Benet's story, it may be recalled, first appeared in a popular weekly magazine. It suggested operatic possibilities to Mr. Moore. And his composition, which has been produced in New York, was the result. Since then it has been done into a motion picture under the title "All That Money Can Buy." Commenting on the story, Mr. Benet makes no claims to historical accuracy. But he reminds us that while there was the Webster of the great speeches, there was also the Webster whose legend still lingers in the rocks of New England, the farmer, the hunter, the fisherman. The story is an attempt at telling one such legend. In effect it is an American "Faust." But in this case doughty Daniel foils the Devil.

The Worcester series continues this evening with a program of choral and instrumental music in which J. M. Sanroma will be the featured soloist in the MacDowell Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra. Novelty in Worcester will be the much discussed Choros No. 10 by H. Villa-Lobos.

There are no programs on Wednesday. On Thursday evening Anna Kaskas, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, will be featured with the women's chorus and orchestra in Gustav Holst's "Hecuba's Lament" and also in a group of operatic arias.

Artist's night on Friday will introduce in solo and concerted numbers Jarmila Novotna, soprano; Michael Bartlett, tenor; Anna Kaskas, contralto and Norman Cordon, baritone. The festival comes to a close Saturday night with a stage performance of Verdi's "La Traviata" in which Susanne Fisher, Clifford Menz and Clifford Harvuot will sing the leading roles.

Boston Symphony

As is his custom, Serge Koussevitzky has chosen familiar musical material for the programs of the opening concerts of the season this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. On the list he has put Beethoven's Third Symphony, the Eroica; the Second Suite from Prokofieff's ballet "Romeo and Juliet" and "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgsky.

Boston Herald Oct 9, 1941

Symphony Season Starts on Friday

The ceaselessly active Serge Koussevitzky in a rare quiet moment in his home in Brookline, as he examined a volume of bound early programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the 61st season of which he opens Friday afternoon. The occasion will also mark the start of his own 17th year as its conductor. The program will open with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, followed by the Second Suite from the "Romeo and Juliet" ballet of Prokofieff, who, incidentally, has now reached his 50th year. For conclusion of the program there will be heard Ravel's orchestration of the piano pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition," by Moussorgsky, who died 60 years ago. A timely note, the "Pictures" come to a climax with "The Great Gate at Kiev."

Spiritual Uplift of Koussevitzky's Music Praised

'Sane, Joyous Beauty in a World Gone Mad,' Rev. Dr. Cole Asserts

Herald Oct 13

Following his first attendance at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a resident minister in this city, Rev. Dr. Walton E. Cole, now minister of Second Church in Boston, yesterday morning used part of his sermon period to pay an eloquent tribute to the orchestra and to its leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

"One of the satisfactions of moving to Boston is that I am able now to say 'our' symphony instead of being content with saying 'your' symphony. What a spiritual experience Dr. Koussevitzky gave us last night! It was sane, joyous beauty in a world gone mad," he said.

"At a moment when the fate of Europe and the rest of the world hangs in the balance, when Germany and Russia are locked in the embrace of death, it was significant to find the genius of the German Beethoven and the Russian Prokokieff and Moussorgsky united in the same program. From the challenging opening notes of the "Eroica Symphony" to the majestic crashing chord at the conclusion of "The Great Gate of Kiev," one felt the triumphant power of the human spirit. Dr. Koussevitzky's genius and the incomparable playing of America's greatest orchestra gave one a feeling of faith in the victory of the spiritual side of our civilization.

"It was interesting to recall as one listened that Beethoven's great works were composed while Europe was terrorized by Napoleon's conquering power. One remembered that Napoleon is dead in defeat while Beethoven's vision of beauty was being re-created under the baton of Boston's Koussevitzky."

In his more formal sermon which followed, Dr. Cole declared that "the self-centered life is the self-defeated life. The most satisfying life is the life adequately prepared for serving."

tudents Think ise Penn Today

WHITMAN

old-time Ell football hysteria is the same orchestra on the stage, the same old audience filling the hall, these things give one a sense, perhaps false, of security. At any rate in these days it is a pleasant sense, and we might as well bask in it while we can.

Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday started his 18th season in command of the orchestra. The usual rising welcome was given him before the concert, and richly does he deserve it. He is a miraculous man, and no music is ever lifeless or dispirited when he is there to direct it. He demands from the men much; he refuses to let them grow stale; he insists on and gets mid-season form at the very outset. He has doubtless learned much in the past 17 years from being in such close contact with as fine a body of musicians as the personnel of the Boston Symphony. But he has given it all back and more. He has inspired performances that those of us who have had the luck to hear them will never forget. We shall do well not to take for granted the genius of such a leader as Serge Koussevitzky.

Yesterday's concert was an exemplary beginning for the season. A brilliant and vital performance of the Eroica Symphony could not be better for such an occasion. Familiar as the music is to most of us it does not pall for an instant in such an interpretation as this.

Prokofieff himself conducted his "Romeo and Juliet" Suite in his last memorable visit to this country, when he scolded us for not being serious minded. We liked the Suite then and liked it even more as Mr. Koussevitzky unfolded it yesterday afternoon. Like all great composers Prokofieff has certain easily recognizable tricks of style, and you will have no difficulty when listening to the Suite in noting a similarity here to the 2nd Violin Concerto, there to "Peter and the Wolf."

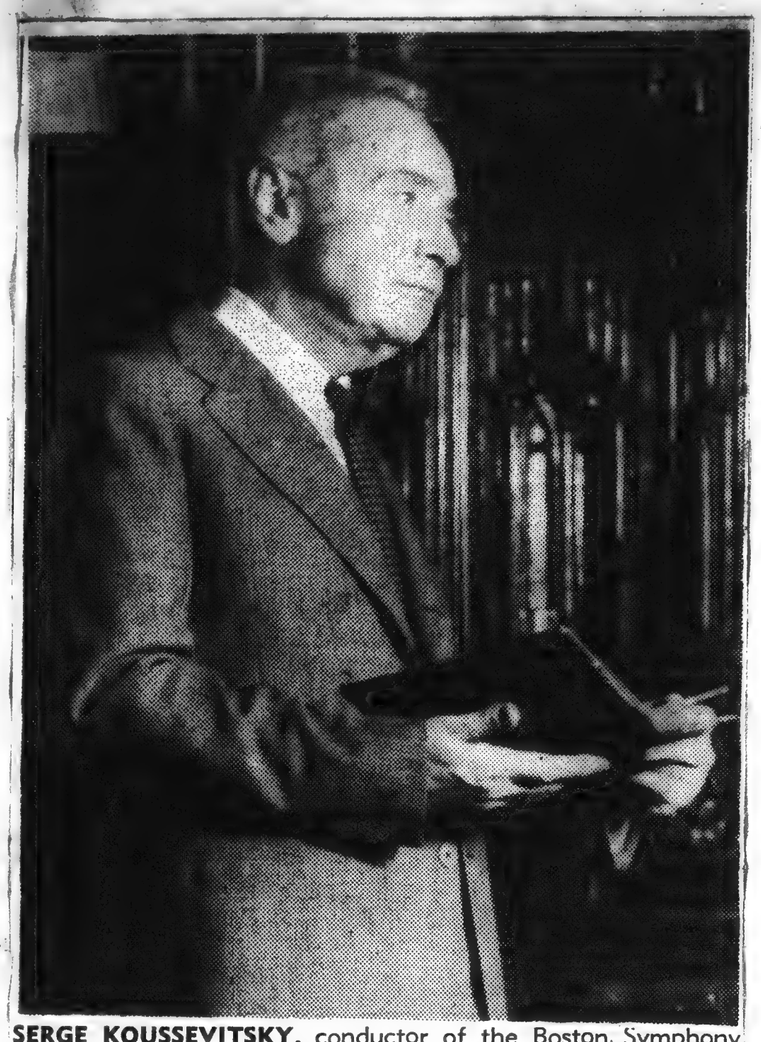
It is amusing to see how in the "Juliet" movement Prokofieff has no qualms about being, as Sir Donald Hovey remarked once about Schumann, "recklessly pretty." With another man this might easily slop over into sentimentality, but Prokofieff handles the dangerous stuff with the most acute skill. Again, the Dance might be too trivial for words. But it isn't, and that is the difference creatively between genius and just plain talent.

The last movement heard yesterday contains some of the noblest and most emotionally serious pages that Prokofieff ever wrote. As a rule he is generally best when he is being entertaining, but he can pull a long face also with the best of them. There were passages that reminded us of Richard Strauss, strange bedfellow for Prokofieff! The Suite is a fine work and was a happy choice for Mr. Koussevitzky to have down from the shelf.

Last year, it will be remembered, Mr. Koussevitzky moved his audience deeply by playing Vaughn Williams' London Symphony; and this year, with an eye, doubtless, for the appropriateness of it in world history, he offered us the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition" with its stunning climax in the Great Gate at Kiev. There were cries of "bravo" when the last tremendous chords had ended, and well there might be.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week three symphonies will be played: Mozart's in D major, William Schuman's Third and the 6th of Tchaikovsky.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which begins its 61st season at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.



SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens its 61st season at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon.

SYMPHONY OPENS 61ST MUSIC YEAR

Conventional Pieces Played With Rare Brilliance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Either Mr. Petrillo's pickets were discouraged by the rain or the music czar has decided to use more subtle methods in his attempt to unionize the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Anyway there was nothing untoward going on outside Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, save for the work on the new underpass, while inside things were quite unchanged, and the first Symphony Concert might well have been the previous season's last.

OF UTMOST BRILLIANCE

At one time it was customary for the reviewers to expatiate on the fact that the newly assembled orchestra played as smoothly as though there had been no break in its routine. But that was before the days of Esplanade concerts and Berkshire Festivals. Now it would be pertinent to remark that the men were as fresh, their playing as zestful as though their vacation had been a longer one. There were no signs yesterday that either players or conductor had gone stale.

On the contrary, Dr. Koussevitzky was unusually pepful and the orchestral playing was of the utmost tonal brilliance. Particularly was this true of the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition," which brought matters to a close with a rarely sonorous version of the final tableau, "The Great Gate at Kiev." As one auditor remarked, Dr. Koussevitzky gave the impression that he personally was winning the war for Russia.

Prokofieff's "Romeo"

Brilliant, too, was the performance of four numbers from the Second Suite made by Prokofieff from his music for a ballet after Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet"—a long way after, as the ancient wheeze has it. When Prokofieff himself conducted this music here in the spring of 1938 it fell as a pancake. Yesterday it was anything but flat, though it is far from being first-rate Prokofieff, but it seemed as inappropriate as ever to its subject matter.

Possibly Berlioz, Gounod and Tchaikovsky have given us a conditioned reflex in regard to "Romeo" music. In his own way, each of these composers has captured the spirit or caught the flavor of Shakespeare, of the period of the play, of youth or young love or of bitter tragedy. Prokofieff's score, on the other hand, summons none of these images. As Four Pieces for Orchestra, yesterday's excerpts would have made a far stronger impression and at the same time have relieved the critical listener of the necessity of trying to reconcile the irreconcilable.

A Revised "Eroica"

Beethoven's "Eroica" served as opening number and Dr. Koussevitzky was plainly minded to give its thrice-familiar measures a new or, at least, an intensified reading. So far as externals were concerned he accomplished his purpose admirably. Or, to put it differently, he seemed to have approached the problem from the outside rather than the inside. In the first movement accents were sharpened; staccato chords become tonal explosions, suggesting in one instance an engine letting off steam.

By these revisions the less inward Scherzo and Finale profited more than the aforesaid Allegro con brio and the mighty Funeral March.

Symphony Season Starts on Friday

The ceaselessly active Serge Koussevitzky in a rare quiet moment in his home in Brookline, as he examined a volume of bound early programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the 61st season of which he opens Friday afternoon. The occasion will also mark the start of his own 17th year as its conductor. The program will open with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, followed by the Second Suite from the "Romeo and Juliet" ballet of Prokofieff, who, incidentally, has now reached his 50th year. For conclusion of the program there will be heard Ravel's orchestration of the piano pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition," by Moussorgsky, who died 60 years ago. A timely note, the "Pictures" come to a climax with "The Great Gate at Kiev."

Symphony Season Opens This Friday

On Friday afternoon next and Saturday evening, October 10 and 11, Serge Koussevitzky will open his 17th successive season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall. The program for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts will begin with Beethoven's third symphony in E-flat major, the "Eroica." There will follow the second suite which Prokofieff has drawn from his ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." The suite was introduced to Boston by the composer when he conducted this orchestra in the spring of 1938. The ballet was composed in 1935; it has not hitherto been conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston.

The concluding number will be the "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgsky, the piano suite as set for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel. The movements include Promenade—Gnomus, Il Vecchio Castello, Tuileries, Bydlo, Ballet of Chicks in Their Shells, Samuel Goldenburg and Schmuyle, Limoges: The Marketplace, Catacombs (Con mortuis in lingua mortua), the Hut on Fowls' Legs, The Great Gate at Kiev.

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN & CITIZEN-LEADER
OCT 7 - 1941

Music

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

(Greater-Lowell music lovers having news of interest to the musical world are respectfully invited to address to Mr. Fleet, care of The Sun and Citizen-Leader office.)

Heralding the opening of the musical season in Massachusetts this week are the first concerts in the regular season of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and the annual Worcester Music Festival in the Heart of the Commonwealth.

Worcester's week of music, the 82nd festival in the long list, was ushered in last night, as has been in recent seasons, by a stage performance of opera. Two works were presented on this occasion, one a genuine American work, both in theme and treatment, Douglas Moore's "The Devil and Daniel Webster," set to the text of Stephen Vincent Benet, and the other "L'Heure Espagnole" (The Spanish Hour) by Ravel, the eminent French composer of Bolero fame. These compositions enlisted the services of an interesting group of principals, the festival chorus and orchestra, all under the direction of Albert Stoessel who, for many seasons, has carried the festival to success. In the American work David Otto sang the role of Webster, Donald Dame that of the sinister Scratch and Harriet Henders that of Mavy.

Mr. Benet's story, it may be recalled, first appeared in a popular weekly magazine. It suggested operatic possibilities to Mr. Moore. And his composition, which has been produced in New York, was the result. Since then it has been done into a motion picture under the title "All That Money Can Buy." Commenting on the story, Mr. Benet makes no claims to historical accuracy. But he reminds us that while there was the Webster of the great speeches, there was also the Webster whose legend still lingers in the rocks of New England, the farmer, the hunter, the fisherman. The story is an attempt at telling one such legend. In effect it is an American "Faust." But in this case doughty Daniel foils the Devil.

The Worcester series continues this evening with a program of choral and instrumental music in which J. M. Sanroma will be the featured soloist in the MacDowell Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra. Novelty in Worcester will be the much discussed Choros No. 10 by H. Villa-Lobos.

There are no programs on Wednesday. On Thursday evening Anna Kaskas, contralto of the Metropolitan Opera, will be featured with the women's chorus and orchestra in Gustav Holst's "Hecuba's Lament" and also in a group of operatic arias.

Artist's night on Friday will introduce in solo and concerted numbers Jarmila Novotna, soprano; Michael Bartlett, tenor; Anna Kaskas, contralto and Norman Cordon, baritone. The festival comes to a close Saturday night with a stage performance of Verdi's "La Traviata" in which Susanne Fisher, Clifford Menz and Clifford Harvuot will sing the leading roles.

Boston Symphony

As is his custom, Serge Koussevitzky has chosen familiar musical material for the programs of the opening concerts of the season this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. On the list he has put Beethoven's Third Symphony, the Eroica; the Second Suite from Prokofieff's ballet "Romeo and Juliet" and "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgsky.

12:30 WHDH—Daily Maid, talk.
WCOP—Seeing the Town.
WHDH—Swinemasters.
Management, topic: Better Farm
Normandie, topic: Better Farm
WVAB—United States Series: James De-
WEEI—Rinso presents Big Sister.
WNAC—Musical Roundup.
12:15 WEEI—Guy and Gal: sketch.

Boston Ex 13

Following his first attendance at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a resident minister in this city, Rev. Dr. Walton E. Cole, now minister of Second Church in Boston, yesterday morning used part of his sermon period to pay an eloquent tribute to the orchestra and to its leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

"One of the satisfactions of moving to Boston is that I am able now to say 'our' symphony instead of being content with saying 'your' symphony. What a spiritual experience Dr. Koussevitzky gave us last night! It was sane, joyous beauty in a world gone mad," he said.

"At a moment when the fate of Europe and the rest of the world hangs in the balance, when Germany and Russia are locked in the embrace of death, it was significant to find the genius of the German Beethoven and the Russian Prokokieff and Moussorgsky united in the same program. From the challenging opening notes of the "Eroica Symphony" to the majestic crashing chord at the conclusion of "The Great Gate of Kiev," one felt the triumphant power of the human spirit. Dr. Koussevitzky's genius and the incomparable playing of America's greatest orchestra gave one a feeling of faith in the victory of the spiritual side of our civilization.

"It was interesting to recall as one listened that Beethoven's great works were composed while Europe was terrorized by Napoleon's conquering power. One remembered that Napoleon is dead in defeat while Beethoven's vision of beauty was being re-created under the baton of Boston's Koussevitzky."

In his more formal sermon which followed, Dr. Cole declared that "the self-centered life is the self-defeated life. The most satisfying life is the life adequately prepared for serving."

---

tudents Think se Penn Today
WHITMAN
old-time Eli football hysteria is same orchestra

stage, the same old audience filling the hall, these things give one a sense, perhaps false, of security. At any rate in these days it is a pleasant sense, and we might as well bask in it while we can.

Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday started his 18th season in command of the orchestra. The usual rising welcome was given him before the concert, and richly does he deserve it. He is a miraculous man, and no music is ever lifeless or dispirited when he is there to direct it. He demands from the men much; he refuses to let them grow stale; he insists on and gets mid-season form at the very outset. He has doubtless learned much in the past 17 years from being in such close contact with as fine a body of musicians as the personnel of the Boston Symphony. But he has given it all back and more. He has inspired performances that those of us who have had the luck to hear them will never forget. We shall do well not to take for granted the genius of such a leader as Serge Koussevitzky.

Yesterday's concert was an exemplary beginning for the season. A brilliant and vital performance of the Eroica Symphony could not be better for such an occasion. Familiar as the music is to most of us it does not pall for an instant in such an interpretation as this.

Prokofieff himself conducted his "Romeo and Juliet" Suite in his last memorable visit to this country, when he scolded us for not being serious minded. We liked the Suite then and liked it even more as Mr. Koussevitzky unfolded it yesterday afternoon. Like all great composers Prokofieff has certain easily recognizable tricks of style, and you will have no difficulty when listening to the Suite in noting a similarity here to the 2nd Violin Concerto, there to "Peter and the Wolf."

It is amusing to see how in the "Juliet" movement Prokofieff has no qualms about being, as Sir Donald Hovey remarked once about Schumann, "recklessly pretty." With another man this might easily slop over into sentimentality, but Prokofieff handles the dangerous stuff with the most acute skill. Again, the Dance might be too trivial for words. But it isn't, and that is the difference creatively between genius and just plain talent.

The last movement heard yesterday contains some of the noblest and most emotionally serious pages that Prokofieff ever wrote. As a rule he is generally best when he is being entertaining, but he can pull a long face also with the best of them. There were passages that reminded us of Richard Strauss, strange bedfellow for Prokofieff! The Suite is a fine work and was a happy choice for Mr. Koussevitzky to have down from the shelf.

Last year, it will be remembered, Mr. Koussevitzky moved his audience deeply by playing Vaughn Williams' London Symphony; and this year, with an eye, doubtless, for the appropriateness of it in world history, he offered us the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition" with its stunning climax in the Great Gate at Kiev. There were cries of "bravo" when the last tremendous chords had ended, and well there might be.

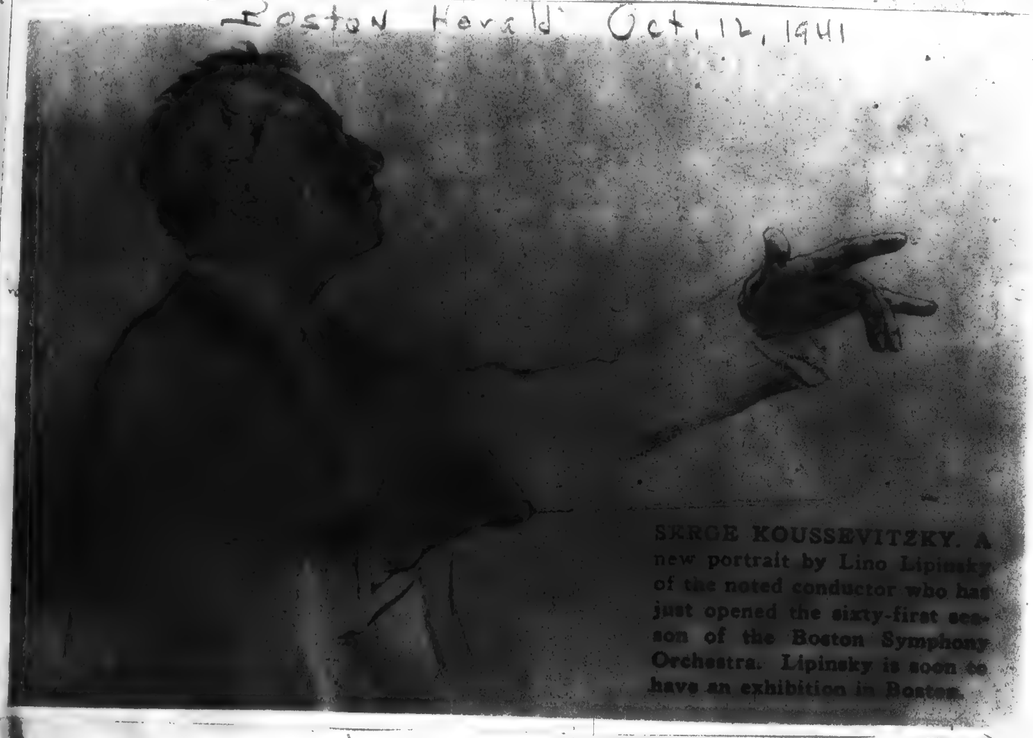
The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week three symphonies will be played: Mozart's in D major, William Schuman's Third and the 6th of Tchaikovsky.

Where Nathaniel Hawthorne Lived

This picture of Hawthorne's home, taken before 1890, shows the old house which stood at Tanglewood.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Guy P. Gannett of Portland, Me., president of the National Federation of Music Clubs, which is to donate the replica of the little red house, are shown at the site, marked by a bronze plaque.

Boston Herald Oct. 12, 1941



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY. A new portrait by Lino Lipinsky of the noted conductor who has just opened the sixty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Lipinsky is soon to have an exhibition in Boston.

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

OCT 10 1941

12

A Changing World May Give Impetus to American Music

CASTING reflections on the assimilative capabilities of the general run of music patrons or poking fun at their appreciative attitudes and claims, is frequently heard. Nine times out of ten these darts of ridicule come from persons with no love or respect for music in any of its more serious forms. Even newspaper cartoons occasionally touch vulnerable spots in the none too sturdy armor of the art. One that we saw some time ago, slyly joked about what is commonly called classical music and there are many who probably saw in the drawing actual vindication of that old epigram about true words being spoken in jest.

A wrathy, if not well-informed, individual expressed his views on musical programs in general in a communication submitted to a widely read and distributed periodical. In the communication, questions were raised as to why audiences seem to enjoy classical compositions, if these selections are played merely to allow artists to demonstate their technical agility and why should by far the larger part of an audience be subjected to such uninteresting music for the sake of the ten per cent who may fully comprehend it? The letter also set forth the idea that the reason for the small attendance at certain performances was on account of the music offered, suggesting that greater support be given to native composers whose works deserve much wider recognition.

Frequent attendance at events in the so-called classic category is sufficient to disprove the statement that only about 10 per cent of the audiences really appreciate and enjoy that kind of program. The sale of seats for the regular Boston Symphony seasons became so heavy that a supplementary Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series was added during the past few years. The powers that be report that there is more criticism for Koussevitzky's conservatism than for his dabs-a-modernism. Even at the Pop concerts, where lengthy works are eschewed—except on a few Sunday evenings — there is usually a deeper, more enthusiastic demonstration following a finely wrought number than at the close at those calculated to appeal more readily to such an audience. Regarding the small attendance at recitals, we are inclined to believe that that is caused more by the fact that the artists are comparatively unknown than because of the type of program announced. Well known, capable artists will draw large audiences regardless of the music they play or sing. Of course, the wise artist will endeavor to vary his programs so as to reach all his listeners. In the operatic field, recent years has shown a great swing towards the substantial Wagnerian diet. At the Metropolitan last season, and for several seasons back the special matinee cycles were given to packed houses, whereas some of the works that the aforesaid letter writer might enthuse over, failed to draw patrons in very large numbers.

The individual who knows Bach's, Beethoven's and Wagner's impregnable positions in music and also knows the nature of the bulk of the native product also knows that the surest way to empty a hall and keep it practically empty, is to give too much prominence to music of an inferior quality. Bach and other severely classic writers are heavy and at times perhaps dry, even to many serious music students and musicians, so it is not at all surprising to find a spirit of coldness towards them displayed by the average run of concert-goers. The same might be said of the Bible and classic literature, but that does not minimize their greatness and significance. It is all very well and laudable to clamor for American art and demand a hearing for American artists, but in so doing one should not belittle or disregard the giants of other years, whose works should be the guiding stars for all seeking the paths to glory.

When the great American symphony or opera comes along it may not at first be recognized or given its just place in the sun, but like all really great things it will eventually be accorded its rightful niche in the hall of fame. Already much good musical material, vocal and instrumental, has been written by American composers. Witness the substantial works of MacDowell, Chadwick, Parker, Converse, Hadley, Loeffler, Harris, Griffes, Ruggles, Gruenberg, Taylor, Sessions, Hanson, Porter, Sowerby, Piston, Copeland, Whithorn and numerous others. The compositions of some in that list have been heard and admired for many years, while some of the works of the younger of present-day group are gradually finding their way into the concert halls and opera houses. But this cheering for everything just because of its native origin will not help the cause of the American composer and his music. A few generations ago there were comparatively few writers of serious music in this country. Today it can boast a goodly number of its own as well as being a haven for many of Europe's most talented. From leading the world in the production of popular music may develop leadership in the more serious types. With slavery and sterility gripping European art, where else can it flourish and survive except among free spirits?

—A. L. M.

LOCAL MUSICIAN ON PROGRAM AT THE N. E. CONSERVATORY

At the Smoker Program, given by the Phi Nu Alpha Fraternity on Oct. 6 at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, Joseph Rizzo of Canton street played Foote's Aubade Villegoise and Pastorale for oboe. Mr. Rizzo has appeared in several previous concerts at the conservatory, both in solo and ensemble playing.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Begins Season This Afternoon

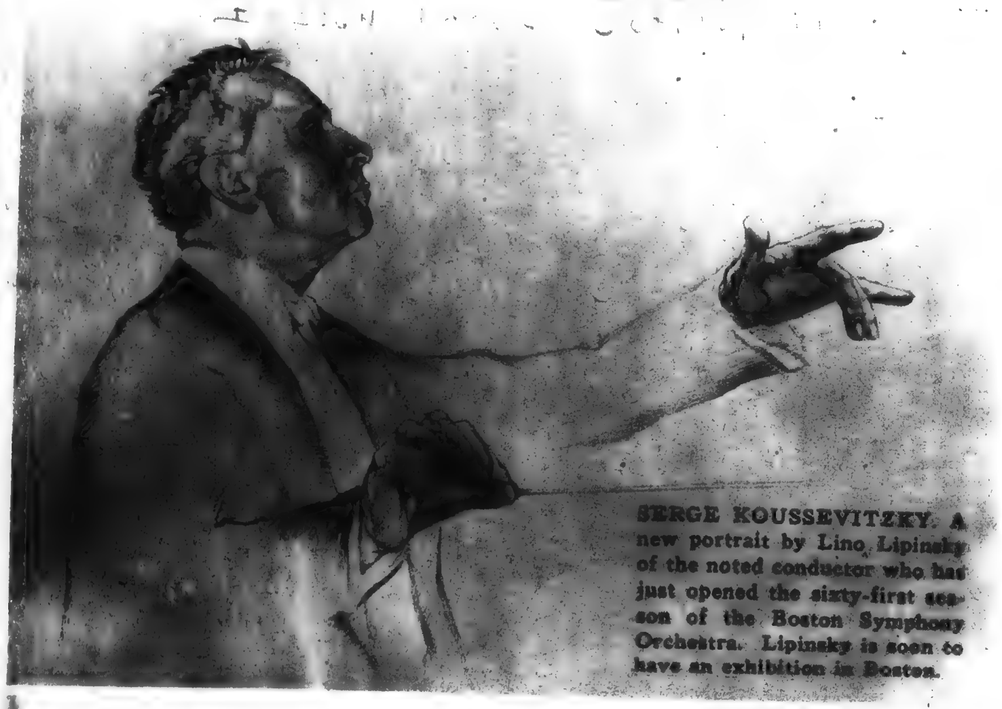
This afternoon and tomorrow evening Serge Koussevitzky will open his 17th successive season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall. The program for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts will begin with Beethoven's third symphony in E-flat major, the "Eroica." There will follow the second suite which Prokofieff has drawn from his ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." The suite was introduced to Boston by the composer when he conducted this orchestra in the spring of 1938. The ballet was composed in 1935; it has not hitherto been conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston.

The concluding number will be the "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgsky, the piano suite as set for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel. The movements include Promenade —Gnomus, Il Vecchio Castello, Tuileries, Bydlo, Ballet of Chicks in Their Shells, Samuel Goldenburg and Schmuyle, Limoges: The Marketplace, Catacombs (Con mortuis in lingua mortua), the Hut on Fowls' Legs, The Great Gate at Kiev.

Where Nathaniel Hawthorne Lived

This picture of Hawthorne's home, taken before 1890, shows the old house which stood at Tanglewood.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Guy P. Gannett of Portland, Me., president of the National Federation of Music Clubs, which is to donate the replica of the little red house, are shown at the site, marked by a bronze plaque.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY. A new portrait by Lino Lipinsky of the noted conductor who has just opened the sixty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Lipinsky is soon to have an exhibition in Boston.

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

OCT 10 1941

(4)

A Changing World May Give Impetus to American Music

CASTING reflections on the assimilative capabilities of the general run of music patrons or poking fun at their appreciative attitudes and claims, is frequently heard. Nine times out of ten these darts of ridicule come from persons with no love or respect for music in any of its more serious forms. Even newspaper cartoons occasionally touch vulnerable spots in the none too sturdy armor of the art. One that we saw some time ago, slyly joked about what is commonly called classical music and there are many who probably saw in the drawing actual vindication of that old epigram about true words being spoken in jest.

A wrathy, if not well-informed, individual expressed his views on musical programs in general in a communication submitted to a widely read and distributed periodical. In the communication, questions were raised as to why audiences seem to enjoy classical compositions, if these selections are played merely to allow artists to demonstate their technical agility and why should by far the larger part of an audience be subjected to such uninteresting music for the sake of the ten per cent who may full comprehend it? The letter also set forth the idea that the reason for the small attendance at certain performances was on account of the music offered, suggesting that greater support be given to native composers whose works deserve much wider recognition.

Frequent attendance at events of the so-called classic category is sufficient to disprove the statement that only about 10 per cent of the audiences really appreciate and enjoy that kind of program. The sale of seats for the regular Boston Symphony seasons became so heavy that a supplementary Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series was added during the past few years. The powers that be report that there is more criticism for Koussevitzky's conservatism than for his ultra-modernism. Even at the Pop concerts, where lengthy works are eschewed—except on a few Sunday evenings — there is usually a deeper, more enthusiastic demonstration following a finely wrought number than at the close at those calculated to appeal more readily to such an audience. Regarding the small attendance at recitals, we are inclined to believe that that is caused more by the fact that the artists are comparatively unknown than because of the type of program announced. Well known, capable artists will draw large audiences regardless of the music they play or sing. Of course, the wise artist will endeavor to vary his programs so as to reach all his listeners. In the operatic field, recent years has shown a great swing towards the substantial Wagnerian diet. At the Metropolitan last season, and for several seasons back, the special matinee cycles were given to packed houses, whereas some of the works that the aforesaid letter writer might enthuse over, failed to draw patrons in very large numbers.

The individual who knows Bach's, Beethoven's and Wagner's impregnable positions in music and also knows the nature of the bulk of the native product also knows that the surest way to empty a hall and keep it practically empty, is to give too much prominence to music of an inferior quality. Bach and other severely classic writers are heavy and at times perhaps dry, even to many serious music students and musicians, so it is not at all surprising to find a spirit of coldness towards them displayed by the average run of concert-goers. The same might be said of the Bible and classic literature, but that does not minimize their greatness and significance. It is all very well and laudable to clamor for American art and demand a hearing for American artists, but in so doing one should not belittle or disregard the giants of other years, whose works should be the guiding stars for all seeking the paths to glory.

When the great American symphony or opera comes along it may not at first be recognized or given its just place in the sun, but like all really great things it will eventually be accorded its rightful niche in the hall of fame. Already much good musical material, vocal and instrumental, has been written by American composers. Witness the substantial works of MacDowell, Chadwick, Parker, Converse, Hadley, Loeffler, Harris, Griffes, Ruggles, Gruenberg, Taylor, Sessions, Hanson, Porter, Sowerby, Piston, Copeland, Whithorn and numerous others. The compositions of some in that list have been heard and admired for many years, while some of the works of the younger of present-day group are gradually finding their way into the concert halls and opera houses. But this cheering for everything just because of its native origin will not help the cause of the American composer and his music. A few generations ago there were comparatively few writers of serious music in this country. Today it can boast a goodly number of its own as well as being a haven for many of Europe's most talented. From leading the world in the production of popular music may develop leadership in the more serious types. With slavery and sterility gripping European art, where else can it flourish and survive except among free spirits?

—A. L. M.

LOCAL MUSICIAN ON PROGRAM AT THE N. E. CONSERVATORY

At the Smoker Program, given by the Phi Nu Alpha Fraternity on Oct. 6 at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, Joseph Rizzo of Canton street played Foote's Aubade Villegoise and Pastorale for oboe. Mr. Rizzo has appeared in several previous concerts at the conservatory, both in solo and ensemble playing.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Begins Season This Afternoon

This afternoon and tomorrow evening Serge Koussevitzky will open his 17th successive season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall. The program for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts will begin with Beethoven's third symphony in E-flat major, the "Eroica." There will follow the second suite which Prokofieff has drawn from his ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." The suite was introduced to Boston by the composer when he conducted this orchestra in the spring of 1938. The ballet was composed in 1935; it has not hitherto been conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston.

The concluding number will be the "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgsky, the piano suite as set for full orchestra by Maurice Ravel. The movements include Promenade —Gnomus, Il Vecchio Castello, Tuileries, Bydlo, Ballet of Chicks in Their Shells, Samuel Goldenburg and Schmuyle, Limoges: The Marketplace, Catacombs (Con mortuis in lingua mortua), the Hut on Fowls' Legs, The Great Gate at Kiev.

Egon

Dr. Koussevitzky

Opening Night of Boston Symphony

Christian Science Monitor Oct 11, 1941

By Margaret Williamson
Written for The Christian Science Monitor

Go out for dinner this Saturday evening? Go to a play? Go away into the country for this particular week end? I should rather think not. Can it be that my friends do not know the significance that attaches itself to one certain Saturday of each October? Beginning as a child, when I went with my musically-minded grandfather to sit in the first balcony at the right-hand side, quite close to Mrs. Jack Gardner, until now when I have progressed as far as a long-coveted aisle seat on the floor, never have I willingly been absent from town on the evening of the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

I know so well what this Saturday evening will be like. An outrageous, strong-smelling press of cars the whole length of Westland Avenue, until we fear we never shall arrive in time; the anticipatory stir and hum of people in the lobby and the long corridor, having been admitted by that benevolent attendant who meticulously thanks each newcomer for his ticket; the reckless tuning of the instruments on the stage, shrill but pleasantly dissonant; the banging of innumerable seats; people slipping in to their old places as readily as though there had never been an entire summer to intervene.

Yes, our friends are in their proper places: the dapper gentleman who escorts a lady straight out of the moyen age, if dress is any indication; the erudite professor who would as lief miss a symphony concert as the current football match across the river; the lad who is so keen on music that he taps his foot in violent accent of the rhythms and twists in his seat to ask the ladies behind if they liked the playing of the Sibelius as well as he did. Yes? No? Well, it doesn't matter; for he is as certain of his own musical judgment as any veteran three times his age.

Happy to See Them

Are those music students going to sit next us this year? They are difficult. They talk a great deal too much and elbow us as they turn rapidly the wide pages of the score; or else they push in and out far too often, tripping over our fet or forcing us to stand to let them pass. However, when they come, half-a-dozen strong at least, we rise at once and willingly, actually happy to see them once more.

There's the first warning bell. People hurry across the broad aisle and then right or left to their seats. Ushers do have to answer a few questions on this first evening. Now the second bell accompanied by a real scurrying. No one likes to wait, outside until after the opening number. They all recall the imperative line of Dr. Koussevitzky's distinguished back as he holds his baton suspended. There he comes. Now the thunder of applause. Now the spontaneous getting to the feet in grateful greeting. Now the first notes of an orchestra which, as the whole artistic world admits, has today no peer.

I sink back comfortably in my place. The old-style seat is actually wide enough, with ample knee space, too. I fold my hands over my open program, and give myself up wholly to the loveliness and richness of the tone. Perhaps I even close my eyes.

Bit of Civilization

This is more than the most skillful playing to be encountered anywere today. It is more than a Beethoven symphony, or this overture, or that concerto, with such and such a visiting celebrity by way of additional lure. This is a realization that the civilized world has not vanished entirely.

Like the serene existence of that library on the slopes of Beacon Hill, the Boston Athenaeum, the continued existence of the Boston Symphony concerts is a delicious comfort and support to hundreds who are hungry for beauty.

Come to think of it, both the library and the concert hall are equipped with swinging doors of well-worn leather to exclude the unworthy and admit the truly appreciative. Is there some magic in leather doors? At least, they contrive to divide sharply between a troubled world and one which counteracts it a thousand times over.

Let my friends smile if they will. Let them jeer. Let them just try to divert my attention in some other direction on this enchanted Saturday evening. In spite of them, I shall be in Smphony Hall before the sound of that first warning bell.

Touch of Old France in Boston

By Robert R. Mullen
Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Madame Burguet operated a pension on St. Botolph Street, just in back of Huntington Avenue in Boston. The rose-red sidewalks—like so much of the old lace and lavender Boston—have gone. But St. Botolph Street retains its Georgian doorways; most of its brass work gleams as brightly as in more elite days, especially that of Madame Burguet, who stood aside for no Puritan or Pilgrim housewife in her knocker polishing.

Outside, when the fog mists the street lamps a bit, there was a wisp of London. But inside Madame Burguet's door was France. Not Paris, not delicate chairs, cloisonné, and politicians so adept they remind you of Kipling's Squeezy-cum-squeeze that swallowed itself. Madame Burguet's was the France of the thrifty virtues, and meat so flavorsome you were tempted to accept the rumor that Madame seasoned it by firing shot-gun shell loads of spices into it. It was the France of the true and splendid salad, and onion soup . . . !

Madame's tables were covered with red and white checkered cloths. Informality was the rule, you sat at the table with whomever was there before you, Madame's, of course, was near Symphony Hall. You were liable to sit opposite a Bull Fiddle and a Bassoon most any night. Good food attracts the genial.

"Are conductors, then, so unpopular?" you asked, as talk turned to a recent article by Oscar Levant. "Is it true, as he writes, that a symphony is just a matter of a 'hundred men and a louse'?"

"Not precisely," answered Bassoon, "not with the Boston Symphony. Maestro Koussevitzky has been with us 17 years now. It is quite different from so many others. We have guest conductors from time to time, for instance . . ."

"Mention no names," warned Bull Fiddle, "he's writer," with that Latin grin which removed all edge.

"The names of conductors are mostly unpronounceable, anyway," shrugged Bassoon. "Well, then, these guest conductors strive, they strain, and they repeat phrases interminably. But Maestro is not like that. No.

"Let us say we rehearse some Prokoffief. It goes not so good. Maestro directs a while. Then he stops, puts down his baton, leans on the desk, and shakes his head with sorrow. 'No, no, gentlemen,' he will say, 'this is beautiful music,' and he will wave his arms aloft in that Russian gesture, 'we must play it beautifully, softly now, feel it. It must sing!'

"So," concluded Bassoon matter-of-factly, breaking off a chunk of hard-crusted bread, "we do."

"That is true," agreed Bull Fiddle, "and Maestro knows the instruments so well. He was a virtuoso with the double bass when he was but 12 in Russia, and he became the greatest since Dragonetti. It is not a mere 'zum, zum, zum' to him. He demands music. He tells us he won Madame Koussevitzky by playing the Bull Fiddle for her. He demands music. It was Debussy himself who remarked on the quality of the bass in the Koussevitzky orchestra. That was when Maestro conducted the State Orchestra in Moscow, you know. He brought this art to Boston," asserted Bull Fiddle proudly.

Martha Burnham

The Eroica Symphony

Beethoven's Third Symphony is set down by Paul Henry Lang, in his "Music in Western Civilization," (published this month by W. W. Norton & Company) as "one of the incomprehensible deeds in arts and letters, the greatest single step made by an individual composer in the history of the symphony and the history of music in general."

The statement is well considered; it looms in a summation which is broad, scholarly, and musically penetrating. Indeed, wonderment at that mighty project of the imagination and will is not lessened by the passing years.

"I am not satisfied," said Beethoven to Krumpholz in 1802, "with my works up to the present time. From today I mean to take a new road." Contemplating the harmless docilities of the First and Second Symphonies, one looks in vain for a "new road" taken so readily, with so sure and great a stride. Wagner's "Ring" following "Lohengrin," Brahms' First Symphony—these triumphant assertions of will power were achieved only after years of germination and accumulated force. With Beethoven, spiritual transformation often came swiftly and without warning. Having completed his Second Symphony in the summer of 1802 at Heiligenstadt, he forthwith turned his back upon the polite patterns of Haydn and Mozart.

The moment was the most critical in his life. The realization came upon him in that summer that deafness must be accepted, an ironic blotting out of the precious faculty of his calling, shutting him from converse with the world of tone and the world of men. He contemplated suicide, but seized upon the thought that living to compose was his one great duty and resource. To Dr. Wegeler, one of the two friends whom he could bring himself to tell of his deafness, he wrote in a letter of resurgent determination, "I will take Fate by the throat." The "Eroica" was his direct act of taking "Fate by the throat," for the first sketches are attributed by Nottebohm to October, 1802, the very month of the Heiligenstadt Will. In this sense, the idealized heroism of the Symphony can be nothing else than autobiographical. It is not explicitly so, for Beethoven would not reveal his secret tragedy; not even consciously so, for the deeper motivations of Beethoven were quite instinctive.

As his notebooks show, he forged his heroic score with a steady onslaught, expanding the inherited form almost beyond recognition, yet preserving its balance and symmetry. The plans for each movement but the scherzo were laid in the first fever of creation. But Beethoven seems to have been in no great hurry to complete his task. The workmanship in detail is largely attributed to his summer sojourns of 1803 at Baden and at Ober-Döbling. Reis remembered seeing the fair copy in its finished state upon the composer's table in the early spring of 1804.

Musicians have never ceased to wonder at the welded and significant organism of the exposition in the first movement, the outpouring invention and wealth of episodes in the working out, the magnificence and freshness of the coda.—From the program notes for the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season, by John N. Burk.

The Artists Behind the Pictures

The portrait of Dr. Koussevitzky on this page is a detail from a photograph by C. J. S. Egone. The original is one of a group of portraits now on exhibition in the First Balcony Gallery at Symphony Hall. Mr. Egone first made his reputation in Italy in 1916, by using what was said to be the first candid camera in that country. Two years ago, he was established in Milan, making portraits of peasants and royalty—and of enough dubious aspects of the Fascist regime so that he had to flee, one step ahead of the secret police. All his equipment and files were left behind. His studios are now in Boston.

The sketches of the first concert of the season were made by Martha Burnham from a second balcony seat, where, so the experts say, the music is most perfectly balanced. The seats cost the least there, too.

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN & CITIZEN-LEADER
OCT 14 1941
Boston Symphony

Minister at 2d Church Pays Tribute to Boston Symphony

Moral lessons from the joy generated by the discovery of 5-year-old Pamela Hollingsworth and the beauty created by the Boston Symphony Orchestra were drawn yesterday by the Rev. Walton E. Cole in a sermon at the Second Church in Boston, Beacon street and Park drive.

When the Lowell child was found safe Monday after being lost for eight days in the New Hampshire mountain forest, millions of New England men and women were happier than they had been in many months, Mr. Cole declared.

Such happiness in an event outside their immediate selfish concerns, he said, was "a striking demonstration of the religious principle 'that the sympathetic life is the satisfying life.'"

Frankly thrilled by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its opening concert Saturday night Mr. Cole, who only recently moved to the city, paid glowing tribute to Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, as one who was able to give Boston the spiritual experience of sane, joyous beauty in a world gone mad.

It was significant to him that with Germany and Russia at war, the concert included the music of the German Beethoven and the Russian Prokofieff and Moussorgsky. As he listened, he said, he had "a feeling of faith in the victory of the spiritual side of our civilization."

"It was interesting to recall as one listened that Beethoven's great works were composed while Europe was terrorized by Napoleon's conquering power," he continued. "One remembered that Napoleon was dead in defeat while Beethoven's vision of beauty was being recreated under the baton of Boston's Koussevitzky."

Artist's night on Friday will be moved once about Schu-

SPRINGFIELD, Mo., Oct. 11 (AP)—Arnold (Mickey) Owen, a catcher for Brooklyn during the baseball season and a farmer the rest of the time, has sold his herd of goats—but don't jump to conclusions.

Grinning, he announced the sale to neighbors who greeted him on his return from the World Series to his 250-acre farm but he quickly added it was "not because they reminded me of my part in the series."

Owen tried his best to convince his friends his error in dropping that third strike in the ninth inning of the fourth game permitted the Yankees to win the championship.

"If it hadn't been for that muff Whit Wyatt would have been given another day of rest—and with more rest he would have beaten the Yankees again." Owen said.

He intends to invest part of his World Series money in a herd of cattle.

WHERE TO DINE

BOSTON

● Either mid-afternoon or late evening, when you feel you would relish a light lunch, we highly recommend this popular item . . .

MELTED CHEESE on TOASTED ENGLISH MUFFINS with Coffee or a Pot of Tea 20c

Waldorf CAFETERIAS
AT THE SIGN OF THE RED APPLE

Brittany COFFEE SHOP
LUNCHEON—TEA—DINNER
Open six days a week.
222 Newbury St., nr. Exeter Com. 5370

CAFE AMALFI
8 WESTLAND AVENUE
1 Block from The Mother Church
Specializing in Italian Dishes—Lunches and Dinners

Visit the New, Modern MINERVA CAFÉ
Opp. The Christian Science Mother Church
Business Luncheons from 50c
Dinners 75c up
Special Sunday Dinners 75c and $1.00
Delicious Food Cheerful Atmosphere

BROOKLINE, MASS.

CHINA INN
Air-Cooled

FINE FOOD PRIVATE PARKING
250-252 HARVARD STREET
At Coolidge Cor., opp. Longwood Ave.

IPSWICH, MASS.

1640 HART HOUSE
Ipswich 1640-1941
An Adventure in Good Eating
GIFTS Open Noon to 9 until Mid-October. Newburyport Turnpike or Route 1A

CONCORD, N. H.

When in Concord, enjoy good food and excellent service at Colburn's RESTAURANT
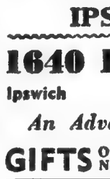
Air Conditioned

NEW YORK CITY

ALWAYS SOMETHING GOOD TO EAT
LUNCHEON from 45¢ DINNER from 60¢
One of New York's Largest Restaurants
ESTABLISHED 1899
ROSOFF'S
147 W. 43rd St. 152 W. 44th St.

Jane Davies
145 West 55th Street
LUNCHEON 55c — 65c — 75c
DINNER $1.00 — $1.10 — $1.25

DES MOINES, IOWA



Breakfast, Luncheon
Tea or Dinner
Served in Our Delightful Tea Rooms—Fifth Floor
Open 9:15 A. M. to 8 P. M.
Dinner Music Every Evening
YOUNKERS TEA ROOM

Managers of restaurants advertised in The Christian Science Monitor appreciate your identifying yourself as a Monitor reader.

College Football

By the Associated Press

East

Duquesne 26, Manhattan 7.
Temple 17, Georgetown 7.
St. Vincent 12, Waynesburg 0.
Albright 6, West Chester 0.
Salem 0, Bethany 0 (tie).
Lebanon Valley 30, City College, New York, 7.
Moravian 32, Hartwick 0.
Montclair (N. J.) Teachers 14, Millersville (Pa.) Teachers 13.
Penn Military 20, Blue Ridge 0.

South

Washington and Lee 0, George Washington 0 (tie).
Mississippi 14, Georgia 14 (tie).
The Citadel 21, Presbyterian 13.
Chattanooga 26, Mississippi College 6.
Tennessee Tech 25, Morris Harvey 6.
Roanoke 7, Tusculum 0.
Southwestern Louisiana Institute 6, Millsaps 0.
Apprentice School (Newport News) 20, Randolph-Macon 7.
Union University 12, Murray Teachers 0.
Miami 20, Tampa 6.
Elon 13, Lenoir-Rhyne 0.
North Carolina State T. 9, Blufield State T. 6.
Troy (Ala.) T. 3, Oglethorpe 0.
Transylvania 55, Union College 6.
Tennessee Wesleyan 6, Hiwassee 0.
Mississippi Southern 43, Southeastern Louisiana 6.
Tennessee State College 21, Austin Peay Normal 0.
Louisiana Normal 7, Louisiana College 0.
Georgetown (Ky.) 21, Carson Newman 12.

Midwest

Drake 6, St. Louis 6 (tie).
Western Reserve 12, Akron 6.
Muskingum 12, Finlay 6.
Case 7, Kent State 6.
Butler 13, Ball State 6.
Wittenberg 14, Lawrence Tech 0.
Ohio Northern 25, Albion 6.
Alma 6, Hillsdale 0.
La Crosse (Wis) Tchrs 20, Stout Institute 6.
Youngstown 25, Illinois Wesleyan 14.
Defiance 26, Ashland 7.
Upper Iowa 6, Buena Vista 0.
Midland (Neb) 7, Western Union 6.
Penn 20, Wartburg 0.
Baker 7, McPherson 0.
Ottawa (Kan) 13, William Jewell 12.
Missouri Central 19, Tarkio 0.
Kirksville Tchrs 20 Cape Girardeau (Mo) Techrs 7.
Hastings 52, York 7.
Milton 6, Mission House 0.
Doane 6, Wayne Tchrs 6 (tie).
Iowa State Tchrs 13, Morningside 0.
Wahpeton Science 6, Valley City Tchrs 0.
Fort Riley (C. M. T. C.) 0, Emporia Tchrs 0 (tie).
Kansas Wesleyan 26, Bethany (Kan), 19.
Missouri Mines 0, Warrenburg (Mo) Tchrs 0 (tie).

Southwest

Abilene Christian 20, Trinity 0.
North Texas State 60, Arkansas A & M. 0.
Northeastern Oklahoma State 7, Northwestern Oklahoma State 0.
Arkansas Tech 6, Henderson State Teachers 0.
Magnolia A. & M. 19, Northeastern Oklahoma Junior College 0.
Ouachita 19, Arkansas Teachers 0.
Kilgore 33, John Tarlton 7.

Rocky Mountains

Brigham Young 13, Denver 7.
Greeley State 19, Colorado Mines 14.
Boise Junior College 15, Albion (Ida.) Normal 0.

Far West

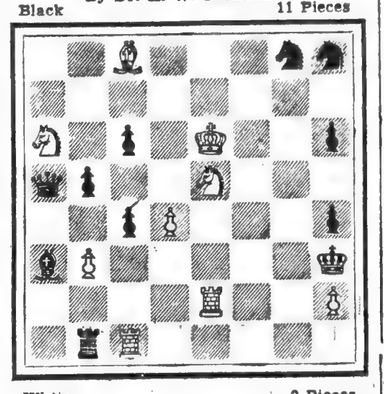
U. C. L. A. 14, Montana 7.
Idaho 21, Gonzaga 7.
Texas Tech 14, Loyola (La.) 0.
College of Idaho 27, Pacific University 14.
Eastern Washington 35, Whitworth 7.

White 12 Pieces
White to play and mate in two.
2Q2Kt1K/1pp1pp2/P1P1P1Pkt/q3k1B1/R2Kt4/8/8/5R1B.
(First publication and date unknown. "Bettmann's hardest task in two-movers, perhaps—8 variations from moves of two B. P.'s. Intricate play—poor key.")

Problem No. 2392

By Dr. H. W. Bettmann

Black 11 Pieces



White 9 Pieces
White to play and mate in three.
2B3ktkt/8/Kt1p1K2p/qp2Kt3/2pP3p/bP5k/4R2P/1rR5.
(Composed 1916. First publication unknown. "Intricate experiment in mutual BQ and BB interference—Plachutta theme.)

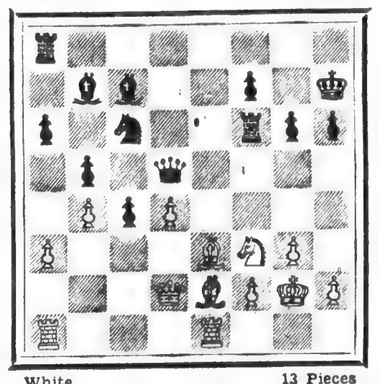
Solutions to Problems

No. 2389. Q-B6
No. 2390. 1. B-B5 threatens
2. Kt-Q2ch
1. . . . Q-Q
2. Kt-Kt2
1. . . . K-B5
2. Kt-Q2

End-Game No. 583. White wins: 1 R-R4ch, K-K4; 2 R-K4ch, KxR; 3 B-Kt8, P-Kt8(Q); 4 B-R7ch, and wins.

End-Game No. 584

Black 13 Pieces



White 13 Pieces
Black to play and win.
r7/1bb2p1k/p1kt2rpp/1p1q4/1PpP4/P3BKtP1/3QBPKP/R3R3.
(Popoff-Rjumin, Moscow, 1929. The latter wins with a combination that should almost leap off the diagram to the experienced player.)

Forsyth Notation

The conglomeration of figures and letters below the problem diagrams represents a method of giving the position in letters and figures. This is how it works: The Capital letters represent White pieces, the small letters represent black pieces, and the numbers represent vacant squares. Starting with the upper lefthand corner, each rank is thus described. The first group, under problem 2391, is 2Q2Kt1K. This is a simple way of saying that on the first rank, starting at Black's end, there are two vacant squares, then a White Q, and two more vacant squares and a White Kt, and one vacant square and the White K. With this notation the problem solver who questions a problem has a check on the position.

Russian Chess

The September British Chess Magazine quotes a Russian publication in English dealing with art and culture with two pages devoted to sports and nine to chess. The last championship tournament was held in the Moscow Conservatoire of Music, where frequently all 2,500 seats were sold out, and in some of the smaller rooms, masters discussed the games with the aid of wall boards.

Incidentally, the Soviets cannot claim credit for the universal appeal of chess in Russia. Capablanca, who played in the 1914 St. Petersburg tournament, has recalled how he and other masters were lionized by the upper classes, one of whom was Alo-

10	R-Kt	Kt-QR4	26	B-Q4	Kt-K
11	PxP	KtxP	27	R-R7	R-Q
12	Q-B2	Kt-KB3	28	BxKt(B4)	PxB
13	P-QB4	P-QKt3	29	QxP	Kt-B6ch
14	B-Kt2	Kt-Kt2	30	BxKt	PxB
15	P-Q5	Kt-Q3	31	QxP	Q-K
16	Q-B3	Q-K2	32	P-B5	Resigns

Russian Game

This game, from the Soviet championship, shows an old-fashioned opening, with what might be termed old-fashioned after-play. In any case, White went astray in complications proved by Black to be in his favor.

Two Knights' Defense

Bondarevsky		Ragosin
White		Black
1	P-K4	P-K4
2	Kt-KB3	Kt-QB3
3	B-B4	Kt-B3
4	P-Q3	P-Q4
5	PxP	KtxP
6	Q-K2	B-K2
7	KtxP	Kt-Q5
8	Q-K4	Kt-KB3
9	BxPch	K-B
10	Q-R4	Kt-Kt5

Bondarevsky		Ragosin
White		Black
11	Kt-Kt6ch	KxB
12	KtxRch	K-K
13	Q-R5	KtxBPch
14	K-Q2	Kt-Kt
15	Q-QKt5	B-K
16	Kt-R3	P-B
17	Kt-B7	KxK
18	Q-R5ch	K-K
19	R-Q	KtxBP
20	Q-K2	B-Kt
	Resigns

Around the Hub

There will be a definite undergraduate tinge to crew at Boston University this coming spring, not only as far as the oarsmen are concerned but including the coach, too.

For Boston University's varsity crew will be coached this year by George N. Hurd, Jr., a senior at Harvard. The appointment of Hurd to succeed Jim Manning was announced last night by Dr. Daniel L. Marsh, president of Boston University, and Dr. John M. Harmon, director of athletics.

Hurd, who is a keen rowing enthusiast and an outstanding sculler, manages the 150-pound crew at Harvard and has coached the house crews. He is a student of the rowing technique enmployed by Tom Bolles, Harvard's brilliant crew mentor, and will instruct the Terriers in the same Washington stroke.

Hurd will meet the Terrier crew aspirants Tuesday afternoon at the Hayden Memorial Building and has hopes of getting some work accomplished on the river before the extreme cold weather sets in.

* * *

Harvard officially opened its cross-country season over the muddy 3½-mile Riverside course with a crushing 15-to-50 victory over Boston University. The entire Harvard team finished in a seven-man tie for first place in 21m. 35s. . . . Yale harriers, running at Middletown, Conn., defeated Wesleyan, 23 to 32, with Capt. Roy Schwartzkopf running the 4.7 mile course in 23m. 48.2s. to break the old record 24m. 18s.

Sports Mirror

By the Associated Press

Today a Year Ago

Cornell swamped Army, 45-0, Fordham beat Tulane, 20-7, Notre Dame edged out Georgia Tech 26-20 and Texas A. & M. hung up its 14th straight victory, 7-0, over U. C. L. A.

College Cross-Country

By the Associated Press

Results Oct. 10
Rhode Island 15, Fordham 40.
Williams 27, Middlebury 28.
Springfield 17, Amherst 44.
Yale 23, Wesleyan 32.

Boston Herald Oct 8

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Third Symphony by William Howard Schuman was played for the first time at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The first number of the program was Mozart's "Haffner," Symphony (K. 385)—substituted for his "Prague" Symphony, originally scheduled — and the last was the "Pathetic" Symphony by Tchaikowsky.

Mr. Schuman's new work, composed in January of this year, is a vast score, an improvement over the Second Symphony which introduced the young American composer to Boston audiences in 1939. In style the Third Symphony is as modern as 1941, not a bit sentimental, not a bit afraid of a big, noisy brass section, and not nearly so dry as a good many contemporary works one has heard in the last five years. There are two movements, the first dividend into a Passacaglia and a fugue, the second encompassing a chorale and a Toccata. From this formal plan, you can see that it is not a symphony at all, in the traditional Viennese sense. Neither, for that matter, have a lot of other symphonies followed the architectural pattern left by Beethoven. But Mr. Schuman was obviously pre-occupied by form and structure and counterpoint. The Third Symphony is form and structure in a big way, created from a comparatively small amount of thematic material, a highly respected procedure of which many an example is to be found in Beethoven.

Schuman's Second Symphony and his "American Festival Overture" showed that he is a composer of imagination. Despite the dominant impression of intellectual exercise left by the Third Symphony, it is not without feeling. For one thing, the orchestra is enormous. Composers nowadays who are interested merely in theoretical writing follow the fashion of scoring for smaller orchestra. Mr. Schuman, one may assume, is not the sort to cut dead some of the musical ideas that flourished between 30 and 50 years ago.

His facility for orchestration has gained notably. Much of his scoring is of the virtuoso order, and would be very difficult for any but a first-rate orchestra. As for the substance of the music, so nearly as one may judge from short acquaintance with a most complicated work, Mr. Schuman has still not reached creative maturity. More than once you are remanded of the Third Symphony by Roy Harris. If Mr. Schuman has the talent this reviewer is certain he possesses, and can let his fancy operate to equal advantage with his mind, the future ought to bring some excellent music from him. He was cordially received yesterday when he appeared on the stage.

The "Haffner" Symphony, little masterpiece that it is, made a charming beginning for the concert, though one was sorry to be deprived of the "Prague" Symphony, equally good and less often heard than the "Haffner." For many, judging by applause, the "Pathetic" was the climax of the afternoon. Tchaikovsky's Slavic lament must indeed be of enduring worth, because its popularity does not seem to have diminished. For others, the "Pathetic" has lost its original thrill.

One suspects that the quality of performance has a lot to do with the matter. Serge Koussevitzky conducts the "Pathetic"—and the rest of Tchaikovsky, as well—with an understanding, sympathy and overpowering eloquence commanded by no other conductor. Yesterday his interpretation was extremely dramatic, though not so smooth as others have been.

The program next week follows: Vivaldi: "Spring" Concerto; Falla: Suite from "Love the Sorcerer"; Schubert: Seventh Symphony, in C major.—C. W. D.

Boston Herald MUSIC Oct 15 '41

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 2d regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Mozart.....Symphony in D major, K. 385
William Schuman..Symphony No. 3
Tchaikovsky.....Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 74

Mr. William Schuman, whose 3d Symphony was heard for the first time yesterday, shall be the hero of this story. Stirring as was the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique" and captivating as was the Mozart "Haffner," it takes another kind of criticism than we are willing to write to do nothing save rhapsodize over familiar music. It is there to be enjoyed as in past performances; but to go into elaborate ecstasies about it is to beg the whole issue and purpose of criticism. That, however, is the proper subject for something other than a review in a daily newspaper.

Let Mr. Schuman have the field, then; and well in this instance does he deserve it. He has been represented at these concerts by his 2d Symphony and his American Festival Overture. The latter was an attractive piece, and we went on record as saying so. Somewhat to our embarrassment, in the light of the fine quality of this new symphony, we appear to have rather high-handedly dismissed the former in these columns two years ago. Doubtless we should now hear in it many virtues which were obtusely hidden from us at the time.

We should like to pass this off by now saying that "Mr. Schuman has found his feet;" but clearly any composer who can write so well-knit and powerful a symphony as this must have had his feet somewhere near the ground in his earlier work. The new symphony requires pretty close attention on the listener's part, but, granted that, interest should not falter for an instant.

Mr. Schuman goes back further than the classical period for his solution to the vexing problem of form and thus puts his ideas into such ready-to-hand media as the passacaglia, fugue, chorale and toccata. The advantage of these is that they are not hard-and-fast, even as is the classical symphony. And, of course, you have much more freedom of action in a fugue than in a song for a modern musical comedy. A good composer more or less creates his own form anyway.

Since Mr. Schuman's musical thought tends to run towards the kind of counterpoint that Bach wrote, he was wise to choose his framework from the 17th century. He has filled this with ideas and a language of his own, with passages of somber reflection and climaxes of astonishing power and intensity. The toccata-finale is the lightest movement of the four and is devoted to a brilliant exploitation of the resources of the modern orchestra.

Here it may be allowed that he was lucky to have the Boston Symphony and Mr. Koussevitzky for the first performance. The Symphony needs a first class interpretation, with all that that implies in these days. Anything less than a virtuoso brass section, for instance, would spell ruin. And "first class" is what it rated. The composer was in the audience and responded to applause that was as cordial as it ever is on Friday afternoon for unfamiliar music.

It is odd to learn from the program that Mr. Koussevitzky had never led the Boston Symphony in Mozart's "Haffner" before. With its curiously modernistic twists in the finale and its infinitely graceful andante, it would seem to be just his dish. He is a great conductor of Mozart, and the more we hear from him on this score the firmer the proof of it.

That he is also at his best with Tchaikovsky has never been denied; and thus it was that Tchaikovsky's profoundest work, wherein the finale carries an extra meaning in the world today, had a most eloquent reading.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the program offers Vivaldi's "Spring," Falla's "El Amor Brujo" Suite and Schubert's 7th Symphony.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 19 1941

Tuesday Night Program Notes

Some Pertinent Comments on Boston Symphony's Imminent Concert

BY GEORGE Y. LOVERIDGE

TWO well-known articles of musical commerce—the third symphony of Beethoven and the "Pictures at an Exhibition" of Moussorgsky—will be offered in the Metropolitan Theatre by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

As almost everybody knows and not so many care, the third is called the "Eroica" and is in E-flat. Great, dreamy-flowing rivers of ink have been consumed in speculating on the title. Did Beethoven dedicate the symphony to Napoleon and later tear up the dedication, when Napoleon accepted the title of Emperor in defiance of the democratic inclinations of Beethoven? Does the music depict battles and the soldiers' life in the field?

There is a military, trumpet-call character to the first theme of the first movement, and there is a funeral march long enough to bury all the dead of the Russo-German war, but otherwise the symphony is not susceptible to suspicion of martial intent, except by persons super-suspicious in these matters.

The four movements contain some of the most forceful music Beethoven wrote, giving full opportunity for abilities of great conductors and great orchestras.

"Pictures at an Exhibition" was originally a piano solo, of such difficulty that few pianists care to try it. Almost 20 years ago, Dr. Koussevitzky requested Maurice Ravel to orchestrate it. He did, and it has become a favorite concert work.

Victor Hartman was the artist whose pictures are described in music. He was a friend to Moussorgsky. The exhibition to which the title refers took place after Hartman's death and was a memorial show arranged by his admirers. "Gnomes," "The Old Castle," "Ballet of the Chicks in Their Shells," "Samuel Goldenburg and Schmuyle," and "The Great Gate at Kiev" are some of the pictures.

A few years ago, Hans Wiener created dances for the music, and gave a performance here with the Providence Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Sunday Advertiser Oct 19, 1941

Symphony In Novel Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitsky conducting, will give the third pair of concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

The program will open with the Orchestral Concerto "Spring" by Vivaldi, which is the first of four entitled "The Four Seasons." The second number will be the Suite from Falla's Ballet "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"). This suite, which has not been performed at these concerts since 1934, consists of the following movements: Introduction and Scene, The Gypsies (Evening), The Homecomer, Dance of Terror, The Magic Circle (Narrative of the Fisherman), Midnight (Sorceries), Ritual Dance of Fire (To dispel Evil Spirits), Pantomime, Dance of the Game of Love, Finale (Morning Chimes).

The closing number will be Schubert's great Symphony in C major, No. 7.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
OCT 20 1941

When Defense Calls

Koussevitsky's championship of the Russian cause is a reminder of the play "Tovarich," which delighted theatre and movie audiences some seasons ago. In that piece of fiction an exiled couple of the Russian nobility buries its hatred of the Red regime and surrenders the royal treasures to save Russia from the inroads of foreign capital. It was Russia, Red or White. And yesterday Koussevitzky, who shook the dust of the Soviet from his heels in 1920, pleaded for help for his country.

"Really," he is quoted as saying, "we must absolutely forget about the Bolsheviks. It's the Russian people we must remember. The Russians never will be defeated. I'm 20 years out of Russia but I know Russian people haven't changed much. The Russian is not a soldier by nature. He likes his home ,his forests, his village and his songs. But when he has to go to fight, wen he feels that his ome, is village, his land and his country are in danger, then he will fight until he dies!"

This is something to take account of in weighing the assets of the various participants in the war. It appears that patriotism overbalances loyalty or opposition to a political regime in inverse proportion to a nation's state of what we call civilization. France had advanced farthest from the primitive desire to save home and village. Britain apparently has not changed so much since 1066. How far along the road Germany has gone we will not know until the Reich is invaded and Hitler has to call upon the German people—not necessarily the Nazis—for a war of defense.

LATEST WORK BY SYMPHONY

Boston Post Oct 19, 1941

Schuman's Third Given First Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Symphonies of the 18th, 19th and 20th centuries (Mozart's "Haffner," Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" and William Schuman's Third) make the programme of this week's Symphony Concerts. And since Mr. Schuman's contribution, heard yesterday for the first time and with the composer in attendance, is based on musical forms developed during the 17th century, the passacaglia, fugue, chorale and toccata, Dr. Koussevitsky may be said to have given us a fairly comprehensive lesson in musical history.

Mr. Schuman's music was made known to us early in 1939 through his uncompromising Second Symphony in one movement. This rather drastic composition won him few friends, though it was not without its ardent supporters. The American Festival Overture, composed that summer for special concerts of American music by the Boston ochestra, marked a step in advance. Mr. Schuman was here more genial, more fluent and more assured. With the present work he has climbed even higher; though it is possible to accuse it of over-intellectuality and to say that it savors more of cerebration than of inspiration, it is also possible to describe it many ways as a masterly production.

Like the C minor Symphony of Saint-Saens, Mr. Schuman's third effort in the form runs in two parts and four movements, and displays a similar thematic unity. Of the four divisions, the Passacaglia and Toccata made the most favorable impresion. The former has abundant energy, a quality typical of Mr. Schuman's music as a whole, and a considerable degree of what for lack of a better word may be called charm. The Toccata is a virtuoso—piece pure and simple, a bit empty perhaps, but in a performance such as that of yesterday it is bound to be effective. The Chorale is often persuasive but sometimes falters. No doubt the rather involved Fugue would gain on re-hearing. The score of the Symphony bears the inscription "This work is for Serge Koussevitsky." The dedication was well deserved and in

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
OCT 19 1941

THIRD SYMPONY PROGRAM THIS WEEK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will give the third pair of concerts of the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series in Symphony Hall on October 24 and 25 next. The program will open with the Orchestral Concerto "Spring" by Vivaldi, which is the first of four entitled "The Four Seasons." The second number will be the Suite from Falla's Ballet "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"). This suite, which has not been performed at these concerts since 1934, consists of the following movements:

Introduction and Scene, The Gypsies (Evening), The Homecomer, Dance of Terror, The Magic Circle. (Narrative of the Fisherman). Midnight (Sorceries). Ritual Dance of Fire (To dispel Evil Spirits), Pantomime, Dance of the Game of Love, Finale (Morning Chimes). The closing number will be Schubert's great Symphony in C major, No. 7.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 22 1941

SERVICEMEN HEAR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Khaki and Blue Take Place Among Silver Fox, Teddy Bear and Caracul.

By DORA PATTEN

A sortie of service men into the symphonic atmosphere of the Metropolitan Theatre last evening gave a new flourish to the opening of the Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Khakis and blues and even one scarlet-lined full dress military cape peppered the audience as Serge Koussevitzky swung his orchestra into Beethoven's "Eroica."

Twenty-five of the service men were there at the express invitation of a committee of the Music Association of Providence, which fosters the orchestra's five-concert series here.

One of Largest

Not only the uniformed men, however, put in an appearance. It was one of the largest audiences ever to tax the capacity of the Metropolitan. It was also a somewhat more lavishly dressed audience than usual.

The luxury of bright silver fox wraps and white sheered caraculs; the purely 1941 gayness of white teddy-bear coats bordered in red and green felt and the sparkle of this season's evening frocks gave the audience a bit more splash than Providence theatre audiences generally offer.

Among the veteran concert-goers present were: Mr. and Mrs. John Nicholas Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, Mr. Hugh F. MacColl, who was accompanied by his daughter, Miss Adele MacColl, and Mr. H. Minot Pitman, Jr. Mrs. Brown, always smartly attired, last evening wore an unusual short cape of large green and red plaids on a white background with manipulated arm sections and a tassled fringe. Mrs. Allen's and Miss MacColl's dark gowns were topped with fox wraps.

Blue Fox Cape

Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis, prominent in the Music Association of Providence, attended last night's concert. Mrs. Innis wore a blue fox cape over her dinner dress of a tomato color print.

Several other patrons of the Symphony collected back-stage after the concert to congratulate Dr. Koussevitzky on his performance. Among them were Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, who wore a crimson tweed cloak over cocoa color chiffon, and Mrs. G. Maurice Congdon, wearing a fluffy white cape over sleek black. Also in the back-stage group were Mr. MacColl, his daughter, and Mr. Pitman; and Mr. Robert S. Holding, Jr.

Often seen at Providence concerts are Mr. and Mrs. Gerald W. Harrington. Last evening Mrs. Harrington was chic in a brilliant emerald green tweed coat a la the coachman's cloak with its full shoulder cape. Another pair of music enthusiasts was Mr. and Mrs. Carl W. Haffenreffer. A row of scarlet flowers flashed down one side of the V-neckline of Mrs. Heffenreffer's black gown.

This Clipping From DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
OCT 20 1941

Prokoviev Premiere

NEW YORK, Oct. 19.—Prokoviev's Third Symphony, as yet unheard in America, will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, during the coming season. Other high lights will include William Schuman's Third Symphony and a new symphony by Arthur Lourie, both of which will receive their first performances.

Oct. 19 Telegram

Koussevitsky Amazed At Hearing Good 'Jazz'

Symphony Conductor Says Complex Mood Responds to Some Music Styles

By RAYMOND MORIN

Those who attended the last of the civic music concerts in March, still vividly recall the superb performance of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique Symphony" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky.

There are a number of reasons why the works of Tschaikowsky have become a "specialty of the house" to this orchestra. At an interview recently granted me, Dr. Koussevitsky graciously told reminiscences about the great Russian master, and talked of many things. The interview took place in one of the living rooms of the Koussevitsky home in Brookline late in the afternoon. As darkness descended, the engrossed conductor became silhouetted against the background, but the conversation went on—sometimes in English, sometimes in French.

Tschaikowsky

"Yes, I knew Tschaikowsky. It was in Moscow in 1892 that I was presented to him as a double-bass virtuoso." (Koussevitsky had completed several sensationally successful tours with the instrument) "I asked him if I might play for him my double-bass arrangement of his 'Andante Cantabile.' The next day I appeared at his hotel with my instrument and score. He accompanied me himself at the piano. I saw him many times after that at the opera.

"Years later I conducted my own orchestra in Russia in a Tschaikowsky festival which terminated with a dinner in my honor, at which my good friend, Modeste Tschaikowsky (brother of the composer) expressed a warm testimonial in my behalf."

Incidentally, it was during the year that Koussevitsky met Tschaikowsky that the "Pathetique Symphony" was being composed. Asked whether he resented "swing" arrangements of Tschaikowsky melodies, Koussevitsky replied:

"They are in bad taste, but this is just temporary phase. It is 'a la mode' like the changes in women's hats. However, such arrangements can never spoil great art." However, he added this about "swing" music—"We are each of us made up of complex moods each one of which responds to some style of music. So it is that I sometimes enjoy hearing 'jazz,' and when I turn on my radio and hear this kind of music, I am oftentimes amazed at how well it is played."

The [illegible]

Of the pre[illegible] flict and its [illegible]

velopment of music, Koussevitsky said:

"Art is in advance of historical events. Art has predicted the rise and fall of nations. There is something in the very cadence of music that foretells tragedy and triumph." He added emphatically: "There has been absolutely no reaction against German music as a result of this war. Beethoven, Schumann, even Strauss are not to be blamed for the cruelties of the present German regime.

"Unfortunately, there will be no great music created until order has been restored in Europe. Out of all this, there may arise a composer of great magnitude. Hundreds of young men are being sent to their deaths who are potentially great composers."

Advice to Students

Since he had just listened to some auditions for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I asked what qualities in an applicant have most weight. These auditions, by the way, are heard by Dr. Koussevitsky and a jury of the first members of the orchestra.

"First of all, we judge his technical ability. His technical equipment must be entirely adequate.

"Then we judge him as a musician. He must have interpretive sensitivity and judgment. He must be able to subordinate his individuality to conductorship. He must have good sight-reading ability—in short, he must be able to reach our high standard."

Then Dr. Koussevitsky made some specific statements about the development of a student: "I firmly believe in the absolute necessity of studying scales and technical exercises. An adequate technic cannot be acquired merely by the practice of pieces. With the establishment of a technical foundation, the individual styles must be studied. The styles of Beethoven, Chopin, and Debussy are highly individual—in fact, even the styles of Mozart and Beethoven are distinctly different."

Dr. Koussevitsky has started his 17th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He expressed particular interest in three of the new works he is presenting—William Schumann's [illegible]p. 3," and symphoSowerby and John [illegible]er.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
DAILY WORKER

OCT 21 1941

Koussevitzky Heads Russian Relief Group

Prominent Leaders Join Massachusetts Aid Committee

(Special to the Daily Worker)

BOSTON, Oct. 20. — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has assumed chairmanship of the Massachusetts Committee for Russian War Relief and has publicly urged that people realize "to help Russia is to help ourselves, the British and all democracies."

The noted musician, who left the Soviet Union in 1920 an enemy of the young socialist state, has declared that now is no moment to be quibbling about differences and that it was his intention to do all he could to aid the Soviet Union in this war.

Expressing his confidence in the courage and strength of the Soviet defenders of world democracy, Koussevitzky declared:

"The Russian is not a soldier by nature. He likes his home, his forests, his village and his songs. But when he has to go to fight, when he feels that his home, his village, his land and his country are in danger, then he will fight until he dies."

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY with pet spaniel Bemol.

Boston Globe Oct. 20, 1941

Koussevitzky to Do All Possible to Aid Russia

Forget Bolsheviks, He Urges as Honorary Head of Relief

By JANET JONES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who left Russia in 1920, heartily despising the Bolshevik regime, declared yesterday that he was going to let bygones be bygones and do all he could to aid Russia in this war.

For the first time since he has been in the United States—he came here in 1924—this great musician has joined a committee. He is honorary chairman of the Massachusetts Committee for Russian War Relief.

"Really," he said at his home on Druce st., Brookline, "we must absolutely forget about the Bolsheviks. It's the Russian people we must remember. The Russian people, who give their blood to save everybody in the democracies. That's why we must help them and ask all the American people to help.

"Today is not the time to tell what bad things the Bolsheviks did. Today we must help the Russian people. With all my heart I say that to help Russia is to help ourselves, the British and all the democracies."

Says Russia Won't Lose

Leaning forward from his seat on the red divan in his living room to pound on the coffee table in front of him for emphasis, he declared:

"The Russians never will be defeated. I'm 20 years out of Russia, but I know Russian people haven't changed much. The Russian is not a soldier by nature. He likes his home, his forests, his village and his songs.

"But when he has to go to fight, when he feels that his home, his village, his land and his country are in danger, then he will fight until he dies!"

With his keen blue eyes flashing, with a few more staccato raps on the coffee table, the musician who until today has lived solely for his music, looked belligerent enough to lead a tank corps over the Russian battlefield.

Dressed in an impeccably tailored dark blue pin-striped suit, with matching blue tie, Dr. Koussevitzky said that the purpose of the Massachusetts Committee for Russian War Relief is to raise funds for furnishing the most urgently needed non-military supplies, such as medical goods, surgical instruments, certain food concentrates and warm clothing. The committee, of which Dr. Hugh Cabot is chairman, is affiliated with the Russian War Relief, Inc., of New York. Transport facilities are supplied by the Soviet Government.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that there was a possibility, later in the season, that his Boston Symphony Orchestra might give a concert for the committee.

"It might be possible, if the trustees and the orchestra members consent, to give something that will attract the great masses of the people here to help this cause," he said.

He reminisced about his troubles in Russia after the revolution and about his famous prewar orchestra, which he took on Summer trips down the Volga.

He said that Kazan, suggested new Russian capital, is a large city on the Volga, "where I always gave two concerts on the way down and one on the way back. Kazan is in European Russia. Formerly it was the principal city of the Tartars."

Then, patting his black cocker spaniel, Bemol—which is the French musical term for "flat"—he again said how necessary he felt it was to aid Russia.

"I am now an American citizen," he said, "but I still love my Russia."

Included on the Massachusetts committee for Russian war relief are:

Prof. J. A. C. Fagginger Auer, Dr. Herman Blumart, Judge Lawrence G. Brooks, Dr. C. Sidney Burwell, Dr. Hugh Cabot, Prof. Zechariah Chafee Jr., Dr. David Cheever, John S. Codman, Kenneth Conant, Charles A. Coolidge, Prof. S. H. Cross, Dr. Elliott G. Cutler, Dr. Hallowell Davis.

William Emerson, Prof. Sidney B. Fay, Richard H. Field, Dr. Max Finland, Mrs. J. Malcolm Forbes, Seth Geno, Cushing Goodhue, Jerome Greene, Rev. Whitney Hale, Christian Herter, Prof. Vida Scudder, Mrs. George Cheever Shattuck.

Arthur D. Hill, Prof. William E. Hocking, Prof. and Mrs. Bruce C. Hopper, Mrs. Henry B. Jackson, Rev. Frank Jennings, Basil Kacedan, Prof. Michael Karpovich, Dr. Serge Goussevitzky, Rev. Harry Kruener, Dr. Frank Lahey, Dr. Roger Lee.

Dean Delmar Leighton, Dr. William G. Lennox, Prof. and Mrs. Leontief, Dean Howard Le Sourd, Rev. Donald G. Lothrop, Mrs. Stanley McCormick, Mr. and Mrs. John F. Moors, Rev. Leslie Pennington, Prof. Ralph Barton Perry, Mrs. Andrew J. Peters, Prof. George Sarton, Prof. A. M. Schlesinger.

Prof. Alfred D. Sheffield, Mrs. Nicholas Slonimsky, Prof. Theodore Smith, Prof. and Mrs. Pitirim Sorokin, Dr. and Mrs. Richard P. Strong, Prof. and Mrs. D. J. Struik, Mrs. Beatrice M. Taussig, Mrs. Robert Ulich, Dr. Soma Weiss, Dr. Stafford M. Wheeler, Mrs. Jasper Whiting, Thomas Whittemore, Prof. Amos Wilder, Dr. George B. Wislock.

BELIEVES RUSSIANS WILL WIN

Boston Post
Oct. 20, 1941

Dr. Koussevitzky Sure They Can Outlast Germans

BY GRACE DAVIDSON

The Russian people have taken over the war and are doing the fighting and dying. Bolshevism is dead!

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Boston's famous conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, made this impassioned declaration yesterday on accepting the honorary chairmanship of the Massachusetts Committee for Russian War Relief, with Dr. Hugh Cabot as chairman. Now an American citizen, Dr. Koussevitzky said at his home at 88 Druce street, Brookline, that "by helping Russia, we are helping ourselves."

STRIPPED OF WEALTH

"I know the Russian people well," said Dr. Koussevitzky, smiling. It is some 20 years since the Bolshevik government stripped the musician of his splendid Moscow home and a collection of 260 famous paintings, including one of the finest Rubens, which were dispersed throughout the Soviet museums. He also had confiscated one of the rarest musical and art libraries in Europe.

"But it was not the act of the Russian people then. And so we must no longer talk of the Bolsheviks. It is these Russian people who are fighting for their homes and they will continue to fight."

Dr. Koussevitzky remarked that when the German-Russian war was only a few hours old, an acquaintance came to him with the comment that the Russians would be knocked out of the war in 10 days.

"I answered, 'You do not know the Russian people.' This man said, 'Oh yes, I do. I was only in Moscow recently. I asked him for how long. He replied, 'Four days.' Well, I have not been in Russia for 20 years, but I was born in Russia and every year until I left, I was in Russia for some part of the year. And, although there have been outer changes, I do not believe the Russian people have changed fundamentally. They are not a militaristic people. They are not professional soldiers, but when a Russian finds his home, his ground, attacked, he will fight and he will die in the fight to save his home, but not until he has killed 10 who are trying to take it away from him."

The conductor characterized the Russian people as "gay, spirited, imaginative, who know how to enjoy a glass of wine in carefree moments," but stubborn, intense, and courageous in battle when attacked. He pointed out that Moscovites have had enemies at their gates long before Napoleon's conquest. The Tartars hammered at the Kremlin fortress and finally gained entrance. But not for long!

"Hitler can't conquer the Russian people," he prophesied Dr. Koussevitsky. He claims that the Bolshevik conquest was the only temporary, that even they who were made up of a segment of the Russian people, are now seeing their doom.

Oct. 19 Worcester Telegram

Koussevitsky Amazed At Hearing Good 'Jazz'

Symphony Conductor Says Complex Mood Responds to Some Music Styles

By RAYMOND MORIN

Those who attended the last of the civic music concerts in March, still vividly recall the superb performance of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique Symphony" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky.

There are a number of reasons why the works of Tschaikowsky have become a "specialty of the house" to this orchestra. At an interview recently granted me, Dr. Koussevitsky graciously told reminiscences about the great Russian master, and talked of many things. The interview took place in one of the living rooms of the Koussevitsky home in Brookline late in the afternoon. As darkness descended, the engrossed conductor became silhouetted against the background, but the conversation went on—sometimes in English, sometimes in French.

Tschaikowsky

"Yes, I knew Tschaikowsky. It was in Moscow in 1892 that I was presented to him as a double-bass virtuoso." (Koussevitsky had completed several sensationally successful tours with the instrument) "I asked him if I might play for him my double-bass arrangement of his 'Andante Cantabile.' The next day I appeared at his hotel with my instrument and score. He accompanied me himself at the piano. I saw him many times after that at the opera.

"Years later I conducted my own orchestra in Russia in a Tschaikowsky festival which terminated with a dinner in my honor, at which my good friend, Modeste Tschaikowsky (brother of the composer) expressed a warm testimonial in my behalf."

Incidentally, it was during the year that Koussevitsky met Tschaikowsky that the "Pathetique Symphony" was being composed. Asked whether he resented "swing" arrangements of Tschaikowsky melodies, Koussevitsky replied:

"They are in bad taste, but this is just temporary phase. It is 'a la mode' like the changes in women's hats. However, such arrangements can never spoil great art." However, he added this about "swing" music—"We are each of us made up of complex moods each one of which responds to some style of music. So it is that I sometimes enjoy hearing 'jazz,' and when I turn on my radio and hear this kind of music, I am oftentimes amazed at how well it is played."

The Present War

Of the present European conflict and its effect upon the development of music, Koussevitsky said:

"Art is in advance of historical events. Art has predicted the rise and fall of nations. There is something in the very cadence of music that foretells tragedy and triumph." He added emphatically: "There has been absolutely no reaction against German music as a result of this war. Beethoven, Schumann, even Strauss are not to be blamed for the cruelties of the present German regime.

"Unfortunately, there will be no great music created until order has been restored in Europe. Out of all this, there may arise a composer of great magnitude. Hundreds of young men are being sent to their deaths who are potentially great composers."

Advice to Students

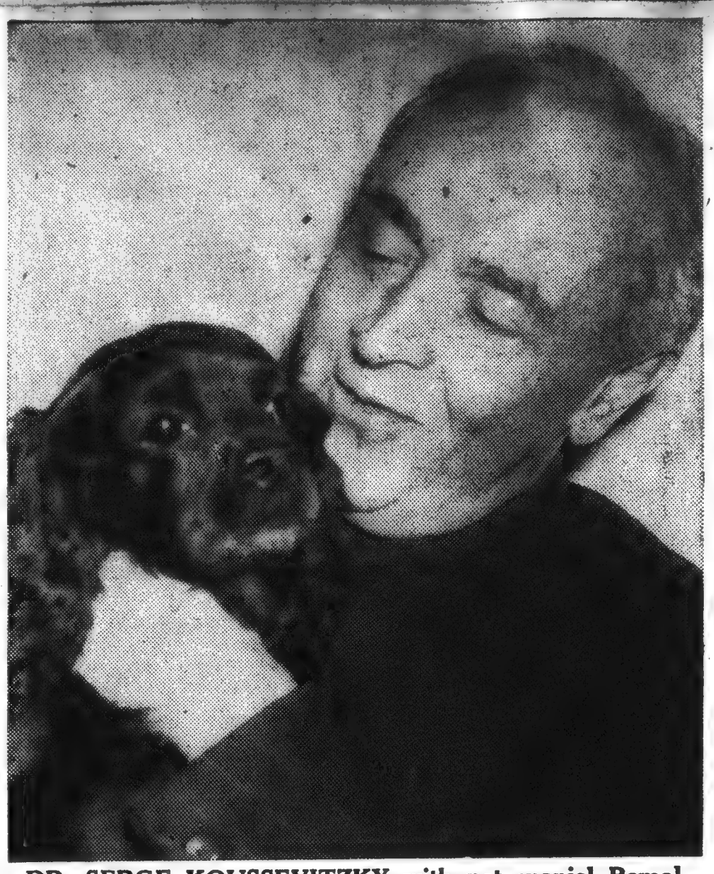
Since he had just listened to some auditions for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I asked what qualities in an applicant have most weight. These auditions, by the way, are heard by Dr. Koussevitsky and a jury of the first members of the orchestra.

"First of all, we judge his technical ability. His technical equipment must be entirely adequate.

"Then we judge him as a musician. He must have interpretive sensitivity and judgment. He must be able to subordinate his individuality to conductorship. He must have good sight-reading ability—in short, he must be able to reach our high standard."

Then Dr. Koussevitsky made some specific statements about the development of a student: "I firmly believe in the absolute necessity of studying scales and technical exercises. An adequate technic cannot be acquired merely by the practice of pieces. With the establishment of a technical foundation, the individual styles must be studied. The styles of Beethoven, Chopin, and Debussy are highly individual—in fact, even the styles of Mozart and Beethoven are distinctly different."

Dr. Koussevitsky has started his 17th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He expressed particular interest in three of the new works he is presenting—William Schumann's "Symphony No. 3," and symphonies by Leo Sowerby and John Alden Carpenter.



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY with pet spaniel Bemol.

Boston Globe Oct. 20, 1941

Koussevitzky to Do All Possible to Aid Russia

Forget Bolsheviks, He Urges as Honorary Head of Relief

By JANET JONES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who left Russia in 1920, heartily despising the Bolshevik regime, declared yesterday that he was going to let bygones be bygones and do all he could to aid Russia in this war.

For the first time since he has been in the United States—he came here in 1924—this great musician has joined a committee. He is honorary chairman of the Massachusetts Committee for Russian War Relief.

"Really," he said at his home on Druce st., Brookline, "we must absolutely forget about the Bolsheviks. It's the Russian people we must remember. The Russian people, who give their blood to save everybody in the democracies. That's why we must help them and ask all the American people to help.

"Today is not the time to tell what bad things the Bolsheviks did. Today we must help the Russian people. With all my heart I say that to help Russia is to help ourselves, the British and all the democracies."

Says Russia Won't Lose

Leaning forward from his seat on the red divan in his living room to pound on the coffee table in front of him for emphasis, he declared:

"The Russians never will be defeated. I'm 20 years out of Russia, but I know Russian people haven't changed much. The Russian is not a soldier by nature. He likes his home, his forests, his village and his songs.

"But when he has to go to fight, when he feels that his home, his village, his land and his country are in danger, then he will fight until he dies!"

With his keen blue eyes flashing, with a few more staccato raps on the coffee table, the musician who until today has lived solely for his music, looked belligerent enough to lead a tank corps over the Russian battlefield.

Dressed in an impeccably tailored dark blue pin-striped suit, with matching blue tie, Dr. Koussevitzky said that the purpose of the Massachusetts Committee for Russian War Relief is to raise funds for furnishing the most urgently needed non-military supplies, such as medical goods, surgical instruments, certain food concentrates and warm clothing. The committee, of which Dr. Hugh Cabot is chairman, is affiliated with the Russian War Relief, Inc., of New York. Transport facilities are supplied by the Soviet Government.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that there was a possibility, later in the season, that his Boston Symphony Orchestra might give a concert for the committee.

"It might be possible, if the trustees and the orchestra members consent, to give something that will attract the great masses of the people here to help this cause," he said.

He reminisced about his troubles in Russia after the revolution and about his famous prewar orchestra, which he took on Summer trips down the Volga.

He said that Kazan, suggested new Russian capital, is a large city on the Volga, "where I always gave two concerts on the way down and one on the way back. Kazan is in European Russia. Formerly it was the principal city of the Tartars."

Then, patting his black cocker spaniel, Bemol—which is the French musical term for "flat"—he again said how necessary he felt it was to aid Russia.

"I am now an American citizen," he said, "but I still love my Russia."

Included on the Massachusetts committee for Russian war relief are:

Prof. J. A. C. Fagginger Auer, Dr. Herman Blumart, Judge Lawrence G. Brooks, Dr. C. Sidney Burwell, Dr. Hugh Cabot, Prof. Zechariah Chafee Jr., Dr. David Cheever, John S. Codman, Kenneth Conant, Charles A. Coolidge, Prof. S. H. Cross, Dr. Elliott G. Cutler, Dr. Hallowell Davis.

William Emerson, Prof. Sidney B. Fay, Richard H. Field, Dr. Max Finland, Mrs. J. Malcolm Forbes, Seth Geno, Cushing Goodhue, Jerome Greene, Rev. Whitney Hale, Christian Herter, Prof. Vida Scudder, Mrs. George Cheever Shattuck.

Arthur D. Hill, Prof. William E. Hocking, Prof. and Mrs. Bruce C. Hopper, Mrs. Henry B. Jackson, Rev. Frank Jennings, Basil Kacedan, Prof. Michael Karpovich, Dr. Serge Goussevitzky, Rev. Harry Kruener, Dr. Frank Lahey, Dr. Roger Lee.

Dean Delmar Leighton, Dr. William G. Lennox, Prof. and Mrs. Leontief, Dean Howard Le Sourd, Rev. Donald G. Lothrop, Mrs. Stanley McCormick, Mr. and Mrs. John F. Moors, Rev. Leslie Pennington, Prof. Ralph Barton Perry, Mrs. Andrew J. Peters, Prof. George Sarton, Prof. A. M. Schlesinger.

Prof. Alfred D. Sheffield, Mrs. Nicholas Slonimsky, Prof. Theodore Smith, Prof. and Mrs. Pitirim Sorokin, Dr. and Mrs. Richard P. Strong, Prof. and Mrs. D. J. Struik, Mrs. Beatrice M. Taussig, Mrs. Robert Ulich, Dr. Soma Weiss, Dr. Stafford M. Wheeler, Mrs. Jasper Whiting, Thomas Whittemore, Prof. Amos Wilder, Dr. George B. Wislock.

R...up

Prominent Leaders Join Massachusetts Aid Committee

(Special to the Daily Worker)

BOSTON, Oct. 20. — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has assumed chairmanship of the Massachusetts Committee for Russian War Relief and has publicly urged that people realize "to help Russia is to help ourselves, the British and all democracies."

The noted musician, who left the Soviet Union in 1920 an enemy of the young socialist state, has declared that now is no moment to be quibbling about differences and that it was his intention to do all he could to aid the Soviet Union in this war.

Expressing his confidence in the courage and strength of the Soviet defenders of world democracy, Koussevitzky declared:

"The Russian is not a soldier by nature. He likes his home, his forests, his village and his songs. But when he has to go to fight, when he feels that his home, his village, his land and his country are in danger, then he will fight until he dies."

BELIEVES RUSSIANS WILL WIN

Boston Post Oct. 20, 1941

Dr. Koussevitzky Sure They Can Outlast Germans

BY GRACE DAVIDSON

The Russian people have taken over the war and are doing the fighting and dying. Bolshevism is dead!

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Boston's famous conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, made this impassioned declaration yesterday on accepting the honorary chairmanship of the Massachusetts Committee for Russian War Relief, with Dr. Hugh Cabot as chairman. Now an American citizen, Dr. Koussevitzky said at his home at 88 Druce street, Brookline, that "by helping Russia, we are helping ourselves."

STRIPPED OF WEALTH

"I know the Russian people well," said Dr. Koussevitzky, smiling. It is some 20 years since the Bolshevik government stripped the musician of his splendid Moscow home and a collection of 260 famous paintings, including one of the finest Rubens, which were dispersed throughout the Soviet museums. He also had confiscated one of the rarest musical and art libraries in Europe.

"But it was not the act of the Russian people then. And so we must no longer talk of the Bolsheviks. It is these Russian people who are fighting for their homes and they will continue to fight."

Dr. Koussevitzky remarked that when the German-Russian war was only a few hours old, an acquaintance came to him with the comment that the Russians would be knocked out of the war in 10 days.

"I answered, 'You do not know the Russian people.' This man said, 'Oh yes, I do. I was only in Moscow recently. I asked him for how long. He replied, 'Four days.' Well, I have not been in Russia for 20 years, but I was born in Russia and every year until I left, I was in Russia for some part of the year. And, although there have been outer changes, I do not believe the Russian people have changed fundamentally. They are not a militaristic people. They are not professional soldiers, but when a Russian finds his home, his ground, attacked, he will fight and he will die in the fight to save his home, but not until he has killed 10 who are trying to take it away from him."

The conductor characterized the Russian people as "gay, spirited, imaginative, who know how to enjoy a glass of wine in carefree moments," but stubborn, intense, and courageous in battle when attacked. He pointed out that Moscovites have had enemies at their gates long before Napoleon's conquest. The Tartars hammered at the Kremlin fortress and finally gained entrance. But not for long!

"Hitler can't conquer the Russian people," he prophesied Dr. Koussevitsky. He claims that the Bolshevik conquest was the only temporary, that even they who were made up of a segment of the Russian people, are now seeing their doom.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 19 1941

Mrs. Edward L. Johnson of Prospect street, this city, who attended the first Boston Symphony concert in Providence sixty years ago. She has not missed a Symphony appearance since that memorable first night when the 31-year-old conductor, Georg Henschel, not only directed the orchestra but sang a baritone solo as well.

—Journal photo, Harry A. Scheer

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, noted conductor, who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it opens its sixtieth Providence season on Tuesday evening at the Metropolitan Theatre. Here Dr. Koussevitsky abandons dynamism for serenity during a rehearsal of the famous organization.

Boston Symphony To Open 60th Season Here

BY GEORGE Y. LOVERIDGE

It would cause an authentic national sensation if Dr. Serge Koussevitzky should lay down his baton in Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday night and turn to sing a solo with accompaniment by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Yet, when the orchestra first appeared in Providence, just 60 seasons ago, the conductor did sing a solo and nobody was surprised. Georg Henschel was the director who doubled in voice. He was 31 years of age at the time, and was already distinguished as a singer before he became a conductor. His Providence solo was Pogner's address from "Die Meistersinger."

Dr. Koussevitzky could, if he would, provide diversion equally unusual. He is one of the few men in the world capable of appearing as a double-bass soloist. He did so once in Providence, when Brown University gave him an honorary degree.

However, on Tuesday he will confine himself to conducting the orchestra that he has led for 17 years, and has brought to such eminence that many consider it the finest in the world. Rigorous drilling as well as Dr. Koussevitzky's superior insight into the meanings and possibilities of the scores, has resulted in an orchestra magnificently precise, responsive to the most elusive moods, and confident in its leadership.

In a sense, Dr. Koussevitzky is still a soloist. The instrument he plays is the most complicated and difficult ever invented—the orchestra itself.

—Photos by Arthur Griffin

The fervor of the Boston musicians is indicated during a pause as the players await the next "attack." In centre is First Viola Jean Lafranc and at his right, Second Desk Jean Cauhape.

A study of devotion applied to plucking a single note in a pizzicato passage. The example for the rest of the orchestra is set by Concertmaster and Assistant Conductor Richard Burgin (centre) and Second Concertmaster Julius Theoderowicz (right).

"Russ
Says

Famed D for Wit
Rus
"Ru racy

With all liance and he conduct orchestra i bridge con sevitsky ye stinted aid country th
fied.

Slight an a vivacity conductor ing an int home whe nounced t post of ho newly-form mittee for

His infor were delive a symphor
"we must help Russi

Of cour on this th
help Russi
we defend fighting t democracy will fight.
quered."

But tim his quick knock out table befo is to help

At one played pi comfortab Empire s his life after the
He told brary—" complete" treasures ful."

He ta trips u spreadin had nev spoke so ures, his hardships over.

"But w

Mid-Winter Fun...

HENNESSE
Laundrette · Cle
BROOK and ARNOLD Sts.,
Woon. 4749 GAspee 9626 Va
"The Only Laundry in Rhod to offer This Exclusive Se
SEMI-FINISH SERV
Flatwork completely ironed.
& starched and dried. Hand additional. Shirts ironed weighed). Minimum charge
I'M WORSE THAN AN BANDIT BECAUSE I
STEAL YOUR HEALTH
AN INNOCENT LOOKING PILLOW can be infested with vicious destroyers of cleanliness and health . . .
dirt, perspiration and germ-filled dust! The sure way to purify and revitalize pillows is the Sanitized way!
Hennessey's Routs Dan
Feathers are sterilized in a bath in live steam at 315 degrees . . . downy buoyancy restored . . . then blown into separately washed ticking.
POOR PETER PILLOW - W
KRE-MEL DESSERT IS CHOCOLATE
VANILLA
CARAMEL
BUTT
L
6
Fine
Flavors
pan. Add 2 c to a boil. Coc in 1 cup cream
ture control se
sionally. Turn c
Makes 1 quar
grocer for the
It's the selecte

This Clipping From
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
OCT 21 1941

"Russia Will Not Be Conquered," Says Koussevitzky, Asking Help

Famed Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra Calls for Unstinted Aid to Native Land, Country Which Abused Him Until He Fled—"To Aid Russia is to Aid America," He Says, Adding "Russia is Fighting Threat of Nazism to Democracy."

With all the inspirational brilliance and sheer beauty with which he conducts the Boston Symphony orchestra in its Boston and Stockbridge concerts, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky yesterday called for unstinted aid to his native Russia, the country that abused him until he fled.

Slight and grey-haired, but with a vivacity that belies his age, the conductor urged aid to Russia during an interview at his Brookline home where it was formally announced that he had accepted the post of honorary chairman of the newly-formed Massachusetts Committee for Russian War Relief.

His informal words of acceptance were delivered with all the rigor of a symphonic score. Its theme was "we must help Russia because to help Russia is to help America."

Of course, there were variations on this theme. "All my heart is to help Russia . . . by helping Russia we defend America . . . Russia is fighting the threat of Nazism to democracy . . . the Russian people will fight. Russia will not be conquered."

But time and again he stopped his quick, gesticulating hands to knock out the rhythm on the little table before him: "to help Russia is to help America."

At one point, Dr. Koussevitsky played pianissimo and leaned back comfortably in the red-upholstered Empire sofa as he reminisced about his life in Russia before and just after the Bolsheviks came to power. He told movingly of losing his library—"from Palestrina to 1914, complete"—and his priceless art treasures—"ah, they were beautiful."

He talked about his legendary trips up and down the Volga, spreading music in villages which had never heard its charms. He spoke softly of his home, his pleasures, his youth, and then, of his hardships when the Bolsheviks took over.

"But we must not talk of that," he broke in abruptly. "What is past is past." His dark eyes began to sparkle again and he sat upright on the very edge of the sofa. "This is not the time to talk about the errors of the Bolsheviks. We must help Russia; to help Russia is to help America."

He wagged a thin forefinger at his listener. "Russia will never be conquered," he said slowly.

"The Russians are not a military people," he added quietly. "They love their homes, their villages and their songs. But—" he paused, his voice in crescendo—"he must go to fight when he feels that his ground is in danger. Then he will fight and die. But he will kill 10 before he gives his life."

His enthusiasm was infectious and heady, like a crashing finale.

"We must help them. We must help them," he repeated. "It is like helping England. We help England to help ourselves and to help the democracies. We must help Russia the same way. For Russia is fighting the enemies of the democracies."

The purpose of the committee Koussevitsky heads is to raise funds for the most urgently needed non-military supplies, such as medical goods, surgical instruments, food concentrates and warm clothing.

The committee is affiliated with Russian War Relief, Inc., of New York which purchases and packs the materials. Transport facilities are supplied by the Soviet government.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 22 1941

Khaki and Blue Take Place Among Silver Fox at Concert

By DORA PATTEN

A sortie of service men into the symphonic atmosphere of the Metropolitan Theatre last evening gave a new flourish to the opening of the Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Khakis and blues and even one scarlet-lined full dress military cape peppered the audience as Serge Koussevitzky swung his orchestra into Beethoven's "Eroica."

Twenty-five of the service men were there at the express invitation of a committee of the Music Association of Providence, which fosters the orchestra's five-concert series here.

One of Largest

Not only the uniformed men, however, put in an appearance. It was one of the largest audiences ever to tax the capacity of the Metropolitan. It was also a somewhat more lavishly dressed audience than usual.

The luxury of bright silver fox wraps and white sheered caraculs; the purely 1941 gayness of white teddy-bear coats bordered in red and green felt and the sparkle of this season's evening frocks gave the audience a bit more splash than Providence theatre audiences generally offer.

Among the veteran concert-goers present were: Mr. and Mrs. John Nicholas Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, Mr. Hugh F. MacColl, who was accompanied by his daughter, Miss Adele MacColl, and Mr. H. Minot Pitman, Jr. Mrs. Brown, always smartly attired, last evening wore an unusual short cape of large green and red plaids on a white background with manipulated arm sections and a tassled fringe. Mrs. Allen's and Miss MacColl's dark gowns were topped with fox wraps.

Blue Fox Cape

Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis, prominent in the Music Association of Providence, attended last night's concert. Mrs. Innis wore a blue fox cape over her dinner dress of a tomato color print.

Several other patrons of the Symphony collected back-stage after the concert to congratulate Dr. Koussevitzky on his performance. Among them were Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, who wore a crimson tweed cloak over cocoa color chiffon, and Mrs. G. Maurice Congdon, wearing a fluffy white cape over sleek black. Also in the back-stage group were Mr. MacColl, his daughter, and Mr. Pitman; and Mr. Robert S. Holding, Jr.

Often seen at Providence concerts are Mr. and Mrs. Gerald W. Harrington. Last evening Mrs. Harrington was chic in a brilliant emerald green tweed coat a la the coachman's cloak with its full shoulder cape. Another pair of music enthusiasts was Mr. and Mrs. Carl W. Haffenreffer. A row of scarlet flowers flashed down one side of the V-neckline of Mrs. Heffenreffer's black gown.

MUSIC at MOVIE PRICES

Koussevitzky proposes a radical change in our musical set-up to bring symphonies to the masses.

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

IN a day when the forces of democracy are joined in a showdown struggle with black reaction, music has a tremendous mission to fulfill. It satisfies a spiritual need because it bestows a spiritual power. But what it has to give must be placed at the disposal of the great masses of men and women of America.

Thus Sergei Koussevitzky sums up his fighting program for the spread of music. The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is a student of the temper of our times as well as a great musician, has been thinking about his problem for more than thirty years. He is convinced that at this crucial point in the affairs of the world the time has come to march forward vigorously in the arts as well as on the social and battle fronts.

In the tranquillity of his Lenox (Mass.) home poised high on a hill overlooking the grounds of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, over which he presides, and commanding a view of rugged, headlong mountains, peaceful vales and gleaming blue lakes, Mr. Koussevitzky recently discussed these momentous issues.

The aristocracy of the spirit is important, not the aristocracy of blood, he began as he developed his thesis. Music ennobles, stimulates and satisfies, and it can serve high income and low.

"The masses," he continued, "do not receive the best in music. Perfect performances are not accessible to them, because until now their concerts have not been conducted by the foremost conductors and their orchestras have not been rehearsed to the point of perfection.

"Yet there is a great need for music for the masses today. For many, music has become almost a religion, and for some it is a religion. This is only natural, because music as an art was born with Christianity and is the highest achievement of Christian culture. Music, as the highest manifestation of human creative power, grows parallel with the evolution of democracy. It is a spiritual need not only for those who can pay $3 or $5 a ticket but more so for the simple worker who, though unable to pay, is just as much an aristocrat of the spirit."

But how can the spread of music be insured? "You must go to the people, give them your best and they will come to you," Mr. Koussevitzky says. And we must put an end to the old way of supporting music. The day of the individual Maecenas who organizes an orchestra and sees it through the thick of its budget headaches and the thin of the deficits is virtually over. Mr. Koussevitzky concedes that the wealthy patrons of art have done good work in their time and place, but he deplores the continuance of the method, even with his own Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is a way of supporting music which "cannot continue long."

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY is convinced that music, like all the arts, must find a new and wider base of support. He suggests that this can be accomplished in alternative ways or perhaps by a judicious admixture of both. The first would be outright support by governments, whether Federal, State or municipal. The second would be through huge audiences at low prices that would make music as widespread and as profitable as the movies.

Given first-rate performances in immense auditoriums, the large, general public might well support good music at low admission rates, Mr. Koussevitzky believes. He has seen how at the Berkshire Festival, where the grounds at Tanglewood have held average audiences of 9,000, the public more than paid for the cost of the performances. He calls to mind the vast outpourings of people for concerts in places like the Lewisohn Stadium and the Hollywood Bowl in the Summer.

HE would like to see halls of comparable size employed in the Winter, and admission charged at movie-house rates. If that were not immediately possible, he would favor more performances each week in the smaller auditoriums now used, with larger total audiences at lower prices.

If the setting up of a new concert system on a foundation of a mass audience could not immediately pay the orchestra's way, Mr. Koussevitzky would recommend a modicum of support from the public treasuries. Fully aware that taxes are mounting in size and variety, he would nevertheless add a tiny levy for the benefit of art. The city of San Francisco collects a small tax for the use of its orchestra; one-half cent of every $100 of the city's income from taxation is set aside for the maintenance of a civic orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky feels that other communities might follow suit. Then orchestras and operas would need have no recourse to periodic campaigns for funds, nor would they have to depend on the generosity of any single benefactor. There have been instances in the past when the death of one philanthropist has brought to an end an artistic enterprise that has meant much to the entire community.

Mr. Koussevitzky would have no lowering of standards of performance. He wants mass concerts arranged on the high artistic level that marks the best Winter season. The regular maestro should preside for the mass audience, and he should have as much time for rehearsal for the great auditorium as for the smaller one. It is not enough, he asserts emphatically, to offer concerts at low prices; these concerts must be the finest we have.

That the people would know how to appreciate such a benison he has no shadow of doubt. His certainty is based on experiments that he conducted as long ago as 1909 in Moscow. That was the year in which he formed his own orchestra, and besides a fashionable season, he insisted on giving a series of concerts for poor workers. The programs, soloists and conductor were the same; even the auditorium, the Hall of the Nobles, was the same. The only difference was in the admission charge. For these concerts tickets sold at thirty kopecks, then the equivalent of 15 cents. He gave concerts in St. Petersburg at the same rates.

"The hall was packed with workers and poor young students," Mr. Koussevitzky recalls. "I have never enjoyed any concerts as I did those. The response was electrical."

IN 1910 Mr. Koussevitzky undertook another experiment to bring music to communities that had never seen or heard a symphony orchestra. He organized a junket that would have warmed the heart and quickened the imagination of a Mark Twain. He hired a Volga River sidewheel steamboat and put his orchestra of eighty-five men on board. His wife and a party of friends went along, and they toured up and down the Volga from Tver to Astrakhan and back, playing at towns along the route.

In Tsaritsin (Continued on Page 31)

(10)

MUSIC AT MOVIE PRICES

(Continued from Page 14)

Mr. Koussevitzky's traveling band gave three concerts, the third at reduced rates, for the workers of the town. It was this third concert that won the musicians their most thrilling success. At the end of the concert, when the conductor emerged from the theatre, the crowd placed him in a sedan chair and carried him aloft, like an oriental potentate, to his steamboat on the Volga.

NOR was that all. Two years later, when Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians came down the Volga once more and stopped at Tsaritsin, he was greeted by a band. The local musicians were drawn up at the theatre on the day of his arrival and they serenaded him. He learned that his last visit had inspired the workers to organize this ensemble, and for months they had practiced this serenade to a conductor. The outfit had been christened the Koussevitzky Band.

Sergei Koussevitzky's awareness of the potentialities of little men and women over the world as music lovers has deep roots in his own background. Of a poor family, he was born sixty-seven years ago in the Province of Tver, along the northern reaches of the Volga. His father, a humble violin teacher, was the lad's mentor, particularly after the mother died when Sergei was 3. There were lessons with his father, and he played in the town band, but the small community had limited opportunities for the gifted youngster. At 14 he went to Moscow, arriving with a capital of three rubles. He hoped to get a musical scholarship in Moscow, but prizes were available only in trombone, horn and double bass. Young Koussevitzky took the scholarship test for bull-fiddle, won it, and in time became the world's most eminent virtuoso of the bulky bear of the string family.

His success as a contrabass soloist and later as a conductor did not divert him from the missionary zeal to spread the beneficence of good music among all people. Being of a philosophical turn of mind and a progressive in the bargain, Koussevitzky thought about the larger problems of the artist and his public besides developing himself as an artist. He was not afraid to act according to his convictions.

IN 1911, on the first anniversary of the death of Count Leo Tolstoy, who had spoken for the "submerged tenth" of Russia, the police banned anniversary demonstrations. But Koussevitzky, upon opening a concert, bade the orchestra arise and stand silently for one minute "in honor of the memory of a great artist." The audience knew the significance of the action, and the conductor's friends feared political repercussions, but the incident was passed over.

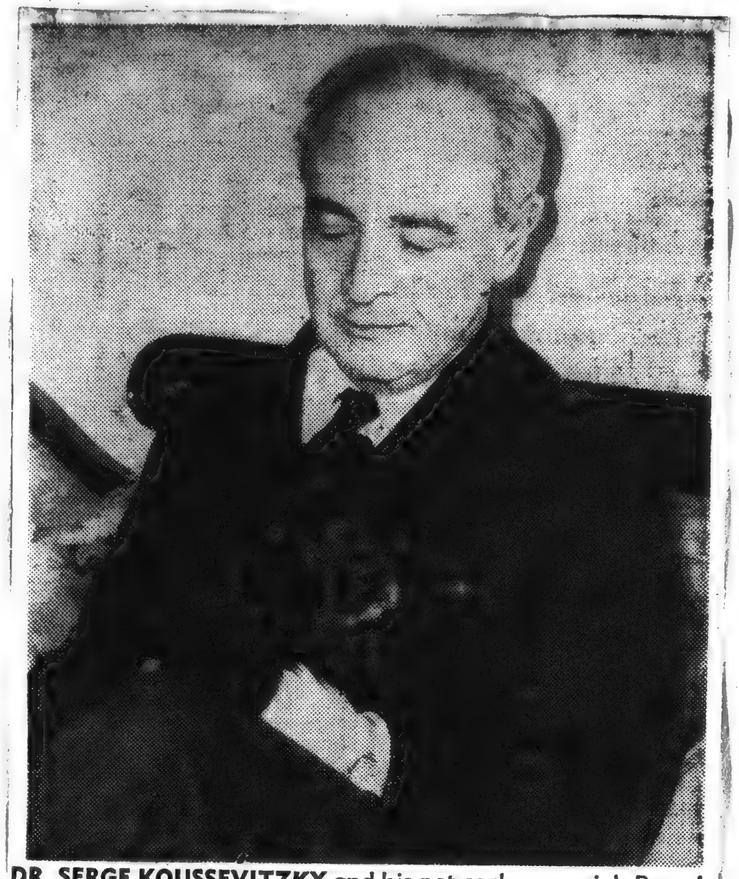
Throughout his career as a conductor—in Russia, in other European centers and in Boston, where he took over in 1924 and made the Boston Symphony Orchestra one of the world's greatest—Mr. Koussevitzky has been forward-looking. He has befriended young conductors here and abroad. He has given young musicians their first chance to appear as soloists. Today he leads the call for recognition of American art—both composers and performers. But, above all, he insists that the wide, new public must be brought into the picture.

Here is how he analyzes the meaning of drawing the masses nearer to music:

"It consists, with due regard to native creative ability, in breaking down the artificial barriers between the 'initiated' and the 'non-initiated'; in making the musical language as accessible to the general understanding and emotion as is the spoken language; in exposing the meaning and evolution of all musical styles; in giving a feeling for, and an understanding of, the development and structure of musical forms; in an invitation to practical participation in instrumental and vocal ensembles, and so on. But the most important is to introduce into the consciousness of listeners the truly spiritual essence of music, which stands high above the level of vulgar amusement and musical diversions.

"ONE of the greatest vices of European culture (of art, at any rate) has been that art was detached from the people. Fortunately, we do not have this here to any such extent as in Europe. We well know that 'a man of action' in the true sense of the word can only be called one whose actions are linked with the progress of the masses.

"It depends on us to act in such a way as to make a severance between culture and the people quite impossible in the future. The people must be linked with music organically and not merely by an accidental link based on mutual sympathy or taste. The strength of this link is the guarantee of the entire future growth of music in this country."



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and his pet cocker spaniel, Bemol, or Flat, as he appeared during an interview at his Brookline home yesterday. Boston Herald Oct 20, 1941

Koussevitzky Forgives Soviets, Will Head Russian War Relief

By WESLEY FULLER

With all the inspirational brilliance and sheer beauty with which he conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky yesterday called for unstinted aid to his native Russia, the country that abused him until he fled.

Slight and grey-haired, but with a vivacity that belies his age, the conductor urged aid to Russia during an interview at his Brookline home where it was formally announced that he had accepted the post of honorary chairman of the newly-formed Massachusetts Committee for Russian War Relief.

'TO HELP AMERICA'

His informal words of acceptance were delivered with all the rigor of a symphonic score. Its theme was "we must help Russia because to help Russia is to help America."

Of course, there were variations on this theme. "All my heart is to help Russia . . . by helping Russia we defend America . . . Russia is fighting the threat of Nazism to democracy . . . the Russian people will fight . . . Russia will not be conquered."

But time and again he stopped his quick, gesticulating hands to knock out the rhythm on the little table before him: "to help Russia is to help America."

At one point, Dr. Koussevitzky played pianissimo and leaned back comfortably in the red-upholstered Empire sofa as he reminisced about his life in Russia before and just after the Bolsheviks came to power. He told movingly of losing his library —"from Palestrina to 1914, complete" —and his priceless art treasures— "ah, they were beautiful."

PERSECUTED BY REDS

He talked about his legendary trips up and down the Volga, spreading music in villages which had never heard its charms. He spoke softly of his home, his pleasures, his youth, and then, of his hardships when the Bolsheviks took over.

"But we must not talk of that," he broke in abruptly. "What is past is past." His dark eyes began to sparkle again and he sat upright on the very edge of the sofa. "This is not the time to talk about the errors of the Bolsheviks. We must help Russia; to help Russia is to help America."

He wagged a thin forefinger at his listener. "Russia will never be conquered," he said slowly.

"The Russians are not a military people," he added quietly. "They love their homes, their villages and their things. But —" he paused, his voice in crescendo—"he must go to fight when he feels that his ground is in danger. Then he will fight and die. But he will kill 10 before he gives his life."

'FIGHTS FOR DEMOCRACY'

His enthusiasm was infectious and heady, like a crashing finale.

"We must help them. We must help them," he repeated. "It is like helping England. We help England to help ourselves and to help the democracies. We must help Russia the same way. For Russia is fighting the enemies of the democracies."

Dr. Hugh Cabot of Boston, chairman of the state committee for Russian War Relief, was also present at the interview and explained the humanitarian purpose of the committee: to raise funds for the most urgently needed non-military supplies, such as medical goods, surgical instruments, food concentrates and warm clothing.

The committee is affiliated with Russian War Relief, Inc., of New York which purchases and packs the materials. Transport facilities are supplied by the Soviet government.

CONCERT FOR WAR RELIEF

Dr. Cabot also revealed that Dr. Koussevitzky would use his influence to gain permission to direct a symphony concert this season, the proceeds to go to the state committee. The committee has opened a temporary headquarters at 42 Brattle street, Cambridge, but expects to establish permanent offices in Boston in the near future.

Members of the committee include:

Prof. J. A. C. Fagginger Auer, Dr. Herman Blumgart; Judge Lawrence G. Brooks, Dr. C. Sidney Burwell, Prof. Zecharish Chafee, Jr., Dr. David Cheever, John S. Codman, Kenneth Conant, Charles A. Coolidge, Prof. S. H. Cross; Dr. Elliott C. Cutler, Dr. Hallowell Davis, William Emerson, Prof. Sidney B. Fay, Richard H. Field, Dr. Max Finland, Mrs. J. Malcolm Forbes, Seth Gano, Cushing Goodhue, Jerome Greene, The Rev. Whitney Hale, Christian Herter, Arthur D. Hill, Prof. William E. Hocking, Prof. and Mrs. Bruce C. Hopper, Mrs. Henry B. Jackson, The Rev. Frank Jennings, Basil Gacedan, Prof. Michael Karpovich, The Rev. Harry Kruener, Dr. Frank Lahey, Dr. Roger Lee, Dean Delmar Leighton, Dr. William G. Lennox, Prof. and Mrs. Leontief, Dean Howard Le Sourd, The Rev. Donald G. Lothrop, Mrs. Stanley McCormick, Mr. and Mrs. John F. Moors, The Rev. Leslie Pennington, Prof. Ralph Barton Perry, Mrs. Andrew J. Peters, Prof. George Sarton, Prof. A. M. Schlesinger, Prof. Vida Scudder, Mrs. George Cheaver Shattuck, Prof. Alfred D. Sheffield, Mrs. Nicholas Slonimosky, Prof. Theodore Smith, Prof. and Mrs. Pitirim Sorokin, Dr. and Mrs. Richard P. Strong, Prof. and Mrs. D. J. Sturik, Mrs. Beatrice M. Taussig, Mrs. Robert Ulich, Dr. Soms Weiss, Dr. Stafford M. Wheeler, Mrs. Jasper Whiting, Thomas Whittemore, Prof. Amos Wilder, and Dr. George B. Wislocki.

This Clipping From
KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL
OCT 20 1941

KOUSSEVITZKY IS HONORARY CHAIRMAN OF RUSSIAN RELIEF COMMITTEE

Boston, Oct. 20, (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra who fled his native Russia, has joined a committee for the first time. He is honorary chairman of the newly-formed Massachusetts committee for Russian war relief.

"Really we must absolutely forget about the Bolsheviks," he said, in announcing he would let bygones be bygones and help to gain war aid for the Soviet.

"It's the Russian people we must remember; the Russian people who give their blood to save everybody in the democracies. To help Russia is to help ourselves, the British and all the democracies."

Koussevitzky, who came to the United States in 1924, recently became an American citizen.

This Clipping From
ST. ALBANS, VT.
MESSENGER
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS
OCT 22 1941

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
OCT 20 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BARRE, VT.
TIMES
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL
Oct. 20, 1941

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
OCT 20 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS
Oct. 22, 1941

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
Oct 20 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM SALEM, MASS.
NEWS
Oct 20, 1941

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
Oct. 20, 1941

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
Oct. 20, 1941

This Clipping From
FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTINEL
OCT 20 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH
Oct 20, 1941

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN
Oct. 20, 1941

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 21 1941

This Clipping From LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
TORRINGTON, CONN.
REGISTER
OCT 20 1941

MUSIC AT MOVIE PRICES

(Continued from Page 14)

Mr. Koussevitzky's traveling band gave three concerts, the third at reduced rates, for the workers of the town. It was this third concert that won the musicians their most thrilling success. At the end of the concert, when the conductor emerged from the theatre, the crowd placed him in a sedan chair and carried him aloft, like an oriental potentate, to his steamboat on the Volga.

NOR was that all. Two years later, when Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians came down the Volga once more and stopped at Tsaritsin, he was greeted by a band. The local musicians were drawn up at the theatre on the day of his arrival and they serenaded him. He learned that his last visit had inspired the workers to organize this ensemble, and for months they had practiced this serenade to a conductor. The outfit had been christened the Koussevitzky Band.

Sergei Koussevitzky's awareness of the potentialities of little men and women over the world as music lovers has deep roots in his own background. Of a poor family, he was born sixty-seven years ago in the Province of Tver, along the northern reaches of the Volga. His father, a humble violin teacher, was the lad's mentor, particularly after the mother died when Sergei was 3. There were lessons with his father, and he played in the town band, but the small community had limited opportunities for the gifted youngster. At 14 he went to Moscow, arriving with a capital of three rubles. He hoped to get a musical scholarship in Moscow, but prizes were available only in trombone, horn and double bass. Young Koussevitzky took the scholarship test for bull-fiddle, won it, and in time became the world's most eminent virtuoso of the bulky bear of the string family.

His success as a contrabass soloist and later as a conductor did not divert him from the missionary zeal to spread the beneficence of good music among all people. Being of a philosophical turn of mind and a progressive in the bargain, Koussevitzky thought about the larger problems of the artist and his public besides developing himself as an artist. He was not afraid to act according to his convictions.

IN 1911, on the first anniversary of the death of Count Leo Tolstoy, who had spoken for the "submerged tenth" of Russia, the police banned anniversary demonstrations. But Koussevitzky, upon opening a concert, bade the orchestra arise and stand silently for one minute "in honor of the memory of a great artist." The audience knew the significance of the action, and the conductor's friends feared political repercussions, but the incident was passed over.

Throughout his career as a conductor—in Russia, in other European centers and in Boston, where he took over in 1924 and made the Boston Symphony Orchestra one of the world's greatest—Mr. Koussevitzky has been forward-looking. He has befriended young conductors here and abroad. He has given young musicians their first chance to appear as soloists. Today he leads the call for recognition of American art—both composers and performers. But, above all, he insists that the wide, new public must be brought into the picture.

Here is how he analyzes the meaning of drawing the masses nearer to music:

"It consists, with due regard to native creative ability, in breaking down the artificial barriers between the 'initiated' and the 'non-initiated'; in making the musical language as accessible to the general understanding and emotion as is the spoken language; in exposing the meaning and evolution of all musical styles; in giving a feeling for, and an understanding of, the development and structure of musical forms; in an invitation to practical participation in instrumental and vocal ensembles, and so on. But the most important is to introduce into the consciousness of listeners the truly spiritual essence of music, which stands high above the level of vulgar amusement and musical diversions.

"ONE of the greatest vices of European culture (of art, at any rate) has been that art was detached from the people. Fortunately, we do not have this here to any such extent as in Europe. We well know that 'a man of action' in the true sense of the word can only be called one whose actions are linked with the progress of the masses.

"It depends on us to act in such a way as to make a severance between culture and the people quite impossible in the future. The people must be linked with music organically and not merely by an accidental link based on mutual sympathy or taste. The strength of this link is the guarantee of the entire future growth of music in this country."

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and his pet cocker spaniel, Bemol, or Flat, as he appeared during an interview at his Brookline home yesterday. Boston Herald Oct 20, 1941

Koussevitzky Forgives Soviets, Will Head Russian War Relief

By WESLEY FULLER

With all the inspirational brilliance and sheer beauty with which he conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky yesterday called for unstinted aid to his native Russia, the country that abused him until he fled.

Slight and grey-haired, but with a vivacity that belies his age, the conductor urged aid to Russia during an interview at his Brookline home where it was formally announced that he had accepted the post of honorary chairman of the newly-formed Massachusetts Committee for Russian War Relief.

'TO HELP AMERICA'

His informal words of acceptance were delivered with all the rigor of a symphonic score. Its theme was "we must help Russia because to help Russia is to help America."

Of course, there were variations on this theme. "All my heart is to help Russia . . . by helping Russia we defend America . . . Russia is fighting the threat of Nazism to democracy . . . the Russian people will fight . . . Russia will not be conquered."

But time and again he stopped his quick, gesticulating hands to knock out the rhythm on the little table before him: "to help Russia is to help America."

At one point, Dr. Koussevitzky played pianissimo and leaned back comfortably in the red-upholstered Empire sofa as he reminisced about his life in Russia before and just after the Bolsheviks came to power. He told movingly of losing his library —"from Palestrina to 1914, complete" —and his priceless art treasures— "ah, they were beautiful."

PERSECUTED BY REDS

He talked about his legendary trips up and down the Volga, spreading music in villages which had never heard its charms. He spoke softly of his home, his pleasures, his youth, and then, of his hardships when the Bolsheviks took over.

"But we must not talk of that," he broke in abruptly. "What is past is past." His dark eyes began to sparkle again and he sat upright on the very edge of the sofa. "This is not the time to talk about the errors of the Bolsheviks. We must help Russia; to help Russia is to help America."

He wagged a thin forefinger at his listener. "Russia will never be conquered," he said slowly.

"The Russians are not a military people," he added quietly. "They love their homes, their villages and their [illegible]s. But —" he paused, his voice a crescendo—"he must go to fight when he feels that his ground is in danger. Then he will fight and die. But he will kill 10 before he gives his life."

'FIGHTS FOR DEMOCRACY'

His enthusiasm was infectious and heady, like a crashing finale.

"We must help them. We must help them," he repeated. "It is like helping England. We help England to help ourselves and to help the democracies. We must help Russia the same way. For Russia is fighting the enemies of the democracies."

Dr. Hugh Cabot of Boston, chairman of the state committee for Russian War Relief, was also present at the interview and explained the humanitarian purpose of the committee: to raise funds for the most urgently needed non-military supplies, such as medical goods, surgical instruments, food concentrates and warm clothing.

The committee is affiliated with Russian War Relief, Inc., of New York which purchases and packs the materials. Transport facilities are supplied by the Soviet government.

CONCERT FOR WAR RELIEF

Dr. Cabot also revealed that Dr. Koussevitzky would use his influence to gain permission to direct a symphony concert this season, the proceeds to go to the state committee.

The committee has opened a temporary headquarters at 42 Brattle street, Cambridge, but expects to establish permanent offices in Boston in the near future.

Members of the committee include:

Prof. J. A. C. Fagginger Auer, Dr. Herman Blumgart; Judge Lawrence G. Brooks, Dr. C. Sidney Burwell, Prof. Zechariah Chafee, Jr., Dr. David Cheever, John S. Codman, Kenneth Conant, Charles A. Coolidge, Prof. S. H. Cross; Dr. Elliott C. Cutler, Dr. Hallowell Davis, William Emerson, Prof. Sidney B. Fay, Richard H. Field, Dr. Max Finland, Mrs. J. Malcolm Forbes, Seth Gano, Cushing Goodhue, Jerome Greene, The Rev. Whitney Hale, Christian Herter, Arthur D. Hill, Prof. William E. Hocking, Prof. and Mrs. Bruce C. Hopper, Mrs. Henry B. Jackson, The Rev. Frank Jennings, Basil Gacedan, Prof. Michael Karpovich, The Rev. Harry Kruener, Dr. Frank Lahey, Dr. Roger Lee, Dean Delmar Leighton, Dr. William G. Lennox, Prof. and Mrs. Leontief, Dean Howard Le Sourd, The Rev. Donald G. Lothrop, Mrs. Stanley McCormick, Mr. and Mrs. John F. Moors, The Rev. Leslie Pennington, Prof. Ralph Barton Perry, Mrs. Andrew J. Peters, Prof. George Sarton, Prof. A. M. Schlesinger, Prof. Vida Scudder, Mrs. George Cheaver Shattuck, Prof. Alfred D. Sheffield, Mrs. Nicholas Slonimosky, Prof. Theodore Smith, Prof. and Mrs. Pitirim Sorokin, Dr. and Mrs. Richard P. Strong, Prof. and Mrs. D. J. Sturik, Mrs. Beatrice M. Taussig, Mrs. Robert Ulich, Dr. Soma Weiss, Dr. Stafford M. Wheeler, Mrs. Jasper Whiting, Thomas Whittemore, Prof. Amos Wilder, and Dr. George B. Wislocki.

(10)

This Clipping From
KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL
OCT 20 1941

KOUSSEVITZKY IS HONORARY CHAIRMAN OF RUSSIAN RELIEF COMMITTEE

Boston, Oct. 20, (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra who fled his native Russia, has joined a committee for the first time. He is honorary chairman of the newly-formed Massachusetts committee for Russian war relief.

"Really we must absolutely forget about the Bolsheviks," he said, in announcing he would let bygones be bygones and help to gain war aid for the Soviet.

"It's the Russian people we must remember; the Russian people who give their blood to save everybody in the democracies. To help Russia is to help ourselves, the British and all the democracies."

Koussevitzky, who came to the United States in 1924, recently became an American citizen.

This Clipping From
ST. ALBANS, VT.
MESSENGER
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS
OCT 22 1941

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
OCT 20 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM BARRE, VT.
TIMES
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL
Oct. 20, 1941

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
OCT 20 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS
Oct. 22, 1941

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
Oct 20, 1941

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
TORRINGTON, CONN.
REGISTER
OCT 20 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM SALEM, MASS.
NEWS
Oct 20, 1941

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
Oct. 20, 1941

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
Oct. 20, 1941

This Clipping From
FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTINEL
OCT 20 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH
Oct 20, 1941

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN
Oct. 20, 1941

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 21 1941

This Clipping From LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL
OCT 20 1941

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 22 1941

Symphony Night—Sponsors and Special Guests

BACKSTAGE SHOT at the "Met" last night, showing (above) a few members of the Music Association of Providence, the society instrumental in bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its five-concert season. Left to right: Hugh F. MacColl, Mrs. G. Maurice Congdon, Robert S. Holding, Jr., Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe. Right: Four service men, among the 25 invited by the sponsors to attend the concert. Corp. Salvatore J. Mellone of West Warwick, Sergt. Henry Jablecki of Pawtucket, Sergt. Joseph Foley of Brooklyn and Corp. Americo Cenci (rear) of this city.

FIRST YOUTH CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon Wheeler Beckett and his 70 members of the orchestra gave the first of this season's youth concerts. The audience which left hardly a seat unfilled seemed a bit more sedate and decorous than of yore. Some, no doubt, are routined concert-goers by now, while many others must be attending these occasions for the first time. Seated behind your correspondent was one young miss who was audibly regretting that she had not come last year.

In the course of the preceding three seasons of six concerts each Mr. Beckett has presented some 40 composers and more than twice that many compositions, including whole symphonies. There have been few repetitions, though yesterday's programme consisted of nothing else. These numbers were Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody, No. 1, and Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" with Richard Hale again as the narrator.

Once more Mr. Beckett proved his all-round fitness for his manifold task of conductor, programme-maker, writer of the programme notes and verbal commentator. The orchestral performances he directs have all the requisite virtues of performance and interpretation.

SYMPHONY HALL

Youth Symphony Concert

Oct 25 1941

About 2000 youngsters from High Schools in 50 Greater Boston communities gathered at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the beginning of the fourth session of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc., Youth Symphony Concerts. Wheeler Beckett, founder and conductor of the concerts, was roundly acclaimed when he appeared on the stage.

These concerts are now a recognized part of Boston's musical life. They are valuable because they bring good music played by a great orchestra to boys and girls whose tastes are beginning to be formed. Let a youngster attend these concerts all through his years at High School and, if he has any liking for symphonic music at all, he will emerge a prospective subscriber to the regular programs of the Boston Symphony. No one can afford to forget, after all, that such young people are going to be the adult music public a few years hence.

Mr. Beckett's way of presenting these concerts is valuable from another and an equally important point of view: The price range is within the reach of many purses. Youth concerts which are available only to those in the upper income brackets have a limited function. These Boston Symphony Youth Concerts are on a laudably democratic basis.

Yesterday Mr. Beckett's audience heard the Overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" in a crisp, admirable performance; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, likewise done in good style, but with less intensity than might have been; the First Rumanian Rhadsody of Enesco, and Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," with Richard Hale as Narrator. The applause was enthusiastic. The next concert will be Nov. 5.—C. W. D.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
OCT 25 1941

Words About

MUSIC

And Musicians

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky will play the opening concerts of the Monday and Tuesday series at Symphony Hall at 8:15 and at 3 p. m. next week respectively.

The program will consist of Beethoven's Third Symphony, the "Eroca," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as arranged by Ravel.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
OCT 26 1941

Pianist Jesus Maria Sanroma of the Bostone Symphony Orchestra and an exponent of modern music is an expert sleight-of-hand artist and magician. Chu-Chu, as he is known to intimates, is also ventriloquistic. During rests between recording sessions he enjoys indulging in voice-throwing tactics much to the bewilderment of the sound engineers.

Youth Concert

At the opening of the Boston Symphony Youth Concerts, Wheeler Beckett, conductor, at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, an eager juvenile audience took a music lesson, perhaps without thinking so, in the form of a fairy tale. Hearing Richard Hale recite the text of "Peter and the Wolf," and listening while the orchestra pictured the fanciful creatures that are the characters of that fable, the young folks enjoyed, or at any rate showed keen appreciation for, a darkly, wittily expressed allegory by the composer, Prokofieff, of the modern Russian school.

Oct 23

For this is no simple story, we may be sure, of Bird, Duck, Cat, and Wolf. Anyone who has read Aesop and La Fontaine knows better than that. Well, then, what is it a story of? Let each one interpret it as he likes; but since "Peter and the Wolf" is a piece of music, we may fairly suppose that it represents and typifies something in the musical world. Call Peter, for example, the Public; and say that Wolf is just another name for Wagner. Let Bird, if it seems appropriate, be Mozart; let Duck be Weber, and Cat, Berlioz. Bird flies, Duck swims, Cat tries to capture Bird. Along comes Wolf and swallows Duck.

The Public in great concern watches these performances. At last come Hunters, who are perhaps the horde of critics and historians. The Wolf gets roped and is walked off to the zoo. As the procession moves, Duck is heard from inside Wolf. He was swallowed, it appears, alive. Yes, indeed, quite alive.

Mozart's Overture to "Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's Symphony No. 5—"Symphony V" today—and Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody, No. 1, figured on the program and were set forth in full authority.

ROCKLAND, ME
COURIER
10/25/41

• • • •

An interesting announcement in the world of music is that the Little Red House at Tanglewood in the Berkshires, where Nathaniel Hawthorne wrote some of his greatest works, will be rebuilt by the National Federation of Music Clubs as a gift to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and a permanent memorial to the distinguished novelist. The original structure was destroyed by fire on June 22, 1890. The decision to rebuild the former Hawthorne home and present it to the music center established by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was made by the board of directors of the federation at the recent meeting in Cincinnati. As rebuilt by the Federation the Little Red House will be almost an exact replica of the one in which the Hawthorne family lived and where the novelist wrote his second great romance, "The House of the Seven Gables," and spun the fascinating "Wonder Book." It is hoped that the structure can be completed by the Summer of 1942.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 22 1941

Symphony Star and Satellites

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and his Boston Symphony Orchestra, favorite music-makers of Providence concert audiences, opened their [illegible] concerts at the Metropolitan Theatre last evening. Above are Mr. Koussevitzky and Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, one of the members of the Music Association of Providence, patrons of the orchestra in this city, who greeted the maestro back-stage following the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER
OCT 24 1941

SYMPHONY CONCERTS BEGIN

For the past three years 70 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of the eminent Wheeler Beckett have presented each year a series of six youth concerts for people of junior and senior high school age interested in music. Before each program, excellent notes explaining the compositions to be played are issued to the pupils. The price of these concerts has been very reasonable and the enjoyment and knowledge obtained from them has made them increasingly popular.

This year 21 pupils of Quincy High are again taking advantage of this great opportunity, some for the third year, and last Wednesday they attended the first concert of the season at Symphony hall, Boston.

After a short talk by Wheeler Beckett, the orchestra opened the concert with Beethoven's great "Symphony No. 5 in C Minor." This was especially timely since its central rhythmic theme consists of three-eighths or short notes and one-quarter or long note, which as everyone now knows is the Morse code signal for V, the symbol the British and their sympathizers have been using for the word "victory."

The second composition was George Enesco's "Rumanian Rhapsody No. 1," which was played with the wild abandon of the gypsies whose gay life it portrays.

The charming "Peter and the Wolf" was the third and final number on this program. This is one of Prokofieff's lighter works and, with Richard Hale as narrator, tells a delightful story by the use of different instruments and themes to represent certain people and animals.

The roof-shaking round of applause at the close ably showed what a great success the program had been and how eagerly the audience was anticipating the future concerts.

MARY ELIZABETH CLARK.

MR. AND MRS. ARTHUR M. ALLEN, who rarely miss a symphony concert, were photographed as they entered the theatre.

MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR
OCT 25 1941

OPINIONS

"Music satisfies a spiritual need because it bestows a spiritual power."

—Sergei Koussevitzky.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 22 1941

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 22 1941

12

MUSIC

Doctor Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony Bring Culture Into Providence Again, Are Hailed by Audience at the Metropolitan

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

Other agreeable manifestations may precede it, like a false dawn or a summer day in March, but culture itself can never be said to have arrived in our midst until the gentlemen from Boston bring it here, which they did last night. The place was the Metropolitan Theatre, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 61st Providence season.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the rites. When he appeared on the podium 99.44 per cent. of the audience floated to its feet and provided him with a sincere and respectful greeting. He smiled and bowed in appreciation. Then he went rigorously to work.

Dr. Koussevitzky has a considerable reputation as an explorer of uncharted musical seas, but for some reason he seldom brings his friends hereabouts any mementoes of those voyages. When he takes his hand from behind his back, it is generally seen to be holding the same old teddy-bear or lollypop with which he has been charming us for years and years. The strange and perhaps uncouth plunder of his more adventurous moments is distributed elsewhere.

That is probably the way most people like it. Nobody can say that what he does bring is not of the finest grade, guaranteed by good names, proved by substantial service. And he dusts it off in a way that often makes it seem new, which is the sort of dusting that few can accomplish. But couldn't we, with the other things, have something really new?

Last night it was Beethoven's third symphony and the "Pictures at an Exhibition," Moussorgsky orchestrated by Ravel. As usual, everybody was not in time for the first movement of the symphony, but all had gathered in season for the funeral, which was commendable. We imagine this symphony uttered with more elemental enthusiasm than we could detect last night; the opening movement, particularly, seemed to be in want of less polish, if anything, and sometimes the momentum of it was impaired by a too lingering joining of the parts. The scherzo, too, might have been more reckless, more rebellious. On the other hand, it was the first time that the funeral march had not seemed too long to us, and it is indeed a mark of superb skill in conductor and orchestra when one does not fall asleep in this movement.

Although the spirit of the performance was not equal to the executive powers displayed, they in themselves were a sufficient wonder. And they were even more magnificently demonstrated in the Moussorgsky work. Each voice, each choir responded with wit, suavity, or sonorous emphasis, as Dr. Koussevitzky magically brought out the colors. He read it with clear delight, endowed it with the deftest gleam and shadow, and concluded it with a characteristically resplendant pronouncement. It was so brilliant that it made poor Beethoven seem almost drab, and made one think how unfortunate it was that he wasn't smart enough to throw in a few trombones, harps and assorted Hallowe'en contrivances, the way Ravel did.

Leader and orchestra received their due from the enraptured audience.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 26 1941

CUM GRANO SALIS?

Editor:

There was once an ancient Athenian who got tired of hearing Aristides called, "The Just." Apparently your musical critic, Mr. Loveridge, has tired of hearing Ludwig van Beethoven called "The Greatest," and is bent upon yanking him off his pedestal.

The last time but one when the Eroica Symphony was rendered here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Loveridge alluded to its second movement as "ponderous" and unduly long. In his pertinent comments (I should suggest "impertinent") on the imminent concert of Oct. 21, appearing on Oct. 19, he reiterated his criticisms of its length and made the extravagant statement that "this funeral march is long enough to bury all the dead of the Russo-German war!" Is this to be taken "cum grano salis," or does Mr. Loveridge underestimate the carnage?

Furthermore, he somewhat recklessly states that "not so many care" whether this symphony is called the Eroica or not, although Beethoven himself christened it and when once questioned by a friend as to which was his favorite among the nine, answered, "Eh? The Eroica."

I am proud to be in agreement with him, especially with respect to the first two movements, which are my favorite among all his symphonic works. And for this marche funébre, which would seem to be Mr. Loveridge's bête noir, so that he sees red every time it is played here, I don't hesitate to affirm that I prefer it either to the other Beethoven requiem, or to those of Chopin or Mendelssohn, beautiful as they all are.

In regard to this critic's opinion that aside from this movement there is nought of martial interest that can be detected in the Eroica, that is tantamount to assuming that Beethoven, to copy Mr. Loveridge's somewhat bizzare style was "all wet," both when he wrote the music and when he gave it its title. One could scarcely imagine the late Philip Hale as voicing such heretical notions.

WILLIAM CONGDON FRY.
Providence.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 24 1941

HITS MUSIC CRITIC

Editor:

Why don't you employ a music critic who knows something about music? The flippant way he has of criticizing the Boston Symphony, as well as eminent artists, is disgusting.

I have been a constant subscriber to the Boston Symphony for at least 20 years and, while I think everyone welcomes constructive criticism, the impression of his recent comments belittle the organization recognized to be perhaps the leading symphony orchestra of the world, and tend to influence those who might like to become familiar with the best music to believe that the concerts are only for the socially prominent.

While Beethoven's symphonies may bore your critic, there are many music-loving people who could listen to them year after year with enjoyment and profit, and to the younger generations they would prove an inspiration beyond compare.

M. A. YOUNG.

Providence.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 25 1941

SEEKS CONCERT VARIETY

Editor:

I'd like to rise to the defense of the Journal music critic, Mr. Loveridge, because he is perfectly justified when he laments the fact that Boston Symphony programs in Providence repeat the same music year after year. The concerts are, of course, superb, but Dr. Koussevitzky ought to be able to avoid bringing us only a few works over and over when the literature holds such abundance from which to choose.

Of course, when you're "on the road," it's easy to reach into stock and draw out music that needs no rehearsing for a provincial audience outside of Boston. But we've become pretty familiar with the traveling repertory of the Symphony.

Congratulations, Mr. Loveridge. Your point is well taken.

CODA.

Providence.

13

30

AH . . . THE MAGIC OF MUSIC

Strains of Symphony Orchestra Soothing to Sally

BOSTON AMERICAN. OCT. 24, 1941

In World of Her Own—So enthralled by the music played by some 70 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Sally Hope Brown, 12-year-old Somerville miss, that she didn't even notice Staff Photog. Carroll Myett as he stole up on her and took this shot. Sally was one of 2500 youngsters who attended the afternoon concert, directed by Wheeler Beckett, which started the fourth season for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Youth Concerts.

Photo by Staff Photographer Carroll Myett.

YOUTH CONCERTS IN BOSTON WORTH SUPPORTING

THE NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE HUNDREDTH anniversary of the birth of Antonin Dvorak, which befell on Sept. 8, will be commemorated at this week's Symphony concerts. Inevitably, the programme will contain the Symphony "From the New World," before which will come the "Carnival" overture and the violin concerto, with Ruth Posselt as soloist . . . Not many of the present generation of Bostonians are aware that the eminent Bohemian composer actually came to Boston and conducted two performances of his Requiem in the old Music Hall.

In Sept. 1892, Dvorak landed in New York to take over his duties as head of the new National Conservatory and teacher of composition. The concerts of the Cecilia Society, at which he made his Boston appearances, were on Nov. 29 and 30 of that same year. It was about a month later that work was begun on the "New World" Symphony, which alone among the several that he wrote survives in the current repertory. The music was completed in four months and orchestrated the following summer at Spillville, Iowa, the Bohemian settlement, where Dvorak spent his vacations during his three-year American sojourn.

* * * *

It was the custom of the Cecilia in those days to give a so-called Wage Earners' Concert, on the night before the concert proper, and only those were admitted whose weekly salary was not in excess of $15. It was these humble folk who got the first look at Dvorak. The Requiem, itself, like so much of Dvorak's music, has disappeared from the concert hall. (John F. Runciman once referred to it as "the most poverty-stricken Requiem ever composed by a man of genius.") But is it not possible that we are missing some tricks where the orchestral Dvorak is concerned? Daniel Gregory Mason, whose article on "Dictator Conductors" was discussed here last Sunday, was bewailing, in the course of that diatribe, the neglect of the Slavonic Rhapsodies. The last performance of any of these at a Boston Symphony Concert was in 1902. Next month we will hear from the Conservatory Orchesta the Scherzo Capriccioso, and that was dropped from the B. S. O.'s repertory in 1895.

This matter of "wage earners'" concerts has a direct bearing on an interview with Dr. Koussevitzky printed in the magazine section of last Sunday's New York Times. Believing that the future of symphonic music in America is threatened by the gradual disappearance of the plutocratic class, the conductor favors State or municipal aid of orchestras (San Francisco has already tried it) and, more especially, larger auditoria and a much lower scale of prices. "Music at Movie Prices" was the title given to the interview.

* * * *

In this connection it might be remarked that the transferring of the Boston season of Metropolitan Opera from the Opera House to the Metropolitan Theatre was partly dictated by the desire to sell a much larger number of the cheaper seats. What is more, they were sold; and the receipts mounted considerably.

Now if the support of symphonic concerts is to pass from the classes to the masses, or if the latter are to play a larger part in supporting them, the desire for such entertainment must first be present. Perhaps it is already there in sufficient quantity, but we can't take any chances. And here is where the Symphony Orchestra's Youth Concerts, under the direction of Wheeler Beckett, come in. The thousands of youngsters who attend the six concerts of this series, now in their fourth season, are not only being educated in symphonic music, they are learning to love it. You have only to go to one of these Wednesday matinees to see how genuine is their affection for and interest in the music they hear. In these respects they would put many adult audiences to shame. The trouble is, however, that these concerts are no more self-supporting than the Symphony Concerts themselves. There is an annual deficit of around $7500, which must be met by private subscription. The cause is certainly a worthy one.

* * * *

The Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon Symphony Concerts begin this week with Beethoven's "Eroica" and the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition" on the programme.

* * * *

Two sopranos and two pianists are the week's recitalists. At Symphony Hall this afternoon Dorothy Maynor will offer airs by Handel and Beethoven, songs by Brahms, Strauss and Marx, spirituals and songs in English. Shirley Sinclair, a newcomer, will sing at Jordan Hall, on Tuesday evening, Lieder by Beethoven and Wolf and songs by French, Italian and American composers.

The first of the pianists, Jan Smeterlin, will present an all-Chopin programme at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening. In this music he is unsurpassed today. Halmar Grabeau, a young woman of Cuban birth, will make her Boston debut in that auditorium the following evening. The Sonata of Liszt and Liszt's formidable transcription of the "Tannhaeuser" Overture have place on her programme, along with pieces by Chopin, Dohnanyi and Griffes.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
OCT 25 1941

Music for Masses

Great symphonic music played by first rate orchestras has never been made available to the masses at prices they could afford to pay. Sergei Koussevitzky, famous conductor of the Boston Symphony, hopes to see the day when every person in the country can go to a nearby concert hall and hear great music at movie prices. By mass patronage of this kind he believes that orchestras would be self-supporting, that music indeed would be as widespread and as profitable as the movies.

Not all distinguished musicians have had the same faith in the musical responsiveness of the masses that Mr. Koussevitzky apparently has. Symphony concerts were once supposed to be "over the heads" of the plain people. That was one reason why the great orchestras were taken over largely by wealthy patrons, who pumped the necessary financial life into them, with admission prices beyond the reach of ordinary folks. Symphonic music thus became a class luxury; working people grew up and died without ever being inside a concert hall.

Yet there has never been any good reason to suppose that appreciation of good music was something to be bought with money. All the evidence pointed to the contrary. More of the great musical inspirations have sprung from the poor than from the rich. With the rise of the radio, a lot of old notions have gone by the board. We know that the homes of the masses are open today to the symphonies and operas of the great producing organizations, that more people are learning about good music than ever before.

Mr. Koussevitzky has taken the lead toward a notable advance in music. The details are as yet a long way from a practicable basis but the basic idea is sound. Appreciation of music cuts through all kinds and conditions of people. Once it is fully tapped, it will unquestionably make good music as available and as inexpensive as the corner movie.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 27 1941

Ruth Posselt to Play With Boston Symphony

Ruth Posselt will be violin soloist in an all-Dvorak program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in Boston this week.

Miss Posselt has been heard in Hartford. She is the wife of Concertmaster Richard Burgin.

The program will include the "Carnival" Overture, Concerto for violin and orchestra in A minor, Op. 53, and the Symphony No. 5 in E minor, "From the New World."

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

OCT 27 1941

Paired Symphony Concerts to Open

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the opening of its paired Monday evening-Tuesday afternoon programs which are a monthly series. The Tuesday concerts, known as the "commuters," are set at the special hour of 3 p. m.

The program for this week offers the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven (No. 3 in E flat major, Op. 55) and Ravel's orchestral arrangement of Moussorgsky's pianoforte pieces, "Pictures at an Exposition."

Patrons strolling at intermission in the first balcony foyer, inspecting one of the art exhibits that have come to be a regular feature of these concerts, will be engaging their ears, immediately after returning to their seats, in a similar pleasure. The Moussorgsky—Ravel suite represents, by instrumental sound, a promenade through a picture gallery where hang the sketches by Victor Hartmann, Moussorgsky's friend.

Among these are the great rumbling Polish wagon, the altercation between a rich Jew and a poor Jew, children playing in the Tuileries gardens and the massive tonal building up of a proposed "Great Gate of Kiev." A. C. R.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES

OCT 27 1941

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 26 1941

A representative gathering of Providence society welcomed the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Theatre, Tuesday evening.

Enthusiastic applause was given to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his musicians, who opened their 61st Providence season that evening.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN
OCT 26 1941

Plans for the Boston Symphony's current season include the appearances of Desire Defauw of Brussels and Bruno Walter, as conductors. During that time Koussevitzky will be guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LANCASTER, PA.
SUNDAY NEWS

OCT 26 1941

BROOKLYN is about to have it own symphony orchestra, it is an nounced by the Brooklyn Institut of Arts and Sciences, whose Insti tute at the Academy of Music i the borough's chief cultural center

The Brooklyn Symphony Orches tra will present a series of five monthly concerts at the Academy of Music, beginning on Nov. 12. The orchestra, composed of professional musicians, will have as conductor John Barnett, Gerald Warburg and Carl Bamberger, all well known in their field.

Other orchestras to be heard under the institute's auspices during an active winter season will be the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Chamber Orchestra. Soloists will include Sergei Rachmaninoff, Marian Anderson, Mischa Elman, Jose Iturbi, Gladys Swarthout, Tito Schipa, Harold Bauer, Rose Pauly, Robert Casadesus and the original Don Cossacks.

Christian Science Monitor
Nov. 1, 1941

Dvorak Program Honors Composer on Centenary

By L. A. Sloper

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra's celebration of the centenary of Antonín Dvořák, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky chose to play at the season's fourth pair of concerts (Oct. 31-Nov. 1) the "Carnival" Overture, the Violin Concerto (Ruth Posselt), and the "New World" Symphony. Some, no doubt, would have preferred to hear less familiar items, possibly the Overture to "Othello," the Cello Concerto, and the Fourth Symphony. But the program was designed to honor the memory of the great Czech composer; and the three works selected are perhaps the most representative as well as the best known of his symphonic production. Certainly the performance of them did honor to him, and no less to soloist, conductor, and orchestra.

The overture had not been played before at these concerts by Dr. Koussevitzky; surely it had never had a more vivid or rousing performance anywhere.

Mme. Posselt played the concerto here five years ago. Yesterday her art gave evidence of having ripened. Her tone was broader, her style more assured. With excellent support from Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, she achieved a superb performance, and was deservedly rewarded at its close with prolonged applause and even cheers.

The symphony, heard here as recently as three years ago, also was performed with the greatest eloquence and the most subtle variety of expression. The entire concert, with its essentially lyrical material, served to remind us once more of the rich tonal quality and the magnificent flexibility of the orchestra, and of the vivifying poetic imagination of its leader.

RAVEL'S SUITE AT SYMPHONY

Post Oct 25

Replaces Vivaldi's 'Spring' Concerto

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" replacing Vivaldi's "Spring" Concerto and Roussel's Third Symphony substituting for Falla's "Love the Sorcerer," only Schubert's C major Symphony remained in its original place on this week's Symphony programme. On the whole these changes helped. The interest in Vivaldi's music is partly historical, and Falla's Spanishry is wearing a bit thin. However, had Vivaldi, not Ravel preceded Roussel the latter's G minor might have sounded to better advantage.

Roussel was a composer of no mean attainment and there is much that is appealing in his Third Symphony. The difference between him and Ravel is the difference between talent and genius and this is a gulf that inevitably widens as the years go on. Some of the G minor Symphony is already dated and outmoded, for example, the thumpety-thump business in the first moyement. Ravel's little Suite, however, whether in the original piano version or in the composer's masterly arrangement for orchestra, is as fresh as the day it was set on paper.

Of the four movements of this Symphony the last is distinctly the best. Of the others the Adagio comes closest to its level. Writing at a time when feeling was out of fashion, Roussel nevertheless did not hesitate to show it, though his expression was marked by a certain reserve. The beauty that he attains at the beginning of this movement makes all the more incongruous the lively fugue which serves as middle section.

The performances of both of these modern French works was in the finest traditions of conductor and orchestra. Not as much can be said for the playing of Schubert's Symphony, which often lacked the necessary clarity, euphony and rhythmic stability. Dr. Koussevitzky is greatly devoted to this Symphony, yesterday's performance was the third in four seasons, but for some reason he seems ill at ease in it. Yesterday the music was over-driven and in the hurly-burly of the end hardly sounded like Schubert at all. Yet because it was loud and fast the audience lingered to applaud. More justifiable was its great enthusiasm over the Ravel.

Globe Oct 25

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky's revised program for the Boston Symphony concerts this week proved more interesting than the list previously chosen. Ravel's "The Tomb of Couperin" was a good substitute for the "Spring" Concerto of Vivaldi, if for no other reason than the infrequency with which "The Tomb of Couperin" is performed, and while it would have been nice to hear the suite from Falla's "Love the Sorcerer," it was nicer to listen to the G minor Symphony of Roussel. Even more interest might have been generated if the "Great" C major Symphony of Schubert had also been postponed. Of all the Schubert symphonies, this is becoming most hackneyed. As it turned out, the interpretation was one of the least attractive one can remember from Mr. Koussevitzky.

The playing of the Boston Symphony's first oboe, Mr. Gillet, added much to the glitter of Ravel's musical jewels. Actually "The Tomb of Couperin" is no more than a bit of tonal legerdemain, an illusion of the atmosphere of Couperin's own time; precise, concentrated music, decked out with diamond-bright orchestration, and full of that ironic urbanity so characteristic of the gnome of Le Belvedere.

It hardly needs to be said that only the very best orchestras can even play "The Tomb of Couperin" adequately, and only so astonishing a collection of virtuosi as the Boston Symphony can play it with the ultra-glitter it deserves. Mr. Gillet's contribution to a performance of fascinating delicacy was oboe playing whose technic, phrasing and sound had the color and the inner fire of a string of matched opals.

One would like to know how the G minor Symphony of Roussel will sound 25 years hence. Standing on the premise that a decade can be a sore decayer of new music, the Symphony composed for the 50th anniversary season of the Boston orchestra has lasted remarkably well. A peculiar combination of aristocratic expression, clean, luminous scoring and harmonic effects of a champagne dryness, the G minor Symphony is remarkably pleasant. The slow movement, the scherzo and finale may endure as of the best music of its time.

While it is not reasonable to divorce the first movement from the rest, and consider it as something apart, the first movement in truth is less worthy than the rest. This movement was seemingly more touched by the spirit of the times—the late 1920s, bad times for composition, when tonal creation was subject to current of eccentricity. In the opening allegro, you find a noisiness almost crude in comparison with the fineness of other parts of the Symphony, and a waggishness now seen to be dated.

Ravel and Roussel fared magnificently at the hands of Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. With Schubert it was a different story. Lyrical simplicity was hidden beneath the artificial complexities of a mannered reading. Too much speed and too much dramatic emphasis took the performance quite out of the Schubert style and spirit.

The centenary of the birth of the Bohemian composer, Anton Dvorak, will be observed at the concerts next week with an all-Dvorak program, as follows: "Carnival" Overture, Violin Concerto (Ruth Posselt, soloist), "New World" Symphony.

C. W. D.

Herald Oct 25

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The third regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Ravel — "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Suite
Roussel — Symphony No. 3 in G minor Op. 42
Schubert — Symphony No. 7 in C major

As far as straight symphonic concerts go this one would be hard to beat, and we may be grateful that Mr. Koussevitzky saw fit to change the program. Schubert's C major Symphony may be played too much but it is undeniably one of those masterpieces with which it is pleasant to renew old acquaintance from time to time. We do not mean this in any patronizing spirit, but the sameness of the repertoire is one of the sorest topics for criticism in our symphonic system. And naturally we want to keep abreast with the times.

Ravel's Tombeau de Couperin Suite is one of the most exquisite things in music. Its orchestration is an absolute miracle, especially to anyone who has tried over the piano version. Ravel was probably the greatest orchestrator of his time, and in this Suite he achieved a kind of satin-smooth texture of sound. The harmony of the music is curious and fascinating. It is not rooted in a particular tonality but hovers between one key and another. You have the sensation that Ravel has toyed with chords until at length he got just the effect, just the dissonance that he wanted. And then he proceeded to clothe these harmonies in the most ravishing orchestral color.

The Suite is perhaps musicians' music. You have to love tone for tone's sake to enjoy it to the full. For that reason it must exercise a tremendous fascination on a sensitive conductor like Mr. Koussevitzky.

We are at some loss to understand why he takes the movements so fast. Surely the tone qualities and the archaic flavor could be relished at a slightly more deliberate tempo. Yet it is not inartistic or ineffective at the faster speed. Mr. Koussevitzky gets away with it, and very possibly that should be enough for those of us who would like to assimilate the delicious sounds more slowly.

Roussel's 3rd Symphony wears well with time. It is a fine work by one of the most interesting and learned of modern composers. (By the way, Mr. Koussevitzky by this magnificent performance is now under an obligation to revive Roussel's no less remarkable 4th Symphony.) The interpretation, to get that off our chest first, was extraordinarly stimulating. Here was good music, not too familiar, that went over with terrific impact. You could not sit still mentally while that kind of music making was going forward.

The 3rd Symphony seems to us chiefly remarkable for its deft handling of the problems of form, its amazing melodic fertility and a certain earthy quality about the last two movements. After the rather tempestuous Allegro and Adagio, with lulls in the storm, to be sure, the exuberant gaiety of the scherzo and finale comes as an agreeable shock. At times Roussel has not scrupled to caper with the abandon of an Offenbach.

This gaiety is typical of much of Roussel's music. It is, as we recall, even more pronounced in his 4th Symphony. Roussel himself has said that this comes from the Flemish side of his character. He must kick up his heels or burst. This is an unromantic quality, and you find it in Beethoven, Mozart and Haydn constantly. In Roussel's case it may be the saving grace in one who might otherwise be a too intellectual composer.

The whole concert was, as we have said, a singularly rewarding one. Not the least of the joys was a fine performance of Schubert's Symphony. This is music that requires no explanation or apology. It is perfectly forthright and still unbelievably lovely, frequently as it is played.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky has decided to celebrate the Dvorak centennial by offering the following program of his music: "Carnival" Overture, Violin Concerto (Ruth Posselt, soloist) and "New World" Symphony.

OPENS SERIES OF CONCERTS

Symphony Plays But Two Numbers

Post Oct 26

The shorter series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened last evening, and the programme, which will be repeated this afternoon, contained but two numbers, Beethoven's Third or "Eroica" Symphony and Moussorgsky's "Picture at an Exhibition," as orchestrated by Ravel. With the addition of Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" Suite, this list was that of the first pair of regular concerts.

When the "Eroica" and the "Pictures" were played earlier in the season, it was generally opined that Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen them for their significance in the present crisis. No finer musical incarnation of the heroic spirit exists than the symphony which Beethoven wrote while under the spell of Napoleon's victories. (When the Corsican proclaimed himself emperor, Beethoven tore up the dedication.)

The timeliness in the Moussorgsky suite is to be found in the final picture, "The Great Gate at Kiev." In Ravel's resplendent instrumentation, this concluding section becomes eloquently symbolical of Russian resistance and Dr. Koussevitzky's fervor with the music plainly indicates that that is what it means to him.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The opening concert of the 1941-42 Monday evening series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was given last night at Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55 ..... Beethoven
"Pictures at an Exhibition," pianoforte pieces arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel ..... Moussorgsky

Herald Oct 27

As always on hearing our first Boston symphony concert of any season, we felt last night that never had Dr. Koussevitzky done more with his orchestra, and never had the orchestra done more with the music. It is not every such organization that can take a warhorse like the "Eroica" and treat it with such enthusiasm and brilliancy that the listner strains to hear every note with all the intensity usually accorded only to a new and exceptionally interesting work. Last night's performance was practically electrifying, reaching its height, as far as we were concerned, in the magnificent fugal section of the second movement.

It would be hard to think offhand of any symphonic work more ideal to display Dr. Koussevitzky's genius with Russian music than the Ravel orchestration of the piano pieces Moussorgsky wrote inspired by the work of his artist friend, Victor Hartmann. Almost all the elements of Russian music are to be found in these 11 pieces; and its goes without saying that from the heavy humor of the "Promenade," through the haunting lyricism of "Il Vecchio Castello" and the witty caricature of "Samuel Goldenburg," to the bombastic majesty of "The Great Gate at Kiev," each was flawlessly and thrillingly played.

J. W. G.

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

There was a headline in this newspaper yesterday afternoon which quoted an authority as saying, "Moscow will not fall." That statement—inspiration to all who stand as bulwarks of freedom—was reiterated at Symphony Hall last evening in the most heroic musical terms by Ludwig van Beethoven, whose "Eroica" Symphony was conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

Globe

This was the first of the series of six Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But Moussorgsky, through his "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the orchestral arrangement by Ravel, also had something to say about Russia.

An electric, elevating reading of the Third Symphony, such as Mr. Koussevitzky gave last night, is the most lucid explanation of Beethoven's intentions that one can think of. It is made clear beyond any doubt that Beethoven herein glorifies the unconquerable human spirit; not the shabby majesty of the conqueror.

Oct 27

This listener cannot recall hearing the Boston Symphony and Serge Koussevitzy in such splendid form. As one could hear remarked during intermission, attack and ending were clean as a whistle. Sonority was its fullest. But this was not sound and fury for its own sake. This was great music-making.

What Moussorgsky had to say about Russia was more in the nature of musical character sketching. "Pictures at an Exhibition" acted as commentary upon the foregoing Beethoven Symphony. Where the "Eroica" spoke of human spirit (the Russian spirit if you chose to see it that way), the latter called attention to human frailty. Lumbering humors were satirized, Russian characters smartly etched in bright colors. Whatever one's impressions as the music began, they swiftly crystalized as an unmistakable Russian panorama swept by.

This Clipping From
ELMIRA, N. Y.
STAR-GAZETTE

OCT 30 1941

Music for Masses

GREAT symphonic music played by first rate orchestras has never been made available to the masses at prices they could afford to pay.

Sergei Koussevitzky, famous conductor of the Boston Symphony, hopes to see the day when every person in the country can go to a nearby concert hall and hear great music at movie prices. By mass patronage of this kind he believes that orchestras would be self-supporting, that music indeed would be as widespread and as profitable as the movies.

Not all distinguished musicians have had the same faith in the musical responsiveness of the masses that Mr. Kousevitzky apparently has. Symphony concerts were once supposed to be "over the heads" of the plain people. That was one reason why the great orchestras were taken over largely by wealthy patrons, who pumped the necessary financial life into them, with admission prices beyond the reach of ordinary folks. Symphonic music thus became a class luxury; working people grew up and died without ever being inside a concert hall.

Yet there has never been any good reason to suppose that appreciation of good music was something to be bought with money. All the evidence pointed to the contrary. More of the great musical inspirations have sprung from the poor than from the rich. With the rise of the radio, a lot of old notions have gone by the board. We know that the homes of the masses are open today to the symphonies and operas of the great producing organizations, that more people are learning about good music than ever before.

Mr. Koussevitzky has taken the lead toward a notable advance in music. The details are as yet a long way from a practicable basis but the basic idea is sound. Appreciation of music cuts through all kinds and conditions of people. Once it is fully tapped, it will unquestionably make good music as available and as inexpensive as the corner movie.

This Clipping From DANVILLE, ILL.
COMMERCIAL NEWS

OCT 29 1941

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N.Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

NOV 15 1941

This Clipping From
DAYTON, O.
NEWS

NOV 16 1941

This Clipping From SPRINGFIELD, O.
NEWS

NOV 16 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GENEVA, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 19 1941

This Clipping From MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

NOV 19 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

OCT 30 1941

Hub Symphony Orchestra to Honor Dvorak

BOSTON, Oct. 30 (UP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, tomorrow will present the first all-Dvorak symphony program in the nation-wide observances of the centennial of the birth of Anton Dvorak, great Czech composer.

Reminiscences by William Arms Fisher of Boston, only living member of the composition class which Dvorak conducted in New York City in the 90's, will be included in the program book.

A feature of the program will be Dvorak's symphony "From the New World." The now universally popular pseudo-spiritual, "Going Home," is a combination of Fisher's original words with the tune of the English horn solo in the largo, or slow movement, of that symphony.

Coincidentally, tomorrow's revival of the symphony will take place in the same hall where the song was first sung in public. The composition was added to a recital program of Roland Hayes, noted Negro tenor, when he learned of the death of Woodrow Wilson.

Still living here are two retired Czech members of the Boston Symphony orchestra who remember playing under Dvorak's conductorship when he presented his oratorio, "St. Ludmilla," with the Worcester Festival chorus in the 90's.

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN & CITIZEN-LEADER

OCT 30 1941

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
OCT 30 1941

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

NOV 2 - 1941

BEETHOVEN AND THE PEOPLE.

The St. Louis Symphony Orchestra opened a new season this week end by playing the grandest piece of musical literature ever written: Beethoven's Third Symphony—the Eroica.

This was a gesture eminently suited to the times. This triumphant work of genius sprang out of days that must have seemed as troubled and turbulent as ours. It was inspired by Napoleon, in whom Beethoven saw, at first, the liberator of the downtrodden of this earth. The composer, however, quickly discovered the clay feet of his "hero," tore up his dedication, and boldly announced his own stand for the freedom of man.

Personalities aside, this symphony is a marvelous proof of the sublimity men may reach in evil days. It is a statement of great dignity and bold faith. The composer did not stop with its second movement, the awesome funeral march. He went on to write the vigorous, impassioned scherzo.

It is a good thing for the human spirit to hear this kind of music. It makes fundamental explanations and helps to affirmations that sometimes are beyond the limited logic of words. It is folly and snobbishness—the snobbishness of the unfeeling and the intellectually lazy who would reduce everybody to their own low level—to say that this music is only for the "initiated."

Sergei Koussevitzky of Boston, who wields his baton over one of the greatest orchestras ever assembled, is protesting bitterly against this kind of talk—against all the cant that would make of music something exclusive and "arty." He wants its language to be made as accessible as the written word is in a 3-penny newspaper or the spoken word in a two-bit talkie. He is, in fact, pleading for concerts at movie prices.

There are millions ready to pay for good music if it is made possible for them. Here in St. Louis, it is necessary to turn away crowds when the orchestra plays its popular concerts. There should be more of these—and they need be "popular" in nothing but the admission price. The people need and want great music in these days. It was meant for them. Or are there those, perhaps, who coddle the naive belief that Beethoven wrote the Eroica for a little clique of white ties?

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

OCT 30 1941

Symphony Lists Dvorak Program

BOSTON (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, tomorrow will present the first all-

This Clipping From
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS
NEWS

OCT 30 1941

Dvorak Centennial

BOSTON, Oct. 30—(UP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra will observe the centennial of Anton Dvorak's birth tomorrow. The orchestra will honor the great Czech composer with an all-Dvorak symphony program. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

NATIONAL SECRETARY
SAN ANTONIO, TEX
OCT, 1941

Pops Concert

Wednesday evening was School Secretaries' Night at the Pops concert in Symphony Hall. We turned out 186 strong, including association members and guests, and occupied the majority of the seats on the main floor. Seated at tables in groups of four, we enjoyed cooling drinks while listening to a beautiful musical program under the direction of Dr. Arthur Fiedler. Among the selections played were two favorites, Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nurenburg" and Revel's "Bolero." The soloist was Helen Zoe Duncan, pianist. She played Haydn's "Piano Concerto in D Minor" and was accompanied by the orchestra. During intermissions we roamed from table to table chatting with our fellow secretaries and friends.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 5 - 1941

Words About

MUSIC

And Musicians

The first performances of Lourie's "Kormtchaia" Symphony No. 2 will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerns in Boston this week.

The program also will include the Haydn Symphony in B flat, No. 102, and the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in E minor. Op. 98.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

NOV 7 - 1941

The first performance anywhere of a Concerto Grosso by the distinguished Czech composer, Martinu, will be given by the Boston Symphony in Boston on November 14—provided war, fate or circumstances don't interfere. They've already caused four postponements of the premiere. The work, written in 1937, was to have been played in Paris in 1938, but while it was being published in Vienna, Austria was swallowed up by Germany, and it was impossible to ship the score to France. Another premiere was arranged for Prague, but before it took place, Germany seized Czecho Slovakia, and the performance of Martinu's music

This Clipping From
FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS

OCT 30 1941

Dvorak symphony program in the nation-wide observances of the centennial of the birth of Anton Dvorak, great Czech composer.

Reminiscences by William Arms Fisher of Boston, only living member of the composition class which Dvorak conducted in New York city in the 90's, will be included in the program book.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

OCT 31 1941

Miss Posselt Soloist Today

Boston Orchestra Friends To Meet Next Tuesday

Ruth Posselt, who appeared last summer at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play with the orchestra in Boston this afternoon and tomorrow. She will be the soloist in Dvorak's concerto for violin and orchestra in A minor.

The annual meeting of Friends of the Orchestra will be held Tuesday afternoon at 4 at Symphony Hall. There will be a special program by the orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky after which the trustees and Dr. Koussevitzky will receive members at tea in the upper foyer. Reginald C. Foster is chairman of the Friends.

The Massachusetts Division of University Extension and the Public Library of Boston are again sponsoring lectures with music on the orchestra programs every Wednesday at 4.45 in the lecture hall of the library.

The youth concerts likewise are being given again this year by 70 members of the orchestra with Wheeler Beckett, conductor, with a larger atendance than ever from Boston schools and those in the suburbs.

The management of Symphony Hall is operating a lunch room for the convenience of Friday afternoon concert goers. The lunch room is on the second balcony, stage end, left.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 8 - 1941

Boston Symphony Program Listed

The program has been announced by William H. Mortensen, managing director of the Bushnell Memorial, for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening, Nov. 18.

In this, the second event of the Bushnell Symphony Series, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston musicians in the Symphony No. 5 in E minor ("From the New World") by Dvorak; Prokofieff's Ballet (Second Suite), "Romeo and Juliet;" and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

The four parts of the Prokofieff Ballet are programed as "Montagues and Capulets; "Juliet, the Maiden"; "Dance," and "Romeo by Juliet's Grave."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

NOV 8 - 1941

Next Friday and Saturday the Boston Symphony is performing for the first time a Concerto Grosso by the Czech composer Martina. Premiere was originally set for Paris in 1938, but the Anschluss prevented shipment of the music from Vienna. The second premiere was planned for Prague, a year later, but Martinu's music was put under the official ban. A third was scheduled for Paris in May, 1940. Martinu fled the Nazi occupation, leaving behind the unperformed score, which was rescued and brought to America by his countryman, conductor George Szell.

This Clipping From
ELMIRA, N. Y.
STAR-GAZETTE
OCT 30 1941

Music for Masses

GREAT symphonic music played by first rate orchestras has never been made available to the masses at prices they could afford to pay.

Sergei Koussevitzky, famous conductor of the Boston Symphony, hopes to see the day when every person in the country can go to a nearby concert hall and hear great music at movie prices. By mass patronage of this kind he believes that orchestras would be self-supporting, that music indeed would be as widespread and as profitable as the movies.

Not all distinguished musicians have had the same faith in the musical responsiveness of the masses that Mr. Kousevitzky apparently has. Symphony concerts were once supposed to be "over the heads" of the plain people. That was one reason why the great orchestras were taken over largely by wealthy patrons, who pumped the necessary financial life into them, with admission prices beyond the reach of ordinary folks. Symphonic music thus became a class luxury; working people grew up and died without ever being inside a concert hall.

Yet there has never been any good reason to suppose that appreciation of good music was something to be bought with money. All the evidence pointed to the contrary. More of the great musical inspirations have sprung from the poor than from the rich. With the rise of the radio, a lot of old notions have gone by the board. We know that the homes of the masses are open today to the symphonies and operas of the great producing organizations, that more people are learning about good music than ever before.

Mr. Koussevitzky has taken the lead toward a notable advance in music. The details are as yet a long way from a practicable basis but the basic idea is sound. Appreciation of music cuts through all kinds and conditions of people. Once it is fully tapped, it will unquestionably make good music as available and as inexpensive as the corner movie.

THIS CLIPPING FROM QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER
OCT 30 1941

Hub Symphony Orchestra to Honor Dvorak

BOSTON, Oct. 30 (UP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, tomorrow will present the first all-Dvorak symphony program in the nation-wide observances of the centennial of the birth of Anton Dvorak, great Czech composer.

Reminiscences by William Arms Fisher of Boston, only living member of the composition class which Dvorak conducted in New York City in the 90's, will be included in the program book.

A feature of the program will be Dvorak's symphony "From the New World." The now universally popular pseudo-spiritual, "Going Home," is a combination of Fisher's original words with the tune of the English horn solo in the largo, or slow movement, of that symphony.

Coincidentally, tomorrow's revival of the symphony will take place in the same hall where the song was first sung in public. The composition was added to a recital program of Roland Hayes, noted Negro tenor, when he learned of the death of Woodrow Wilson.

Still living here are two retired Czech members of the Boston Symphony orchestra who remember playing under Dvorak's conductorship when he presented his oratorio, "St. Ludmilla," with the Worcester Festival chorus in the 90's.

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
OCT 30 1941

Symphony Lists Dvorak Program

BOSTON (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under baton of Serge Koussevitzky, tomorrow will present the first all-Dvorak symphony program in the nation-wide observances of the centennial of the birth of Anton Dvorak, great Czech composer.

Reminiscences by William Arms Fisher of Boston, only living member of the composition class which Dvorak conducted in New York city in the 90's, will be included in the program book.

This Clipping From
FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS
OCT 30 1941

This Clipping From
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS
NEWS
OCT 30 1941

Dvorak Centennial

BOSTON, Oct. 30—(UP)—The Boston [illegible] orchestra will observe the centennial of Anton Dvorak's birth tomorrow. The orchestra will honor the great Czech composer with an all-Dvorak symphony program. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
OCT 31 1941

Miss Posselt Soloist Today

Boston Orchestra Friends To Meet Next Tuesday

Ruth Posselt, who appeared last summer at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play with the orchestra in Boston this afternoon and tomorrow. She will be the soloist in Dvorak's concerto for violin and orchestra in A minor.

The annual meeting of Friends of the Orchestra will be held Tuesday afternoon at 4 at Symphony Hall. There will be a special program by the orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky after which the trustees and Dr. Koussevitzky will receive members at tea in the upper foyer. Reginald C. Foster is chairman of the Friends.

The Massachusetts Division of University Extension and the Public Library of Boston are again sponsoring lectures with music on the orchestra programs every Wednesday at 4.45 in the lecture hall of the library.

The youth concerts likewise are being given again this year by 70 members of the orchestra with Wheeler Beckett, conductor, with a larger attendance than ever from Boston schools and those in the suburbs.

The management of Symphony Hall is operating a lunch room for the convenience of Friday afternoon concert goers. The lunch room is on the second balcony, stage end, left.

NATIONAL SECRETARY
SAN ANTONIO, TEX
OCT, 1941

Pops Concert Nat Assoc School

Wednesday evening was School Secretaries' Night at the Pops concert in Symphony Hall. We turned out 186 strong, including association members and guests, and occupied the majority of the seats on the main floor. Seated at tables in groups of four, we enjoyed cooling drinks while listening to a beautiful musical program under the direction of Dr. Arthur Fiedler. Among the selections played were two favorites, Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nurenburg" and Revel's "Bolero." The soloist was Helen Zoe Duncan, pianist. She played Haydn's "Piano Concerto in D Minor" and was accompanied by the orchestra. During intermissions we roamed from table to table chatting with our fellow secretaries and friends. Secretaries Convention

This Clipping From DANVILLE, ILL.
COMMERCIAL NEWS
OCT 29 1941

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N.Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
NOV 15 1941

This Clipping From
DAYTON, O.
NEWS
NOV 16 1941

This Clipping From SPRINGFIELD, O.
NEWS
NOV 16 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GENEVA, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 19 1941

This Clipping From MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS
NOV 19 1941

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN & CITIZEN-LEADER
OCT 30 1941

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
OCT 30 1941

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
NOV 2 - 1941

BEETHOVEN AND THE PEOPLE.

The St. Louis Symphony Orchestra opened a new season this week end by playing the grandest piece of musical literature ever written: Beethoven's Third Symphony—the Eroica.

This was a gesture eminently suited to the times. This triumphant work of genius sprang out of days that must have seemed as troubled and turbulent as ours. It was inspired by Napoleon, in whom Beethoven saw, at first, the liberator of the downtrodden of this earth. The composer, however, quickly discovered the clay feet of his "hero," tore up his dedication, and boldly announced his own stand for the freedom of man.

Personalities aside, this symphony is a marvelous proof of the sublimity men may reach in evil days. It is a statement of great dignity and bold faith. The composer did not stop with its second movement, the awesome funeral march. He went on to write the vigorous, impassioned scherzo.

It is a good thing for the human spirit to hear this kind of music. It makes fundamental explanations and helps to affirmations that sometimes are beyond the limited logic of words. It is folly and snobbishness—the snobbishness of the unfeeling and the intellectually lazy who would reduce everybody to their own low level—to say that this music is only for the "initiated."

Sergei Koussevitzky of Boston, who wields his baton over one of the greatest orchestras ever assembled, is protesting bitterly against this kind of talk—against all the cant that would make of music something exclusive and "arty." He wants its language to be made as accessible as the written word is in a 2-penny newspaper or the spoken word in a two-bit talkie. He is, in fact, pleading for concerts at movie prices.

There are millions ready to pay for good music if it is made possible for them. Here in St. Louis, it is necessary to turn away crowds when the orchestra plays its popular concerts. There should be more of these—and they need be "popular" in nothing but the admission price. The people need and want great music in these days. It was meant for them. Or are there those, perhaps, who coddle the naive belief that Beethoven wrote the Eroica for a little clique of white ties?

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 5 - 1941

Words About
MUSIC
And Musicians

The first performances of Lourie's "Kormtchaia" Symphony No. 2 will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerns in Boston this week.

The program also will include the Haydn Symphony in B flat, No. 102, and the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in E minor, Op. 98.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
NOV 7 - 1941

The first performance anywhere of a Concerto Grosso by the distinguished Czech composer, Martinu, will be given by the Boston Symphony in Boston on November 14—provided war, fate or circumstances don't interfere. They've already caused four postponements of the premiere. The work, written in 1937, was to have been played in Paris in 1938, but while it was being published in Vienna, Austria was swallowed up by Germany, and it was impossible to ship the score to France. Another premiere was arranged for Prague, but before it took place, Germany seized Czecho Slovakia, and the performance of Martinu's music

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 8 - 1941

Boston Symphony Program Listed

The program has been announced by William H. Mortensen, managing director of the Bushnell Memorial, for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening, Nov. 18.

In this, the second event of the Bushnell Symphony Series, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston musicians in the Symphony No. 5 in E minor ("From the New World") by Dvorak; Prokofieff's Ballet (Second Suite), "Romeo and Juliet;" and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

The four parts of the Prokofieff Ballet are programed as "Montagues and Capulets; "Juliet, the Maiden"; "Dance," and "Romeo by Juliet's Grave."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
NOV 8 - 1941

Next Friday and Saturday the Boston Symphony is performing for the first time a Concerto Grosso by the Czech composer Martina. Premiere was originally set for Paris in 1938, but the Anschluss prevented shipment of the music from Vienna. The second premiere was planned for Prague, a year later, but Martinu's music was put under the official ban. A third was scheduled for Paris in May, 1940. Martinu fled the Nazi occupation, leaving behind the unperformed score, which was rescued and brought to America by his countryman, conductor George Szell.

Christian Science Monitor - Oct. 30, 1941

Memories of Czech Composer Recalled by Boston Pupil

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Street-sprinklers figured in the municipal economy of Prague, Bohemia, when Antonin Dvořák headed the Conservatory of Music there; and one day at the conclusion of an academic ceremonial, when Dvořák was parading home in his best Sunday clothes and silk hat, the man who trudged behind the water-cart, swinging the hose from left to right, let a good dash of the spray go in the direction of the sidewalk. Dvořák, getting quite a ducking from the performance, shouted at the careless civic employee asking if that was what respectable citizens paid taxes for. When Dvořák's peasant temper was at its height, along came a Conservatory official and made inquiry as to what all the commotion was about.

"Oh, nothing," said Dvořák, drying and smoothing out the nap of his hat on his sleeve. Then, "Here!" to the city employee who played the useless trick, "shake hands!"

Emanuel Ondříček, the violinist, who was a student in Prague at the time, directly under Dvořák's instruction, tells the story and says it sums up in his recollection what sort of human being the composer of the "New World" Symphony was. As a teacher, he notes, Dvořák was one of the most fragrant, and at the same time one of the pleasantest of men. He was brusque with a pupil who could not grasp his meaning, and at the same time he showed all manner of patience and gave no end of encouragement. He was admirable at imparting theoretical knowledge, explaining matters of harmonic or orchestral technique in detail, but coming out with fiery and original remarks, borrowed from farm talk often, against someone who was slow in comprehending.

* * *

Asked one day in the composition class what opinion he held of the achievement of a certain contemporary writer of music—"Well," replied Dvořák, "he is a good composer, but has no talent"; and he said it emphasizing all in his own manner the "no."

Now Mr. Ondříček, having been so near to Dvořák, may be supposed to know something about the Violin Concerto which Mme. Ruth Posselt is reviving at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, this week. Did not Mr. Ondříček's half brother, Franz, help make Europe acquainted with the work back in the 1880's? Mr. Ondříček says he did, and Paul Stefan in his biography of Dvořák furnishes verification. Now, in the role of adviser to Mme. Posselt—for the relation of teacher and pupil hardly seems the one that subsists between two artists—Mr. Ondříček explains that on the Dvořák centenary program of Oct. 31 and Nov. 1 the concerto goes according to the composer's original conception and interpretative ideas. Mme. Posselt will play it, Mr. Ondříček notes in a letter to the Monitor's music department, according to those ideas, "as the great Dvořák gave them to me when I performed it for the composition class in Prague under his direction."

To discuss the concerto briefly in the light of a meeting with Mr. Ondříček, but not to hold him responsible for conclusions drawn, the work, being early, stands on a less exalted level than the Violoncello Concerto, which was written in the composer's maturity. A certain want of mastery of form will be found by the critical. But a characteristic and original expression comes out, notwithstanding any architectural awkwardness. The adagio movement has a charming melody; too bad that it runs to diffuseness and so overbalances the first and last movements. Different, to repeat, from the Cello Concerto, which exemplifies a quite perfect balance.

* * *

In style and workmanship, the early composition follows classic models; for what we know as modernism and the large orchestra did not get started till toward the 1890's. Yet, classical or not, the Violin Concerto had in its day, and still possesses, interest for its Czech national rhythms and its dance whims and fancies, these coming to notice particularly in the middle and last movements.

Something Slavic in the music carries it through; and when we say Slavic, we mean more than exclusively Czech, since Dvořák's imagination ranged considerably beyond merely the borders of his native Bohemia. Unlike Smetana, who may be called Czech right through, Dvořák is Slavic with a Slavism that includes the Slovak and the Ukranian. Slavic elements of a number of sorts were intermingled at the time of the Austrian domination, when Dvořák's composing career was at the start. A Moravian quality is sometimes appreciable in his musical utterance, and in a slight way, some listeners may believe, Great Russian traits can be discerned there as well.

At Symphony Hall

Charles Kaeselau is exhibiting water colors in the first balcony gallery during concert time this week. Mr. Kaeselau has been identified for many years with the Provincetown group of artists and has attracted attention more recently for some mural painting.

The pictures at Symphony Hall depict scenery familiar to a resident of Cape Cod. There are the fishermen at their strenuous jobs, the dunes, the old timber-gabled houses, storm-tossed waters and ominous skies, wintry cold and dreariness. Those artists who live on the Cape are fascinated by the scenery, which is often stark, always picturesque, and generally dramatic. Mr. Kaeselau handles his aquarelle with brusqueness and fervor. Such themes as "Truro Church, Winter" find him at his best. His whites—nothing more than the paper itself—are strong and telling.

Shown besides at Symphony Hall is a group of charming water colors painted in about 1866 by Ellen Sturgis Tappan. They describe Tanglewood and Stockbridge and illustrate the life of the times.

D. A.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVENING PUBLIC LEDGER

NOV 10 1941

Symphony Conductor Lauds Magic of FM

An unusual tribute was paid to frequency modulation recently by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky after he had heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he conducts, broadcast over the new noise free, full fidelity system.

Dr. Koussevitzky asserted that FM marks the beginning of a new era in symphonic broadcasting. He added that he had never heard the various instruments so clearly reproduced.

"Heretofore," he said, "a clarinet always has been an awful instrument over the radio. Now it is beautiful. The timbre of the different choirs comes over with exceptional fidelity. Never before in a broadcast have I been able to pick out each instrument individually."

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 3 - 1941

OVERTONES

During the conductor's symposium, held last summer at Lee, Mass., Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, expressed his desire to see symphonic music made available for the public at a nominal fee. Recently Dr. Koussevitzky's views were formulated into an excellent article by Howard Taubman of the New York Times. In effect, Dr. Koussevitzy said that he would like to see halls, comparable in size to the Music Shed of the Tanglewood estate, which houses some 9,000 persons, used during the winter months for concerts at popular prices.

It is obvious by many signs today that we are facing a new period in musical performance and musical education. The day of high-priced concert and opera stars, drawn to these shores from Europe, is now passing. A few of the old guard are left, but in no way can the salaries paid be called parallel. Whereas there may always be some deviation proportionately in the compensation artists receive, that is necessary in view of talent and appeal. But exorbitancy seems to be slowly dying. Already, performances by oustanding artists are available to the general public at prices of admission they can afford to pay. There has been a general leveling since 1929 that has been a boon to American music, an American artist and an American public.

It is indisputable now that the American public is more kindly disposed to a higher level of musical expression than ever before in the history of this country. They have found that those arts which bring them into contact with beauty and thought are priceless and most desirable. Through such mediums as radio, they have proved that familiarity with a work is the best means towards its popularity, and have slowly gathered works unto themselves through frequent hearings that a generation ago were mere names, or known only to those few who could afford the high box office prices accompanying any given concert.

Artistically, the depression was a musical god-send. Material gains had failed, and leisure hours had to be guarded. Economists were realizing that man does not live by bread alone, and so was the state. With the vast WPA program, action was taken, and although the project has artistically been slowly dispersed, its effects have not been forgotten. The American people have evidenced time and again their desire for the best music presented in the best way possible.

Education, too, has been undergoing a change. Formerly, the study of music as a profession was accepted as a foregone conclusion that the student was preparing for a virtuostic career. That idea has passed. Now, it is a training of musicians, intensive study of background and the developing of an integrated musical personality, that is paramount, that these musicians may serve their community. Also, as in such outlets as the Music Settlement schools, music is being taught as an avocation and as an agent of social intercourse.

Since the establishment of Hull House in 1888, music has been an important part of settlement programs. In 1921, the response to music was so great that the music division of the National Federation of Settlements was founded. A central office was established in New York city by 1927, an office virtually acting as a clearing house for all problems pertinent to music in a well-rounded social scheme.

The programs include all sorts of informal performances, many of which have as participants members of surrounding communities. Large ensemble groups of singers have been organized, and small instrumental groups as well as miniature symphonic orchestras. These activities are not confined in any way to children. Adults so desiring can receive musical education either in technical study or as recreational participation. They may act as listeners or as choral singers. They may study an instrument and participate in chamber groups.

The main idea is to stimulate musical expression and create, first, a desire for it, and then, a discriminating taste for good music, whether familiar or not as the case may be. Through these settlement activities, men and women, as well as children, are actively a part of a national musical growth. They are no longer passive listeners, they are living, learning and expressing music.

Accompanying the settlement projects, there are numerous courses in musical appreciation seeping into each and every community, sometimes independently presented, but more often sponsored by such groups as the Y. M. C. A., technical institutes and Adult Education programs. Most of these courses are free, but when tuition is necessary, that tuition is so low as to be available to anyone interested.

Community orchestras are offering concerts at a vastly decreased admission charge, as are other civic musical groups. Even concert series, which bring before the public noted artists, offer their wares at a price unbelievable 20 years ago.

There is a vast social change in music in our country. That it can be improved, there is no doubt. That it will be is further indicated by the stand such men as Dr. Koussevitzky are now taking.

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

NOV 1 31941

"LITTLE RED HOUSE"

(New York Sun)

Restoration of "The Little Red House" at Tanglewood, in the Berkshires, where Nathaniel Hawthorne wrote "The House of Seven Gables" and many other works, will further enhance the attractiveness of this delightful spot.

The National Federation of Music Clubs could have chosen no better gift for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has brought such fame to Tanglewood by its summer music festival. Rebuilt as almost an exact replica of "The Little Red House" which was destroyed by fire more than half a century ago, the house will stand as a permanent memorial to the great novelist. Visitors to Tanglewood are sure to increase in numbers.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

NOV 9 - 1941

After having its world première delayed four times in as many lands because of the war, Martinu's Concerto Grosso will receive its initial hearing by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its pair of concerts this week in Boston.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 9 - 1941

Koussevitzky Will Conduct Dvorak Work

Program Announced for Boston Symphony Concert to Be Held at Bushnell Memorial

The Dvorak Symphony No. 5, in E minor. "From the New World," is the feature of the program in which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial Tuesday evening, November 18, in the second event of the Bushnell Symphony Series.

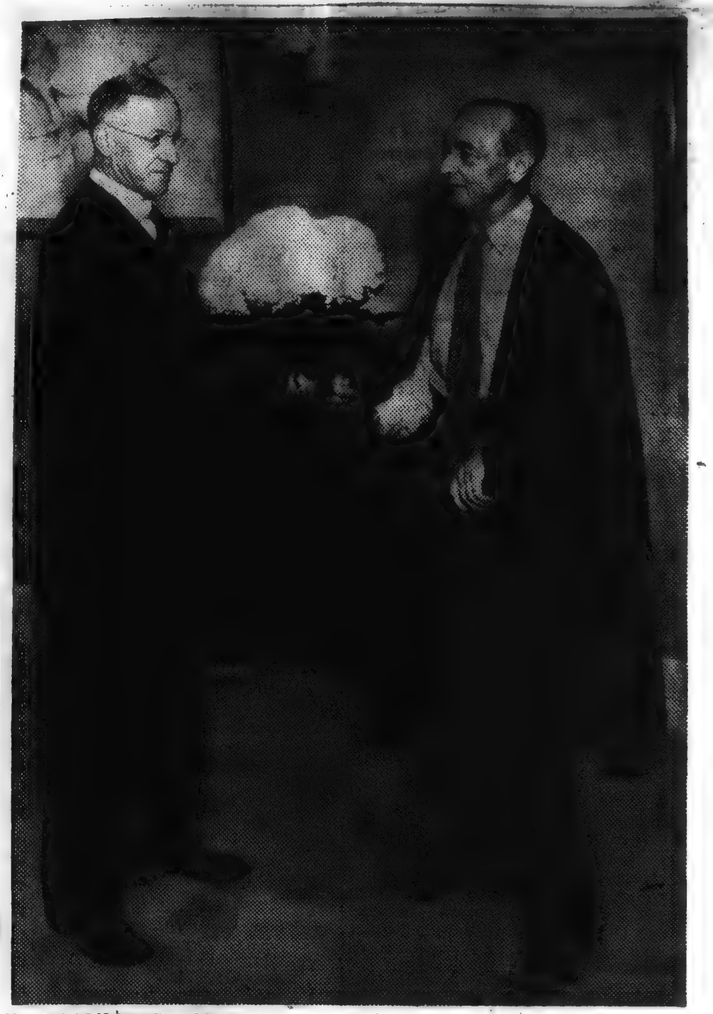
In this concert, the Boston Symphony will play also Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet," Second Suite, and the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

"We have almost forgotten," writes Charles O'Connell, "the storm of controversy that raged in musical circles following the first presentation of the Symphony. It had to do with the manner and degree in which the 'New World' was influenced by characteristic American music, that is, the music of the Indian and the plantation songs of the Negro.

Interprets American Spirit.

"Discussions of these matters are not of paramount importance now. The 'New World Symphony' has been assimilated into the collective body of musical works which we have come to regard as properly in the repertoire of every symphony orchestra; old prejudices and opinions are forgotten in the extraordinary charm of the music itself. Matured judgment of musicians and music lovers has vindicated the declaration of the composer that he sought, not to embody in the Symphony a literal version of native American music — assuming that there is such a thing—but rather an interpretation of the spirit of that American music which most closely approaches the folk-song.

"It is interesting to recall that the Symphony was written in America, most of the orchestration being done at Spillville, Iowa, whither the composer had fled from New York in a period of homesickness. Here in this little town was a colony of Bohemians; here Dvorak could feel that he was among his own, could hear his native tongue and feel contact with those who certainly were his friends. The Symphony was written during December, 1892, and the early months of 1893; the last touches were given on May 25, 1893. In the following December, the Symphony 'From the New World' was given its first performance, in New York City, by the Philharmonic Society of New York, with Anton Seidl conducting and Dr. Dvorak present."



"MUMS" THE WORD lovers of chrysanthemums use in referring to their favorite flowers. Appropriately mum is Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (right), here being presented with a new golden chrysanthemum named in his honor by chrysanthemum growers of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society, at Horticultural Hall. The bestower is Edward I. Farrington, secretary of the society.

Boston Globe
Boston Post

Autumn Flower Show Packed

As Boston's chrysanthemum show yesterday approached its termination (10 o'clock tonight), its sponsors reported a record attendance and great appreciation of what they considered the "most magnificent autumn flower display in the 112 years of show history of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society." The exhibition is at Horticultural Hall, Massachusetts avenue.

One of its most popular features is the scarlet-and-gold Oriental temple garden. Four halls are filled with 100,000 chrysanthemums. These include some from Asia, grown by Mrs. H. A. Lamb of Milton, a white variety that blooms outdoors in New England at Christmas; an Amazon lily, shown by Harold A. Ryan of Cambridge, its natural setting Colombia; and a Mexican plant, exhibited by F. W. Holbrow of Dorchester.

Thanksgiving table decorations and Christmas wreaths are on display. So are hardy outdoor "mums" suitable to the New England climate, including the new variety, "Sunset," which has bronze and gold petals shaped like tiny spoons.

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD JOURNAL
NOV 15 1941

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 11 1941

Dvorak Feature Of Boston Program

Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," is the feature of the program to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial Tuesday evening, Nov. 18, in the second event of the Bushnell Symphony Series.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead his celebrated group also in Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" and the Moussorgky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

"I don't know the difference between a symphony and a Strauss waltz," a business man said, emerging from a symphony concert, "but that man Koussevitzky makes my blood tingle, whatever music he waves his stick at."

This blunt remark comprises as graphic a summary as could be made of the power exerted upon an audience by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Great music is a necessity of life. Nothing less—a necessity," Koussevitzky explains.

"In great music there is the bond of the most profound sympathy between genius and the rest of humanity. The genius expresses what is in the souls of the rest, better than they can. We musicians draw out what the great composers have attempted to express within the limitations of musical notes printed on paper. We sense, and we continually develop, what we sense there. Through the intermediary of the conductor, if you please, the composer, the musicians, and the listeners are brought together in communion with life."

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N.Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTINEL
Nov. 13, 1941

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
NOV 15 1941

This Clipping From
BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS
Nov 13 1941

This Clipping From
PASSAIC, N. J.
HERALD-NEWS
NOV 13 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
HERALD-TIMES
Nov 13 1941

This Clipping From
KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE
NOV 13 1941

18

Czech Composer to Hear His Concerto After Wars Block 3 Scheduled Premiers

By BERNARD FREEMAN

BOSTON, (AP) — After fleeing across most of Europe only a jump or two ahead of Adolf Hitler's armies, Bohaslav Martinu, one of Europe's outstanding contemporary composers, apparently is going to hear at last his concerto grosso for two pianos.

The refugee Czech has been trying to obtain a first hearing for the work ever since he wrote it in 1937, but a combination of bad breaks—usually in the form of the German Army — already has cancelled four premiere performances.

Tomorrow, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are scheduled to make a fifth attempt to give this "fugitive concerto" a performance — and Martinu still has his fingers crossed.

The work was first due to be performed in Paris in the Spring of 1938, but was cancelled when Hitler's armies marched into Austria and closed that Country's frontiers, thus preventing the publishers in Vienna from forwarding the score to Paris.

A second premiere was scheduled in Prague in December, 1938, but the Germans, moving in after the Pact of Munich in September, ruled Martinu's music "verboten" so chance No. 2 went out.

Their invasion of France likewise forced cancellation of a third attempt set for Paris in May of 1940 after the score had been safely received and the auditorium paid for.

When Martinu finally reached this Country last April (he quit Paris three days before the Germans moved in), he learned that Dr. Koussevitzky had been favorably impressed with the concerto after studying a master copy forwarded to him by another Czech musician, Georg Szell, and had decided to play it that Spring.

But this premiere was called off, too, when the orchestra's librarian couldn't obtain the instrumental parts.

This Clipping From
FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.
NEWS & SENTINEL
NOV 16 1941

This Clipping From
READING, PA.
EAGLE
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
NOV 14 1941

This Clipping From
HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
ADVERTISER
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
NORWICH, CONN.
RECORD
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES-HERALD
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
ELIZABETH, N. J.
JOURNAL
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
NOV 13 194

This Clipping From SALISBURY, MD.
TIMES
Nov. 13, 1941

This Clipping From
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
Nov 14 194

This Clipping From DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
NOV 14 1941

This Clipping From
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
NOV 17 1941

This Clipping From
YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR
NOV 16 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALEXANDRIA, LA.
TOWN-TALK
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
JACKSONVILLE, FLA.
JOURNAL
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
FAIRMOUNT, W. VA.
WEST VIRGINIAN
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
CUMBERLAND, MD.
TIMES
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
SPOKANE, WASH.
CHRONICLE
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
Nov. 13 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER
Nov 13 1941

This Clipping From
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS
Nov 13 1941

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE
Nov 13 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BECKLEY, W. VA.
RALEIGH-REGISTER
Nov 13 1941

Composer Plays "Fugitive" Symphony

FLED FROM COUNTRY TO COUNTRY (AP—Wirephoto). Bohuslav Martinu, famed Czech composer, plays his concerto grosso for Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony conductor, and Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, teacher of composers. The Boston group will give the concerto its world premiere today.

This Clipping From SPRINGFIELD, O.
NEWS

NOV 14 1941

COMPOSER AWAITS CONCERT

—(AP) WIREPHOTO

BOSTON, Mass., Nov. 14.—Composer Bohoslav Martinu was greeted earlier in this year on his arrival from Czechoslovakia by Pianist Germaine Leroux. She was to have played one of the pianos in his Concerto Grosso for two pianos with the Boston Symphony in the spring—but the premiere was postponed, after numerous similar postponements on the continent because of the invading German armies. Now, the premiere is scheduled for today, but he has his fingers crossed.

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

NOV 16 1941

Intermission---

By Elaine Huber

four years is quite a long time nowadays for a composer to wait for the premiere of a new work (although some composers of another era never heard some of their works performed), but at long last Bohaslav Martinu, refugee Czech composer, has heard his "Concerto Grosso for Two Pianos." This, after Martinu fled across most of Europe only a jump or two ahead of Hitler's armies. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra presented the work Friday. The first performance was scheduled for France in the spring of 1938 but had to be canceled when the German army marched into Austria and closed that country's frontiers, preventing the publishers in Vienna from forwarding the score to Paris. Chance No. 2 faded when the Germans, moving into Prague after the September pact of Munich, ruled Martinu's music "verboten" and the performance scheduled for December, 1938, was out. The invasion of France killed the third attempt to perform the work in May, 1940, after the score had safely arrived and the auditorium had been paid for. When the composer arrived in America last April, he found that Koussevitzky already had studied a master copy of the concerto sent to him by another Czech musician, Georg Szell, and had decided to play it that spring. The orchestra's librarian couldn't obtain the instrumental parts and so that, too, was canceled. Friday must have been a red-letter day for Martinu.

This Clipping From
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE

NOV 16 1941

Czech Composer Hears His Music After Four Tries

(The Associated Press)

Boston, Nov. 15. — Safe from German armies which have made him and his music fugitives, Bohuslav Martinu sat in Symphony Hall Friday and after four previous cancellations finally heard the world premiere of his Concerto Grosso for two pianos.

The noted Czecho-Slovakian had been trying to hear his work performed ever since he wrote it in 1938, but three times German army invasions of European nations forced postponement of the program.

A fourth time, last April, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony scheduled it for performance, only to postpone it when they could not obtain instrumental parts of the score.

The audience here called the composer three times to take bows, and newspaper critics gave the work favorable reviews.

Martinu reached this country last April after enduring much hardship as a refugee. He spent most of last summer working on the instrumental parts of the score, and refused to uncross his fingers until concert time.

"It sounded just as I thought it would," he said after it was over.

This Clipping From
BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

NOV 15 1941

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

NOV 14 1941

DR. KOUSSEVITZK IS HONORED FO FESTIVAL WOR

Boston Symphony Director Presented Silver Plaque by N. E. Conference

Special to The Springfield Union

BOSTON, Nov. 14 — The recreational session of the 17th New England Conference was interrupted today at the Hotel Statler long enough for New England Council President Ralph E. Flanders to pay tribute on behalf of all-New England, to Serge Koussevitzky, brilliant director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, and his associates for "their

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

NOV 14 1941

declared that New England is "deeply grateful for what the Boston orchestra has contributed to the cultural life of this region and deeply proud of the reputation it has earned us abroad."

"You and your associates," he said, "have become a truly re-creating force in a world which seems to be slipping backward into barbarism. You have contributed immeasurably to the development and prestige of New England and New Englanders and in the development of the great Berkshire Music Center you have contributed toward increasing the recreational income of the six New England states. It is the hope of the Council's recreational development committee that your example will encourage other cultural developments, like, if not equal, in all of our six states.

International Music Event

"Under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its 61st season, has achieved a point of accomplishment where comparisons with other fine orchestras mean little. Its peers are only the greatest. Although 1941 marked only its eighth season, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival has already become an international musical event. It has taken the place of the great European festivals. Music lovers from every part of the United States and Canada now come to New England to hear the festival concerts. From all over the Western Hemisphere promising young music students come here to study under the tutelage of Dr. Koussevitzky and his staff.

"On behalf of the entire region, the recreational development committee of the New England Council pays tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky and his associates of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Symphonic Festival."

This Clipping From
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

NOV 14 1941

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS
GAZETTE

NOV 14 1941

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 17 1941

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

NOV 15 1941

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
N
1941

This Clipping From
WESTERLY, R. I.
SUN

NOV 14 1941

...ony Orchestra, conducted by Desire Defauw, will play in Metropolitan Theatre the evening of Nov. 25. The program:

Respighi, "The Birds," suite for small orchestra: I. Prelude (after B. Pasquini); II. The Dove (after Jacques de Gallot); III. The Hen (after Philippe Rameau); IV. The Nightingale (after an anonymous English composer); V. The Cuckoo (after B. Pasquini); Lakeu, adagio for string orchestra; Dukas, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," Scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe); Franck, Symphony in D Minor.

New England Honors Koussevitzky

For his and the Boston Symphony's Orchestra's "distinguished contribution to the cultural life and economic welfare of New England," Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, was presented a silver plaque at the recreational session of the New England Council yesterday at the Hotel Statler in Boston. Mention was made, not only of Dr. Koussevitzky's work with the orchestra in Boston, but activities at Tanglewood for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and establishment of the Berkshire Music Center. On the left is Ralph E. Flanders, president of the Council, making the presentation. To the right of Dr. Koussevitzky is Glenwood J. Sherrard, chairman of the recreational development committee.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 19 1941

New England In Tribute to Koussevitzky

Boston, Nov. 18.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presented with a silver plaque by the New England Council last week for the orchestra's 'distinguished contribution to the cultural life and economic welfare of New England.

Presentation was made during the annual New England Conference, sponsored by the Council. Particular emphasis was placed on the success of the summer Berkshire Symphonic Festivals, which have built to national and international import since inaugurated by the conductor eight years ago. Reference to 'economic welfare' in the citation stems from appreciation of western Massachusetts resort, retail and theatrical interests that have benefited from the extra population drawn to the Stockbridge area by the summer concert series.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 15 1941

Koussevitzky Honored For Orchestra's Work

Dr Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra and of the Berkshire Symphonic festival, was presented a silver plaque and a testimonial by Ralph E. Flanders, president of the New England council, at the recreational session of the 17th New England conference at Boston yesterday.

Mr Flanders presented the sterling silver plaque, mounted on polished New England white pine, and said, "New England is deeply grateful for what the Boston orchestra has contributed to the cultural life of this region and deeply proud of the reputation it has earned us abroad.

"You and your associates," Mr Flanders said, "have become a truly recreating force in a world which seems to be slipping backward into barbarism. . . . It is the hope of the council's recreational development committee that your example will encourage other cultural developments, like, if not equal, in all of our six states.

"On behalf of the entire region, the recreational development committee of the New England council pays tribute to Dr Koussevitzky and his associates of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Berkshire Symphonic festival."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, O.
NEWS
NOV 14 1941

19

COMPOSER AWAITS CONCERT

—(AP) WIREPHOTO

BOSTON, Mass., Nov. 14.—Composer Bohoslav Martinu was greeted earlier in this year on his arrival from Czechoslovakia by Pianist Germaine Leroux. She was to have played one of the pianos in his Concerto Grosso for two pianos with the Boston Symphony in the spring—but the premiere was postponed, after numerous similar postponements on the continent because of the invading German armies. Now, the premiere is scheduled for today, but he has his fingers crossed.

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
NOV 16 1941

Intermission---

By Elaine Huber

four years is quite a long time nowadays for a composer to wait for the premiere of a new work (although some composers of another era never heard some of their works performed), but at long last Bohaslav Martinu, refugee Czech composer, has heard his "Concerto Grosso for Two Pianos." This, after Martinu fled across most of Europe only a jump or two ahead of Hitler's armies. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra presented the work Friday. The first performance was scheduled for France in the spring of 1938 but had to be canceled when the German army marched into Austria and closed that country's frontiers, preventing the publishers in Vienna from forwarding the score to Paris. Chance No. 2 faded when the Germans, moving into Prague after the September pact of Munich, ruled Martinu's music "verboten" and the performance scheduled for December, 1938, was out. The invasion of France killed the third attempt to perform the work in May, 1940, after the score had safely arrived and the auditorium had been paid for. When the composer arrived in America last April, he found that Koussevitzky already had studied a master copy of the concerto sent to him by another Czech musician, Georg Szell, and had decided to play it that spring. The orchestra's librarian couldn't obtain the instrumental parts and so that, too, was canceled. Friday must have been a red-letter day for Martinu.

This Clipping From
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE
NOV 16 1941

Czech Composer Hears His Music After Four Tries

(The Associated Press)

Boston, Nov. 15. — Safe from German armies which have made him and his music fugitives, Bohuslav Martinu sat in Symphony Hall Friday and after four previous cancellations finally heard the world premiere of his Concerto Grosso for two pianos.

The noted Czecho-Slovakian had been trying to hear his work performed ever since he wrote it in 1938, but three times German army invasions of European nations forced postponement of the program.

A fourth time, last April, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony scheduled it for performance, only to postpone it when they could not obtain instrumental parts of the score.

The audience here called the composer three times to take bows, and newspaper critics gave the work favorable reviews.

Martinu reached this country last April after enduring much hardship as a refugee. He spent most of last summer working on the instrumental parts of the score, and refused to uncross his fingers until concert time.

"It sounded just as I thought it would," he said after it was over.

This Clipping From
BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN
NOV 15 1941

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
NOV 14 1941

DR. KOUSSEVITZK IS HONORED FO FESTIVAL WOR

Boston Symphony Director Presented Silver Plaque by N. E. Conference

Special to The Springfield Union

BOSTON, Nov. 14 — The recreational session of the 17th New England Conference was interrupted today at the Hotel Statler long enough for New England Council President Ralph E. Flanders to pay tribute on behalf of all-New England, to Serge Koussevitzky, brilliant director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, and his associates, for "their distinguished [illegible]n to the cultural life and [illegible]welfare of New England."

[illegible]sented Silver Plaque

[illegible]nting Dr. Koussevitzky a [illegible]ver plaque mounted on [illegible]Y England white pine, Mr. [illegible]lared that New England is deeply grateful for what the Boston orchestra has contributed to the cultural life of this region and deeply proud of the reputation it has earned us abroad."

"You and your associates," he said, "have become a truly re-creating force in a world which seems to be slipping backward into barbarism. You have contributed immeasurably to the development and prestige of New England and New Englanders and in the development of the great Berkshire Music Center you have contributed toward increasing the recreational income of the six New England states. It is the hope of the Council's recreational development committee that your example will encourage other cultural developments, like, if not equal, in all of our six states.

International Music Event

"Under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its 61st season, has achieved a point of accomplishment where comparisons with other fine orchestras mean little. Its peers are only the greatest. Although 1941 marked only its eighth season, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival has already become an international musical event. It has taken the place of the great European festivals. Music lovers from every part of the United States and Canada now come to New England to hear the festival concerts. From all over the Western Hemisphere promising young music students come here to study under the tutelage of Dr. Koussevitzky and his staff.

"On behalf of the entire region the recreational development committee of the New England Council pays tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky and his associates of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Symphonic Festival."

This Clipp[illegible] From
N. ADAM
TRAN
NOV [illegible]

This Clipp[illegible]
WORCESTER, MASS
GAZETTE
NOV 14 1941

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 17 1941

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
NOV 15 1941

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 15 1941

• • •

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Desire Defauw, will play in Metropolitan Theatre the evening of Nov. 25. The program:

Respighi, "The Birds," suite for small orchestra: I. Prelude (after B. Pasquini); II. The Dove (after Jacques de Gallot); III. The Hen (after Philippe Rameau); IV. The Nightingale (after an anonymous English composer); V. The Cuckoo (after B. Pasquini); Lakeu, adagio for string orchestra; Dukas, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," Scherzo (after a ballad by Goethe); Franck, Symphony in D Minor.

New England Honors Koussevitzky

For his and the Boston Symphony's Orchestra's "distinguished contribution to the cultural life and economic welfare of New England," Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, was presented a silver plaque at the recreational session of the New England Council yesterday at the Hotel Statler in Boston. Mention was made, not only of Dr. Koussevitzky's work with the orchestra in Boston, but activities at Tanglewood for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and establishment of the Berkshire Music Center. On the left is Ralph E. Flanders, president of the Council, making the presentation. To the right of Dr. Koussevitzky is Glenwood J. Sherrard, chairman of the recreational development committee.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 19 1941

New England In Tribute to Koussevitzky

Boston, Nov. 18.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presented with a silver plaque by the New England Council last week for the orchestra's 'distinguished contribution to the cultural life and economic welfare of New England.

Presentation was made during the annual New England Conference, sponsored by the Council. Particular emphasis was placed on the success of the summer Berkshire Symphonic Festivals, which have built to national and international import since inaugurated by the conductor eight years ago. Reference to 'economic welfare' in the citation stems from appreciation of western Massachusetts resort, retail and theatrical interests that have benefited from the extra population drawn to the Stockbridge area by the summer concert series.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
NOV 15 1941

Koussevitzky Honored For Orchestra's Work

Dr Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra and of the Berkshire Symphonic festival, was presented a silver plaque and a testimonial by Ralph E. Flanders, president of the New England council, at the recreational session of the 17th New England conference at Boston yesterday.

Mr Flanders presented the sterling silver plaque, mounted on polished New England white pine, and said, "New England is deeply grateful for what the Boston orchestra has contributed to the cultural life of this region and deeply proud of the reputation it has earned us abroad.

"You and your associates," Mr Flanders said, "have become a truly recreating force in a world which seems to be slipping backward into barbarism. . . . It is the hope of the council's recreational development committee that your example will encourage other cultural developments, like, if not equal, in all of our six states.

"On behalf of the entire region, the recreational development committee of the New England council pays tribute to Dr Koussevitzky and his associates of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Berkshire Symphonic festival."

Martinu Concerto Grosso First Performance by Symphony

Boston Herald Nov 15

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The sixth regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 6 in F major Op. 68, "Pastoral"
Martinu.....Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra
Strauss.....'Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28

Mr. Koussevitzky's practice in recent years of sandwiching modern music between two established pieces works out on the whole with satisfactory results. It means for one thing that the modern gets heard, for it takes a very nimble conservative under this system to catch the old while missing the new. For the rest of it, of course, it is up to the modern to sink or swim in this company.

Yesterday's concert, somewhat to everyone's surprise, began with another unfamiliar work unannounced on the program, namely the "Star Spangled Banner." No one had to attempt to sing it, so that we could all, orchestra and audience alike, stand physically at attention and mentally at ease and listen to it.

But to come back to the new work on yesterday's program: The Concerto Grosso of Bohuslav Martinu proved to be the most stimulating novelty so far of the season. It is quite properly titled, for it bears an interesting affinity with the Brandenburg Concertos of Bach, especially those bright, quick movements. Mr. Martinu has taken the idea of contrasted soli and tutti, that delighted Bach and Handel, and worked out a composition in three movements on this basis. It is an eminently successful and in the end exciting work. Mr. Martinu is quoted in the program as saying that the form of the work should make its own way without benefit of a preliminary analytical lecture, and he is right.

The method of contrast he usually employs is to set two pianos against strings or wind. This is not invariably followed, but in the main we hear percussive dissonance in the pianos set against melodic invention in the orchestra. One of the most brilliant passages, which will perhaps indicate the fascination of this music, occurs in the finale. The pianos and strings work up to a nervously exciting climax, whereupon the woodwinds, three oboes and three clarinets, take over in much quieter vein that is simply entrancing to the ear.

If the bustling first movement, with a wealth of melody, and the captivating finale are at first hearing the most attractive, the slow movement is in its own way an expressive and remarkable interlude between them. It is, as the composer says, a song, in fact a lamentation in the strings, with the pianos in a subservient role and again chiefly percussive in effect. The dissonance of the harmony throughout may repel certain listeners, but it is all logically included and the endings are always, like Hindemith's, a concord in an established key.

Mr. Martinu was in the audience to receive the very cordial applause for this the long delayed first performance of his work. Mr. Koussevitzky led it in just the spirit it needed. Special mention should go to Messrs Sanroma and Zighera, the two expert pianists. Why the program did not mention them we cannot conceive.

Mr. Koussevitzky played Strauss's "Till" at the end of last season, and so good was the performance then that he was evidently tempted to let us hear it soon again. And again the performance was miraculously brilliant. The orchestra certainly departs next week for New York in splendid form.

Post MUSIC NOV 15 1941

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky had a surprise for the Friday subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts yesterday afternoon. It was "The Star Spangled Banner," played at the very beginning. Few could have expected the National Anthem because even after the orchestra had stood, ready to play, the audience remained seated until brought to their feet by a gesture from Mr. Koussevitzky. As soon as they understood what was about to follow, some applause broke out. About an equal amount of handclapping was generated by the performance, surprisingly little it seemed, considering the times.

Older people may have thought back to the stormy days of 1917-18, when there was agitation over the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner" by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Karl Muck. There are those who dislike introduction of the anthem at serious concerts, and on purely musical, not patriotic grounds. They claim "The Star Spangled Banner" is just not good music. If this reviewer may offer an opinion it is: "Why not play the National Anthem at concerts?" At the same time, he emphasizes that he has long felt "America the Beautiful" to present a more applicable text and more singable music.

Yesterday's program, as most of this season, traversed two standard works—Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony and "Till Eulenspiegel," by Richard Strauss—and a new score, the Concerto Grosso by the Czech Bohuslav Martinu. As detailed in the music columns of last Sunday's Globe, Martinu's music has had an adventurous career. The composer, sitting in Symphony Hall, finally heard the long-delayed premiere.

The term Concerto Grosso should not be taken too literally in the sense of form, because there is not strict observance of the "concertino" and "ripiene" as they were contrasted in the 18 Century Concerto Grosso. There are, however, two pianos in the small orchestra consisting of strings, two horns, one flute, oboes and clarinets in threes, and a pair of horns. Martinu has variously alternated the prominence of pianos, woodwinds and strings.

The two allegros which surround the slow middle movement are brusque, spirited, thoroughly healthy music, not without melody, but most striking for their rhythm. They fare boldly into much dissonance, but each movement ends with a good old, reassuring, common chord. Call it "pattern music" if you like, but observe that the patterns are less academic than expressive of the composer's temperament. More conventional is the slow movement, with its spreading, meditative melody set off against milder dissonance than prevails in the allegros.

Perhaps the only difficult aspect of the Concerto Grosso is its too, too, solid orchestration. Surely counterpoint out to be more distinguishable. One could observe the colors of massed strings and woodwinds, and the heavy sonorities of the pianos, but no half-tints, no delicate contrasts or weaving voices. During the performance a story came to mind of that rare character, the late Henry F. B. Gilbert, American composer. Gilbert developed his technic only with effort, and once told of revising a score by taking out "about a barrel of notes."

Mr. Martinu, appearing on the stage with Mr. Koussevitzky, received applause of obvious enthusiasm.

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the "Pastoral" seemed of even greater lyrical beauty and sunlit warmth than usual. His "Till," also continues to gain in wit and virtuoso glitter.

The orchestra goes to New York next week. Desire Defauw, the Belgian conductor, will be guest at the Symphony Hall concerts of Nov. 28 and 29, in the following program: Respighi: "The Birds," suite for small orchestra; Lekeu: Adagio for strings; Dukas: "The Apprentice Sorcerer"; Franck: Symphony in D minor.

C. W. D.

20

HAS PREMIERE AT SYMPHONY

Boston Post

Martinu's Concerto Very Well Received

Nov 15

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The contest between Bohuslav Martinu and Adolp Hitler was finally decided yesterday afternoon in favor of the Czech composer, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought to performance his Concerto Grosso for "chamber orchestra" of strings, woodwinds, horns and two pianos. To retell a tale given a certain prominence in the public prints yesterday morning, this Concerto Grosso, composed in Paris in 1937, was to have been published in Vienna and performed in the French capital the following year. The annexation of Austria by the Nazis put the score out of reach, -and the premier was then slated for Prague, only to have its composer become persona non grata in German-occupied Czecho-Slovakia. Again Mr. Martinu turned to Paris and the twice-postponed first performance was set for May, 1940, when along came the German army, and in the retreat from Paris the manuscript was lost.

As it chanced, the Czech conductor, George Szell, had another copy, the existence of which was revealed to the delighted composer after his arrival in America. Dr. Koussevitzky had every intention of performing the work last spring but there was a delay in copying the parts. Yesterday, to repeat, it was played, and the audience received it and its modest-seeming author with applause that betokened a genuine enthusiasm for the one and warm friendliness toward the other.

Nor was the audience at fault in commending the work, which, though far from epoch-making, is masterly in construction and thoroughly attractive in content. As its name implies, the Concerto is another instance of pouring new wine into an old bottle, yet there is no antagonism here, between ancient mould and modern matter. The former might well have been created for the latter's special benefit, so naturally does Martinu express himself in these 17th century terms. Vitality is the keynote of the music, even in the lyric slow division, which never languishes. And in the finale we encounter a spontaneity and exuberance that suggests an earlier Bohemian, Bederich Smetana.

After this heady conclusion and the excitements of the occasion, the rest of the concert might have been anti-climax. But it was not. For final number Dr. Koussevitzky produced a masterpiece by another — and far greater—living composer, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and accorded it a performance of extraordinary eloquence and verve. Beethoven's "Pastoral," a "nice comfortable symphony," as one listener was heard to describe it, began the programme, and upon it the conductor not only lavished loving care, he performed the equally important service of preventing its undeniably draggy passages from dragging any more than was really necessary.

A while ago President Petrillo of the Musicians' Union decreed that all orchestras under his jurisdiction should play "The Star Spangled Banner" before each concert, or stage performance, in which they were concerned. Yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky followed suit, with orchestra and audience standing, and a custom which prevailed at Symphony Hall during this country's participation in the first World war was restored, probably for the duration of this one.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
NOV 16 1941

It scarcely seems so long, yet it is 17 years ago last September, since SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY first set foot on American shores to take over direction of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He has conducted this great organization for more than one-fourth of its historic 60 years. Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Muck were some of his predecessors. The Boston comes to Columbus on Dec. 12 to play for the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN
NOV 16 1941

MISS SMITH AGAIN HEADS FESTIVAL

Officers of Berkshire Symphonic Festival, inc., Is Chosen at Recent Meeting

At the recent annual meeting of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, inc., the finance committee reported that it had been discussing arrangements for future seasons at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony orchestra and expected to have a definite announcement soon.

The meeting was held at the home of Mrs Charles Robinson Smith in Stockbridge. Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith was reelected president; Henry W. Dwight of Stockbridge, treasurer, and George W. Edman of Pittsfield, clerk. Laurence R. Connor of Pittsfield was elected vice-president to succeed the late Norval H. Busey, Jr., of Lee and New York. Mr Connor is also chairman of the finance committee.

Trustees reelected were: Miss Robinson Smith, Mr Edman, Mrs Myron Taylor of New York, Prof Philip Marshall Brown of Williamstown, Mrs Charles C. Griswold of Stockbridge and New York, Mrs William Felton Barrett of Egremont and Rye, N. Y., and William L. Bull of Lenox.

The official attendance for the nine concerts the past summer, as recorded from ticket stubs, was 83,037, or 14,000 more than in 1940. The second series of concerts had the largest attendance, 29,075. The third series had 28,710, and for the first series the attendance was 25,252. The smallest attendance was for the opening night, 7044 or 1000 more than the capacity of the shed, while the final concert had the greatest attendance 12,054. Patrons, members and subscribers accounted for 44 per cent of the attendance, while there were 25,660 general admissions.

These statistics and many others were contained in the president's report. Other reports were submitted by Joseph Franz on the grounds and the shed; by Mr Dwight, Mr Connor, Mrs Bruce Crane as head of the Festival Clubs, and Mr Edman, as clerk and director of publicity. Reports were read from Miss Alice Riggs as chairman of the Layman's Music course; Fred N. Cummings, in charge of parking; Willard M. Sistare as chairman of ushers; Miss Elizabeth Y. Pixley, Red Cross first-aid chairman.

The publicity report showed that 60,000 words were sent out from Tanglewood for newspapers by Western Union during the period of the Festival, an increase of 10,000 over last year. Mr Edman reporting on the gala benefit at Tanglewood for the USO and the British War Relief said that the net proceeds were about $19,000, so that the two beneficiaries would receive $9500 each.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
NOV 16 1941

21

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY CONDUCTING

Making the first of their two annual appearances in this city the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of its famed Russian conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, comes to Woolsey Hall on Wednesday evening. The concert by the great 110 piece orchestra will begin at 8:30 and the occasion will mark the second concert of the current Woolsey Hall Concert Series.

Long reckoned as one of the world's greatest program makers, Dr. Koussevitzky reveals his happy knack in this respect by his selections for the forthcoming concert. Ravel's Suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin", will be the first composition to be heard, following which the Symphony No. 3, by William Schuman will be presented. The concluding selection will be Brahms' great Symphony No. 4, in E minor. The Schuman work will be heard for the first time in New Haven at this concert, in fact it received its very first performance less than a month ago when it was performed by the Bostonians at their second concert of the season on October 17 with the composer present. New York expects to hear the piece this weekend when the orchestra makes its first visit of the season to Carnegie Hall.

This season is the sixty-first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the eighteenth that it has been under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, who, by the way, is the first Russian conductor of the world-famous musical body.

Born in Russia

Dr. Koussevitzky was born in 1874 in the small, central Russian province of Tver. There was no musical life about him, except for small visiting theatrical companies. When his father opposed a career so remote from the experience of their own community, he ran away and presented himself at the Philharmonic School in Moscow. The school was full—the year begun, but the authorities at once sensed the unusual qualities of the penniless young applicant, and made a place for him. There was only one possible scholarship open to him—for a student of the double-bass, and he accordingly took on this strange instrument. In a short time he astonished everyone by coaxing a lovely 'cello-like tone, and delicate melody from his huge, cumbrous bass, with its fist-wise bow. This was the Koussevitzky who later could elicit such transcendent tone and sheer melodic songfulness from a body of strings. And then, as now, he was tireless in his quest until he had reached new and unprecendented heights of beauty. Koussevitzky was soon known all over Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass.

Then, coming to the end of its possibilities, Koussevitzky aspired to that richest of instruments, the hundred-fold orchestra. He made his first trials in Berlin, and then, having independent means, he assembled his own orchestra in Moscow, and gave memorable series of concerts there and in St. Petersburg. When his public heard the erstwhile double-bassist on this infinitely more expressive instrument, the effect was electric. Koussevitzky was then, as ever, a pioneer for his art. He chartered a steamer to take his orchestra the length of the Volga through his vast country, taking to the musically starved people of innumerable provincial towns their "first symphony concert."

Brilliant Leader

After the revolution, Koussevitzky conducted for a while under government subsidy, but, fleeing restriction, established his famous "Concerts Koussevitzky," with his own orchestra in Paris. Here, and by guest performances in London and other cities, western Europe came under the spell of this magnetic and forceful leader.

Such was the leader who came to America and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. His span of years covers more than a quarter of the orchestra's history and far exceeds that of any previous conductor. He has touched new heights of his art, and brought the orchestra even in this present era of much fine music to new and surpassing importance. It requires a succession of seasons to test the scope of a conductor's interest in new music and old, the extent of his vision and his ability to refine his orchestra into an ever more perfect instrument, to keep his approach to the more familiar "classics" vital and absorbing. Koussevitzky's lengthening term shows him to have these abilities to a transcendent degree. The Boston Symphony concerts have never held such an abundant musical life, utter freedom from routine, such a brilliant and engrossing eloquence.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
NOV 16 1941

'New World' Symphony Is Anticipated

Koussevitzky To Conduct Symphony In Dvorak's Melodious Work at Bushnell

Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," is the feature of the program in which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial this Tuesday evening in the second event of the Bushnell Symphony Series.

The Boston program includes also the second suite from Prokofieff's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," as orchestrated by Maurice Ravel.

Gestures Unusual.

To many regular attendants at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the gestures of its leader, Serge Koussevitzky, are said to be a marvel of eloquence and grace which rival the artistic delights of the music itself. Yet this impression is gained, of course, from sitting back of him in the auditorium.

Here is how Koussevitzky looks from the stage. The observations were made by a newspaper reporter who smuggled himself into a choral group appearing several times with the orchestra last season in Symphony Hall, Boston.

"As Koussevitzky takes his place before his 'desk' (the music stand), he does not brusquely and loudly tap on it with his stick, to signal "attention" to the orchestra. He seems to make a prayerful pause of an instant, with head slightly bent. Then for a moment he sweeps his glance over the faces of the musicians. His breathing seems to indicate suppressed excitement. Next he sets himself, and stretches his hand out rather deliberately to pick up his baton from the music rack. Suddenly he sweeps both hands upward. Again he eyes the musicians until there is breathless attention on the part of orchestra and audience alike. Down come the arms, swift, but gliding, and the sound of music rises.

"As the playing proceeds, the hands, body, and face of Koussevitzky work together with amazing powers of expression. His face at times is seraphic, at times demoniac. With arms and body he seems by turn an emotional actor of tremendous power, a painter in bold colors and rugged masses, or a painter of opposite character—one using faint pastel hues, and brush-strokes of the utmost delicacy. Often he irresistibly gives the impression of a sculptor chiseling from solid rock a magnificient image to which he imparts sublime symmetries."

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
NOV 17 1941

Czech, Balked by Nazi Gets a Hearing in N.Y.

Boston, November 16.—(AP)—Safe from German armies which have made a fugitive of both himself and his music, Bohuslav Martinu sat in Symphony Hall Friday and after four previous cancellations finally heard the world premiere of his Concerto Grosso for two pianos.

The noted Czechoslovakian had been trying to hear his work performed ever since he wrote it in 1938, but three times Nazi invasions of European nations forced postponement of the program.

A fourth time, last April, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony scheduled it for performance only to postpone it when they could not obtain instrumental parts of the score.

Friday's premiere was successful. The audience called the composer to the centre of the stage three times and newspaper critics gave the work favorable reviews.

Played by a chamber orchestra, the concerto proved brisk and compact, containing a hint of themes Czech in character. The two pianos were used a good deal for percussion in the first two movements before taking over heavier solo parts in the last.

The concert also afforded another departure when the Boston Symphony, for the first time since the last war, played The Star Spangled Banner before the concert. It was a dispute over the playing of this same anthem then which led to the resignation of the late Karl Muck as conductor of the orchestra.

Originally scheduled for performance in Paris in 1938, the first premiere of Martinu's concerto was cancelled when his publishers in Vienna could not deliver the score because the German army had annexed Austria.

The German invasion of Czechoslovakia wiped out a second scheduled premier in Prague later that year, and Martinu, his works "verboten" because of his record as a patriot, moved on to Paris. Another premiere, scheduled there in May, 1940, was called off when the Nazis marched into France. This time the composer moved out of Paris only three days before the Germans entered.

He reached the United States last April after enduring much hardship as a refugee. He spent most of last summer working on the instrumental parts of the score.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
NOV 17 1941

Boston Orchestra In 60th Season

It is the 60th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that distinguished organization which the Symphony Club is bringing to Memorial Hall for a concert on Dec. 12, Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

During this season Dr. Koussevitzky, who is idolized not only by Bostonians but by much of the country at large, is playing a repertoire in which the "three B's", the "two H's" (Handel and Haydn) and Sibelius and Tschaikowsky are heavily represented.

Some of the classics less frequently heard are being revived, including the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony and excerpts from the seldom played "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony of Berlioz.

The new music draws upon Roy Harris, Britten, Goossens, Stravinsky and Paul Hindemith. Stravinsky also will be one of the guest conductors in Boston's mid-season.

Tickets for the Columbus concert may be ordered now through Heaton's or by mail to the manager of the Symphony Club, Helen Pugh Alcorn, at 34 Linwood-av.

This Clipping From BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE
NOV 17 1941

Mr. Koussevitsky Is Censored.

POOR Mr. Koussevitsky. He got brushed off. And by the long-haired critics of his own parish. What did he do? Sh-h-h . . . don't let it get around—he played "The Star-Spangled Banner." And right in front of the ghosts of Strauss and Beethoven.

Of course you've got to forgive Mr. Koussevitsky; he wasn't born in this country. He doesn't know that our blue-chip musical audiences take their Bach neat.

Anyway, the other afternoon Mr. Koussevitsky opened his programme with the national anthem. His audience was so surprised that Mr. Koussevitsky had to tell them it was customary for Americans to stand when they heard it.

After it was over, Mr. Koussevitsky stood there, expecting them to applaud his salute to America. They did—and it sounded like two feather dusters crashing together.

Poor Mr. Koussevitsky. He thought he knew music. He thought he knew Americans. He thought he appreciated good music as well as the next guy. And then he got brushed off.

It happened in Symphony Hall, Boston.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 15 1941

Boston Symphony Will Open Season Here Next Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first Brooklyn concert of the season on Friday evening, Nov. 21, at 8:30 o'clock in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in a program consisting of Mozart's symphony in D major, K. 385, known as the "Haffner" symphony; the second suite from the ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," by the contemporary Russian composer, Serge Prokofieff, and Dvorak's symphony No. 5 in E minor, subtitled "From the New World."

The annual Brooklyn series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is held under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee. The four remaining concerts for the current season will be held on Friday evening, Jan. 9; Thursday evening, Feb. 12; Friday evening, March 13, and Friday evening, April 3.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
NOV 17 1941

Berkshire Musicians Are Busy

Boston Symphony Playing in New York This Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will appear at Carnegie Hall, New York, Thursday night and Saturday afternoon and in Brooklyn, Friday night. This is Dr. Koussevitzky's 18th season with the orchestra.

Albert Spalding of Great Barrington, will appear in a Carnegie Hall recital tonight.

Artur Rodzinski, Stockbridge summer resident and conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, will conduct the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra Wednesday night and Friday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. These will be his first concerts of a four weeks' engagement and he will be the fourth conductor to share the centennial season of the orchestra.

Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano, will give her first recital of the New York season, Dec. 3, in Carnegie Hall, as a benefit for the New York Women's Trade Union League.

Hugh Ross, member of the Berkshire Music Center faculty at Tanglewood last summer, will direct the Schola Cantorum's performance of Mozart's Mass in C minor, Nov. 26, at Carnegie Hall. This will be the organization's first concert of the season.

Alexander Kipnis, who has appeared in the Berkshires, will give his only New York recital of this season, Nov. 29, at the McMillin Theatre, Columbia University.

Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, member of the Berkshire Music Center faculty last summer, who appeared last season on the Pittsfield Community Concert Association's program, will give a recital at the Town Hall in New York, Nov. 26.

This Clipping From BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE
NOV 18 1941

Proud of Bird.

Pictured above is Minot Beal, Boston Symphony violinist, holding perfectly marked Golden Amherst pheasant, one of the many beautiful birds in his rare collection at his home on Central street.

This Clipping From MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER
NOV 18 1941

1834 — Henry Lee Higginson, banker, at New York City. He was a volunteer in the Union Army and was severely wounded in 1863. He founded the Boston Symphony orchestra, presented Soldiers' Field to Harvard in 1891, and erected the Harvard Union building in 1899.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 18 1941

Boston Symphony Comes for Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first visit of the season to Hartford for a concert tonight at 8:15 in the Bushnell Memorial.

Serge Koussevitsky, world-famous conductor of the Symphony, will open the program with the Symphony "From the New World" by Antonin Dvorak, which he has revived this season in celebration of the 100th year since the birth of the Czech composer. The Second Suite from Prokofieff's Ballet. "Romeo and Juliet" will likewise be played. The movements consist of "Montagues and Capulets," "Juliet, the Maiden," "Dance," and "Romeo by Juliet's Grave."

The closing number will be Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Maurice Ravel. They are as follows: Promenade, Gnomus, Il Vecchio Castello, Tuileries, Bydlo, Ballet of Chicks in Their Shells, Samuel Goldenburg and Schmuyle, Limoges; The Marketplace, Catacombs (Con mortuis in lingua mortua), The Hut on Fowls' Legs, The Great Gate at Kiev.

Tonight's concert is the second event of the Bushnell Symphony Series, which opened last month with a program by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky will bring his famous orchestra to the Memorial for its other concert of the present season on Tuesday evening, Jan. 6.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
NOV 19 1941

Boston Symphony in Woolsey Hall Tonight

Making its first visit of the season in New Haven the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to Woolsey Hall this evening. The concert is the second of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series of 1941-42 and will begin at 8:30. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished Russian conductor of the famous 110 piece orchestra, will direct, and the program will consist of compositions by Maurice Ravel, William Schuman and Johannes Brahms.

The Ravel selection, "Le Tombeau de Couperin", will open the evening of fine music. This is a little suite in which the late French composer pays tribute to his earlier countryman by an imitation of his style and period. The movements include Prelude, Forlane, Menuet and Rigaudon.

William Schuman's Third Symphony is a newcomer to the symphonic field, having received its initial performance just a month ago by the Boston Orchestra in its second concert of the season. New York is to hear the piece for the first time this coming Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. William Howard Schuman was born in New York City in 1910. He graduated from Columbia Univeristy, studied with Persin, Haubiel, and Roy Harris, and attended the Mozarteum Academy at Salzburg. He is at present in charge of music at Sarah Lawrence College. Previous of this composer's works to have been played by the Boston Orchestra are his First Symphony and American Festival Overture.

The Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor will take up the second half of the program this evening. Long one of the standard works in symphonic literature this great composition will find an eager audience awaiting its presentation, for the Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky performs the piece in brilliant style.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
NOV 18 1941

Boston Symphony ... Tomorrow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first visit of the season to New Haven for a concert in Woolsey Hall tomorrow evening at 8:30. Serge Koussevitzky will introduce at this concert the Third Symphony of William Schuman. This Symphony had its first performance in Boston recently by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is in four parts, including Passacaglia, Fugue, Chorale and Toccata. William Howard Schuman was born in New York City in 1910. He graduated from Columbia University, studied with Persin, Haubiel, and Roy Harris, and attended the Mozarteum Academy at Salzburg. He is at present in charge of music at Sarah Lawrence College. Schuman's First Symphony and American Festival Overture have been performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program will open with Maurice Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," the little suite in which the late French composer pays tribute to his earlier countrymen by an imitation of his style and period. The movements include Prelude, Forlane, Menuet, and Rigaudon. The second half of the program will consist of the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
NOV 18 1941

Unusual Work Is Scheduled Here By Koussevitzky

Boston Symphony Will Perform 'Pictures at An Exhibition'

"Picture at an Exhibition," which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in its concert at the Bushnell Memorial tonight, is one of the most interesting works in symphonic literature. This composition shares the program with the second suite of the Prokofieff ballet, "Romeo and Juliet" and with the Dvorak Symphony "From the New World." Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct this concert which is the second event of the Bushnell Symphony Series.

In the "Victor Book of the Symphony," Charles O'Connel writes:

"One of Moussorgsky's most intimate friends was a painter-architect named Victor Hartman. Their association was terminated by the death of Hartman at the age of thirty-nine—one of the great sorrows in Moussorgsky's life. Other friends and admirers of Hartman planned to honor his memory with exhibition of his paintings in oil and water-color, and this was the occasion for the composition of the delightful music, descriptive of the exhibition, which we are considering here.

"The music was not written originally for orchestra, but for piano. The orchestral arrangement is the work of Maurice Ravel, and was done at the request of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first performance was given by Mr. Koussevitzky in Parris, May 3, 1923; the first in America by the same conductor, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, December 3, 1926. In orchestral guise the "Pictures" take on color and form impossible to realize in the original piano version, and exhibit both Ravel's respect for the designs of the composer, and his own extraordinary skill in the difficult and subtle art of orchestration."

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
NOV 20 1941

Last Night's Concert

By A. P.

The Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was greeted with tremendous applause last evening at Woolsey Hall in its first New Haven concert of this year. A friendly atmosphere was felt immediately as the audience settled back in their seats watching the wave of Serge Koussevitzky's baton and listening to the delicately puckish music of Ravel, "Le Tombeau de Couperin", the first number of a well balanced and varied program.

This engaging suite of the 20th century Frenchman is dedicated to the 18th century musician, Francois Couperin. Ravel infused his work with melody and with impressionism which makes him akin to Mozart and Debussy but at the same time, he has a decided originality all his own. The Forlane is reputed to be derived from the gondoliers of Venice. The Boston Symphony Orchestra demonstrated its ability to play light, airy music catching in its entirety the personality and intent of the composer.

William Schuman, a professor at Sarah Lawrence College very much interested in the correlation of progressive education and the arts, wrote his symphony No. 3 last Jan. especially for Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra. It is dramatic, invigorating music having abrupt changes in mood and great power. The novel sounds and startling, almost brutal force of the climax in the lost movement proclaim his completely modern style. The Chorale has a very sweet and pleasant melody and is one of the most beautiful sections. Especially in this selection could the audience perceive the fine technique of the Orchestra as the piece is difficult to play.

Brahm's last Symphonic work E Minor, No. 4, Op. 98, reveals his command of logical, concise style in the classical manner. Its perfection requires understanding and skill and the Boston Symphony provided both abundantly in the concert.

It is a splendid work, a great intellectual achievement and was a fitting close for a very excellent and highly enjoyable program.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
(B'klyn, Queens Sect.)
NOV 16 1941

BOSTON SYMPHONY INBROOKLYNFRIDAY

First of Five Concerts This Season in Academy Will Offer Varied Program

DON PASQUALE WEDNESDAY

Opera Cast and Orchestra From the Metropolitan Will Give Donizetti Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will begin its Brooklyn season with a concert on Friday night in the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The program will consist of Mozart's Symphony in D major, K. 385, known as the "Haffner" Symphony; the Second Suite from the ballet "Romeo and Juliet" by Serge Prokofieff and Dvorak's Symphony No. 5 in E minor, subtitled "From the New World."

The annual Brooklyn series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee. The four remaining concerts for the current season will be held on Friday night, Jan. 9; Thursday night, Feb. 12; Friday night, March 13, and Friday night, April 3.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
NOV 16 1941

Symphony To Open Its Season

Boston Orchestra To Play Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first Brooklyn concert of the season on Friday evening at 8:30 o'clock in the Academy of Music. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in a program consisting of Mozart's Symphony in D major, K. 385 (known as the "Haffner" Symphony); the Second Suite from the Ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," by the contemporary Russian composer, Serge Prokofieff, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 5 in E minor, subtitled "From the New World."

The annual Brooklyn series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is held under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee. The four remaining concerts for the current season will be held on Friday evening, Jan. 9; Thursday evening, Feb. 12; Friday evening, March 13, and Friday evening, April 3.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 19 1941

23

Music

Boston Orchestra Heard at Bushnell

BY CARL E. LINDSTROM

The first half of last night's concert was just the second event in the Bushnell series; after the intermission it was a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with all that the words imply.

It is not easy to sum up the distinctions that subtly set this group apart from all others. Some have to do with the players, such as coordination among the choirs, individual virtuosity and sharply contrasted planes of orchestral coloring; others grow out of the leader such as a certain dramatization of the various elements and a flair for the spectacular which inheres to most Koussevitzky interpretations.

The "Romeo and Juliet" ballet suite of Prokofieff and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" had the benefit of Koussevitzky interpretations. Dvorak's "New World" Symphony was conducted by the revered leader for no better reason than the one that a hundred years ago in Bohemia, Antonin Dvorak was born, an implicit blessing, just as his E minor symphony is implicitly good and requires no anniversary to occasion its performance.

A Prokofieff Ballet

The Romeo and Juliet music is best appreciated apart from its literary connotations. The dissonantal opening period is repeated — though in a different tonality, if memory serves—a practice which is recommended to modern composers who complain that their works get only a single hearing.

There is nothing particularly forbidding in Prokofieff's score. Descriptions of the ballet would seem to explain the innocuous character of the sections entitled "Juliet." "Dance," and even Romeo's clamant threnody at the grave of a Juliet who is really not dead at all. But we agreed to forget the meanings of this music. Actually it examples once again Prokofieff's melodic or thematic fertility, his piquant counterpoint, and less specifically but more importantly his gift for giving his compositions a savor and quite an individual one at that.

A visitor from another planet would never have guessed that 60 of the most momentous years in musical history separated the Prokofieff and Moussorgsky compositions. Of course, the modernity of Moussorgsky is an old story and so is Ravel's orchestration of this graphic music. But this is the kind of thing that is the most viable to Dr. Koussevitzky's hands.

Gates of Kiev

The course of events in the Russian campaign made it inevitable that this suite with its magnificent climax apostrophizing the Gates of Kiev would reach the concert hall with increasing frequency. It is arresting music. The vivid portrayal of the ballet chicks, the overpowering effect of the brass choir in the Catacombs and the fantastic sketches of the gnome and the witch are unforgettable as Koussevitzky limned them with his master players. If the first trumpet fluffed a note in the opening Promenade, he more than redeemed himself in the character piece, "Samuel Goldenburg and Schmuyle."

It has been so often repeated that Dvorak's "American" music turned out to be merely a Europeanized version of Negro and Indian themes that it may be no use to point out that his "New World" Symphony has an inherent freshness that endures to this day. It is one of those symphonies that play themselves and if this one is permitted to play itself, it can have a good deal of the Kansas prairie about it in spite of the European academy and broken English.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

I don't think Dr. Koussevitzky had quite made up his mind about the Dvorak Symphony. There were only two details that attested a Koussevitzky "interpretation"—the pianissimo of the pizzicato bass so insubstantial and yet so pervasive that instead of approaching the ear directly it seemed to steal up from behind—and secondly, the quickened tempo of the slow movement. That was an improvement. Dr. Koussevitzky set the beat at what might be called Larghetto and indeed that is the way the program described the second movement. Dvorak marked it Largo. Who changed it?

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
NOV 21 1941

Boston Symphony Opens Concerts Here Tonight

The first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's annual series of five concerts at the Academy of Music will be given tonight, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting symphonic works by Mozart and Dvorak, and a ballet suite by the contemporary Russian composer, Serge Prokofieff.

The series is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a special committee. The four other concerts will be presented on Jan. 9, Feb. 12, March 13 and April 3.

Hartford Courant

Symphony Again Gets Ovation

Nov. 19, 1941

Many Unique Aspects in Boston Orchestra Concert Featuring Dvorak, Moussorgsky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in the second concert of the Bushnell Symphony Series at the Horace Bushnell Memorial Hall last night.

Symphony No. 5, "From the New World" ..... Dvorak
Suite, "Romeo and Juliet" ..... Prokofieff
"Pictures at an Exhibition" ..... Moussorgsky

Each orchestra that appears at the Bushnell Memorial has a special place in the collective heart of the audience, but the place of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a special one indeed. Its history in Hartford is the longest. Its distinguished conductor is the most familiar personality to appear on the Bushnell podium. And even in the winter, the sight of its players, dressed as they are, in their white ties and long tails, inevitably recalls the wide skies, the sweeping lawns and the high excitement of Tanglewood.

Yet the greeting that it gets on its every appearance bespeaks something more than a long friendship and happy associations. When the audience at Bushnell tenders to Dr. Koussevitzky and his talented men such ovations as were offered last night, the audience is not, as is sometimes the case, merely begging for another tidbit, but is expressing as best it can its recognition of the unparalleled performances that conductor and orchestra are now, in the eighteenth year of their joint activity, bestowing upon the people of the eastern seaboard.

Unique Event.

The performance last night had its unique aspects, musical and otherwise. Many who sat in the audience last night must have remembered, when Dr. Koussevitzky bade his orchestra rise for the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner," another occasion long ago when the same music and the same orchestra were less happily associated; remembering its consequences, one can only praise Citizen Koussevitzky for his tact and his patriotism. For the record, Dr. Koussevitzky, unlike Mr. Barbirolli, conducted the orchestra rather than the audience, and he permitted his 'cellists to remain seated rather than contort themselves for the sake of convention. Watching Mr. Bedetti and Mr. Zighere one had no doubt that their hearts were in the right place if their backs, strictly speaking, were not.

Like a thoughtful uncle, Dr. Koussevitzky never ignores a significant, or even a relatively insignificant, anniversary. The birth a hundred years and two months ago of Antonin Dvorak gave him an excuse, which he scarcely needed, for programming the best known symphonic work of the Bohemian whose experiences in America were so rewarding. The music is thrice familiar, but why should familiarity bar rehearing of a work so excellently constructed, so warmly inspired, so richly orchestrated? The camp meeting echoes through it; so does the Venusberg of Wagner. Yet the music is endowed with the character of a solid, tasteful musician, capable of employing all the resources of the Nineteenth Century orchestra, but using them with the discrimination of a poet and a scholar. The performance was not, particularly in the initial measures, impeccable, but if Dvorak heard it, he must have been gratified by its brisk pace, its colorful phrasing and its lack of lush sentimentality.

The suite drawn by Prokofieff from his ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," has the graphic character of the music for "Lieutenant Kije," the same ingeniousness in the use of the orchestra, the same conciseness of expression, but it lacks the wit, the originality, in short, the distinction that Prokofieff generally can give even his slightest compositions. Performing the music, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra conferred upon it all their skill in sharpening its phrases, shaping its rythms and coloring its acid harmonies. The debt that Prokofieff owes his foremost interpreters in the United States is a large one; it will not be paid by such relatively weak compositions as "Romeo and Juliet."

Timely Item.

The final item on the program was another matter. The musical tribute that Moussorgsky seventy years ago paid his friend Hartmann, architect and painter, has peculiar meaning now when Russians are once more seeking the understanding of the West, and the graphic representations of the Poles and the Jews and the Russians — romantic and realistic, fanciful and melancholy,—is heightened by the knowledge brought daily from battlefields. The orchestration made by Ravel at the request of Dr. Koussevitzky is famous. The interpretation given it by the conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra is equally so. Last night's was exceptional. Never has the wagon in "Bydlo" rumbled more heavily over the bleak Polish plain; never have Goldenburg and Schmuyle conducted their dialogue more tellingly; never has the market place at Limoges bustled more actively; never have the chicks danced from their shells more lightly. And never has the gate at Kiev been reared more impressively from its granite base to its brazen crown than it was last night by the talented brass players of the Boston Orchestra. As long as Dr. Koussevitzky and his men can read the score, Kiev will never be entirely in alien hands; the better part of it, perhaps, will always belong to whomever will listen.

W. K. S.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
NOV 21 1941

MRS B. W. WARREN DIES, WILLIAMSTOWN

Wife of Boston Lawyer Was Daughter of Congressman and Treasury Secretary William Windom

Williamstown, Nov. 20—Mrs Ellen Windom Warren, 74, wife of Bentley Wirt Warren of 228 Beacon street, Boston, died suddenly this afternoon of a heart condition at their summer home, Stone Hill, Williamstown, where they had been staying since early in September. She had been ill for 18 months.

Born at Washington, D. C., Mrs Warren was the daughter of William and Ellen (Hatch) Windom. Her father was a congressman and later a senator from Minnesota and subsequently was secretary of the treasury in the cabinets of President James A. Garfield and President Benjamin Harrison. Her father died suddenly at New York after he had delivered a "free silver" speech in 1891. Mrs Windom's mother was the daughter of Rev Roger Conant Hatch, a Congregational minister at Warwick.

Mrs Warren attended private schools at Washington, Boston and Paris and her marriage to Mr Warren, a widely known Boston lawyer, took place June 6, 1894, at New York. Mr Warren is a former president of the Massachusetts Bar association, a senior trustee of Williams college and a trustee of Radcliffe college and of Boston Symphony orchestra.

Mrs Warren was a member of the Chilton club at Boston, the Colony club at New York. St John's Episcopal church at Williamstown and Emmanuel Episcopal church, Boston. She was identified with many charitable organizations at Boston.

She leaves her husband; a son, Bentley Wirt Warren, Jr., of Boston; a daughter, Mrs Danforth Geer of Short Hills, N. J.; six grandchildren and a sister, Miss Florence B. Windom of Boston. A private funeral will be held at Williamstown. Burial will be in Williamstown.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
NOV 21 1941

Boston Group in Concert

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Last night's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall literally ended with a bang at the Great Gate of Kiev.

The composition, of course, was Ravel's grandscale version of Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition, which wind up with the orchestra arching hugely over the compositive sight of Kiev's portals.

The gate came in for one of the biggest crashings to date. Mr. Koussevitzky rose especially to the task, and the Boston battalion went all-out in one of the grandest orchestral fortissimos on record.

The piece topped the Ravel-Moussorgsky series in high virtuosity. Mr. Koussevitzky yields to none in lashing up the tone-waves. The brasses rang out like Judgment Day, and the strings just about sizzled in one of the toughest repertory workouts.

* * *

Eleven Tone Canvasses.

The Kiev Gate was only last in a sequence of 11 boldly executed tone canvasses. The series teemed with telling touches in character and landscape sketchings, Mr. Koussevitzky accented keynote gestures and moods. The whole made as fine a picture gallery as ever came from a symphonic easel.

Together the Russian Moussorgsky and the French Ravel range over a human pageant from grim deformity to high grace, with a recess for chuckling relief. The Boston unit turned the trick of making sheer sound visible in blinding streaks of realistic color.

Earlier Mr. Koussevitzky read four excerpts from Prokofieff's second Romeo and Juliet Ballet Suite. Steeped in typical Prokofieff modernism and by turns gnarled, spacious and whimsical, the pieces came in for brilliant exposition.

* * *

Raw Grief and Poetry.

Despite certain stuffy sequences hard to fathom in form and meaning, Prokofieff's score yet throws off hints of the Shakespeare blend of raw grief and twilight poetry.

Conductor and orchestra kept close pace in a mediocre reading of Beethoven's Eroica symphony, opening the program. Neither planning nor playing came up to Boston standard, barring a first movement humming with life. But, then a mediocre Boston Symphony reading is still a few jumps ahead of routine stride.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
NOV 21 1941

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS 'EROICA'

Serge Koussevitzky Leads the Orchestra in the Beethoven Work at Carnegie Hall

HIS READING IS ACCLAIMED

Suite of 4 Movements From Prokofief's 'Romeo and Juliet' Ballet Heard

By OLIN DOWNES

It is a sheer feast to the ear when the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town. Playing and conducting of the highest order are customarily the rule when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his men officiate. The public satisfaction in their accomplishment is shown as it was shown last night by the audience which packed Carnegie Hall and congested the boxes and galleries and acclaimed the performances.

The orchestra sounded again last night, sounded nobly, sounded, when the brass choir was not forced, as occasionally it was, like the Stradivarius of all orchestras which this one is. There was also an interesting program, beginning with the symphony which, if any one work in that form could be said to tower over all the others, and to look down from an incommensurable height over the centuries, is the one heard on this occasion—the Beethoven "Eroica."

Never was a time when this symphony could be more appropriately heard, and pondered. For it is the apotheosis of the heroic spirit in man, in terms that only a tone poet could utter. Such was Beethoven's fundamental inspiration in writing the symphony. Those who insist that music has none other than purely tonal conceptions back of it can never explain away this fact. It is not merely the circumstance of the original dedication of the score to Napoleon the consul, and the rest of the story. When Beethoven tore Napoleon's name from the title page, the underlying and impersonal thought of the symphony remained. That thought is without question responsible for the dimensions of the work and the immense gap which lies between it and the earlier formal symphonies of the Bonn master.

But there is even more here than homage to heroism, more than profound grief, and sublime thoughts of the passing of the human spirit through the portals that make the humblest and the mightiest equal. There is surely the conception, in the second half of the work, of nature's endless cycles of deaths and resurrections, and of enveloping infinity. In form, in accent, the vast piece is Michaelangelesque, timeless, universal. The final variations would deserve Emerson's remark about Shakespeare, who could announce that there would be a play of stars and planets tonight in the theatre. Saying which, we ask the indulgence of those who decry "personal interpretations" of masterpieces. We are forced to think no less of the symphony, and its capstone, the finale, with the Protean variations.

Classic Reading Prepared

Of this work Dr. Koussevitzky had prepared a nobly classic reading which, in the letter, was carried out. There could of course, there undoubtedly were, as there should be, differences of opinion among those familiar with the music concerning minor details. One could advocate a little less of a ritard here, or a slower tempo there.

When a conductor of sincerity and greatness reads a score he certainly will not give a reading exactly like another conductor's, or slavishly adherent to every fractional detail of "the tradition"—any more than two great actors would read Hamlet's soliloquy at the same pace and with identical accents and inflections.

To such things we take no exception. But there is an element that is more essential, and that we found diluted in the performance: Beethoven's gigantic power, his uncouthness and explosive intensity. Classicism, it is true, implies balance of force against force, and harmonious of proportion. This symphony is an incomparable classic structure. Underlying it is the terrifying elementality which inheres in Beethoven. In brief, the "Eroica" was a little too preposed for polite society.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
NOV 21 1941

Soviet Ballet Smiles at Juliet

By HENRY SIMON

The USSR refuses to take Shakespeare's adolescent love very seriously, if we may judge from Serge Prokofieff's second ballet suite on Romeo and Juliet, which the Boston Symphony brought to Carnegie Hall last night. The fighting Montagues and Capulets sound suspiciously like little Peter and his wolf; Juliet is a kittenish maiden with just a touch of sentiment; there's a light-hearted Russian ballet for the ball; while the only serious business is Romeo mourning at Juliet's grave—and that's scarcely heart-breaking. It's all a dandy bit of Soviet fun.

Serge Koussevitzky and his Bostonians were in fine fettle for the opening of their New York season. Beethoven's Eroica got a performance that was cleaner technically than Bruno Walter's recent one with the Philharmonic-Symphony, but, for my money, less satisfactory. The opening movement had sweep, but the hero's funeral march was full of slow Russian mournfulness, and sentiment—of all things—crept into the lively finale.

A sold-out house, with as many standees as the Fire Department allows, found it all to its liking—and was fairly bowled over by the virtuoso performance of the Moussorgsky-Ravel Pictures at an Exhibition that closed the concert.

Suite From Prokofief Ballet

The second part of the concert was modern in texture. Its most recent music was the suite of four movements taken from Prokofief's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet, the subject—believe it or not after hearing the music—the same as Shakespeare's. It is music of a ballet-satire upon the idea of "Romeo and Juliet," performed in the Bolshoi Theatre in Moscow in 1935. And it is silly parody, silly musically, as dramatically—in fine, mostly trash.

It is one of those jokes—this score—that are so tragic because they just aren't funny, or new either. There is the same Prokofief face-making, the same type of theme and rhythmic banality, the kind of stuff which this gifted composer should by now have outgrown. But perhaps his government forces him to do it. There are moments of lyricism for the scene of Juliet's death. This is melodious, pretty, more refined, but it need not be taken seriously, because, you see, in this precious ballet Juliet does not die. The death is a bluff, the grave a deception, Romeo, by inference, an ass, and so with the music.

The program ended with the masterly orchestral version, by Ravel, of Mussorgsky's "Pictures from an Exhibition." Hoffman's pictures inspired these little, unique creations, which are by turns realistic, grotesque, fanciful, or humorous, and have in them a whole world of music. Usually their performance is unique with the Boston Symphony and its distinguished leader. We had, however, the feeling that this was not Dr. Koussevitzsky's night. There was unnecessary fussiness of detail, italization, and also forcing of tone. Fascinating music, excellent execution, but, for some inner or outer reason, not the customary total of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
NOV 21 1941

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEGINS ITS VISITS

Koussevitzky Opens New Series—A Kern Novelty.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Music talked turkey in Carnegie Hall last night, the auditorium being packed to the doors for the opening concert of the Boston Symphony's fifty-sixth season in New York. Nothing of a post-prandial lassitude was discoverable in the performances. Standees as well as regular subscribers had reason to note the vigor with which Serge Koussevitzky launched his players upon each of the three compositions of the evening: Beethoven's "Eroica," four movements from the second of Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet suites, and the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Some of the playing was very loud and some of the loudness not as musical in sound as Boston Symphony fortissimo climaxes usually are. Presumably this had nothing to do with Thanksgiving. It did, however, seem to conform with the extreme energy of the conductor. The "Eroica" and the "Pictures" exhibited anew the virtuosity of the ensemble, which is as responsive and flexible as ever. As each of these works is an old story, there is no need to dwell upon details of their performance. For this listener the symphony had more of muscularity than depth and there might be a deal of hair-splitting about retards and accelerations.

The Prokofieff music is not so well known. "Montagues and Capulets," "Juliet, the Maiden," "Dance" and "Romeo by Juliet's Grave" bespeak the proficient man of the theater rather than the symphonist of the concert halls.

The music is neat, dissonant, variegated in its scoring and—for ballet. There is something of dramatic tension in the last of the excerpts, but this needn't have been, since the dance Juliet is brought back to life for the sake of a happy ending. Prokofieff's music dates back to 1935, and has been in the Boston repertory since 1938.

Rodzinski Leads Kern Piece.

Aside from the essential news fact that Artur Rodzinski began his month with the orchestra as the fourth conductor of its centenary year, Wednesday night's concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony calls for more than a line in the record, because of the first performance in Manhattan of a novelty, made up of tunes everybody knows. This was Jerome Kern's Scenario for Orchestra on Themes from "Showboat." Lushly, heavily and, at times, brilliantly scored, the "Scenario" was precisely what in an elder day would have been called a potpourri. All the "Showboat" song hits were there, with "Old Man River" doing double duty at the opening and the close.

This is not symphonic music, and the effect it makes remains that of highly overdressed operetta. But the audience applauded it like mad and paid Mr. Kern a tribute of affection when he came forth to bow. The program embraced, otherwise, Beethoven's First Symphony, the Overture, Nocturne and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Mid-summer Night's Dream," and Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler." The playing did not always represent the orchestra at its best. There will be other and, perhaps, fairer opportunities to discuss the results obtained from the ensemble by Dr. Rodzinski.

New Symphony Is Directed by Koussevitzky

Nov 21

Boston Orchestra Presents William Schuman Work at Carnegie Hall Concert

By Robert Lawrence

Thwarted ambition was the philosophic scheme of yesterday afternoon's magnificent concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. The stream of disillusionment ran consciously in the Sixth ("Pathetic") Symphony of Tchaikovsky which, for this writer, is a very great work. It inundated, without any awareness on the part of the composer, the Third Symphony of William Schuman, receiving a first performance here under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The symphony of Mr. Schuman, thirty-one-year-old New Yorker, is a gallery of counterpoint exercises on a gigantic scale. There are two formal parts to this work, each divided into two sections. Thus we have, as four separate movements, a Passacaglia, Fugue, Chorale and Toccata. A very large orchestra is employed.

To the composer's credit, it may be said that he orchestrates well. There was not a dull moment in his piece, from the standpoint of pure sound. His mastery of contrapuntal forms also proved remarkable. But his use of these forms breathed emotional sterility. Such a grasp of minutiae might have been of equal help in planning the layout of a bridge or a tunnel, but not in the writing of great music, which must come from the heart.

Mr. Schuman owns a superb rhythmical equipment. One had only to hear the subject of his fugue to recognize a composer who can accomplish anything he wants in the field of technique. But he has sought, in the Third Symphony, nothing beyond technique. The prevailing style is an admixture of Hindemuth and Roy Harris. I must add that this judgment is merely my own opinion. The work received an ovation yesterday. In great part, the applause was a tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, who had given the score a stunning performance. Such selfless devotion to new music by a great orchestra can bring only the highest admiration.

There were moments in this symphony, as in portions of the Toccata, when Mr. Schuman forgot his contrapuntal mission and wrote harmonies of an ingratiating texture. But most of the time his melodic lines were ugly in themselves and forced in their junctures. This work, conceived on a tremendous scale, points to a fundamental weakness in our modern conservatory methods—the fostering of virtuosity without an accompanying demand that the musician look well within himself.

Beautiful playing marked Ravel's suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," which opened the program. And, save for one or two errors in the brass, the closing performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony was the climax of the afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky's approach to this work is too familiar to require much discussion at this point. But his probing grasp of its meaning, his ability to make it a new experience with every repeated hearing deserve whole-hearted praise.

This was ideal Tchaikovsky—full of sentiment, free-flowing, yet never crossing the border line of good taste. If only for such an achievement, yesterday's concert of the Boston Orchestra is to be remembered.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 21 1941

Koussevitzky Directs Concert In Carnegie Hall

Boston Symphony Opens N.Y. Season With Works of Beethoven, Prokofieff

By Jerome D. Bohm

Some of the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its first concert of the season under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in Carnegie Hall last night, had the tonal sumptuousness and brilliancy one has come to expect from that organization and some of it fell considerably short of those expectations. Unfortunately, it was the second, less consequential portion of the program upon which the orchestra's virtuosity was expended.

The evening began with a highly unsatisfactory performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. The blame for this unsatisfying interpretation must be shared by both the conductor and the orchestra itself. Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of the score hardly penetrated beneath its surface in any of the four movements, with the exception of the Scherzo, which was deftly accounted for throughout and with especial felicity in the trio, where the four horns set forth their difficult parts superbly.

But the other three movements were poorly integrated. The arbitrary retarding of the tempo at various points in the opening allegro halted the music's passionate sweep; the C major portion of Funeral March was conceived by Mr. Koussevitzky, not as a continuation of the tragic mood of its commencement, but as a trivial loosening of the tension; the finale wanted in spontaneity of utterance. In fact, the interpretation as a whole was a pedestrian one, the dullness of which was not lesscned by the opaque quality of tone with which it was invested for the most part, in addition to technical shortcomings, such as unequalities of balance in wood-wind and brass chords, and impurities of intonation.

But after the intermission both Mr. Koussevitsky and his musicians returned in their customary excellent form. The four numbers from Prokofieff's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," "Montague and Capulets," "Juliet, the Maiden," dance, and "Romeo by Juliet's Grave," which were performed first, are not among the Russian composer's most telling products. There are faded reminiscences of the Classical Symphony, intermingled with bits which sound like some of the studies in velocity from Clementi's "Gradus ad Parnassum" in the first three numbers. "Romeo at Juliet's Grave" contains better thematic material, but even here the music does not reach any great depths.

The concert was brought to a stunning close with Ravel's version of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition.' This has always been one of Mr. Koussevitky's finest achievements not only because of its truly magnificent tonal attributes but because of its enkindling imaginativeness as well.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
NOV 21 1941

25

Bostonians Play at Carnegie Hall

Initial N.Y. Concert of 56th Season

By GRENA BENNETT

The celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given a rousing welcome last evening in Carnegie Hall at the initial local concert of its fifty-sixth season.

In an admirably constructed and prepared program, the visitors thrilled a capacity audience which frequently manifested its enjoyment of a performance that left nothing undone in its interpretation.

The list consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the symphony revealed him in a most eloquent and eager mood, the pages of that mighty and heroic work communicated in a glowing and compelling presentation.

He and his men were in faultless co-operation in the reading of the reflective beauty of every phrase with warmth of feeling, and moulded the texture and fabric of the music with alternating felicitousness and impetuous drive.

Emotional appeal and romantic urge were prominent in the performance of the "Romeo and Juliet" suite, which was given with a wealth of tonal quality by each and every section of the band.

The details of the Moussorgsky work demand a broad scope in delineating its various and varied subjects, each one of which was calculated with the intent to reconstruct the composer's idea, ably invoked by the batonist and expresesd by the instrumentalists.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
NOV 21 1941

Boston Symphony At Carnegie Hall

By EDWARD O'GORMAN

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony returned to Carnegie Hall last night, opening their current local season with a program of German, Russian and French-Russian music. Four movements from a suite from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet were played between Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and the Ravel-Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition."

The concert, without being in all ways up to the Boston Symphony's usual standard, had its impressive moments. Dr. Koussevitzky was in an enthusiastic but a heavily capricious humor; the orchestra played lustily but with occasional lapses in intonation; and a large audience was sent home in good spirits, largely due to the intensity of the conductor's reading of the Moussorgsky music.

In the "Eroica" Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky wielded an iron fist, but the orchestra wrapped it up in a velvet glove. Of the many performances of the "Eroica" that have been heard this fall, it was in general the hastiest and the most impulsive, and yet—from an instrumental standpoint — one of the best played. The opening movement had more than its share of changes of tempo, and could hardly be accused of being in the strictly classical vein; but these were liberties which derive purely from the fact that Dr. Koussevitzky has been on close terms with the symphony for a long time.

For the epicure in modern music the Prokofieff suite was the evening's treat. It was made up of "Montagues and Capulets," "Juliet," "Dance" and "Romeo by Juliet's Grave," and as far as the first three numbers are concerned is a small package of sheer wizardy in musical and instrumental invention. For concert use, the final movement seemed a trifle on the theatrical side.

Koussevitzky Directs Concert InCarnegieHall

Boston Symphony Opens N.Y. Season With Works of Beethoven, Prokofieff

By Jerome D. Bohm

Some of the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its first concert of the season under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in Carnegie Hall Thursday night, had the tonal sumptuousness and brilliancy one has come to expect from that organization and some of it fell considerably short of those expectations. Unfortunately, it was the second, less consequential portion of the program upon which the orchestra's virtuosity was expended.

The evening began with a highly unsatisfactory performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. The blame for this unsatisfying interpretation must be shared by both the conductor and the orchestra itself. Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of the score hardly penetrated beneath its surface in any of the four movements, with the exception of the Scherzo, which was deftly accounted for throughout and with especial felicity in the trio, where the four horns set forth their difficult parts superbly.

But the other three movements were poorly integrated. The arbitrary retarding of the tempo at various points in the opening allegro halted the music's passionate sweep; the C major portion of Funeral March was conceived by Mr. Koussevitzky, not as a continuation of the tragic mood of its commencement, but as a trivial loosening of the tension; the finale wanted in spontaneity of utterance. In fact, the interpretation as a whole was a pedestrian one, the dullness of which was not lessened by the opaque quality of tone with which it was invested for the most part, in addition to technical shortcomings, such as unequalities of balance in wood-wind and brass chords, and impurities of intonation.

But after the intermission both Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians returned in their customary excellent form. The four numbers from Prokofieff's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," "Montague and Capulets," "Juliet, the Maiden," dance, and "Romeo by Juliet's Grave," which were performed first, are not among the Russian composer's most telling products. There are faded reminiscences of the Classical Symphony, intermingled with bits which sound like some of the studies in velocity from Clementi's "Gradus ad Parnassum" in the first three numbers. "Romeo at Juliet's Grave" contains better thematic material, but even here the music does not reach any great depths.

The concert was brought to a stunning close with Ravel's version of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." This has always been one of Mr. Koussevitzky's finest achievements not only because of its truly magnificent tonal attributes but because of its enkindling imaginativeness as well.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
NOV 22 1941

Boston Symphony Pays First Brooklyn Visit

Koussevitzky Commemorates Mozart And Dvorak in Academy Program

By MILES KASTENDIECK

In commemorative mood, Serge Koussevitzky took note of the anniversaries of Mozart's death and Dvorak's birth in the first Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night. That was more than he arranged for his Manhattan appearances on this visit. It was a fortunate circumstance for us, otherwise the year might have passed by without any proper recognition of these events in the music halls of this borough.

Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony and Dvorak's "From the New World" Symphony were as good choices as any; the Dvorak was inevitable of course. Sandwiched in betwen them was a Prokofieff work, not an unexpected choice from contemporary music so far as Koussevitzky is concerned, since he has fathered Prokofieff's music in this country. The item was four movements of the Second Suite from the "Romeo and Juliet" Ballet.

What was heard by way of performance was typical of the Boston Symphony, though at no time during the evening did it surpass itself as it has been known to do. There were more slips than one would have expected, especially in the horns. Chiefly to be noted was the ultra-refinement of the playing, its tonal richness and balance. That Koussevitzky did not ask the ultimate from the musicians was not their fault.

The treasurable music of the "Haffner" Symphony (D Major, K 385) has long since transcended commentary. Though it may have been routine for Mozart, it has worn better than several of his others in the course of time. Last night it was played with requisite style and polish yet with a little more straightforwardness than one might have expected from so fastidious a conductor.

While not the best Prokofieff, the Romeo and Juliet music is neatly contrived, expertly orchestrated, and quite engrossing. The ancient feud of the Montagues and Capulets is graphically stated in the conflict of dissonances; Juliet, the Maiden, is fetchingly sketched in the tripping music reminiscent of the "Classical Symphony"; the Dance is typically light-hearted; Romeo by Juliet's Grave though prostrate is not however so deeply moved as to convey his grief through this music.

To hear the "New World" Symphony well played is always to experience again the perennial freshness of a hackneyed work. The music is more robust than Koussevitzky made it sound last night. He tended to over-refine to a point where the stirring scherzo, for instance, lost some of its sharpness and the ending came as an anti-climax. The slow movement dragged unnecessarily. In short, there was more of Koussevitzky than Dvorak in this performance, no matter how well it sounded.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 22 1941

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Brooklyn Season

Koussevitzky Conducts.— Academy Full to Overflowing, with Standees

The Brooklyn Academy of Music was full to overflowing last night, with many standees, for a performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

The program consisted of Mozart's "Symphony in M Major," Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet," second suite, and Dvorak's "Symphony No. 5 in E Minor" (New World).

Especially enthusiastic applause was given to Prokofieff's ballet music for "Romeon and Juliet," which was first performed in Soviet Russia in the spring of 1937. The orchestra last night played four of the seven movements of the suits: 1. Montagues and Capulets (allegro pesante); 2. Juliet the Maiden (vivace); 3. Dance (Vivo), and 4, Romeo at Juliet's Grave (Adagio Fundebre).

Mozart's symphony and the Prokofieff music made up the first half of the program. The second half was taken up by Dvorak's symphony "From the New World," which was given an excellent reading.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 22 1941

Boston Symphony Opens Season Before Large Audience; Many Attend Concert With Guests

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's initial visit to the borough for this last season night brought a capacity audience to the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Preceding the concert Mrs. William H. Good gave a dinner for Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Supreme Court Justice and Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Supreme Court Justice and Mrs. George W. Brower, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Joralemon Davenport and Rudolf Reimer. The party occupied box No. 1 at the concert.

In box No. 2 Mrs. Dean C. Osborne entertained for Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Fawcett, Supreme Court Justice Lewis L. Fawcett, Mrs. Theodore Frohne, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Weiler and Donald Sinclair.

Mrs. Benjamin Prince had as her guests in box No. 3 Rear Admiral and Mrs. James C. Pryor, Mr. and Mrs. James C. MacMullin, Mrs. Karp Milhalenkoff, Benjamin Prescott and Mr. and Mrs. James G. McDonald.

The party in the box of the Brooklyn Woman's Club included Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Oliver Goldsmith Carter, Mrs. George Hills Tier and Mrs. R. S. Vossler.

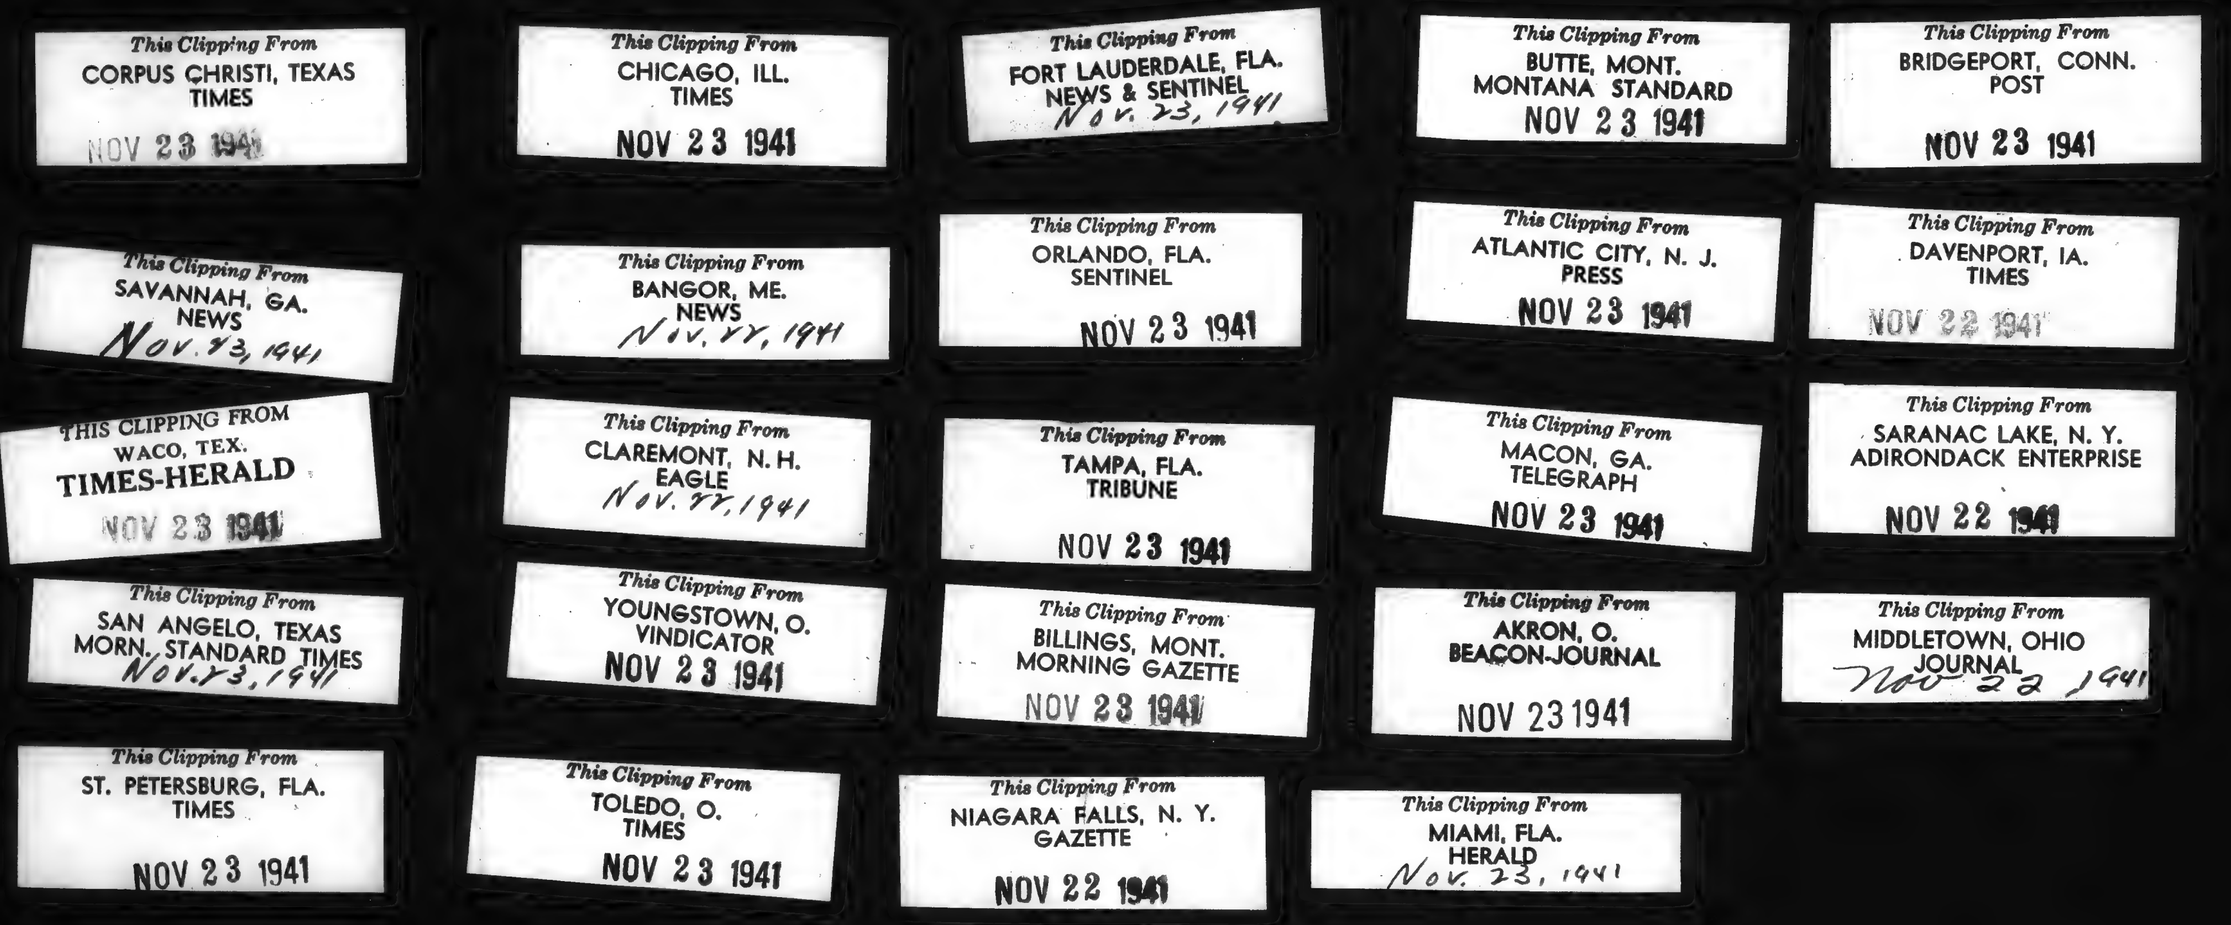
In box No. 5 the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy was represented by Mr. and Mrs. William B. Parker, Mr. and Mrs. Luman B. Wing, Miss Emma Jessie Ogg, Miss Rosalie B. Parker and Miss Gwendolyn Glass.

In box 6 Mrs. Thomas Lauderdale entertained for Mr. and Mrs. William V. Laurino, Mr. and Mrs. James M. Currie and Mr. and Mrs. George W. Felter.

Admiral E. J. Marquart, commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and his party occupied box No. 8, and students from Packer Collegiate Institute, the Brooklyn Friends School and Polytechnic Preparatory Country Day School were in boxes Nos. 7, 9 and 11.

This concert was the first of the series of five Boston Symphony concerts to be given here during the season under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry Joralemon Davenport executive chairman.

A review of the program, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be found in another section of this edition of "The Brooklyn Citizen."



This Clipping From
CORPUS CHRISTI, TEXAS
TIMES
NOV 23 1941

This Clipping From CHICAGO, ILL.
TIMES
NOV 23 1941

This Clipping From
FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.
NEWS & SENTINEL
Nov. 23, 1941

This Clipping From BUTTE, MONT.
MONTANA STANDARD
NOV 23 1941

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
NOV 23 1941

This Clipping From SAVANNAH, GA.
NEWS
Nov. 23, 1941

This Clipping From
BANGOR, ME.
NEWS
Nov. 22, 1941

This Clipping From
ORLANDO, FLA.
SENTINEL
NOV 23 1941

This Clipping From
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS
NOV 23 1941

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IA.
TIMES
NOV 22 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM WACO, TEX.
TIMES-HERALD
NOV 23 1941

This Clipping From
CLAREMONT, N. H.
EAGLE
Nov. 22, 1941

This Clipping From
TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE
NOV 23 1941

This Clipping From MACON, GA.
TELEGRAPH
NOV 23 1941

This Clipping From
SARANAC LAKE, N. Y.
ADIRONDACK ENTERPRISE
NOV 22 1941

This Clipping From
SAN ANGELO, TEXAS
MORN. STANDARD TIMES
Nov. 23, 1941

This Clipping From
YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR
NOV 23 1941

This Clipping From
BILLINGS, MONT.
MORNING GAZETTE
NOV 23 1941

This Clipping From
AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
NOV 23 1941

This Clipping From MIDDLETOWN, OHIO
JOURNAL
Nov 22 1941

This Clipping From
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
TIMES
NOV 23 1941

This Clipping From TOLEDO, O.
TIMES
NOV 23 1941

This Clipping From
NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE
NOV 22 1941

This Clipping From MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD
Nov. 23, 1941

REVIVE DVORAK AT SYMPHONY

Refreshing Programme Wins Cheers

Post Nov 1

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday's Symphony concert, devoted to the music of Dvorak, who was born Sept. 8, 1841, proved, in this listener's humble opinion, the most consistently enjoyable of the season; nor was this reaction wholly expected. One item on the programme, the symphony "From the New World," was inescapable. For the others Dr. Koussevitzky's choice fell upon the "Carnival" Overture, which seems to be the most enduring of the Bohemian composer's works in that form, and the Violin Concerto, in which Ruth Posselt was the soloist.

Unfamiliar music from the 19th century or the early 20th is getting to be a positive treat at Symphony Hall, where the programmes run chiefly to war horses and contemporary novelties. Into this welcome class fell both overture and concerto. The one had not been played at a Symphony concert since 1923 and the last two performances of the others were in 1919 and 1936. Some of the Overture comes pretty close to being empty din, albeit a cheerful din, and the gentleman with the cymbals earned his money. But there are relieving passages in Dvorak's pleasantly melodious vein.

The Concerto is naturally more of a piece—and also a better piece—than this reviewer had remembered it to be. There are those who claim that Dvorak sold his birthright when he ceased being a composer of Slavonic rhapsodies and dances and went academic in the manner of Brahms. The suggestion of watered Brahms is present in this Concerto, particularly in the first movement. The Adagio and Finale, however, are full of charm and a charm that may well be described as Dvorak's own. It is good to hear a good tune, of which one has not wearied, and these two movements abound in them.

The performance itself could hardly have been better. Miss Posselt, who as the wife of Concert Master Richard Burgin is now a sort of in-law of the orchestra, learned this Concerto under the tutelage of Emanuel Ondricek of this city, and Mr. Ondricek's brother Franz was the soloist at the first performance in Prague in 1883. Miss Posselt's style had thus every reason to be correct, and it was; while the orchestral performance, like that of the "New World" Symphony, was of exceptional eloquence and of rare tonal beauty. Cheers were plentifully mingled with the applause that returned the deserving Miss Posselt and the beaming Dr. Koussevitzky several times to the platform.

This occasion might have led the conductor to revive one of the other symphonies of Dvorak, which are now unknown hereabouts. Had he done so, many in the audience would have regretted the absence from his list of the popular "New World." If the other four are unknown this Fifth in E Minor may easily be described as hackneyed. It was made to live again in yesterday's inspired performance.

LOURIE'S WORK WELL RECEIVED

Symphony Plays His "Kormtchaia"

Post Nov 8

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday the current Symphony Concerts offered their second novelty, the Second Symphony of Arthur Lourie, which bears the title "Kormtchaia," a Russian folk-term derived from a Greek liturgical verse, in which Mary is hailed as the "guiding mother" and which may mean "pilot" or "steersman," and may stand for the lode-star or even mother Russia, herself. The work has also a motto, taken from Michelangelo, "Remember that thou livest and go thy way." Yet the composer disavows any programme and explains that title and motto have only a "general significance."

Mr. Lourie, who was present yesterday to acknowledge exceedingly cordial applause, is the author of "Serge Koussevitzky and His Epoch." As composer he has been represented here by a "Sonata Liturgique" and a "Sinfonia Dialectica," both of them singular compositions. And so is this "Kormtchaia." A prober into musical esthetics, Mr. Lourie has decided that traditional form is the bunk and that melody is all-important. His new Symphony hasn't much form. And it hasn't much melody, either, though it is not wholly devoid of that commodity.

The form, as it is, is that of a theme and variations, and like d'Indy in his "Istar," Mr. Lourie presents the theme in fragments first and welds these fragments together later, not, however, at th every end, as d'Indy does, but in the third of the nine variations. Much is made in an analysis by Fred Goldbeck, quoted in the programme-book, of this being a symphony in "seconds, fourths and thirds," a definition more likely to confuse than assist the listener, for there are plenty of other intervals in evidence.

The opening, after a chord of striking sound and sonority, is purposely vague, yet it immediately exerts a certain fascination by reason of its strange tonal properties. Later, in reference to the Michelangelo motto, much use is made of march rhythm. This, with a certain melodic obviousness—when there is melody—and a great deal of orchestral sound, had probably much to do with the warmth with which the music was received. But its apparent formlessness and its lack of variety (an odd fault for a piece in variation form) were also obstacles in the way of one anxious to make sense of the piece on a first hearing. Undoubtedly Mr. Lourie has something. But what?

As with the new Schuman Symphony of the second pair of concerts, Dr. Koussevitsky preceded this "Kormtchaia" with an 18th century symphony, Haydn's in B-flat, No. 102, and followed it with one from the 19th, the Fourth of Brahms. The Haydn is one of the better ones, but there are many others just as worthy that we are not permitted to hear, while this and No. 88 get perhaps more than their share of attention. This greatest of the Brahms symphonies is one of the most trusted of the conductor's steeds of battle. But his vigorous way with the first movement is not the only way with this autumnal music.

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER
NOV 23 1941

POSTPONED

Bohuslav Martinu, Czechoslovakian composer, finished his Concerto Grosso For Two Pianos in 1938, but the German invasion prevented the premiere. Twice more, as Martinu fled from country to country, the same thing happened.

Last April Martinu reached this country. The concerto was scheduled by the Boston Symphony, but was postponed again because there were no instrumental scores. Martinu worked seven months on the scores, finally heard his work played.

"It sounded just as I thought it would," he said after taking three bows.

MUSIC

Boston Herald Nov 1, 1941

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 4th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Ruth Posselt, violinist, was the soloist. The program, in commemoration of the Dvorak centenary, was as follows:

Overture, "Carnival" Op. 92.....Dvorak
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in A. minor Op. 53.....Dvorak
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, "From the New World," Op. 95.....Dvorak

Memorial concerts are apt to be on the tedious side, if only because it can be mentally tiring to hear the music of only one composer. A way round this issue is to play someone else's music and label it "In Memoriam." The Chicago Orchestra once carried this shift to peculiar lengths when it drew attention to the death of Ravel by playing Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." We can guess that the shade of Ravel, wherever it was, did some fancy convolutions at this news.

Dvorak, it might be hazarded, is not one of those composers who can stand a whole program to themselves. Yet we doubt if many in the audience felt that yesterday's concert was dull. This was in part due to the brilliance and perfection of Miss Posselt's playing and in part to some exciting performances by the Boston Symphony and Mr. Koussevitzky.

We own to having wished that Mr. Koussevitzky might have seen fit to play something less well known by Dvorak. The first three symphonies, for example, are hardly known at all. Yet such an authority as Tovey has praised them to the skies. The "New World" is played too much; and surely this was the time, if ever, to look about and revive something less familiar. Mr. Koussevitzky is not usually so hidebound, and we had expected a little more initiative from him when confronted with the Dvorak centenary.

According to its lights, though, the concert was satisfactory. Mr. Koussevitzky faces squarely up to the problem of the hackneyed "New World" Largo. That he does so by presenting it more slowly and solemnly than you could believe possible is perhaps not much consolation. Still, the pretense that this is the supreme moment in music is rather impressive. We have always wished that a conductor would consent to stop the Symphony with the delightful scherzo. The finale is not much. We have had enough of the old themes, and there is not much to be said one way or another for the new.

Miss Posselt is an amazingly facile and capable musician and she is also a violinist of first rate authority and taste. Her performance did all that could be done for a concerto that is really fine only in the finale. There was an ovation for her at the end.

Mr. Koussevitzky certainly went through the "Carnival" Overture with all the speed and flash of a stream-lined zephyr. It was an astonishing performance, pointed up to the last pinnacle of orchestral brilliance.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the program is as follows: Haydn's Symphony in B flat No. 102; Arthur Lourie's "Kormtchaia," Symphony No. 2; Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor.

Globe MUSIC Nov. 1

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid their respects yesterday afternoon to the Centenary of the Bohemian composer, Antonin Dvorak, who was born Sept. 8, 1841. The program was given over to Dvorak, and consisted of the "Carnival" Overture; the Violin Concerto, with Ruth Posselt as soloist, and the "New World" Symphony.

In prospect the program might have seemed too much of a muchness, the more so because Dvorak has not really been popular with concertgoers for some years. A few tunes have survived—the Largo from the "New World" Symphony, "Songs My Mother Taught Me" and some of the Slavonic dances; otherwise the once overplayed Bohemian has fast been receding into the pages of musical history books. Yesterday's concert turned out to be most enjoyable, both for the music and the manner in which it was played.

When you come right down to it, symphony orchestra publics hear far, far too small a repertory. Beethoven, Brahms, Franck and Tchaikovsky; you hear them over again, year after year. Without doubt it was good to hear Dvorak, because his music has begun to revert to comparative unfamiliarity. Not that Dvorak was a great composer in the sense that he had a formidable intellect or that he possessed the universality of Mozart or Beethoven. Yet there is no need to apologize for a man with fine melodic invention and superb technic. The idea that we ought to live on musical masterpieces all the time is wrong. There are only so many masterpieces, and when they become too familiar we are prone to underestimate them.

Dvorak's melodic sense, his instinct for color of harmony and orchestration, run through overture, concerto and symphony. Each is "well-made," showing the certain hand of a craftsman who expressed himself easily, according to his nature. For Dvorak there were no problems of baring a tormented soul in his art. He was not erudite or an innovator. His music exists simply as a form of beauty. He must have been, next to Schubert, one of the most natural and simple composers in the history of the art.

Miss Posselt gave a fine account of the Violin Concerto, a performance both musicianly and virtuoso. The slow movement, with its wealth of lyricism, she played with perfect taste and style. If there were certain roughnesses of tone in the heat of the finale, they were a pardonable and minor shortcoming. The audience realized the quality of her performance, for they rewarded Miss Posselt with applause of the most cordial sort.

The proverbial magnificence of tone associated with Boston's orchestra was on exhibition the afternoon through. While he emphasized the brilliance of the Overture, Mr. Koussevitzky did not overdramatize the "New World" Symphony.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8:15. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky will play: Haydn: Symphony in B flat, No. 102; Lourie; "Kormtchaia," Symphony No. 2 (first performances); Brahms: Fourth Symphony.

C. W. D.

MUSIC

Herald Nov 8

26

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The fifth regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Haydn.....Symphony in B flat No. 102
Lourie.....Symphony No. 2, "Kormtchaia"
Brahms.....Symphony No. 4 in E minor Op. 98

Three symphonies again made up a Boston Symphony program as they did at the second pair of concerts. Once again two classics flanked a modern work, a first performance anywhere, as a matter of fact. And again, to conclude the analogy, the program was thoroughly satisfactory—Haydn in place of Mozart, Arthur Lourie instead of William Schuman and Brahms for climax in place of Tchaikovsky.

The occasion for the first performance of Mr. Lourie's new work let the patrons in for a weighty and abstruse lecture in the program book by Fred Goldbeck. Mr. Goldbeck is one of the editors of the Revue Musicale, a learned French publication now, we suppose, no more. Thus his analysis of the new work is undoubtedly worth reading, but we imagine that it also confused the audience in several particulars. However enlightening as to the music's unusual form, Mr. Goldbeck's "tall talking" must have terrified a good many of the subscribers and induced others to read it in a bemused fashion when they might better have been using their ears. There is something to be said for certain composers' theory that there should never be any program notes at a concert.

Mr. Lourie's score seemed to us yesterday an original and stimulating work. Whether it would still be so after further performances we seriously doubt. It is a refreshing work on such a program as this, startling the audience by its dissonance and giving it mentally something to chew on.

We are prepared to take on faith Mr. Goldbeck's high estimation of the Symphony's intellectual content. Most composers today are pretty learned fellows and would put to shame a Brahms or a Schubert with their bookishness. For a time this erudition so intoxicated them that many of them wrote what the Germans call "Augenmusik," which was most rewarding in the study and not at all in the concert hall. Possibly you will recall such a score in Ernest Krenek's Piano Concerto which he played here a few years ago and which he also introduced with a solemn lecture.

Mr. Lourie's is a great deal better music than that, and he, moreover, is obviously deeply interested in the sound of his music, for he produces some wildly fascinating sounds. It is not, then, the intellectual scheme which gets in his way and prevents this Symphony from being first rate music. Undoubtedly his system of ostinato bass and accompaniment or background ends in being monotonous. In brief, it is original and strikingly queer music, but neither emotionally or spiritually of great significance nor, on the other hand, straightforwardly effective.

It is an interesting work to have heard, at any rate, and one to which it is not easy to do justice in a review. But, conversely, neither does the cerebral analysis of Mr. Goldbeck. The work seemed to get an intense and thoroughly vital performance by the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky, and it was cordially received by the audience, who brought the composer several times out on the platform.

This Haydn Symphony is one of the eternal joys of music. Specifically it always amazes by the mysterious and almost romantic introductory largo, by the serenely lovely adagio and by the deliciously saucy finale. It had a marvelous performance by the orchestra, for Mr. Koussevitzky is always especially good with Haydn and Mozart. We do not imagine that the public needs at this date any comment by us on Brahms' greatest Symphony. It is sufficient that its grandeur was fully presented yesterday for all to hear and admire.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the program is as follows: Beethoven's 6th Symphony; Martinu's Concerto Grosso; Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
NOV 24 1941

NEW AMERICAN SYMPHONY PLAYED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

By Edward O'Gorman

Magnificent is not too strong a word for the performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony given by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall Saturday. Neat, sensitive and refined will do for Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," and adequate for the first local performance of a Symphony No. 3 by William Schuman, the young American composer.

Returning to Carnegie Hall after a Thursday evening performance that had had its disappointments, Dr. Koussevitzky turned out a "Pathetique" symphony that left a deeply moved audience with an irrepressible desire to applaud after the march, where convention says no, and a reluctance to make any disturbing sound after the final morendo measures of the last movement, where, after a breathless and noticeably prolonged struggle, convention won, and a fine illusion was shattered.

It was a performance that could not have been bettered in any way. There was a feeling of completeness, and a sense of rightness in its tempos and in the thoughtful unfolding of the various sections that I had never before encountered. As for the parts of the symphony responsible for its title: well, they were touching, but there were no tears.

The new Schuman symphony leaves the impression of a singular and experimental job successfully accomplished. It is not a symphony in the strict sense; it is in two sections, the first comprising a passacaglia and fugue, the second a chorale and toccata; and it is faithful to these forms in construction only, not in spirit. For my taste, which they tell me is finicky, there is an excessive use of canon-ading, a deadly device.

It is an inordinately heavy, almost belligerent score. Mr. Schuman has eschewed the more tender emotions. But it is orderly blood and thunder throughout, and is composed with such skill and imagination, and scored (for all its heaviness) with such clarity, that the listener is impressed more by the vitality that Mr. Schuman has than by the variety of expression he lacks.

27

Christian Science Monitor - Nov 8, 1941

New Symphony by Lourie Heard

By L. A. Sloper

The central item of Dr. Koussevitzky's program for the fifth pair of Boston Symphony concerts (Nov. 7-8) was Arthur Lourié's Symphony No. 2, labelled "Kórmtchaia," which had its first performance yesterday afternoon. The program also listed Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102, and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

From Mr. Lourié's pen we had previously heard a "Sonate Liturgique," for small wind orchestra and alto chorus, and a "Sinfonia Dialectica." The composer, who is also the biographer of Dr. Koussevitzky, is a Russian and was once a Soviet Commissar, but in 1923 he went to Paris and, we are informed by the program notes, his name is now "unmentioned in print, nor does it exist, so far as present Russia is concerned."

Mr. Lourié is known for his intellectualism, and for his preoccupation with the early liturgical music of the Roman Catholic Church. Both these qualities were observable in the two compositions of his heard previously in Boston. They are evident also in this latest. But in this latest there is also a greater musical interest.

* * *

The work is, like so many of its contemporaries, a "symphony" in name only, if we are to judge it by classical standards. Actually it is a seris of variations—not, we are hastily reminded by a French analyst quoted in the program book, on a theme, but on "the 'intonation of intervals,'" and the variations are "modulated and cadenced, not by the 'natural' play of 'dominants and tonics,' manifest or latent, but by a harmonic mechanism very different and very novel, based on unaccustomed use of dissonances. The function of these dissonances is neither to 'spice' nor fix the tonality in the classical manner. They are in the shape of a 'false bass' or other apparently foreign addition to the tonal environment, becoming a 'contrasting background' against which the melody stands with greater precision."

The prospective concertgoer should not be discouraged by these notes, for the music is easier to follow than the explanation. It even has tunes, remindful of Moussorgsky, and rhythms which certainly recall Stravinsky. It is Russian music, with a liturgical atmosphere. The opening motto is in the nature of plain-chant, and the variations disguise it with contrasted, often pleasing, and almost always interesting forms.

There is perhaps less that is novel in the work than the program notes quoted would suggest. Whatever name is given to the introductory group of notes, it is still a motive; the difference is that it has no definite tonality, but there is nothing new about that. Neither is there anything new about the building up of a theme from scraps; it has been done for example by D'Indy and by Sibelius.

* * *

No; it would be better to disregard these intellectual dissertations and follow the advice of Professor Tovey about Haydn, to the effect that the only way to get his sense of form "is to listen naïvely to the music, with expectation directed mainly to its sense of movement."

Yet as we listened naïvely to the particular symphony of Haydn's that was played yesterday, we did not feel that we were getting everything from it that we might have got. It was performed by an orchestra reduced as to its double-basses but not, apparently, as to its other strings; and it was treated as a vehicle for virtuosity rather than as a musical composition. The performance was of course extraordinary; but it was lacking in grace. The tonal volume was too great, the accents were too heavy, and the pace at which the Finale was taken was so amazing a tour de force that it drove all thought of the music from the mind.

Globe MUSIC Nov 8

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Arthur Lourie's Second Symphony, given first performance by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, is music of abstruse character and somewhat mixed idiom. The Symphony came in the middle of a program whose first part was given to Haydn's B-flat Symphony, No. 104, and whose conclusion was the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

"Sentence first, verdict afterwards," said the Red Queen at the trial of the Mad Hatter. Of Mr. Lourie's work, one might say: read the program notes first and listen afterward. For one is frank to admit he would have had no idea of what the composer intended unless he had been informed beforehand. Mr. Lourie believes that form must change, and that the definition of the word symphony is not limited by the rules of the conventional sonata-allegro form like that of Beethoven. He's right on that score, and not the first to think of it. Schumann broke away, Franck, D'Indy and the apostles of "cyclical" form went even further, and Sibelius evolved his own form, starting with his Second Symphony.

Lourie's Second Symphony, therefore, is cast in an individual form. Melodic themes and development have no place; instead the thematic basis consists of three intervals, and the single movement of about 20 minutes' length runs through 10 variations upon "the intonation of interviews." Sounds abstruse, doesn't it? Well, it is. While the idea is ingenious, worthy of respectful attention, what of the music? Lourie's idiom can take in free, unrelieved dissonance, and dissonance used as background for an independent melody. It can include marches with swinging tunes, a nice muted trumpet solo, and certain devices which remind one of incidental scores for the theatre written by American musicians.

After Lourie's formal design has been understood, after one has noted a comparative lack of motion and counterpoint, and after it has been recognized that the orchestration is fussy, demanding upon the players and in part superficially reminiscent of Mahler, the fact remains that the Symphony is largely brain music. I would like to hear it again, until it has become thoroughly familiar. But will it seem any more original, any more provocative or moving than it did yesterday? Doubt persists.

As a footnote one should add that the title "Kormtchaia" which Lourie uses, may have symbolical intent not clear at the moment. The word is from the Russian liturgy and refers to the divine guidance of Mary.

Mr. Lourie heard yesterday's performance and bowed from the stage. He and the work were well received. Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra had given of their best in preparing the score.

Haydn of the Symphony No. 104 (ninth in the series written for the London impressario, Salomon) fared very well. The performance was brisk, clear, precise and of splendid tone. Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of the Brahms Fourth is dramatic rather than poetic, an interpretation certain to bring out the heroic proportions of the Passacaglia. At the end there was applause, thoroughly merited, of utmost enthusiasm.

The program for next week: Beethoven, "Pastoral" Symphony; Martinu, Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra (first performances); Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel." — C. W. D.

Music

11/18/41 Thursday Evening Post

Boston Orchestra Heard at Bushnell

BY CARL E. LINDSTROM

The first half of last night's concert was just the second event in the Bushnell series; after the intermission it was a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with all that the words imply.

It is not easy to sum up the distinctions that subtly set this group apart from all others. Some have to do with the players, such as coordination among the choirs, individual virtuosity and sharply contrasted planes of orchestral coloring; others grow out of the leader such as a certain dramatization of the various elements and a flair for the spectacular which inheres to most Koussevitzky interpretations.

The "Romeo and Juliet" ballet suite of Prokofieff and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" had the benefit of Koussevitzky interpretations. Dvorak's "New World" Symphony was conducted by the revered leader for no better reason than the one that a hundred years ago in Bohemia, Antonin Dvorak was born, an implicit blessing, just as his E minor symphony is implicitly good and requires no anniversary to occasion its performance.

A Prokofieff Ballet

The Romeo and Juliet music is best appreciated apart from its literary connotations. The dissonantal opening period is repeated — though in a different tonality, if memory serves — a practice which is recommended to modern composers who complain that their works get only a single hearing.

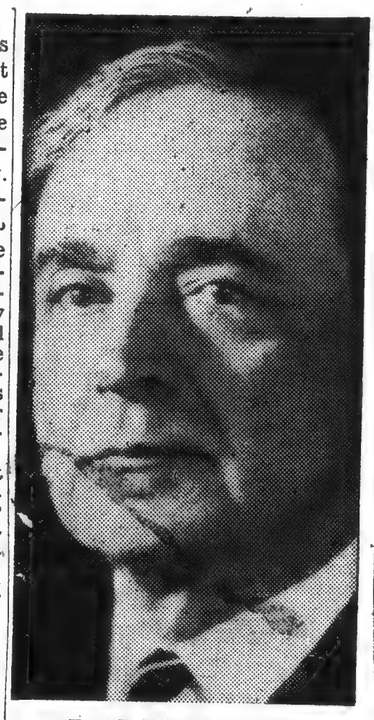
There is nothing particularly forbidding in Prokofieff's score. Descriptions of the ballet would seem to explain the innocuous character of the sections entitled "Juliet," "Dance," and even Romeo's clamant threnody at the grave of a Juliet who is really not dead at all. But we agreed to forget the meanings of this music. Actually it examples once again Prokofieff's melodic or thematic fertility, his piquant counterpoint, and less specifically but more importantly his gift for giving his compositions a savor and quite an individual one at that.

A visitor from another planet would never have guessed that 60 of the most momentous years in musical history separated the Prokofieff and Moussorgsky compositions. Of course, the modernity of Moussorgsky is an old story and so is Ravel's orchestration of this graphic music. But this is the kind of thing that is the most viable to Dr. Koussevitzky's hands.

Gates of Kiev

The course of events in the Russian campaign made it inevitable that this suite with its magnificent climax apostrophizing the Gates of Kiev would reach the concert hall with increasing frequency. It is arresting music. The vivid portrayal of the ballet chicks, the overpowering effect of the brass choir in the Catacombs and the fantastic sketches of the gnome and the witch are unforgettable as Koussevitzky limned them with his master players. If the first trumpet fluffed a note in the opening Promenade, he more than redeemed himself in the character piece, "Samuel Goldenburg and Schmuyle."

It has been so often repeated that Dvorak's "American" music turned out to be merely a Europeanized version of Negro and Indian themes that it may be no use to point out that his "New World" Symphony has an inherent freshness that endures to this day. It is one of those symphonies that play themselves and if this one is permitted to play itself, it can have a good deal of the Kansas prairie about it, in spite of the European academy and broken English.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

I don't think Dr. Koussevitzky had quite made up his mind about the Dvorak Symphony. There were only two details that attested a Koussevitzky "interpretation"—the pianissimo of the pizzicato bass so insubstantial and yet so pervasive that instead of approaching the ear directly it seemed to steal up from behind—and secondly, the quickened tempo of the slow movement. That was an improvement. Dr. Koussevitzky set the beat at what might be called Larghetto and indeed that is the way the program described the second movement. Dvorak marked it Largo. Who changed it?

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
NOV 23 1941

Boston Symphony To Play At Mosque

The Boston Symphony Orchestra annual visit to Pittsburgh is always a high-light of the musical season. The works to be given by Dr. Koussevitzky and his celebrated Boston players indicate wide-spread interest in both the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts at Syria Mosque. The program for Saturday night, Dec. 13:

Mozart ..... Haffner Symphony
William Schuman ..... Third Symphony
Tschaikowsky ..... Pathetique Symphony

Sunday afternoon:

Ravel ..... Tombeau de Couperin
Prokofieff ..... Romeo and Juliet Suite
Strauss ..... Till Eulenspiegel
Brahms ..... Fourth Symphony

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 23 1941

Orchestral Programs In Some Other Cities

Koussevitzky Adds Two Works to His Repertoire

Returning to Symphony Hall after its first New York visit of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its program for next Friday afternoon and Saturday night with Respighi's suite, "The Birds." This, and Lekeu's adagio for strings are new to these concerts. Serge Koussevitzky completes the list with Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" and the Franck symphony.

Two American works, Robert O. Barkley's "Sunday Evening in Bloomfield" and Robert W. Wilkes's "Twilight Dream," will be played this afternoon by the National Symphony of Washington, under Hans Kindler. On Wednesday night, when Richard Crooks is the soloist, Walter Piston's suite from "The Incredible Flutist" will be introduced to the capital. Henri Temianka will play the Beethoven violin concerto with the Pittsburgh Symphony under Fritz Reiner this afternoon, and Sergei Rachmaninoff will play the Schumann concerto and his own Paganini Variations next Friday night and Sunday afternoon in this series.

Under Rudolph Ringwall, the Cleveland Orchestra will devote its program for Thursday and Saturday nights mainly to Mozart and Dvorak, with Donald Dickson, barytone, as soloist. Reginald Stewart, as pianist, will be the soloist with the Chicago Symphony on Tuesday, and Isaac Stern, violinist, will be heard on Thursday and Friday with Hans Lange conducting.

Hitler Can't Stop This Performance

Czech Composer, Dogged by Nazi Army, to Hear Work Played in Boston

BOSTON (AP)—After fleeing across most of Europe only a jump or two ahead of Hitler's armies, Bohaslav Martinu, one of Europe's outstanding contemporary composers, apparently is going to hear at last his concerto grosso for two pianos.

The refugee Czech has been trying to obtain a first hearing for the work ever since he wrote it in 1937. A combination of bad breaks—usually in the form of the German army—already has canceled four premiere performances.

Tomorrow, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are scheduled to make a fifth attempt to give this "fugitive concerto" a performance—and Martinu still has his fingers crossed.

The work was first due to be performed in Paris in the Spring of 1938, but was canceled when Hitler's armies marched into Austria and closed that country's frontiers, thus preventing the publishers in Vienna from forwarding the score to Paris.

A second premiere was scheduled in Prague in December, 1938, but the Germans, moving in after the pact of Munich in September, ruled Martinu's music "verboten" so chance No. 2 went out.

Their invasion of France likewise forced cancellation of a third attempt set for Paris in May of 1940 after the score had been safely received and the auditorium paid for.

New Kind of Trouble

When Martinu finally reached this country last April (he quit Paris three days before the Germans moved in), he learned that Koussevitzky had been favorably impressed with the concerto after studying a master copy forwarded to him by another Czech musician, Georg Szell, and had decided to play it that Spring.

But this premiere was called off, too, when the orchestra's librarian couldn't obtain the instrumental parts.

This Clipping From
BANGOR, ME.
NEWS
Nov 13 1941

This Clipping From ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD-NEWS
Nov 13 1941

This Clipping From UTICA, N.Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS
Nov 13 1941

This Clipping From
BINGHAMPTON, N. Y.
PRESS
Nov 13 1941

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
Nov 13 1941

This Clipping From TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD
NOV 15 1941

This Clipping From
DAYTONA BEACH, FLA.
EVENING NEWS
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
LYNCHBURG, VA.
ADVANCE
Nov 13 1941

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JOURNAL EVERY EVENING
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
Nov 13, 1941

This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
NOV 14 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
PETERSBURG, VA.
PROGRESS INDEX
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
NOV 13 1941

This Clipping From LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
Nov 15 1941

Ads Nov 23

Defauw to Conduct at Symphony

DESIRE DEFAUW, distinguished Belgian conductor, who will appear as guest with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

DESIRE DEFAUW, the Belgian conductor, will be the guest of the week at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will appear as conductor on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next in Symphony Hall.

Defauw, born in Ghent, Belgium, began his career as a violin virtuoso. He came to America in the season of 1939-1940 and again last season, having taken flight from his country. Besides conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, he has appeared as guest over several orchestras in this country and Canada.

TWO Belgian composers will figure upon his coming program. The Symphony of Cesar Franck will be the closing number. Franck's talented pupil, Guillaume Lekeu, a musician of great promise whose life was cut short in 1894 by typhoid fever on the day after his twenty-fourth birthday will be represented by his Adagio for string orchestra. The concert will open with Respighi's Suite for small orchestra, "The Birds." The suite is based upon clavier pieces of the Seventeenth Century which were titled after various birds according to the fashion of the time. "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Paul Dukas stands also upon the program.

This Clipping From
TUCSON, ARIZ.
STAR
NOV 23 194

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first visit to New York of the season this past week, playing in Carnegie hall Thursday and Saturday under the baton of its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Friday the orchestra played in the Brooklyn Academy.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
NOV 23 1941

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OFFERS NEW WORK

Third Symphony of William Schumann Called Best Number by Young American

KOUSSEVITZKY CONDUCTOR

Ravel's 'Tombeau de Couperin,' Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetique' on Program at Carnegie

By OLIN DOWNES

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall introduced to the public of this city the Third Symphony of young Mr. William Schumann, a symphony which, for this chronicler, takes the position of the best work by an American of the rising generation that he has heard.

The score may have a stronger position than that when American music of the last two decades falls into a longer perspective and when we become more familiar with the details of what we heard yesterday. For the present let there be recorded the opinion that this symphony is full of talent and vitality, from first to last, and that it is done with an exuberance and conviction on the part of the composer that carry straight over the footlights and sweep the listener along in their train.

It is true that the cerebral element is omnipresent in Mr. Schumann's score, and that he cultivates what are essentially the methods of the contrapuntists of Europe of the eighteenth century and earlier; and that, for ourselves, we believe these methods will presently be outmoded and superseded by something freer and more direct in approach when our composers have really gotten out from under the still binding influence of foreign cultures. We don't believe, either, that Mr. Schumann will follow the path he now pursues when another decade has passed. What we believe is one thing, but we now are concerned with the fact of yesterday's music.

Aesthetics Are Argued

If we suggest that at some future time Mr. Schumann chuck his present aesthetics out of the window, he has every reason, by virtue of his own practical demonstration, to request that we throw ours through the curtains for the time being, and consider what he actually has done. And what he has done makes us aware again that neither methods, aesthetic systems or theories count for much if a composer has something to say.

What he has to say oozes through all the chinks and crannies of the counterpoint. And, furthermore, while contrapuntal technique, and the cerebral element, are much to the fore in this piece, there is also present the lyrical substance. There are vistas of harmonic as well as linear beauty. The old forms of canon, fughetta, passacaglia, toccata and whatever else you please of the ancient machinery of composition, are handled with exceptional and exhilarating flexibility. And there's laughter in it, too. And a technical advance over all recent scores of Mr. Schumann that we have heard, which goes very far toward setting him free.

Power and Wit in Climax

Perhaps the second part of the symphony is a little more episodic than the first, although in a sense it is even more interesting because of the fresh experiments made here, and the power and the wit, too, of the wind-up. And make no mistake; whatever the methods, this is no academism.

When Mr. Schumann's snare drum begins wickedly tapping the measure for what we can only term an intentionally insulting adoption of the toccata idea of more majestic times, and when he uses a fly-hitter or a baseball bat or some other contraption for rhythmic purposes as he nears his climax, it has the air of a form of bastinado applied by the Davidsbuendler to the more protuberant parts of the Philistines.

The audience, which jammed the hall, was delighted with this symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky brought Mr. Schumann repeatedly back to the stage as the applause continued. And Dr. Koussevitzky's performance was a thing which, we venture to say, the composer will remember in dreams as well as in his waking hours.

It was in all respects, as any one could judge at an initial hearing, a supremely eloquent and spirited projection of the music. But Mr. Schumann is not the only young American composer who has reason to be grateful for the singular intuition Koussevitzky shows when he is confronted by young talent, and his flaming enthusiasm in its cause.

Ravel Work Presented

The remainder of the concert consisted of another interpretation for which Koussevitzky and his men are famous—that of one of Ravel's most beautiful works, the suite, "Tombeau de Couperin." As a whole the suite was exquisitely played, if one excepts some queerly fast tempi, the fastest we ever heard Koussevitzky adopt in this place, so that in this respect he has given more satisfactory readings of this piece.

The Tchaikovsky "Pathetique" Symphony, which closed the program, made an overwhelming impression, although the nonsensical procedure which is now customarily followed, of refusing to allow the audience to applaud after the titanic march movement — when the applause broke out anyhow—and allowing them to applaud only at the end, after the final lamentation, when the audience should be asked to leave the hall without a sound, was adopted as usual. Turn we rather, in memory, to the searing intensity and greatness of the music. Hear it for the thousandth time; it only grows in the hearing.

And the sense of tragedy at the unluckily premature taking-off of Tchaikovsky, just when he had completed this symphony, also grows, because of the total originality, the humanity, the sheer simpicity and feeling and greatness of the first symphonic creation in which Tchaikovsky fully expressed his genius. What might the world have had from the man who left behind him at the age of 53 the "Pathetique"?

Nor was it inapropos of these times to play this symphony. When the delirious march, battle-drunk, earth-shaking, crashed to its end, one thought, "what nation believed it could ever defeat the people from whom that march came?" And the final elegy is for all mankind, all nations, all mortality. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation was unforgettable.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 23 1941

New Symphony Is Directed by Koussevitzky

Boston Orchestra Presents William Schuman Work at Carnegie Hall Concert

By Robert Lawrence

Thwarted ambition was the philosophic scheme of yesterday afternoon's magnificent concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. The stream of disillusionment ran consciously in the Sixth ("Pathetic") Symphony of Tchaikovsky which, for this writer, is a very great work. It inundated, without any awareness on the part of the composer, the Third Symphony of William Schuman, receiving a first performance here under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The symphony of Mr. Schuman, thirty-one-year-old New Yorker, is a gallery of counterpoint exercises on a gigantic scale. There are two formal parts to this work, each divided into two sections. Thus we have, as four separate movements, a Passacaglia, Fugue, Chorale and Toccata. A very large orchestra is employed.

To the composer's credit, it may be said that he orchestrates well. There was not a dull moment in his piece, from the standpoint of pure sound. His mastery of contrapuntal forms also proved remarkable. But his use of these forms breathed emotional sterility. Such a grasp of minutiae might have been of equal help in planning the layout of a bridge or a tunnel, but not in the writing of great music, which must come from the heart.

Mr. Schuman owns a superb rhythmical equipment. One had only to hear the subject of his fugue to recognize a composer who can accomplish anything he wants in the field of technique. But he has sought, in the Third Symphony, nothing beyond technique. The prevailing style is an admixture of Hindemith and Roy Harris. I must add that this judgment is merely my own opinion. The work received an ovation yesterday. In great part, the applause was a tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, who had given the score a stunning performance. Such selfless devotion to new music by a great orchestra can bring only the highest admiration.

There were moments in this symphony, as in portions of the Toccata, when Mr. Schuman forgot his contrapuntal mission and wrote harmonies of an ingratiating texture. But most of the time his melodic lines were ugly in themselves and forced in their junctures. This work, conceived on a tremendous scale, points to a fundamental weakness in our modern conservatory methods—the fostering of virtuosity without an accompanying demand that the musician look well within himself.

Beautiful playing marked Ravel's suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," which opened the program. And, save for one or two errors in the brass, the closing performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony was the climax of the afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky's approach to this work is too familiar to require much discussion at this point. But his probing grasp of its meaning, his ability to make it a new experience with every repeated hearing deserve whole-hearted praise.

This was ideal Tchaikovsky—full of sentiment, free-flowing, yet never crossing the border line of good taste. If only for such an achievement, yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be remembered.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 23 1941

Belgian Won Popularity with First Audience Here

Two Compositions by Compatriots Will Be on Tuesday Night Program, Including D-Minor Symphony of Franck

BY GEORGE Y. LOVERIDGE

A DISTINGUISHED refugee, Desire Defauw, of Belgium, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday night. He is the first of the two guest conductors for the Providence season. The other will be Bruno Walter.

Mr. Defauw appeared here last season in the same role, and aroused the audience to such enthusiasm that the management decided to send him again. He was once known as the "musical dictator" of Belgium. Now he does pretty well in the United States and Canada.

He is a small, vigorous man, about 55 years old, with plentiful hair more or less in the manner of the musician of caricature, and an authoritative bearing on the podium. He has definite notions about the effects he wants, and he can get them.

He brings to our attention on Tuesday two well-worn pieces and two not so familiar. One of the w-w-p's is the symphony in D minor by Franck, the only one he produced. It is about 50 years old and has had an active life, although it began unfavorably. It was played first by the orchestra of the Paris Conservatoire. The orchestra didn't like it. One of the audience, who was a professor at the Conservatoire, made a famous comment to Vincent D'Indy. "That a symphony?" he said contemptuously. "But my dear sir, who ever heard of writing for English horn in a symphony?"

However, its interesting melodies and the many-colored harmonic clothing of them have brought it to great popularity. It is in three movements.

Paul Dukas contributes to the program his "Sorcerer's Apprentice," a bit of comic music that has made the rounds any number of times. It relates the fable of the beginner in magic who learned his master's trick of turning a piece of wood into a servant but didn't learn how to turn the servant back into a piece of wood. So the servant kept carrying water until there was a roomful of it, and might have been carrying it yet if the magician had not returned and put things to rights.

Two short pieces fill out the required time. One is an adagio for string orchestra by Guillaume Lekeu; it is not particularly well known, but the WPA Symphony Orchestra has given listeners hereabouts an opportunity to hear it. Lekeu was one of Franck's pupils. He died young—at 24, of typhoid.

Respighi's "Gli Uccelli," or "The Birds," is the other shorter work. It is scored for small orchestra, and is in four sections, Prelude (after B. Pasquini); The Dove (after Jacques de Gallot); The Hen (after Jean-Phillipe Rameau); and The Nightingale (after an anonymous English composer).

Respighi took his themes from harpsichord pieces.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
NOV 24 1941

Busch and Serkin Excel Themselves

Koussevitzky Presents Schumann Symphony; Rodzinski Repeats Hindemith Music

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Ever since Adolf Busch and Rudolf Serkin first appeared in Town Hall to give their violin and piano sonata recitals, glowing accounts have been written about their performances. Theirs was the finest ensemble playing yet heard, and it was a joy and an inspiration to hear them. Playing for the New Friends of Music in Town Hall late yesterday afternoon, they not only lived up to expectation, they surpassed it. Those fortunate to be present or to tune in on the broadcast of Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata will long remember the exhilaration created by their marvelous performance.

Such unanimity of feeling and such penetrating insight into the very essence of the music on the part of both artists have made them play as one. That kind of ensemble is a rare achievement. It probably has been brought about by the fact that the right balance is attained because of Mr. Serkin's greatness as an ensemble player as well as a solo pianist. For it is the piano playing that cements the two parts together. The fact that Mr. Serkin may be the better executant is of secondary importance; the effect is created by the two effacing themselves in the interests of an artistic merger with the single thought of extracting all the music that a work will yield.

So it was that the Mozart Sonata in E Flat, K 380, expressed the true classical spirit; that the Beethoven Opus 47 glowed in the reflection of its inner beauty; that the Schubert Fantasie in C, Opus 159, spun its melodic spell. The audience broke into a series of ovations; so keyed up was it that the rule for refraining from applause between movements could not restrain the onrush of feeling engendered after the first movement of the Beethoven had been played.

New Symphony

Though the Frankenstein finale in itself might have built up an ovation for the composer present to take his bows, the reception accorded the first New York performance of William Howard Schumann's Third Symphony, given by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon was well earned. The symphony is actually a tremendous accomplishment in structure and sonority and in effect. How extensive its emotional content may be will undoubtedly reveal itself more pointedly on further hearings; on this occasion a powerful feeling of relentless energy and almost vehement purpose, which evolved step by step in the course of each of its two parts, registered unmistakably the impression that the composer had something to convey besides ingenious dexterity in architectural planning.

The designations of Passacaglia, Fugue, Chorale and Toccata, with a division in the middle, imply absorption with craftsmanship, and the parts are riveted together with the best contrapuntal tools. The opening theme is not ingratiating, but it is melodically sound; the Chorale theme has more appeal. In specifying the largest orchestra obtainable, Mr. Schumann is obviously painting on a large canvas; only thus can be built so thunderous a wallop at the end of the Toccata, which is intended for display. But this music is no barbaric yawp; it speaks of power held in restraint (of classical forms), of grandeur, of challenge. Indeed, it is a work that should and will be heard again.

Needless to say, the performance was an amazing one. During the remainder of the afternoon the orchestra was concerned with Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and the Tchaikowsky Sixth Symphony.

30

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 23 1941

Belgian Conductor Adds Brilliance to American Symphonic Stage

BY GEORGE LOVERIDGE

Desire Defauw is in these parts by grace of the Nazi invasion of Belgium, his native land.

He was conducting in Bologna, Italy, when the invasion began. He returned at once to Brussels but was forced to flee to France with his wife and son in the family's two automobiles.

In Paris, one of the cars was commandeered for war service, and Defauw had to give the other to a pilot in Bayonne for help in getting to England. Arturo Toscanini, a close friend, assisted in obtaining papers permitting him to come to America.

Defauw made an instant success as one of the more lively and electric conductors appearing before the American public. His physical stature is small, but his artistic stature is large and his reputation is increasing both here and in Canada.

He is one of the number who have the music so well in their memories that they can conduct without score. His authoritative work with the stick has won the admiration of performers and audiences alike.

Defauw conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence last season. He will appear in another guest performance on Tuesday evening. This series of photographs, taken by Martha Burnham, of Waban, Mass., a specialist in conductorial pictures by camera, brush and pen, show Defauw in rehearsal action. They throw light on the job of symphonic conducting in general, and in particular on the personality and technique of this great Belgian maestro.

1 . . . Mr. Defauw waits for the orchestra to settle down in its chairs. He is an affable man with a flashing smile but his first contact with the orchestra reveals only his grim determination to get the most out of the serious business of rehearsal.

2 . . . The orchestral score on the music stand is only a rehearsal adjunct to be looked at very rarely. Here Defauw faces the violas, with left ear cocked and both eyes concentrated upon the players to keep tabs on tonal balance with the rest of the orchestra.

3 . . . Besides almost military quality of leadership, Defauw has the spirit of a poet. His facial expression softening, he is now seen rejoicing in the tonal beauties rising from the orchestra as his left hand rises to signal increase in volume of tone.

4 . . . Driving power and dramatic fervor now come to the fore. They surge through Defauw literally to his fingertips. Observe the reflex in the tenseness of the left thumb. Also, one sees here one of the "tail" motions. Defauw resorts to to enhance his small stature.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
NOV 24 1941

31

Schuman Receives Greatest Ovation

His Third Symphony Arouses Enthusiasm at Local Premiere

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Thirty-one-year-old William Howard Schuman of New York came in for his greatest ovation to date in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony ran off a local premiere of his Third Symphony.

Mr. Schuman took several bows with the Boston batonist and shook hands all around. The audience's reaction might be ascribed to many causes. First and foremost, Mr. Schuman's music. Then, Mr. Koussevitzky's solid and sonorous reading. Finally, a sharpening interest in homegrown symphonic talent. Serious American music is definitely looking up.

The Symphony is Mr. Schuman's best, omitting from consideration the Fourth, recently completed but still awaiting performance. More so than previous works, it joins absolute formal grasp and personal power in a compact unit of expression. Mr. Schuman's flair for coining idiom and giving rhythms new twists also finds wide scope here.

* * *

Disciplined, Yet Modern.

The Third Symphony is a fully mature manifesto of creative method. Formal logic and pattern, carried out with firm control of technical means, are Mr. Schuman's forte. Through them, aided by funds of color and contrast, he voices vital ideas.

The work moves freely in the classic grooves of passacagalia, fugue and toccata to develop themes with artistic force. Of course, the risk today is that an old form may turn into a strait jacket instead of a pair of wings. Control rather than restriction is the idea. Mr. Schuman fuses classic discipline and frank modernism without selling out to either.

That is, his mastery of design is basic to his musical thinking. The thoughts belong to him and the age. Far from crippling contrapuntal molds, he reshapes them to novel purpose, but only as the logic of new thinking compels him.

* * *

Passacagalia-Fugue Section.

The Passacagalia-Fugue section making up the first of the symphony's two parts certainly ranks with the best products of America's symphonic mill. Mr. Schuman's is only one of many sturdy young talents forging ahead on a new momentum. America is plainly making fast stride toward top billing in future repertories.

Saturday's concert also took down two standard items from the Boston's mounting bookcase of classics—Ravel's Tombeau de Couperin and Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony. Tonally, the orchestra, was in holiday dress all afternoon. When isn't it?

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
NOV 24 1941

An American Gets A Break for Once

By HENRY SIMON

The orchestral season is now some six weeks old, but it wasn't till Saturday afternoon that a major symphony band presented a new, full-length ambitious work by an American composer. This despite the many managerial protestations in favor of local talent.

Serge Koussevitzky was the conductor to lift the blight, his Boston Symphony was the orchestra, and the composition was William Schuman's Third Symphony. If Mr. Schuman's symphony is a fair sample of American work that remains unplayed, our conductors are fools not to do more of it.

For there can be no doubt about its effectiveness or its success with the audience. Mr. Schuman, who isn't far past 30, knows his way about the staves of a score. When he calls upon the full orchestra to play for all it's worth—even demanding some unusual noises from the battery—he doesn't do it because he thinks: "Look—I've got a hundred men and must show I can make 'em work up effects." He does it because he has built up his tunes against each other in such an exciting and logical way that the orchestra must play full-throatedly there. A piano, an organ or even a chorus wouldn't be enough. This is idiomatic writing for a modern symphony orchestra and for nothing else.

So it is with his harmonies. Mr. Schuman uses thoroughly modern harmonies, but he has gone way past the point when he thinks that because he is writing in the 20th century he must be cacophonous. For example, the symphony ends (if my ears heard correctly) on three chords played simultaneously in three different keys. He got to that conclusion not because he wanted to startle anyone but because the many-voiced final movement logically ends that way. It is a completely satisfying dischord.

Is it great music? I don't know. You can't tell about those things, especially not after a single hearing. I didn't, for example, take much to the themes: they are angular, full of uncomfortable intervals, and hard to whistle or remember. I like music that sings more. But maybe we'll catch up with Mr. Schuman's idea of a tune and learn to whistle it; or maybe his next symphony will respect our limitations. I do know, though, that I heard very good American music on Saturday afternoon and that I'd like to hear more of the same.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES
NOV 30 1941

Museum Lists Concert For Its Members

Boston Symphony Gives Annual Program Dec. 11

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will present the annual concert for members of the Toledo Museum of Art Thursday evening, Dec. 11, at 8:30 o'clock, it was announced today. Invitations have been sent to members of the museum, who may also purchase extra admissions for guests. There will be no public sale of tickets.

Inaugurated in 1933 at the time of the dedication of the peristyle, the annual members' concert has been the outstanding event of each year.

The dedication concerts brought the Philadelphia orchestra, Stokowski conducting; the next season's members' concert was presented by the Chicago Symphony orchestra; the succeeding four years' concerts were given by the Boston Symphony; in 1939 the New York Philharmonic-Symphony; and in 1940 the Boston Symphony returned.

Membership to the museum is available to every interested person. Among the privileges of membership are the receipt of the Museum News, a quarterly publication; the weekly bulletin; invitations to previews of exhibitions; free admittance to any exhibition for which a charge is made; and two complimentary tickets for the annual members' concert. Information concerning membership may be obtained by calling the membership secretary, concert office, Toledo Museum of Art.

Mozart Memorial Concerts

Boston Sunday American
Nov. 30, 1941

Honoring the 150th anniversary of the death of Mozart, the date of which is next Friday, Dec. 5, Serge Koussevitzky will feature the music of this master at each of the four concerts which are to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall in the week to come. The second concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series will take place tomorrow and Tuesday, at which Frances Nash, the pianist, will be the soloist, and the eighth regular pair of concerts will take place Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with Antonio Brosa, the Spanish violinist, making his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At this pair of concerts excerpts from Mozart's Requiem Mass will be performed, the Cecilia Society Chorus, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, combining with the orchestra. The movements to be played are: Requiem, Dies Irae, Rex Tremendae, Confutatis, Lacrimosa, Cum Sanctis Tuis. The "Jupiter" Symphony in C major will also be played, and the Violin Concerto in D major, K. No. 218, by Antonio Brosa and the orchestra.

The program for the Monday and Tuesday concerts will consist of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, the so-called "Coronation" Concerto for Piano, K. No. 537, which has not been performed before by this orchestra, and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, the "Pathetique."

This Clipping From
CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 29 1941

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra crept into Carnegie Hall with a premiere of William Schuman's third symphony. Here is a case of melodic style and no melody in sight. Brilliantly scored and structurally sound, it still lacks the germ of eloquence. There is really nothing said and no apparent reason to say it.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
NOV 27 1941

Koussevitzky Will Play New Work

The Third Symphony of William Schuman, which Serge Koussevitzky will introduce to Pittsburgh at the Boston Symphony concert December 13, had its first performance at the Boston concerts last October 17 and was likewise introduced to New York at this orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall on November 22.

Schuman, a native of New York, born in 1910, has attracted considerable attention recently by his orchestral and chamber works. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has played his Second Symphony and his American Festival Overture, which was composed for special concerts of American music by this orchestra in 1939. The composer is a graduate of Columbia University. His principal teacher in composition was Roy Harris.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER
NOV 28 1941

Find Symphony Aided Mozart Statue Fund

BOSTON, Nov. 28 (UP)—Boston Symphony Orchestra members, preparing four concerts for next week to celebrate the 150th anniversary of Mozart's death, discovered to their surprise today that their orchestra played an important part 53 years ago in financing the Mozart statue which still stands in Vienna.

The discovery that the orchestra raised more than $10,000 through two benefit concerts was made during a study of the symphony's archives to gather material for an exhibition in connection with the anniversary concerts which Conductor Serge Koussevitzky plans for next week.

Wilhelm Gericke of Vienna, then conductor of the Boston orchestra, organized the benefit concerts in April, 1888. Gericke's own Austrian government was planning belatedly to honor its genius of opera and symphony, the location of whose pauper grave was unknown.

Lilli Lehmann, most famous soprano of her day, was chief soloist of the program, which consisted of the entire Mozart "Requiem."

Excerpts from the "Requiem" will be included in the memorial concerts to be conducted by Koussevitzky next Friday—the 150th anniversary of Mozart's death—and on the following day. These concerts will be preceded by two other Mozart programs Monday and Tuesday.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 26 1941

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Plays Second Concert in Providence

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its Providence season last night in Metropolitan Theatre. The conductor was Desire Defauw, once of Belgium.

Here Mr. Defauw made his American debut last year, with stirring popular success, and his second visit produced no less enthusiasm. It is not only that he is a musician of uncommon merit but that he is one of those conductors interesting to watch as well as to listen to—no score, a brisk, decisive manner, a picturesque head of hair.

We are not inclued to commend his program. It was axle-deep in the ruts so often traveled by the Boston Symphony when it comes to Providence. The main item was the Cesar Franck symphony, a particularly commonplace choice. There was also Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier," another of the iron-men of symphonic programs. Two charming but not very hearty other pieces appeared, "Gli Uccelli," by Respighi, and an adagio for string orchestra by Lekeu.

Mr. Defauw began the concert with a spirited playing of "The Star Spangled Banner." No doubt this was both a sign of the times and a sign of Mr. Defauw's gratitude to the country that has offered him both refuge and professional opportunity.

The Respighi suite, based on harpsichord airs from the 17th century, is a light, fine-textured composition for small orchestra. It comprises a prelude and sections labeled "The Dove," "The Hen," "The Nightingale," and "The Cuckoo." The orchestra played with great refinement, and there were several solo voices, especially among the woodwinds, that were exquisite. The imitation of the hen amused everybody. It is even more amusing on the harpsichord, for which it was written by Rameau.

The Lekeu suite was admirably displayed by Mr. Defauw. The playing of it was not always exact, especially in pizzicato; the orchestra seemed to be in some uncertainty about Mr. Defauw's beat, and the same uncertainty was noticed occasionally at other times during the evening. But the quality of the string tone was of customary excellence.

The Dukas number was sometimes loud and sometimes soft, and the bassoons got laughs, but that is about the best that can be said.

The Franck symphony is long to begin with, and it seems longer every time one hears it. There are, certainly, fine melodies in it and inspired use of them, but there is also a good deal of wandering about; it becomes tedious. Mr. Defauw appeared to us to be trying too hard to pump vitamins into the music. Sometimes in the first movement he inspired the brasses to such sonority that the strings might as well have been back in Boston, and there was hardly ever the sense of a smooth-flowing and integrated performance.

The majority opinion, however, appeared to be opposed to ours. Mr. Defauw was mightily applauded.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
NOV 24 1941

31

Schuman Receives Greatest Ovation

His Third Symphony Arouses Enthusiasm at Local Premiere

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Thirty-one-year-old William Howard Schuman of New York came in for his greatest ovation to date in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony ran off a local premiere of his Third Symphony.

Mr. Schuman took several bows with the Boston batonist and shook hands all around. The audience's reaction might be ascribed to many causes. First and foremost, Mr. Schuman's music. Then, Mr. Koussevitzky's solid and sonorous reading. Finally, a sharpening interest in homegrown symphonic talent. Serious American music is definitely looking up.

The Symphony is Mr. Schuman's best, omitting from consideration the Fourth, recently completed but still awaiting performance. More so than previous works, it joins absolute formal grasp and personal power in a compact unit of expression. Mr. Schuman's flair for coining idiom and giving rhythms new twists also finds wide scope here.

* * *

Disciplined, Yet Modern.

The Third Symphony is a fully mature manifesto of creative method. Formal logic and pattern, carried out with firm control of technical means, are Mr. Schuman's forte. Through them, aided by funds of color and contrast, he voices vital ideas.

The work moves freely in the classic grooves of passacagalia, fugue and toccata to develop themes with artistic force. Of course, the risk today is that an old form may turn into a strait jacket instead of a pair of wings. Control rather than restriction is the idea. Mr. Schuman fuses classic discipline and frank modernism without selling out to either.

That is, his mastery of design is basic to his musical thinking. The thoughts belong to him and the age. Far from crippling contrapuntal molds, he reshapes them to novel purpose, but only as the logic of new thinking compels him.

* * *

Passacagalia-Fugue Section.

The Passacagalia-Fugue section making up the first of the symphony's two parts certainly ranks with the best products of America's symphonic mill. Mr. Schuman's is only one of many sturdy young talents forging ahead on a new momentum. America is plainly making fast stride toward top billing in future repertories.

Saturday's concert also took down two standard items from the Boston's mounting bookcase of classics—Ravel's Tombeau de Couperin and Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony. Tonally, the orchestra, was in holiday dress all afternoon. When isn't it?

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
NOV 24 1941

An American Gets A Break for Once

By HENRY SIMON

The orchestral season is now some six weeks old, but it wasn't till Saturday afternoon that a major symphony band presented a new, full-length ambitious work by an American composer. This despite the many managerial protestations in favor of local talent.

Serge Koussevitzky was the conductor to lift the blight, his Boston Symphony was the orchestra, and the composition was William Schuman's Third Symphony. If Mr. Schuman's symphony is a fair sample of American work that remains unplayed, our conductors are fools not to do more of it.

For there can be no doubt about its effectiveness or its success with the audience. Mr. Schuman, who isn't far past 30, knows his way about the staves of a score. When he calls upon the full orchestra to play for all it's worth—even demanding some unusual noises from the battery—he doesn't do it because he thinks: "Look—I've got a hundred men and must show I can make 'em work up effects." He does it because he has built up his tunes against each other in such an exciting and logical way that the orchestra must play full-throatedly there. A piano, an organ or even a chorus wouldn't be enough. This is idiomatic writing for a modern symphony orchestra and for nothing else.

So it is with his harmonies. Mr. Schuman uses thoroughly modern harmonies, but he has gone way past the point when he thinks that because he is writing in the 20th century he must be cacophonous. For example, the symphony ends (if my ears heard correctly) on three chords played simultaneously in three different keys. He got to that conclusion not because he wanted to startle anyone but because the many-voiced final movement logically ends that way. It is a completely satisfying dischord.

Is it great music? I don't know. You can't tell about those things, especially not after a single hearing. I didn't, for example, take much to the themes: they are angular, full of uncomfortable intervals, and hard to whistle or remember. I like music that sings more. But maybe we'll catch up with Mr. Schuman's idea of a tune and learn to whistle it; or maybe his next symphony will respect our limitations. I do know, though, that I heard very good American music on Saturday afternoon and that I'd like to hear more of the same.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES
NOV 30 1941

Museum Lists Concert For Its Members

Boston Symphony Gives Annual Program Dec. 11

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will present the annual concert for members of the Toledo Museum of Art Thursday evening, Dec. 11, at 8:30 o'clock, it was announced today. Invitations have been sent to members of the museum, who may also purchase extra admissions for guests. There will be no public sale of tickets.

Inaugurated in 1933 at the time of the dedication of the peristyle, the annual members' concert has been the outstanding event of each year.

The dedication concerts brought the Philadelphia orchestra, Stokowski conducting; the next season's members' concert was presented by the Chicago Symphony orchestra; the succeeding four years' concerts were given by the Boston Symphony; in 1939 the New York Philharmonic-Symphony; and in 1940 the Boston Symphony returned.

Membership to the museum is available to every interested person. Among the privileges of membership are the receipt of the Museum News, a quarterly publication; the weekly bulletin; invitations to previews of exhibitions; free admittance to any exhibition for which a charge is made; and two complimentary tickets for the annual members' concert. Information concerning membership may be obtained by calling the membership secretary, concert office, Toledo Museum of Art.

Mozart Memorial Concerts

Boston Sunday American
Nov. 30, 1941

Honoring the 150th anniversary of the death of Mozart, the date of which is next Friday, Dec. 5, Serge Koussevitzky will feature the music of this master at each of the four concerts which are to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall in the week to come. The second concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series will take place tomorrow and Tuesday, at which Frances Nash, the pianist, will be the soloist, and the eighth regular pair of concerts will take place Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with Antonio Brosa, the Spanish violinist, making his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At this pair of concerts excerpts from Mozart's Requiem Mass will be performed, the Cecilia Society Chorus, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, combining with the orchestra. The movements to be played are: Requiem, Dies Irae, Rex Tremendae, Confutatis, Lacrimosa, Cum Sanctis Tuis. The "Jupiter" Symphony in C major will also be played, and the Violin Concerto in D major, K. No. 218, by Antonio Brosa and the orchestra.

The program for the Monday and Tuesday concerts will consist of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, the so-called "Coronation" Concerto for Piano, K. No. 537, which has not been performed before by this orchestra, and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, the "Pathetique."

This Clipping From
CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 29 1941

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra crept into Carnegie Hall with a premiere of William Schuman's third symphony. Here is a case of melodic style and no melody in sight. Brilliantly scored and structurally sound, it still lacks the germ of eloquence. There is really nothing said and no apparent reason to say it.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
NOV 27 1941

Koussevitzky Will Play New Work

The Third Symphony of William Schuman, which Serge Koussevitzky will introduce to Pittsburgh at the Boston Symphony concert December 13, had its first performance at the Boston concerts last October 17 and was likewise introduced to New York at this orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall on November 22.

Schuman, a native of New York, born in 1910, has attracted considerable attention recently by his orchestral and chamber works. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has played his Second Symphony and his American Festival Overture, which was composed for special concerts of American music by this orchestra in 1939. The composer is a graduate of Columbia University. His principal teacher in composition was Roy Harris.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER
NOV 28 1941

Find Symphony Aided Mozart Statue Fund

BOSTON, Nov. 28 (UP)—Boston Symphony Orchestra members, preparing four concerts for next week to celebrate the 150th anniversary of Mozart's death, discovered to their surprise today that their orchestra played an important part 53 years ago in financing the Mozart statue which still stands in Vienna.

The discovery that the orchestra raised more than $10,000 through two benefit concerts was made during a study of the symphony's archives to gather material for an exhibition in connection with the anniversary concerts which Conductor Serge Koussevitzky plans for next week.

Wilhelm Gericke of Vienna, then conductor of the Boston orchestra, organized the benefit concerts in April, 1888. Gericke's own Austrian government was planning belatedly to honor its genius of opera and symphony, the location of whose pauper grave was unknown.

Lilli Lehmann, most famous soprano of her day, was chief soloist of the program, which consisted of the entire Mozart "Requiem."

Excerpts from the "Requiem" will be included in the memorial concerts to be conducted by Koussevitzky next Friday—the 150th anniversary of Mozart's death—and on the following day. These concerts will be preceded by two other Mozart programs Monday and Tuesday.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 26 1941

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Plays Second Concert in Providence

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its Providence season last night in Metropolitan Theatre. The conductor was Desire Defauw, once of Belgium.

Here Mr. Defauw made his American debut last year, with stirring popular success, and his second visit produced no less enthusiasm. It is not only that he is a musician of uncommon merit but that he is one of those conductors interesting to watch as well as to listen to—no score, a brisk, decisive manner, a picturesque head of hair.

We are not inclued to commend his program. It was axle-deep in the ruts so often traveled by the Boston Symphony when it comes to Providence. The main item was the Cesar Franck symphony, a particularly commonplace choice. There was also Dukas's "L'Apprenti Sorcier," another of the iron-men of symphonic programs. Two charming but not very hearty other pieces appeared, "Gli Uccelli," by Respighi, and an adagio for string orchestra by Lekeu.

Mr. Defauw began the concert with a spirited playing of "The Star Spangled Banner." No doubt this was both a sign of the times and a sign of Mr. Defauw's gratitude to the country that has offered him both refuge and professional opportunity.

The Respighi suite, based on harpsichord airs from the 17th century, is a light, fine-textured composition for small orchestra. It comprises a prelude and sections labeled "The Dove," "The Hen," "The Nightingale," and "The Cuckoo." The orchestra played with great refinement, and there were several solo voices, especially among the woodwinds, that were exquisite. The imitation of the hen amused everybody. It is even more amusing on the harpsichord, for which it was written by Rameau.

The Lekeu suite was admirably displayed by Mr. Defauw. The playing of it was not always exact, especially in pizzicato; the orchestra seemed to be in some uncertainty about Mr. Defauw's beat, and the same uncertainty was noticed occasionally at other times during the evening. But the quality of the string tone was of customary excellence.

The Dukas number was sometimes loud and sometimes soft, and the bassoons got laughs, but that is about the best that can be said.

The Franck symphony is long to begin with, and it seems longer every time one hears it. There are, certainly, fine melodies in it and inspired use of them, but there is also a good deal of wandering about; it becomes tedious. Mr. Defauw appeared to us to be trying too hard to pump vitamins into the music. Sometimes in the first movement he inspired the brasses to such sonority that the strings might as well have been back in Boston, and there was hardly ever the sense of a smooth-flowing and integrated performance.

The majority opinion, however, appeared to be opposed to ours. Mr. Defauw was mightily applauded.

MUSIC

Globe Nov 29

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Desire Defauw is first guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. The diminutive Belgian, who made a deeply favorable impression at his initial appearance at Symphony Hall last season, was again warmly greeted by the Friday subscribers, yesterday afternoon. His program consists half of well-known music—Cesar Franck's D minor Symphony and "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas—half of unfamiliar items—Respighi's Suite for small orchestra, "The Birds," and the Adagio for strings by Lekeu. The last two are new to the Boston Symphony repertory.

A change in the originally scheduled order of the program brought the longest and most substantial work, the Franck Symphony, first. This reviewer had looked forward to hearing Mr. Defauw conduct a work whose composer was Belgian though he lived most of his life in Paris. While the Defauw interpretation was not disappointing, neither was it especially revealing. It was a straightforward account, robust, absolutely free of exaggeration or forced emotion. The first movement was deliberate in pace, the finale pleasantly brisk. Franck's tuneful and gracious slow movement was allowed to speak for itself without marked stressing of its dim-light-and-incense nature. In short, here was a performance consistently artistic, yet without personal distinction.

Old music of less than the rank of masterpiece (as Pooh Bah might say) has become very scarce at the Symphony concerts. All the more reason for joy, then, that Mr. Defauw decided to give us the Lekeu Adagio. Even the name Lekeu is but a memory for older concert-goers, and a mere item in the reference books for those younger. What his talen might have produced, had not Lekeu died from typhoid in 1894 just after he had turned 24, none can say. As it was he left behind a small quantity of music which promised much.

Something of the idiom of Franck, with whom Lekeu studied, is found in the Adagio: the sensuous melody, lush contrapuntal weavings and delight in chromatic harmony and modulations. Not common alone to Franck is that glowing radiance, due partly to the idiom, partly to the skilled division of the strings into many voices, which clothes the Adagio from first page to last. That peculiar quality was both an ideal and a characteristic of the time, especially in those musicians who were susceptible both to the refinement of French music and the colorful expression handed on by Wagner.

While "The Birds" had not been done previously by the Boston Symphony, it is not unknown here. Mr. Bernard Zighera and his Chamber Orchestra performed the Suite at Jordan Hall nearly four years ago. A collection of fanciful miniatures involving Doves, Hens, Nightingales and Cuckoos, each "after" the style of an archaic musical (Pasquini, de Gallot, Rameau and an unidentified Englishman), the Suite is charming and imaginative, but hardly more than that.

Mr. Defauw had the obvious good will of the orchestra, who played superbly for him. The afternoon was concluded with a performance of Dukas' fairy tale which did full justice to the score.

Mr. Koussevitsky will honor the 150th anniversary of the death of Mozart at the concerts next week, offering the following Mozart program: Excerpts from the Requiem Mass; Violini Concerto in D major (K. 218) (Antonia Brosa, as soloist, will make his Boston debut); "Jupiter" Symphony.—C. W. D.

DESIRE DEFAUW AT SYMPHONY

Guest Conductor Presents Pleasing Programme

Post Nov 29

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Desire Defauw, the dynamic if diminutive Belgian conductor, who made his first appearance in this country as guest-conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra exactly a year ago, assumed that role again yesterday afternoon. The programme which he offered included the Symphony of Franck, Respighi's Suite for small orchestra, "The Birds," and Adagio for strings by Lekeu and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

When a guest-conductor comes there is always the hope that he will give us music which has escaped Dr. Koussevitzy's attention or has failed to awaken his interest. In other words, he may be, and frequently is, a promising source of unhackneyed music, and for this reason, if for no other, he is to be welcomed. In two numbers Mr. Defauw did not disappoint the seeker after novelty, Respighi's Suite and Lekeu's Adagio. Franck's Symphony, on the other hand, is thrice-hackneyed and Dukas' Scherzo, one felt yesterday, has seen better days. Perhaps it needs Mickey Mouse, who so ably impersonated the discomfited apprentice in Walt Disney's "Fantasia."

"The Birds" does not count as a real novelty, since it was performed by the Zighera Orchestra in Jordan Hall, Dec. 30, 1937. But from a larger band and a larger hall it had a new sound, and the music itself, though sligh in a sense, proved well worth a second hearing. We might even do worse than have it again some time. Cleverly and tastefully made transcriptions of 17th and early 18th century pieces for harpischord, this charming Suite presents, "The Dove," of Jacques de Gallot, "The Hen," of Rameau, "The Nightingale" by "an anonymous English composer" and Pasquini's "The Cuckoo." There is also a Prelude, freely drwan from Pasquini, in which are to be found premonitions of the pieces to come.

One suspects that the anonymous Englishman was a figment of Respighi's imagination, and not only because of the reference to Respighi's own "The Pines of the Janiculum" in "The Pines of Rome" (in which the composer makes use of a phcnograph record of a nightingale's song). The whole tiny movement seems to bear a Respighian touch. Anyway, deception or no deception, this section is delightful, an adjective that may well apply to the Suite as a whole. The performance was one of exquisite finish and the audience was plainly greatly pleased.

Lekeu was a sort of Thomas Chatterton of music cut down on the second day of his 25 year. None of his music, even the once-celebrated Violin Sonata, is a flawless achievement, but all of it or all that there is any chance of hearing, bespeaks a genuine talent. The Adagio of yesterday is couched in the familiar idiom of the followers of Franck and might have been signed by Chausson, for example. There is the typical post-Wagnerian richness, tempered by Latin sensibility. There is even an unmistakable quotation from "The Good Friday Spell" of "Parsifal," an opera which drew from the young Belgian this comment, quoted in the programme notes: "an entirely new world of which until now I had no conception. One cries almost all the time; 'Parisfal' has made me passionately religious and I fell a smothering longing to go to mass (for that is the only thing resembling Wagner's super-human revery)." Again the performance matched the music and bows were taken by Messrs. Burgin, Lefranc, and Bedetti as solo violin, viola and 'cello, respectively.

The readings of the Franck and Dukas were straight-forward and effective, though some might question the speed at which Mr. Defauw took the Symphony's second movement. By this reviewer it was O. K. Additional note: Mr. Defauw conducted throughout from memory.

Boston Herald Nov 29

MUSIC

BY ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 7th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Desire Defauw conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Franck.....Symphony in D minor
Respighi.....“The Birds,” Suite for small orchestra
Lekeu.....Adagio for string orchestra
Dukas.....“The Sorcerer’s Apprentice,” Scherzo

Mr. Defauw was well received when he conducted the Boston Symphony last season and he was the more cordially welcomed back again yeterday in consequence. That he also had a distinct success is not to be wondered at, since he is a sound musician and had taken the added precaution of choosing an exceedingly popular program — the Adagio by Lekeu excecpted. No conductor could go far wrong on the above program, unless he were very obstinate indeed; and Mr. Defauw is obviously a sensible and honest musician.

The Franck Symphony, to be sure, can be sentimentalized, the more so as it is so often played. Mr. Defauw avoided that pitfall—he probably never had to give it a thought—and proceeded to offer a singularly noble and eloquent interpretation. It was one that particularly made clear the continuity of thought throughout the work.

We shall not at this late date go into the pros and cons of the aesthetics about the Franck Symphony. No large work has come in for more hearty and closely reasoned abuse in recent years. Intellectually it has lost caste, but popularly it keeps or attracts a large following. For some of us it has ceased to hold much significant meaning or even to give more than passive pleasure. For others it is still the monument of all that is fine in human nature or art. And never the twain shall meet? Who can say?

Respighi's ingenious adaptation of 17th century harpsichord pieces into an orchestral suite, "The Birds," proved a very agreeable and amusing number on the program. Mr. Defauw used a large orchestra, which was right in that hall The other day at the Morning Musicale, Robert Casadesus played three of Rameau's pieces of this type on the piano, and it needed no wildly imaginative flight to think of them in orchestral terms. Respighi turned the trick in this Suite with neatness and taste.

We own to a good deal of disappointment in the Lekeu Adagio. The program notes had promised us so much. Here was the brilliant composer whose career was tragically cut short at the age of 24. Here were the ambitious projects of his youth, the many actual achievements and the praise of men like d'Indy and Franck. And here, on the other hand, was this dull and seemingly amorphous movement for string orchestra. At any rate that is a first impression, and further hearings might reveal latent virtues The Menuhins played Lekeu's Violin Sonata here some years ago, and we certainly don't recall it as being as tedious as this Adagio.

Comic relief arrived immediately afterwards with Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice," a delightful piece that everyone now knows since Mickey Mouse played the leading role, if they did not before. Mr. Defauw and the orchestra gave it a stunning performance.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky returns to celebrate the 150th anniversary of Mozart's death by playing excerpts of the Requiem, the so-called "Jupiter" Symphony and the D major Violin Concerto (Antonio Brosa, soloist).

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
NOV 30 1941

32

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two programs when it makes its annual visit to Syria Mosque next month.

Boston Group To Play Here Next Month

Two programs will be offered here when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky, makes its annual visit for concerts at Syria Mosque.

On Saturday night, December 13, the program will include a modern work by a native American, William Howard Schuman, whose Third Symphony will be played. Other works will be Mozart's "Haffner Symphony" and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique."

The program on Sunday afternoon, December 14, will open with Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin." In addition, there will be the "Romeo and Juliet Suite," by Prokofieff; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by Strauss and the Fourth Symphony, by Brahms.

Antonio Brosa, violin soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Mozart's D Major Concerto, which will be presented on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at the Paramount and Fenway.

Boston Herald-Nov 30

An Occasion to Rejoice; The 150th Mozart Anniversary

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

It so happens that Mozart died, in poverty and dejection of spirit, exactly 150 years ago next Friday. And so for once, the Boston Symphony's celebration of this melancholy event will fall precisely on the date. You will find notice of our orchestra's activity on Mozart's behalf during this coming week in other columns of this section. For the moment, rather, let us consider the position of Mozart in the world of music today.

One thing is certain: This anniversary is one for rejoicing all round. The facts that the composer died prematurely and in want have at least been compensated by posthumous glory, as is also the case with Schubert. Mozart is probably and has always been the least neglected of the great composers, Beethoven excepted. It is sometimes fashionable among critics, who are not unnaturally at a loss to find something new to say, to point to this or that of Beethoven's symphonies as "infrequently heard" or even "neglected." There is no foundation for such statements. All of his important music is pretty industriously aired. The symphonies certainly get enough attention; all the string quartets are often given in a series as well as separately; pianists, violinists and cellists keep his works for those instruments before the public; opera companies strain to give "Fidelio"; singers have recently paid much attention to his songs; and, in short, his admirers have little to complain of.

Mozart cannot claim so impressive a record of modern performances of his music as that; ut he is much better off than Handel and Hayn. These last two are perhaps the most neglected of the great composers, that is, from the 18th century on. When the 250th anniversary of the birth of Bach and Handel was celebrated in 1935, poor Handel was badly skimped. It was his misfortune to have been born in the same year. But even the performances that we do hear of Handel's choral works are seriously mangled and usually quite inadequate versions of what the composer wished us to hear.

HAYDN AND MOZART

The situation of Hayn today is not nearly so bad. One trouble is that scholastically the publication of Haydn's works never was carried through with the thoroughness accorded to the monumental editions of other composers, both earlier and later. The other trouble is that we hear only a tiny fraction of his vast output: The last symphonies, some of the quartets, the Cello Concerto, which turns out to be not by him at all, and, rarely, the choral music. Yet Haydn lived to a ripe old age and was respected by all till his death 19 years after the much younger Mozart,

Both Haydn and Mozart have an advantage over Handel and, with reservations in recent years, Bach, in that it is the custom to present this works in a reasonably authentic way. If either composer were to come alive and hear the Boston Symphony perform his music, the result to his ears would not be so astonishing as would a presentation of "Messiah" to Handel. Mozart was charmed by the polish of the Mannheim orchestra, and we may assume that he would not object to the Boston Symphony.

Compared to Haydn, though, the equally large quantity of Mozart's music has been tolerably well explored. He wrote for such an extraordinary number of instrumental combinations that musicians have stood in his debt ever since. Every flutist, for example has at some time studied the two concertos and the two quartets for this instrument. No clarinetist can afford to neglect Mozart's music in that field. Let us admit that a good deal remains unheard, at the same time chamber music groups orchestras and, recently, the record companies have unearthed a lot of first-rate Mozart scores and added greatly to our pleasure in his music beyond the three famous symphonies.

MOZARTEAN OPERA

The most gratifying thing about the continued interest in Mozart is the fact that his operas have been gaining in popularity, and that in face of the strong Wagnerian sentiment in this country of late years.. "Don Giovanni" has stayed fairly consistently in the repertoire—we are talking of America, for Mozart's operas abroad have not suffered the vicissitudes that they have here. "Figaro" has made a triumphant come-back. "The Magic Flute" is one of the Metropolitan's revivals of this season; and the American issue of the Glyndebourne "Cosi fan tutte" records ought to do much for that musical masterpiece.

Consequently we may turn for a fleeting glance at what the Boston Symphony is about to offer us for the 150th. On Monday and Tuesday, Frances Nash will play the so-called "Coronation" Concerto for piano. This is misnamed, because the coronation in Frankfurt, where Mozart played the Concerto K. 537, occurred some three years after he had composed the score. Though done in full maturity, it is not generally considered by connoisseurs to be one of the finest. It is, however, well worth hearing.

The kind of concerto that Mozart wrote, and that Beethoven and Brahms expanded, was perhaps his greatest contribution to musical architecture. Anyone interested in the subject can pursue it in Sir Donald Tovey's 3rd volume of Musical Analyses. The violin concertos, of which we shall hear that in D major, with Antonnio Brosa as soloist, on Friday and Saturday, were all fairly youthful works and all composed at the same time. This one is the most popular of all. For the rest we shall properly hear some of the Requiem, including the authentic parts written by Mozart himself, and two symphonies, the "Haffner" and the "Jupiter" (another inappropriate title).

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
NOV 30 1941

Boston Symphony Schedules Rich Program for Dec. 8

IT should be a musical feast when the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town for a concert at the Eastman Theater on Monday evening, Dec. 8.

Rochester music lovers have felt that way about the Boston musicians for years, but confirmation of that estimate comes from no less an authority than Olin Downes, dean of New York daily music critics, who said of the New Englanders last week:

"Playing and conducting of the highest order are customarily the rule when Serge Koussevitzky and his men officiate. The orchestra again last night, sounded nobly, like the Stradivarius of all orchestras which this one is."

One of the largest audiences of the entire season will hear the Boston ensemble. And, for the benefit of those who are accustomed to Friday evenings for the concerts, this is the only exception. It will be held on a Monday evening, because of the necessity of fitting it into the annual tour of the orchestra.

In this, its 61st season, the orchestra is again performing a program of varied content. But the rich promise of noble music in the Rochester concert is exemplified by the program chosen.

Mozart Week at Symphony Concerts

Honoring the 150th anniversary of the death of Mozart, the date of which is next Friday, Dec. 5, Serge Koussevitzky will feature the music of this master at each of the four concerts which are to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall in the week to come. The second concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series will take place tomorrow and Tuesday, at which Frances Nash, the pianist, will be the soloist, and the eighth regular pair of concerts will take place Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with Antonio Brosa, the Spanish violinist, making his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At this pair of concerts excerpts from Mozart's Requiem Mass will be performed, the Cecilia Society Chorus, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, combining with the orchestra. The movements to be played are: Requiem, Dies Irae, Rex Tremendae, Confutatis, Lacrimosa, Cum Sanctis Tuis. The "Jupiter" Symphony in C major will also be played, and the Violin Concerto in D major, K. No. 218, by Antonio Brosa and the orchestra. Herald-Nov 30

Frances Nash, piano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Mozart's "Coronation" concerto which will be given at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon.

Symphony Artists Practise Constantly

Boston Post - Sunday - Nov 2, '41

Famous Boston Orchestra No Stronger Than Its Weakest Link; Members Look and Act Like Executives

"This is my 44th season—and I'm still going strong," says genial Julius Theodorowicz, Boston Symphony violinist at the Pops.

Julius is a "regular fellow." Not the pale, dreamy type, the concert-master pitches right into work around his home. (Photos by James C. Ward, Sunday Post staff photographer.)

Julius Theodorowicz, friend of the immortal Johannes Brahms, enjoys a moment of relaxation with his dog.

BY KATHLEEN DEADY

Although everyone knows that the Boston Symphony is the best in the world, practically no one knows the musicians. A member of the symphony is as anonymous as a telephone operator. He appears on the stage four or five times a week, for about an hour and a half. Later, he emerges from the stage-door carrying his instrument under his arm. Where he goes and what he does is a mystery.

Mr. Julius Theodorowicz knows the answer, probably better than anyone else. He is a violinist, assistant concert-master during the winter season, and concert-master at Pops.

"I came to Boston Oct. 1, 1898. This is 1941. Let's see—that will make the 44th season," he counted. "And I'm still going strong."

A case of measles started Mr. Theodorowicz on his career. "When I was 6 years old," he explained, "I was sick with the measles. My father went to a county fair and brought me home a toy violin, to think about in bed. After a while, I began to play little tunes on it. So my father said, 'Hmm . . . the boy has talent,' and he decided that I should have lessons."

Young Julius studied in his native Poland, in Lemberg, and went to the conservatory in Vienna when he was 11 years old. "That was in the gay nineties," he recalled, "and Vienna was the most musical city in the world. Every Sunday night there were concerts in the house of some wealthy people . . . chamber music."

At first, he studied the viola. In Vienna, he was the favorite violist of Johannes Brahms. "He would always call for me to play," when there was a concert of Brahm's quartets and quintets.

Brahms Around the Corner

"Brahms lived around the corner from us in Vienna," he continued, "just two houses between us. I remember the morning he died. I went over to the house and asked permission of his housekeeper—he was a bachelor, you know—to see Herr Doktor. She said yes, come in, but be quiet, and, of course, be as short as possible. So I stole into his room—his face was black. He died of cancer of the liver, you know. I cut off a hair of his beard, my hands were shaking like this,"—he illustrated—"I was so afraid of being caught."

The hair, an autographed letter, a bit of laurel from Brahms' room—all Mr. Theodorowicz has left is the laurel. He lost his treasures "in moving around, I suppose someone helped himself."

Since the death of Brahms, Theodorowicz never played the viola.

Studying at the same conservatory with Theodorowicz was Fritz Kreisler, two classes ahead. They knew each other well, and their families were friendly. When the two boys were graduated from the conservatory, Kreisler went on to Paris. "His father, who was the leading dentist in Vienna at the time, talked to my father, and said, 'You should send Julius to Paris, too.' "

Fritz Kreisler a Pal

But the Theodorowicz family needed the money, so Julius went to work, playing in local orchestras. In the fall, he moved to the Berlin Philharmonic. On Oct. 1, 1898, he arrived in Boston and got a job with the young Boston Symphony—as the least of the violinists, the 16th. In those days, there were eight first violins and eight second violins. Now there are nine firsts and nine seconds.

Like Clockwork

"Gradually, I moved up," he explained. "In orchestras, it is the custom when a vacancy occurs to move up the next man." Mr. Theodorowicz remembers the days of Henry Lee Higginson, of Gericke, Muck, Fiedler, Rabaud, and Monteux. He has seen the audience that hissed the "radical" Stravinsky become the audience that applauded the even more modern Hindemith.

Although he has been playing the violin for about 58 years, Mr. Theodorowicz is still practising constantly, polishing and perfecting. A musician's life "must go like clockwork," he says. Four mornings a week—Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday—he rehearses from 10 to 1. Then luncheon, practising, a walk, rest, and "something good to eat" before the evening concert.

Besides the regular programmes in Symphony Hall Monday nights, Tuesday afternoons, Friday afternoons and Saturday nights, there are the Cambridge concerts Thursday nights, the series of Youth Concerts, and other performances. Plus lessons when there is an extra minute.

Art and Wages

He is not the pale, dreamy "long hair" swing fans expect symphony musicians to be. He doesn't waste a minute. Speaks crisply, quickly. And talks with his hands and face—frowns, and wrinkles his nose. He wore a gray suit, light blue shirt and print tie. He would pass for a shrewd executive in any businessman's convention. And he talks as expertly about dollars and cents as he does about sharps and flats.

Speaking of art and wages to a musician leads to the question of unions. Apparently, the Boston Symphony trustees are not attempting to coerce opinion within the orchestra. The men see both sides of the question. Although they take the idea seriously, they are lighthearted enough to call James Caesar Petrillo, the labor man, "Jimmy Caesar."

The union argument rests on the advantage of higher wages. For instance, the Philadelphia orchestra, a union group, rehearses from 10 to 12. On the stroke of 12, mistakes or not, the men lay down their instruments. Otherwise, they would have to be paid extra union wages for overtime.

Opponents of the union rest their case on the value of perfection. It would be impossible to maintain "precision and quality" in an orchestra whose rehearsals depended upon a clock. If an orchestra must play the phrase 20 times to get it perfectly right, the orchestra must play it 20 times, clock or no clock. It would be possible, of course, to reconcile both aims if an orchestra were very heavily endowed. The musicians would rehearse until they got it right, regardless of time; the endowment fund would be large enough to pay them union wages for the necessary overtime.

Union orchestras get better wages, for recording, for instance. When the Boston Symphony made records, the men got $5 per man per hour, with no intermission. In a three-hour session, they played three hours, got $15. On the other hand, the Philadelphia orchestra, admittedly inferior, paid each man $15 per hour, with a 20-minute rest each hour. In a three-hour session, the Philadelphia men played only two hours, got $45.

On the other hand, some musicians have left well-paid posts in union orchestras to accept jobs with the Boston Symphony, and they wouldn't think of going back.

No Equal

Another factor is control of hiring and firing. Under union rules, hiring and firing are not the exclusive domain of the conductor and directors. Under the rules laid down by the founder of the Boston Symphony, Henry Lee Higginson, the conductor should have "sole artistic control" of his men.

Whatever happens in the future, right now the Boston Symphony has no equal. That reputation depends not only upon Dr. Koussevitsky but upon every member of the orchestra. Julius Theodorowicz is a typical member of the Boston Symphony.

The annual performance of Handel's "Messiah" will take place Sunday afternoon, Deember 14, under the direction of Thor Johnson. The University Symphony Orchestra, the University Choral Union, and the following soloists, will participate: Merle Wilkins, soprano; Edwina Eustis, contralto; Ernest McChesney, tenor; and Douglas Beattie, bass. Palmer Christian will be at the or-

(Continued From Page One)

The Chippewa Press
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
DEC 3 - 1941

Koussevitsky Proves Spellbinding Leader

"I don't know the difference between a symphony and a Strauss waltz," a business man said, emerging from a symphony concert that man Koussevitsky

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

DEC 3 - 1941

34

Koussevitsky Proves Spellbinding Leader

"I don't know the difference between a symphony and a Strauss waltz," a business man said, emerging from a symphony concert, "but that man Koussevitzky makes my blood tingle, whatever music he waves his stick at. I don't know how, but he does it!"

This blunt remark comprises as graphic a summary as could be made of the power exerted upon an audience by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he will appear at Memorial hall on Dec. 12, as an attraction of the Symphony club.

As to how Koussevitzky creates his spell over both sophisticates and novices in symphony-concert-going, a summary explanation is not so easily worded. First, it may be said that the great Boston leader requires either of just two characteristics of an orchestral score. It must possess beauty, or it must challenge interest.

The warmth of a final rehearsal is recaptured by Koussevitzky in public performance. It is simply inevitable for the audience to feel its interest kindled, its blood made to tingle.

Tickets may be engaged at Heaton's or Long's for the Symphony club concert or may be ordered by mail from Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue.

COLDWATER, MICH.
REPORTER

NOV 26 1941

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS AT ANN ARBOR

Ann Arbor, Nov. 26—Both the Chicago and the Boston Symphony Orchestras will be heard in the Choral Union Concert Series, Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor; the former on Sunday afternoon, November 30; and the latter, on Wednesday evening, December 10.

Frederick Stock, generally acclaimed as the dean of American conductors, will lead his Chicago players in the following program: Suite No. 2 in B minor, Bach; "On the Shores of Sorrento" from Symphonic Fantasia, "Aus Italien," Op. 16, Strauss; Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," by Tschaikowsky; Variations on an Original Theme by Elgar; Capriccio Espagnol, Op. 34, by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra is an old favorite with Ann Arbor concert audiences. Back in the early days, under Theodore Thomas, it appeared on numerous occasions. Then, for a period of thirty-five years, 1905 to 1935 inclusive, it participated in the Annual May Festivals under Frederick Stock. In 1938 it was heard in the Choral Union Series in a miscellaneous program. This orchestra is, by common consent, a member of what is known in musical circles as "the big four"—the others being the Boston, Philadelphia, and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its only Michigan appearance on this occasion. For twelve years it has come to Ann Arbor annually. Previous to that time it had been heard on seven occasions at intermittent intervals. Dr. Koussevitzky has endeared himself to the concert-going public, and always prepares a program of unusual interest.

The annual Christmas performance of Handel's "Messiah" will take place Sunday afternoon, December 14, under the direction of Thor Johnson. The University Symphony Orchestra, the University Choral Union, and the following soloists, will participate: Merle Wilkins, soprano; Edwina Eustis, contralto; Ernest McChesney, tenor; and Douglas Beattie, bass. Palmer Christian will be at the organ.

(Continued From Page One)

Helen L. Clark shows students how to apply a tourniquet. Many lives can be saved this way.

Above—Mrs. Hazel Holt gives the students gas mask lessons.
Below—Instructions in use of the stirrup pump.

council, Don MacLeod, president of the Lyceum, a debating society, and Vilda Santilli about the coming assembly.

Boys Are Serious

"We're pretty serious about this," one of the boys declared. "After all, we never know when war may come and if it should, there's no reason why we can't do something to help."

"I'm all for it," Vilda piped up. "And what's more, I'm sure all of the girls here feel the same way. We intend to work just as hard as the boys and we're sure it's the sort of civilian defense work that we'd be valuable in."

A few moments before that Vilda with a group of her classmates was learning how to handle an incendiary bomb in an introductory lecture given by Mrs. Hazel Holt and Miss Helen L. Clark, of the Massachusetts Women's Civilian Defense Corps.

They did equally as well as the boys with the sand pail and the stirrup pump, which is particularly useful for putting out fires caused by incendiary bombs in homes.

Carefully combed long bobs were mussed learning to put on gas masks quickly and fingernail polish was entirely forgotten under the important task ahead of mixing a bleach ointment made of chloride of lime and

Personal Co-operation Taught

To maintain morale and prevent depression a portable radio, games, pencil and pads of paper are taken along. Inside, the rooms are fully lighted to make it as cheerful as possible, and stairways are also amply lighted to prevent accidents.

Common-sense personal co-operation is taught, too. If war should ever come to Everett every one of its trained junior defense corps will know enough to protect themselves by laying flat in the gutter if they are caught out during a raid and staying there until all danger from the blast is past.

They know enough to never stand near glass windows or doors or projecting cornices and that the greatest safety during a raid is the refuge room, next to that in any house if they remain away from windows, or in vestibules providing there are no glass doors.

And so stiff will the examination be that every single boy and girl will have to not only know the course as they would a Latin lesson, but be able to use their own common-sense in any emergency, interpreting the general rules intelligently.

The committee in charge of the junior training—General E. Leroy Sweetser, Frederick A. Ashey, Martin G. Sanborn, Frederick Galbraith and Mrs. Hazel Holt—all feel pretty will know that the deadly lewisite has been spread, and the odor of a match means that white phosphorous which burns badly and has a poisonous vapor, is present.

"We're not interested in stirring up any hysteria," Principal Martin G. Sanborn explained, "in fact we hope that this course will have a calming effect because it will enable students to be so well prepared that they won't lose their heads.

2000 Bombs Per Plane

high school students is more a matter of avoiding panic than anything else. If a single plane can carry 2000 bombs, even while the damage might not be so great, the psychological factor of the amount it carries and the imminent danger, might throw a group into hysteria. It's a good thing, too, for people to realize that war isn't far away."

The students are not only enthusiastic about the new course—they can hardly wait till it starts. The school council got so patriotic about it all and white Russian forces in the vicinity of Moscow are continuously pushed back under continuous German pressure, the situation in southern Russia is daily becoming more critical.

Pressure on Centre

The advances which the Germans have successfully carried out up to date always exhibit the same characteristics: steady pressure on the centre to contain the Russian forces and to divert their attention from the flanks around which two encircling horns are being thrown. This is what is happening in the attack on Moscow where the German armies are trying to work around the flanks via Kalinin and Tula, and thus cut off the capital from the rest of Russia.

In the south, in operations immediately directed against the River Volga with the further aim of reaching the Caspian and cutting off the Caucasus, a similar operation is being carried out, but on a more grandiose scale. The northern arm of the pincer movement on the southern front has pushed through Karkov and now is directed southward to cut off Rostov from the rear. The southern arm is already in Crimea.

The Russian Black Sea fleet is based on the Crimean port of Sevastopol, which is strongly fortified, and should defy frontal assaults for some time, but it is more than likely that the Germans will not attempt a direct assault on Sevastopol. They will bomb the Black Sea fleet in the harbor and try to force it out.

If the Russian fleet is bombed out of Sevastopol, it has only one more suitable base, Novorossisk, further to the east, but Novorossisk is less than 100 miles from Crimea, and the bombing process could be repeated. The harbor at Batum is open but cannot be used when the wind blows from the west, so that the Russians will make desperate efforts to hold on to only the good bases at Sevastopol and Novorossisk.

Turkey's Neutrality

Turkey's neutrality bars the Bosphorus and entry to the Mediterranean so that the Russian Black Sea fleet is in serious danger. That danger would be as great if the Germans do leave Sevastopol alone and proceed immediately, as I expect they will, to the east. The German forces in Crimea will probably attempt to fight their way to Kerch and then across the strait into northern Caucasus.

The attack on Crete will serve as a lesson and model for this campaign. It would be a much easier task for the Germans to land parachute troops across the narrow strait at the mouth of the Sea of Azov than it was in Crete. The objective of parachute troops would be to cut off and capture Novorossisk from the rear, and then to link up with German forces advancing from the north.

If the Germans can gain the northern Caucasian area, they will have gained a strategical aim of first magnitude.

First—they will have cut off Moscow and Leningrad and armies of the north from the oil supplies of the Caucasus. This loss of oil would not be a there are vast oil fields in but it would be an insuperable blow to the Russians, for enormous gain for the Germans.

This Clipping From
This Clipping From
This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
Nov. 30, 1941

Mozart This Week At Boston Symphony

Honoring the 150th anniversary of the death of Mozart, the date of which is next Friday, Dec. 5, Sexge Koussevitzky is featuring the music of this master at each of the four concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this week.

At the second concerts of the Monday evening-Tuesday afternoon series (last night and this afternoon at 3, the Commuters') Frances Nash is soloist. Miss Nash appears in Mozart's piano concerto in D major "Coronation," K. 537). Dr. Koussevitzky also is conducting Mozart's Haffner Symphony and Tchaikowsky's 6th, the "Pathetique."

The regular pair of concerts will take place Friday afternoon and Saturday evening with Antonio Brosa, the Spanish violinist, making his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At this pair of concerts excerpts from Mozart's Requiem Mass will be performed, the Cecilia Society Chorus, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, combining with the orchestra. The movements to be played are: Requiem, Dies Irae, Rex Tremendae, Confutatis, Lacrimosa, Cum Sanctis Tuis. The "Jupiter" Symphony in C major will also be played, and the Violin Concerto in D major, K. No. 218, by Antonio Brosa and the orchestra.

MOZART WEEK BY SYMPHONY

Boston Post

Orchestra Observes Anniversary of His Death

Dec 2, 1941

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This is Mozart week at Symphony Hall, in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the composer's death, which befalls on Friday, and the ceremonies began last evening with performances of the "Haffner" Symphony and the so-called "Coronation" Concerto for piano, with Frances Nash as the soloist. In violent contrast, even though Mozart was Tchaikovsky's favorite composer, the remainder of the concert was given over to the Russian's "Pathetic" Symphony. The same programme will be heard this afternoon.

Both the Symphony and the Concerto were a happy choice. The former has not been overworked at the Symphony concerts, particularly since Dr. Koussevitzky's coming, and the latter, for some peculiar reason, was being heard at them for the first time. Composed in 1788, the year of the three last symphonies, this Concerto is of the mature Mozart and like others of his later works sounds prophetically modern in spots. The whole Concerto is charming and the middle movement is Mozart at his most appealing. The performance was a fine one all around and Miss Nash was warmly received.

As Mr. Burk's notes reminded us, the "Haffner" Symphony was written in such haste that the composer did not remember a note of the score when it was brought to his attention a few months later. And yet with the "Prague" Symphony in the same key, D major, it ranks very close to the E-flat major, G minor and "Jupiter" symphonies mentioned above. With choruses from the requiem and a violin concerto played by Antonio Brosa the "Jupiter," greatest of them all, will be heard at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. In the meantime these Mozartean exercises have begun most auspiciously.

HARTFORD, CONN
TIMES
12/3/41

Words About
MUSIC
And Musicians

Excerpts from Mozart's Requiem Mass will be presented in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of his death by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week in the Massachusetts capital.

The Cecelia Society Chorus, of which Arthur Fiedler is conductor, will assist under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Antonio Brosa will be soloist in the Mozart Concerto for Violin in D major, No. 4 (Koechel No. 218) and the orchestra also will present the Mozart Jupiter Symphony in C major (Koechel No. 551).

Boston Herald MUSIC Dec 2, 1941

Monday Symphony

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The second concert of the subsidiary series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. Frances Nash, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:
Mozart—Symphony in D major, K. 385.
Mozart—Piano Concerto in D major, K. 537.
Tchaikovsky—Symphony No. 6 in B minor Op. 74.

This week, as every one should by now know, marks the 150th anniversary of Mozart's death. Exactly that period of years ago to the day next Friday his body was placed into a public grave in the Vienna cemetery. The knowing visitor used to smile in the little museum of the Mozart house in Salzburg at the "actual" skull of the composer in its glass case, for it could obviously never have been authentically recovered. At the same time it is ironic to observe today that no composer is more highly venerated, more shrewdly and justly appraised and, by and large, more genuinely liked than Mozart.

The "Haffner" Symphony and the "Coronation" Concerto, offered on last night's program, are cases in point. The first is a perfect small symphony. The minuet is not perhaps Mozart's highest flight of the imagination, but the slow movement is one of his most completely enchanting. The so-called "Coronation" Concerto has never been played at a Boston Symphony concert before. This is only excusable on the grounds that there are so many of them. It has been pointed out that the concerto as he wrote it was one of Mozart's great contributions to musical architecture; and this particular one, as a late example, with many lovely details and a quite divinely simple larghetto, should certainly have been heard at one of these concerts before this.

Miss Nash, the soloist, has the real feeling for Mozart. She is an utterly unpretentious pianist, very likely—though we do not know this—a specialist in Mozart's piano music. She has so obviously worked out a combination of clear technique, graceful phrasing and deference to the music in hand that this impression is not to be gainsaid. The result was a truly charming performance of the concerto, in which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra played the admirable counterpart.

The concert ended, rather oddly for a Mozart memorial, with the "Pathetique" Symphony of Tchaikovsky, the qualities of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of which are too well known to need further comment at this time. This concert will be repeated tomorrow afternoon, and more Mozart will be heard at the regular concerts at the end of the week.

Globe MUSIC Dec 4
SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The so-called "Coronation" Piano Concerto in D major (K. 537) by Mozart, his last but one, was given its probable first performance in Boston at last evening's Symphony concert. Frances Nash was the soloist. Before the Concerto, Serge Koussevitzky conducted Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony in D major and after, Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

Though written three years previously, this Concerto acquired its name because Mozart played it at a concert he gave during the coronation of Leopold II. A polished and difficult work on a grand scale, it somehow does not display the abundant invention which was Mozart's hallmark elsewhere. Comparatively, it is static.

Miss Nash set forth the piano's portion of the Concerto in small, almost chamber music proportions. The style was clean and very clear, for she negotiated her part with a nearly precious facility. The legato playing was not quite smooth enough to make the tone sing as it must for Mozart. Mr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment was appropriately subdued and nicely balanced to the piano. But, frankly romantic, the Concerto seemed to call for a most robust treatment.

In the "Haffner" Symphony emotion ran warm and human. But it lacked clarity; not the studied artificialty of a surface gloss, but the crystal clarity which reveals the depths.

For the Tchaikovsky Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky and his men reserved a great and climactic performance. It was a memorable playing of a familiar work. The strings responded with the utmost sensitivity. The brass choir was superb. The rest—as good as they can be. The adagio of the finale came as a throbbing calm after storm. A long tense silence followed the last, the longest pianissimo this listener has heard. And the applause was thunderous.

The program will be repeated this afternoon at 3.

Cheer Koussevitzky on Symphony Return

Mozart Memorial Concert Features Matinee

Globe Dec 6

Yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert was a memorable one, marked not only by the return of Dr. Koussevitzky after a week's absence, but also by a distinguished program of Mozart in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of Mozart's death. The audience brought Koussevitzky back again and again to acknowledge his final number, the familiar and beloved "Jupiter" symphony, and there was enthusiastic applause for soloist Antonio Brosa for his playing of the Concerto for violin and for the Cecilia Society Chorus work in the "Requiem."

Christian Science Monitor - Dec 4, 1941

Antonio Brosa

Soloist in Mozart Violin Concerto in D major (K.218) at the Boston Symphony concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

This Clipping From
Christian Science Monitor
Dec 6 1941

Boston Symphony Will Play on December 10

Ann Arbor, Mich., Dec. 3—The University Musical Society will present two important concerts in December preceding the holiday vacation.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will come to Ann Arbor for its twelfth consecutive annual visit Wednesday evening, Dec. 10. Dr. Koussevitzky has prepared the following program: Mozart's Symphony in D major (Haffner); Symphony No. 3 by William Schuman; and Symphony No. 4 in E minor, by Brahms.

The traditional Christmas presentation of Handel's "Messiah" will take place Sunday afternoon, Dec. 14, at 4:15, in Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor, at which time the University Choral Union, the University Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Thor Johnson, will join forces with the following soloists, in a presentation of this monumental work: Marie Wilkins, soprano, who was recently heard on the Metropolitan Auditions of the Air; Edwina Eustis, distinguished contralto; Ernest McChesney, tenor, of wide renoun; and Douglas Beattie, bass, of the Metropolitan Opera. Palmer Christian will be at the organ. To partly defray the expense of production, a nominal charge will be made.

To Conduct

ERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

This Clipping From
NEW KENSINGTON, PA.
DISPATCH
DEC 4 - 1941

Boston Symphony Appears In Pgh.

Residents of New Kensington who are musically inclined will be interested in the annual visit of the Boston symphony orchestra—always a highlight in the Pittsburgh musical season. Two memorable programs are offered for their December concerts at Syria Mosque this season.

On Saturday evening, December 13, Serge Koussevitzky will include a modern work by a native American, William Howard Schuman. Pittsburgh will hear his Third Symphony, which had its first performance at the Boston Symphony concerts in October this year, and was likewise introduced to New York by the Boston Symphony in November. Mr. Schumann's principal teacher in composition was Roy Harris, who is well known in Pittsburgh where his works have been given by the Boston Symphony. Mr. Schuman's Third Symphony is inscribed to Serge Koussevitzky. Other works on the Saturday evening program are Mozart's "Haffner Symphony," and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique."

The Sunday afternoon program on December 14th, will open with Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin." In this work Ravel has preserved something of the old elegance of the early dance forms, while filling them with the color, verve and freer invention of his own day. In addition to Ravel, the Sunday program will include "Romeo and Juliet Suite" by Prokofieff; "Till Eulenspeigel's Merry Pranks" by Strauss; and the Fourth Symphony by Brahms.

APOLLO, PA
NEWS
12/12/41

The Musical Forecast
PITTSBURGH, PA.

DEC -- 1941

CHARLEROI, PA.
MAIL

DEC 13 1941

WILKINSBURG, PA
GAZETTE
12/5/41

Boston Symphony Plays At Mosque On Dec. 13 And 14

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Pittsburgh is always a highlight of the musical season, and attracts music-lovers from the surrounding territory within a radius of 50 miles. Two concerts will be given at Syria Mosque by this celebrated orchestra of 110 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, and both promise to be memorable events.

On Sunday evening, December 13, the program will feature a modern work in the Third Symphony by William Schuman, which was pronounced the best work by an American of the rising generation when it was given in New York City last month. Other numbers on the Saturday evening program are the Mozart "Haffner" Symphony, and the favorite "Pathetique" Symphony by Tschaikowsky.

The Sunday afternoon program on December 14 will open with Ravel's most beauiful work entitled "Tombeau de Couperin." Other important numbers on Sunday afternoon are Brahms Fourth Symphony; "Essay for Orchestra," by the American composer Samuel Barber; and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the old-fashioned Roguish Manner, in Rondo Forms.

This Clipping From
BEAVER, PA.
DAILY TIMES

DEC 5 - 1941

GROVE CITY, PA
REPORTER
12/5/41

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JEANETTE, PA.
NEWS-DISPATCH
DEC 5 - 1941

This Clipping From INDIANA, PA.
GAZETTE

DEC 10 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMBRIDGE, PA.
CITIZEN
DEC 11 1941

This Clipping From
This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES
DEC 2-1941

Mozart This Week At Boston Symphony

Honoring the 150th anniversary of the death of Mozart, the date of which is next Friday, Dec. 5, Sexge Koussevitzky is featuring the music of this master at each of the four concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this week.

At the second concerts of the Monday evening-Tuesday afternoon series (last night and this afternoon at 3, the Commuters') Frances Nash is soloist. Miss Nash appears in Mozart's piano concerto in D major "Coronation," K. 537). Dr. Koussevitzky also is conducting Mozart's Haffner Symphony and Tchaikowsky's 6th, the "Pathetique."

The second pair of concerts will take place Friday afternoon and Saturday evening with Antonio Brosa, the Spanish violinist, making his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At this pair of concerts excerpts from Mozart's Requiem also will be performed, the Cecilia Society Chorus, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, combining with the orchestra. The movements to be played are: Requiem, Dies Irae, Rex Tremendae, Confutatis, Lacrimosa, Cum Sanctis Tuis. The "Jupiter" Symphony in C major will also be played, and the Violin Concerto in D major, K. No. 218, by Antonio Brosa and the orchestra.

MOZART WEEK BY SYMPHONY

Boston Post

Orchestra Observes Anniversary of His Death

Dec 2, 1941

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This is Mozart week at Symphony Hall, in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the composer's death, which befalls on Friday, and the ceremonies began last evening with performances of the "Haffner" Symphony and the so-called "Coronation" Concerto for piano, with Frances Nash as the soloist. In violent contrast, even though Mozart was Tchaikovsky's favorite composer, the remainder of the concert was given over to the Russian's "Pathetic" Symphony. The same programme will be heard this afternoon.

Both the Symphony and the Concerto were a happy choice. The former has not been overworked at the Symphony concerts, particularly since Dr. Koussevitzky's coming, and the latter, for some peculiar reason, was being heard at them for the first time. Composed in 1788, the year of the three last symphonies, this Concerto is of the mature Mozart and like others of his later works sounds prophetically modern in spots. The whole Concerto is charming and the middle movement is Mozart at his most appealing. The performance was a fine one all around and Miss Nash was warmly received.

As Mr. Burk's notes reminded us, the "Haffner" Symphony was written in such haste that the composer did not remember a note of the score when it was brought to his attention a few months later. And yet with the "Prague" Symphony in the same key, D major, it ranks very close to the E-flat major, G minor and "Jupiter" symphonies mentioned above. With choruses from the requiem and a violin concerto played by Antonio Brosa the "Jupiter," greatest of them all, will be heard at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. In the meantime these Mozartean exercises have begun most auspiciously.

HARTFORD, CONN
TIMES
12/3/41

Words About
MUSIC
And Musicians

Excerpts from Mozart's Requiem Mass will be presented in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of his death by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week in the Massachusetts capital.

The Cecelia Society Chorus, of which Arthur Fiedler is conductor, will assist under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Antonio Brosa will be soloist in the Mozart Concerto for Violin in D major, No. 4 (Koechel No. 218) and the orchestra also will present the Mozart Jupiter Symphony in C major (Koechel No. 551).

Boston Herald
MUSIC
Dec 2, 1941

Monday Symphony
By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The second concert of the subsidiary series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. Frances Nash, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:
Mozart—Symphony in D major, K. 385.
Mozart—Piano Concerto in D major, K. 537.
Tchaikovsky—Symphony No. 6 in B minor Op. 74.

This week, as every one should by now know, marks the 150th anniversary of Mozart's death. Exactly that period of years ago to the day next Friday his body was placed into a public grave in the Vienna cemetery. The knowing visitor used to smile in the little museum of the Mozart house in Salzburg at the "actual" skull of the composer in its glass case, for it could obviously never have been authentically recovered. At the same time it is ironic to observe today that no composer is more highly venerated, more shrewdly and justly appraised and, by and large, more genuinely liked than Mozart.

The "Haffner" Symphony and the "Coronation" Concerto, offered on last night's program, are cases in point. The first is a perfect small symphony. The minuet is not perhaps Mozart's highest flight of the imagination, but the slow movement is one of his most completely enchanting. The so-called "Coronation" Concerto has never been played at a Boston Symphony concert before. This is only excusable on the grounds that there are so many of them. It has been pointed out that the concerto as he wrote it was one of Mozart's great contributions to musical architecture; and this particular one, as a late example, with many lovely details and a quite divinely simple larghetto, should certainly have been heard at one of these concerts before this.

Miss Nash, the soloist, has the real feeling for Mozart. She is an utterly unpretentious pianist, very likely—though we do not know this—a specialist in Mozart's piano music. She has so obviously worked out a combination of clear technique, graceful phrasing and deference to the music in hand that this impression is not to be gainsaid. The result was a truly charming performance of the concerto, in which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra played the admirable counterpart.

The concert ended, rather oddly for a Mozart memorial, with the "Pathetique" Symphony of Tchaikovsky, the qualities of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of which are too well known to need further comment at this time. This concert will be repeated tomorrow afternoon, and more Mozart will be heard at the regular concerts at the end of the week.

Globe
MUSIC
SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The so-called "Coronation" Piano Concerto in D major (K. 537) by Mozart, his last but one, was given its probable first performance in Boston at last evening's Symphony concert. Frances Nash was the soloist. Before the Concerto, Serge Koussevitzky conducted Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony in D major and after, Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

Though written three years previously, this Concerto acquired its name because Mozart played it at a concert he gave during the coronation of Leopold II. A polished and difficult work on a grand scale, it somehow does not display the abundant invention which was Mozart's hallmark elsewhere. Comparatively, it is static.

Miss Nash set forth the piano's portion of the Concerto in small, almost chamber music proportions. The style was clean and very clear, for she negotiated her part with a nearly precious facility. The legato playing was not quite smooth enough to make the tone sing as it must for Mozart. Mr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment was appropriately subdued and nicely balanced to the piano. But, frankly romantic, the Concerto seemed to call for a most robust treatment.

In the "Haffner" Symphony emotion ran warm and human. But it lacked clarity; not the studied artificialty of a surface gloss, but the crystal clarity which reveals the depths.

For the Tchaikovsky Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky and his men reserved a great and climactic performance. It was a memorable playing of a familiar work. The strings responded with the utmost sensitivity. The brass choir was superb. The rest—as good as they can be. The adagio of the finale came as a throbbing calm after storm. A long tense silence followed the last, the longest pianissimo this listener has heard. And the applause was thunderous.

The program will be repeated this afternoon at 3.

Cheer Koussevitzky on Symphony Return

Mozart Memorial Concert Features Matinee

Globe Dec 6

Yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert was a memorable one, marked not only by the return of Dr. Koussevitzky after a week's absence, but also by a distinguished program of Mozart in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of Mozart's death. The audience brought Koussevitzky back again and again to acknowledge his final number, the familiar and beloved "Jupiter" symphony, and there was enthusiastic applause for soloist Antonio Brosa for his playing of the Concerto for violin and for the Cecilia Society Chorus work in the "Requiem."

Christian Science Monitor - Dec 4, 1941

Antonio Brosa
Soloist in Mozart Violin Concerto in D major (K.218) at the Boston Symphony concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

This Clipping From Springfield Union
Press
DEC 3 1941

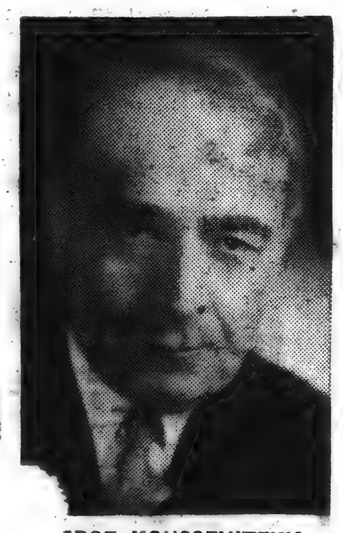
Boston Symphony Will Play on December 10

Ann Arbor, Mich., Dec. 3—The University Musical Society will present two important concerts in December preceding the holiday vacation.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will come to Ann Arbor for its twelfth consecutive annual visit Wednesday evening, Dec. 10. Dr. Koussevitzky has prepared the following program: Mozart's Symphony in D major (Haffner); Symphony No. 3 by William Schuman; and Symphony No. 4 in E minor, by Brahms.

The traditional Christmas presentation of Handel's "Messiah" will take place Sunday afternoon, Dec. 14, at 4:15, in Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor, at which time the University Choral Union, the University Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Thor Johnson, will join forces with the following soloists, in a presentation of this monumental work: Marie Wilkins, soprano, who was recently heard on the Metropolitan Auditions of the Air; Edwina Eustis, distinguished contralto; Ernest McChesney, tenor, of wide renoun; and Douglas Beattie, bass, of the Metropolitan Opera. Palmer Christian will be at the organ. To partly defray the expense of production, a nominal charge will be made.

To Conduct



ERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

This Clipping From
NEW KENSINGTON, PA.
DISPATCH
DEC 4-1941

Boston Symphony Appears In Pgh.

Residents of New Kensington who are musically inclined will be interested in the annual visit of the Boston symphony orchestra—always a highlight in the Pittsburgh musical season. Two memorable programs are offered for their December concerts at Syria Mosque this season.

On Saturday evening, December 13, Serge Koussevitzky will include a modern work by a native American, William Howard Schuman. Pittsburgh will hear his Third Symphony, which had its first performance at the Boston Symphony concerts in October this year, and was likewise introduced to New York by the Boston Symphony in November. Mr. Schumann's principal teacher in composition was Roy Harris, who is well known in Pittsburgh where his works have been given by the Boston Symphony. Mr. Schuman's Third Symphony is inscribed to Serge Koussevitzky. Other works on the Saturday evening program are Mozart's "Haffner Symphony," and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique."

The Sunday afternoon program on December 14th, will open with Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin." In this work Ravel has preserved something of the old elegance of the early dance forms, while filling them with the color, verve and freer invention of his own day. In addition to Ravel, the Sunday program will include "Romeo and Juliet Suite" by Prokofieff; "Till Eulenspeigel's Merry Pranks" by Strauss; and the Fourth Symphony by Brahms.

APOLLO, PA
NEWS
12/12/41

The Musical Forecast
PITTSBURGH, PA.

DEC -- 1941

CHARLEROI, PA.
MAIL

DEC 13 1941

WILKINSBURG, PA
GAZETTE
12/5/41

Boston Symphony Plays At Mosque On Dec. 13 And 14

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Pittsburgh is always a highlight of the musical season, and attracts music-lovers from the surrounding territory within a radius of 50 miles. Two concerts will be given at Syria Mosque by this celebrated orchestra of 110 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, and both promise to be memorable events.

On Sunday evening, December 13, the program will feature a modern work in the Third Symphony by William Schuman, which was pronounced the best work by an American of the rising generation when it was given in New York City last month. Other numbers on the Saturday evening program are the Mozart "Haffner" Symphony, and the favorite "Pathetique" Symphony by Tschaikowsky.

The Sunday afternoon program on December 14 will open with Ravel's most beauiful work entitled "Tombeau de Couperin." Other important numbers on Sunday afternoon are Brahms Fourth Symphony; "Essay for Orchestra," by the American composer Samuel Barber; and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the old-fashioned Roguish Manner, in Rondo Forms.

This Clipping From
BEAVER, PA.
DAILY TIMES
DEC 5-1941
GROVE CITY, PA
REPORTER
12/5/41
THIS CLIPPING FROM
JEANETTE, PA.
NEWS-DISPATCH
DEC 5-1941
This Clipping From
INDIANA, PA.
GAZETTE
DEC 10 1941
THIS CLIPPING FROM AMBRIDGE, PA.
CITIZEN
DEC 11 1941

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
DEC 2-1941

Mozart This Week At Boston Symphony

Honoring the 150th anniversary of the death of Mozart, the date of which is next Friday, Dec. 5, Sexge Koussevitzky is featuring the music of this master at each of the four concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this week.

At the second concerts of the Monday evening-Tuesday afternoon series (last night and this afternoon at 3, the Commuters') Frances Nash is soloist. Miss Nash appears in Mozart's piano concerto in D major "Coronation," K. 537). Dr. Koussevitzky also is conducting Mozart's Haffner Symphony and Tchaikowsky's 6th, the "Pathetique."

The regular pair of concerts will take place Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with Antonio Brosa, the Spanish violinist, making his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At this pair of concerts excerpts from Mozart's Requiem Mass will be performed, the Cecilia Society Chorus, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, combining with the orchestra. The movements to be played are: Requiem, Dies Irae, Rex Tremendae, Confutatis, Lacrimosa, Cum Sanctis Tuis. The "Jupiter" Symphony in C major will also be played, and the Violin Concerto in D major, K. No. 218, by Antonio Brosa and the orchestra.

MOZART WEEK BY SYMPHONY

Boston Post

Orchestra Observes Anniversary of His Death

Dec 2, 1941

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This is Mozart week at Symphony Hall, in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the composer's death, which befalls on Friday, and the ceremonies began last evening with performances of the "Haffner" Symphony and the so-called "Coronation" Concerto for piano, with Frances Nash as the soloist. In violent contrast, even though Mozart was Tchaikovsky's favorite composer, the remainder of the concert was given over to the Russian's "Pathetic" Symphony. The same programme will be heard this afternoon.

Both the Symphony and the Concerto were a happy choice. The former has not been overworked at the Symphony concerts, particularly since Dr. Koussevitzky's coming, and the latter, for some peculiar reason, was being heard at them for the first time. Composed in 1788, the year of the three last symphonies, this Concerto is of the mature Mozart and like others of his later works sounds prophetically modern in spots. The whole Concerto is charming and the middle movement is Mozart at his most appealing. The performance was a fine one all around and Miss Nash was warmly received.

As Mr. Burk's notes reminded us, the "Haffner" Symphony was written in such haste that the composer did not remember a note of the score when it was brought to his attention a few months later. And yet with the "Prague" Symphony in the same key, D major, it ranks very close to the E-flat major, G minor and "Jupiter" symphonies mentioned above. With choruses from the requiem and a violin concerto played by Antonio Brosa the "Jupiter," greatest of them all, will be heard at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. In the meantime these Mozartean exercises have begun most auspiciously.

HARTFORD, CONN
TIMES
12/3/41

Words About
MUSIC
And Musicians

Excerpts from Mozart's Requiem Mass will be presented in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of his death by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week in the Massachusetts capital.

The Cecelia Society Chorus, of which Arthur Fiedler is conductor, will assist under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Antonio Brosa will be soloist in the Mozart Concerto for Violin in D major, No. 4 (Koechel No. 218) and the orchestra also will present the Mozart Jupiter Symphony in C major (Koechel No. 551).

Boston Herald MUSIC Dec 2, 1941

Monday Symphony
By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The second concert of the subsidiary series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. Frances Nash, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:
Mozart—Symphony in D major, K. 385.
Mozart—Piano Concerto in D major, K. 537.
Tchaikovsky—Symphony No. 6 in B minor Op. 74.

This week, as every one should by now know, marks the 150th anniversary of Mozart's death. Exactly that period of years ago to the day next Friday his body was placed into a public grave in the Vienna cemetery. The knowing visitor used to smile in the little museum of the Mozart house in Salzburg at the "actual" skull of the composer in its glass case, for it could obviously never have been authentically recovered. At the same time it is ironic to observe today that no composer is more highly venerated, more shrewdly and justly appraised and, by and large, more genuinely liked than Mozart.

The "Haffner" Symphony and the "Coronation" Concerto, offered on last night's program, are cases in point. The first is a perfect small symphony. The minuet is not perhaps Mozart's highest flight of the imagination, but the slow movement is one of his most completely enchanting. The so-called "Coronation" Concerto has never been played at a Boston Symphony concert before. This is only excusable on the grounds that there are so many of them. It has been pointed out that the concerto as he wrote it was one of Mozart's great contributions to musical architecture; and this particular one, as a late example, with many lovely details and a quite divinely simple larghetto, should certainly have been heard at one of these concerts before this.

Miss Nash, the soloist, has the real feeling for Mozart. She is an utterly unpretentious pianist, very likely—though we do not know this—a specialist in Mozart's piano music. She has so obviously worked out a combination of clear technique, graceful phrasing and deference to the music in hand that this impression is not to be gainsaid. The result was a truly charming performance of the concerto, in which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra played the admirable counterpart.

The concert ended, rather oddly for a Mozart memorial, with the "Pathetique" Symphony of Tchaikovsky, the qualities of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of which are too well known to need further comment at this time. This concert will be repeated tomorrow afternoon, and more Mozart will be heard at the regular concerts at the end of the week.

Globe MUSIC Dec 4

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The so-called "Coronation" Piano Concerto in D major (K. 537) by Mozart, his last but one, was given its probable first performance in Boston at last evening's Symphony concert. Frances Nash was the soloist. Before the Concerto, Serge Koussevitzky conducted Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony in D major and after, Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

Though written three years previously, this Concerto acquired its name because Mozart played it at a concert he gave during the coronation of Leopold II. A polished and difficult work on a grand scale, it somehow does not display the abundant invention which was Mozart's hallmark elsewhere. Comparatively, it is static.

Miss Nash set forth the piano's portion of the Concerto in small, almost chamber music proportions. The style was clean and very clear, for she negotiated her part with a nearly precious facility. The legato playing was not quite smooth enough to make the tone sing as it must for Mozart. Mr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment was appropriately subdued and nicely balanced to the piano. But, frankly romantic, the Concerto seemed to call for a most robust treatment.

In the "Haffner" Symphony emotion ran warm and human. But it lacked clarity; not the studied artificialty of a surface gloss, but the crystal clarity which reveals the depths.

For the Tchaikovsky Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky and his men reserved a great and climactic performance. It was a memorable playing of a familiar work. The strings responded with the utmost sensitivity. The brass choir was superb. The rest—as good as they can be. The adagio of the finale came as a throbbing calm after storm. A long tense silence followed the last, the longest pianissimo this listener has heard. And the applause was thunderous.

The program will be repeated this afternoon at 3.

Cheer Koussevitzky on Symphony Return

Mozart Memorial Concert Features Matinee

Globe Dec 6

Yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert was a memorable one, marked not only by the return of Dr. Koussevitzky after a week's absence, but also by a distinguished program of Mozart in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of Mozart's death. The audience brought Koussevitzky back again and again to acknowledge his final number, the familiar and beloved "Jupiter" symphony, and there was enthusiastic applause for soloist Antonio Brosa for his playing of the Concerto for violin and for the Cecilia Society Chorus work in the "Requiem."

Christian Science Monitor - Dec 4, 1941

Antonio Brosa
Soloist in Mozart Violin Concerto in D major (K.218) at the Boston Symphony concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

This Clipping From
Providence Sunday Press
DEC 7 1941

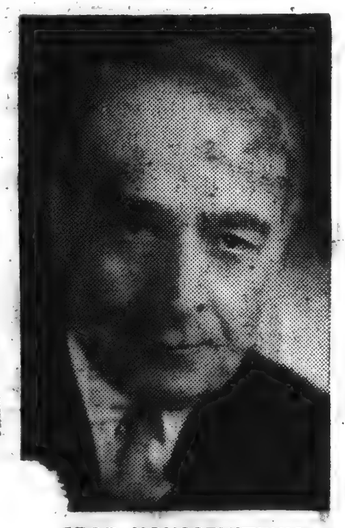
Boston Symphony Will Play on December 10

Ann Arbor, Mich., Dec. 3—The University Musical Society will present two important concerts in December preceding the holiday vacation.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will come to Ann Arbor for its twelfth consecutive annual visit Wednesday evening, Dec. 10. Dr. Koussevitzky has prepared the following program: Mozart's Symphony in D major (Haffner); Symphony No. 3 by William Schuman; and Symphony No. 4 in E minor, by Brahms.

The traditional Christmas presentation of Handel's "Messiah" will take place Sunday afternoon, Dec. 14, at 4:15, in Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor, at which time the University Choral Union, the University Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Thor Johnson, will join forces with the following soloists, in a presentation of this monumental work: Marie Wilkins, soprano, who was recently heard on the Metropolitan Auditions of the Air; Edwina Eustis, distinguished contralto; Ernest McChesney, tenor, of wide renoun; and Douglas Beattie, bass, of the Metropolitan Opera. Palmer Christian will be at the organ. To partly defray the expense of production, a nominal charge will be made.

To Conduct



ERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

This Clipping From
NEW KENSINGTON, PA.
DISPATCH
DEC 4-1941

Boston Symphony Appears In Pgh.

Residents of New Kensington who are musically inclined will be interested in the annual visit of the Boston symphony orchestra—always a highlight in the Pittsburgh musical season. Two memorable programs are offered for their December concerts at Syria Mosque this season.

On Saturday evening, December 13, Serge Koussevitzky will include a modern work by a native American, William Howard Schuman. Pittsburgh will hear his Third Symphony, which had its first performance at the Boston Symphony concerts in October this year, and was likewise introduced to New York by the Boston Symphony in November. Mr. Schumann's principal teacher in composition was Roy Harris, who is well known in Pittsburgh where his works have been given by the Boston Symphony. Mr. Schuman's Third Symphony is inscribed to Serge Koussevitzky. Other works on the Saturday evening program are Mozart's "Haffner Symphony," and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique."

The Sunday afternoon program on December 14th, will open with Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin." In this work Ravel has preserved something of the old elegance of the early dance forms, while filling them with the color, verve and freer invention of his own day. In addition to Ravel, the Sunday program will include "Romeo and Juliet Suite" by Prokofieff; "Till Eulenspeigel's Merry Pranks" by Strauss; and the Fourth Symphony by Brahms.

APOLLO, PA
NEWS
12/12/41

The Musical Forecast
PITTSBURGH, PA.

DEC -- 1941
CHARLEROI, PA.
MAIL
DEC 13 1941

WILKINSBURG, PA
GAZETTE
12/5/41

Boston Symphony Plays At Mosque On Dec. 13 And 14

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Pittsburgh is always a highlight of the musical season, and attracts music-lovers from the surrounding territory within a radius of 50 miles. Two concerts will be given at Syria Mosque by this celebrated orchestra of 110 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, and both promise to be memorable events.

On Sunday evening, December 13, the program will feature a modern work in the Third Symphony by William Schuman, which was pronounced the best work by an American of the rising generation when it was given in New York City last month. Other numbers on the Saturday evening program are the Mozart "Haffner" Symphony, and the favorite "Pathetique" Symphony by Tschaikowsky.

The Sunday afternoon program on December 14 will open with Ravel's most beauiful work entitled "Tombeau de Couperin." Other important numbers on Sunday afternoon are Brahms Fourth Symphony; "Essay for Orchestra," by the American composer Samuel Barber; and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the old-fashioned Roguish Manner, in Rondo Forms.

This Clipping From
BEAVER, PA.
DAILY TIMES
DEC 5-1941
GROVE CITY, PA
REPORTER
12/5/41
THIS CLIPPING FROM
JEANETTE, PA.
NEWS-DISPATCH
DEC 5-1941
This Clipping From
INDIANA, PA.
GAZETTE
DEC 10 1941
THIS CLIPPING FROM AMBRIDGE, PA.
CITIZEN
DEC 11 1941

Boston Herald Dec. 6

Symphony on Tour

Next week, as the reviewers say, Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra will be "on tour," and there will be no concerts in Symphony hall. So far as Boston is concerned, this may tell the whole story. But to a half a dozen other cities, it promises one of the events of the musical season. Probably upwards of 20,000 people scattered through New York, Michigan, Ohio and Pennsylvania have already made their plans accordingly. Next Monday night the orchestra will play in Rochester; Tuesday in Buffalo; Wednesday in Ann Arbor; Thursday in Toledo; Friday in Columbus; and Saturday and Sunday in Pittsburgh. Every concert will be a "sell-out," including the two in Pittsburgh, which will be given in a hall seating 4000.

Its reputation as one of the great orchestras of the world securely established, the B. S. O. is enjoying about the best "road business" in its history. Although Messrs. Toscanini and Stokowski may be more famous individually, because of their radio performances, Mr. Koussevitzky's long association with the Boston orchestra has created a fame for ensemble artistry which is unexcelled. The two New York series of concerts are sold out for the winter. So is the Brooklyn one. The concerts to be given later in the season in Philadelphia and Washington will undoubtedly draw similar houses.

All of which may cause some persons to wonder why the orchestra does not make longer or more frequent tours. Besides the loyalty which it naturally feels to its home community, there are more practical factors which have developed the now long-standing policy of twenty-four weeks of cconcerts in Boston and six on tour. Possibly most decisive is the fact that the orchestra, like any musician, has to stay at home a good part of the time and practice. Performances of familiar works have to be refreshed, new works have to be studiously rehearsed. Only in this way can the band feel confident of maintaining, both at home and abroad, the good repute of half a century.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION
DEC 6 - 1941

Boston Symphony Here Dec. 8

Sixty-one years of virtuoso performing will be the background for the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra when that ensemble appears in the Eastman Theatre Monday evening, Dec. 8.

Naturally such a background has given rise to a tradition in performance as rich as may be boasted by any orchestra in the entire world.

Rochester is one of the few cities in the country that hears the Boston Symphony and its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, year after year. This in itself reflects the high standard of musical taste abounding in local music patrons and results in some of the finest playing of these Boston tours.

For the local concert, Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen a program that will place on display the special attributes of the Boston ensemble through which it has attained the title of "virtuoso orchestra."

The program includes Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin"; Debussy's "La Mer" and the Tschaikowsky Symphony "Pathetique."

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
DEC 6 - 1941

Boston Symphony In Two Concerts

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Koussevitzky conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two concerts next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon at Syria Mosque.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
DEC 6 - 1941

Reviewer's Praise Spans 50 Years

This is the 60th year of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, which the Symphony Club will present at Memorial Hall next Friday night, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Tickets are at Heaton's and at Long's.

It was the late great critic, W. J. Henderson, of New York, who had heard the orchestra under Gericke on its first bow to New York in 1885, four years after its founding. The early orchestra, he admitted, was a great one. But, on the 50th anniversary, Koussevitzky leading the group, Henderson wrote that "The Boston Symphony" was "still a magnificent instrument, still a company of virtuosi, still a splendid and puissant force in the musical vigor of the country, still under the artistic direction of a conductor of wide vision, catholic taste, technical mastery and inexhaustible ardor."

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
DEC 7 - 1941

Conductor

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Syria Mosque Saturday night and next Sunday afternoon.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
DEC 7 - 1941

American Composer To Discuss Works

William Howard Schuman, noted American composer, will give a lecture on Modern Music at Outlines, 341 Boulevard of the Allies, on Wednesday at 8:30 p. m.

He will also discuss his third symphony which the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will play here on Dec. 13 at Syria Mosque.

One of the foremost creative musicians, Mr. Schuman has composed many works in various forms. His Overture for an American Festival was played here recently by the Pittsburgh Symphony Society under Dr. Fritz Reiner, and a fourth symphony has just been completed.

This Clipping From
WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS-REGISTER
DEC 7 - 1941

Boston Symphony At Pittsburgh

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Pittsburgh is always a highlight in the musical season of this section, and two memorable programs are offered for their concerts at Syria Mosque this season. On Saturday evening, December 13, Serge Koussevitzky will include a work by a native American, William Howard Schuman. The audience will hear his Third Symphony, which had its first performance at the Boston Symphony concerts in October this year, and was likewise introduced to New York by the Boston Symphony in November. Mr. Schuman's principal teacher in composition was Roy Harris. This Symphony is inscribed to Koussevitzky. Other works on the Saturday evening program are Mozart's "Haffner Symphony" and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique."

The Sunday afternoon program on December 10 will open with Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin." In this work Ravel has preserved something of the old elegance of the early dance forms, while filling them with the color, verve and freer invention of his own day. In addition to Ravel, the Sunday program will include "Romeo and Juliet Suite," by Prokofieff; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by Strauss, and Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

DETROIT, MICH
FREE PRESS
12/7/41

ANN ARBOR CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will pay its twelfth annual visit to Ann Arbor Wednesday night when it appears in Hill Auditorium. The following program has been prepared: Mozart's Symphony in D major (Haffner); Symphony No. 3, by William Schuman, and Symphony No. 4 in E minor, by Brahms.

This Clipping From TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES
DEC 7 - 1941

Symphony Music Lecture To Be Held at Museum

BEETHOVEN'S monumental Symphony No. 3 in E Flat major, the "Eroica," will be the subject of a lecture to be given Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock in the Museum of Art Lecture hall by A. Beverly Barksdale.

Cleomary Conte will illustrate portions of the symphony at the piano. This work will be the major offering when the Boston Symphony orchestra appears in the peristyle Thursday evening for the annual members' concert.

This Clipping From DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
DEC 7 - 1941

Boston Symphony Plays in Ann Arbor

THE UNIVERSITY MUSICAL SOCIETY of Ann Arbor will present two important concerts in December preceding the holiday vacation.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will come to Ann Arbor for its twelfth consecutive annual visit Wednesday evening.

The traditional Christmas presentation of Handel's "Messiah" will take place next Sunday at 4:15 p. m. in Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor, at which time the University Choral union, and the University Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Thor Johnson, will join forces with the soloists, in a presentation of this monumental work.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
DEC 7 - 1941

* * *

Bostonians Returning

The return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for [illegible] performances this coming week-end at Syria Mosque is always reason for rejoicing. Saturday night's program [illegible] severe, Mozart's "Haffner Symphony," Tchaikowsky's "Pathetique Symphony" and [illegible] American symphony by [illegible] Schuman.

Schuman [illegible] Roy Harris, but [illegible] far more invention [illegible] cher. From the Overture [illegible] Fritz Reiner played some weeks ago we learned what a master craftsman he is; from his symphony we shall hear how eloquently he can write in larger forms. Its four movements come from patterns out of the ancient suite: Passacaglia, Fugue, Chorale and Toccata.

For the Sunday matinee Brahms Fourth Symphony, a favorite with Director Serge Koussevitsky, strikes the keynote. An arrangement of Ravel's piano composition "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" Suite, and Strauss' "Til Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" complete that program.

CONDUCTOR—Serge Koussevitsky, above, will visit Pittsburgh this week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for concerts on Saturday night and next Sunday afternoon at Syria Mosque. Two different programs have been arranged by the Bostonians.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
DEC 7 - 1941

Dr. Hanson Accepts Invitation To Conduct Boston Symphony

Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music, has accepted an invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts, the first in Cambridge on Dec. 18 and the two following in Boston on Dec. 19 and 20, it was announced yesterday.

DR. HOWARD HANSON

Dr. Hanson left Rochester Friday night for Berea, Ohio, where he will be guest conductor at the final concert of the Baldwin-Wallace College music festival, this year devoted to works by American composers. The day after Christmas he will go to Minneapolis, where the Music Teachers National Association and National Association of Music Schools, of the latter of which Dr. Hanson is president, will be in joint session. On Dec. 28 he will be guest conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra in one of its Sunday "Twilight Series." Delegates of the associations will be guests of the orchestra.

Dr. Hanson in his Boston concerts will conduct his Third Symphony, given its first performances two seasons ago by the Boston Symphony, Dr. Serge Koussevitzy conducting, in Boston, New York and Rochester. The present performances of this work will bring its Boston hearings to eight. In Berea Dr. Hanson conducts his "Romantic" Symphony and at Minneapolis the program includes his Third Symphony.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 8th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Antonio Brosa, violinist, was the soloist. Also assisting was the Cecilia Society Chorus, Arthur Fiedler, director. The program was as follows:

Mozart...Excerpts from the Requiem Mass
Mozart..Concerto for Violin in D Major, K. 218
Mozart...Symphony in C major, K. 551

This concert was a plendid tribute to the genius of Mozart, whose melancholy death 150 years ago it commemorated. There was a time when a good deal of nonsense was written about Mozart, but happily that day has largely passed. Recent scholars have shrewdly analyzed his greatness and discussed his art with some sense for what it is, not what it might have been.

Mr. Koussevitzky set before us, as a matter of fact, three sides of that art and thereby constructed a program of contrast and provided a real insight into the composer's achievement. The Requiem shows Mozart's admiration for Bach, whose works he came to know after he had been a composer for some time. The Violin Concerto shows his gallant and youthful side and also his handling of concerto form as he established it. The Symphony, finally, shows the absolute master in one of his finest works. We submit that it would be hard to design a better commemorative program.

It is certainly one of the tragedies of art that Mozart did not live to finish his Requiem. The parts that he did complete are so perfect that the whole work would undoubtedly have become one of the monuments of choral music. Even as it stands the music is infinitely moving. Its affinity is for Bach, so that it is doubtful if any composer in 1791 would have known how to finish it as Mozart would have. Bach was a dead letter at that time, though Mozart knew him from seeing his manuscripts.

We last heard the Requiem in the Salzburg Cathedral in 1934 as a memorial service for Dolfuss, the murdered chancellor of Austria. It was an impressive occasion and more so now from hindsight. The performance yesterday was on the whole a good one. We could ask for a higher degree of choral excellence than the Cecilia Society was able to summon. But in view of the general apathy of the public towards choral music we are probably lucky to get routine competence.

This, the most popular of Mozart's Violin Concertos, heard right after the Requiem, provided a startling contrast of light and shadow. It is a charming work and not so easy to play as it sounds. Mr. Brosa was a bit uneven at first, especially in matters of pitch; but he played the andante most gracefully and the finale in admirable taste. The audience brought him back several times to the stage.

The best performance all afternoon, however, was that of the great C major Symphony. Every time you hear one of the three—the C major, the E flat and the G minor—you think of it as the finest of the lot. Both the first movements of the other two are a shade better than the Jupiter. But it has the advantage of perhaps the loveliest slow movement and, of course, the extraordinary finale. It never ceases to amaze us how Mozart juggles his themes and keeps the whole thing going up to the final chord. Mr. Koussevitzky has a most sympathetic ear for Mozart, and he and the orchestra gave an astonishingly fine performance of the Symphony.

Next week the orchestra goes on its western tour. At the concerts of Dec. 19 and 20 Howard Hanson will conduct his own 3rd Symphony, and Richard Burgin will conduct Walton's "Portsmouth Point" Overture and Strauss' Symphonia Domestica. Meanwhile, if you were not at Friday's Mozart concert, do not miss it tonight.

This Clipping From

Boston American
Dec 7 1941

Conductor

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in its Choral Union appearance here at 8:30 Wednesday night. The concert will be presented in Hill auditorium.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
DEC 8 - 1941

Boston Symphony To Play Tonight At Eastman

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra will make its annual Rochester visit this evening playing a program at the Eastman Theater under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

For the symphony there will be the Tschaikowsky "Pathetique," the program including also Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" and Debussy's "La Mer."

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Just 150 years ago this afternoon the body of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart was taken, during a bad storm, to the churchyard of St. Marx, beyond the city gates of Vienna, and there placed in a pauper's grave. The composer, who had been working during his last days on the Requiem Mass, had died shortly before 1 o'clock on the morning of Dec. 5 1791. Not one of his friends was present at the actual burial, and the Baron van Swieten, Mozart's wealthy patron, did no more than advise the widow Constanze Mozart to arrange the cheapest funeral. In such pathetic loneliness and neglect the mortal Mozart vanished.

Mozart the Immortal, the creator of the great symphonies, the operas, chamber music and concertos, lives on. The music he left behind is one of the fabulous treasures of the art. Because it is so, the memory of the gay little genius is honored today.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are this week observing the anniversary of Mozart's death with a program that includes excerpts from the Requiem, the Violin Concerto in D major (K. 218), and the "Jupiter" Symphony. The chorus of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, assists in the Requiem music, and the soloist for the concerto is Antonio Brosa.

Yesterday afternoon all three works were superbly performed. The Cecilia chorus sang with a thrilling solidity and vitality, and Boston's great orchestra was at its best. What if the slow movement of the Symphony was taken very slowly, and the finale very fast? Neither the spirit nor the letter of the score was disturbed.

No doubt Mr. Koussevitzky had his reasons for giving us part of the Requiem. That much served only to make some listeners wish they could have heard it all. It does seem unfortunate that four soloists were not found and the whole presented. Yet some was better than none at all. The Requiem is one of the greatest of choral religious works of art, even if Mozart's death resulted in its being completed by his pupil, Suessmayr.

Mr. Brosa, a Spanish violinist now living in this country, made his Boston debut yesterday afternoon. He is a sound musician, on the evidence of a single performance. His tone is clear, bright and warm, though not large. There was style, elasticity and delicacy in his Mozart, qualities which were not obscured by a few tentative places in the first movement, and a momentary mixup between orchestra and soloist at the outset of the finale. His playing was not exactly brilliant, but it was fine.

The audience had a chance to see Mr. Koussevitzky as the orchestra sees him; the conductor turned about after the first measure of "The Star Spangled Banner," which opened the concert, and invited the audience to sing. In this position he remained to the end of the National Anthem, conducting an audience who could have responded much better than they did to his thoughtful and gracious invitation.

Next week the orchestra goes on its annual tour of the Mid-West. At the concerts of Dec. 19 and 20, Richard Burgin will conduct William Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point," and the "Domestic Symphony" by Strauss; Howard Hanson will again give us his Third Symphony.

C. W. D.

KOUSSEVITZKY LEADS SINGING

Turns to Audience to Conduct Anthem

Boston Post Dec 6

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Because he had a chorus at his disposal—the Cecilia Society, assembled to sing portions of Mozart's Requiem, in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the composer's death—Dr. Koussevitzky decided yesterday afternoon to have "The Star Spangled Banner," which now precedes all orchestral concerts, sung as well as played. And having started chorus and orchestra on their way, he turned his back to these forces and conducted the standing audience. Those who were not too fascinated by the conductor's facial play, in their first experience of it, joined in the singing.

As befitted the occasion, the programme was all Mozart. In addition to excerpts from the Requiem, it offered the Violin Concerto No. 4 in D major, with Antonio Brosa as soloist, and the "Jupiter" Symphony. Since there was no solo quartet, only these parts of the Requiem were heard: The Requiem, Dies Irae, Rex Tremendae, Confutatis, Lacrimosa and "Cum sanctis tuis," from the Agnus Dei.

Between the Requiem and the "Jupiter," the Concerto, one of the five that Mozart wrote in his 20th year, was snowed under. And added to the natural disadvantage of being placed between two examples of Mozart at his greatest, this youthful and agreeable work suffered further from a rather wooden performance at the hands of Mr. Brosa. The leader of a renowned quartet, now disbanded, Mr. Brosa is probably more at home in chamber music, where his reticence and sobriety and his rather small tone would be more suitable and appropriate. As it was, the Concerto came and went as pleasant enough interlude, and the listener, homeward bound, found his thoughts turning to the two masterpieces so divergently representative of the composer's genius.

There has been much written about the Requiem. At first it was held that Suessmayr could not possibly have been capable of completing the score, and then it was maintained, since the music was not Mozart at his best, there was no reason why his apt pupil should not have finished the job in a perfectly satisfactory manner. The truth of the matter would seem to be that the Requiem is really of the greater Mozart, but that a well-schooled musician like Suessmayr, working from Mozart's sketches, could actually continue the music at the composer's own level, even though he would have been quite incapable of creating it in the first place. Those who think of Mozart's music as relatively slight could not hold that point of view when confronted with such powerful examples of it as the Dies Irae and Rex Tremendae. Here is the Mozart who, in somewhat different vein, wrote the final score in "Don Giovanni."

Trying to cover up his tracks after having rashly called Brahms' C minor "the Tenth Symphony," the always wise-cracking von Buelow hastened to explain that he would put it between the Second and the "Eroica" of Beethoven, and that for Beethoven's First he would substitute Mozart's "Jupiter." Hearing that Symphony yesterday one could agree with Buelow, and go still further and proclaim it the highest point in symphonic composition until the "Eroica" dwarfed all previous symphonies by Beethoven or any other master.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
DEC 8 - 1941

Bostonians

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Columbus Friday night, visits the colleges of our eastern states as a regular and important part of its yearly itinerary.

In its tours the Boston Symphony has played within the following college precincts: Wellesley, Mt. Holyoke, Smith College, the University of Vermont, Middlebury College, Dartmouth College, Yale, Connecticut College, Princeton University, Rutgers University, Cornell University, University of Michigan, University of Minnesota, under the auspices of Northwestern University, and at the Theater of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, N. Y.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
DEC 8 - 1941

Boston Symphony Slated Saturday

The Third Symphony of William Schuman will be introduced by Serge Koussevitzky to Pittsburgh at the Boston Symphony concert next Saturday evening. The symphony had its first performance at the Boston concerts in New York in October, and was introduced to New York by the Boston Symphony last month.

William Howard Schuman, a native of New York, born in 1910, has attracted considerable attention recently by his orchestral works. Mr. Schuman is a graduate of Columbia University. His new symphony is inscribed to Serge Koussevitzky, and after the New York performance Olin Downes, noted music critic, wrote: "It is the best work by an American of the rising generation that I have ever heard." Mr. Schuman will come to Pittsburgh to be present at the performance next Saturday night. Other numbers on Mr. Koussevitzky's Saturday evening program are Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique."

Next Sunday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky will give an entirely different program, opening with Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," which rates as one of this composer's most beautiful works. Other Sunday afternoon numbers are Samuel Barber's "Essay for Orchestra," "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
DEC 8 - 1941

Boston Programs American's Work; Event Is Friday

Thirty-one years old and a native of West Chester, Pa., is Samuel Barber, whose "Essay for Orchestra" will be on the Columbus program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Symphony Club is presenting the great Boston organization Friday night in Memorial Hall.

Toscanini first introduced the piece three years ago at a concert of the NBC Symphony in New York and at the same time played Barber's "Adagio for Strings." A year later, Sir Henry Wood introduced the "Essay" in London.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston orchestra in the "Pathetique" Symphony of Tschaikowsky, the "Eulenspiegel" of Strauss, Ravel's "Tomb of Couperin" and the work by Barber, who, by the way, is a nephew of Louise Homer, famed contralto.

Tickets for the orchestra concert are selling at Heaton's and at Long's Bibliophile.

Rochester Times-Union
Dec 8

Conductor Offers Music For Soldiers

If great music will make a great army, America's fighting forces shall have both, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky pledged today.

One of the most famous living musicians, Dr. Koussevitzky came to Rochester to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert tonight at the Eastman Theater.

He revealed in an interview that he will seek permission on his return to Boston to take his famous orchestra, conceded by many critics to be the world's finest, on a tour of army camps to give concerts free for the soldiers.

Cites Music Aids

"It is the duty of all artists in such moments as this to give service for everybody everywhere," said the Russian-born musician who became an American citizen a year ago. "Music will help keep the highest spirit in the people and in those who are fighting for them."

Striding about the library at Eastman House, where he is a guest of President Alan Valentine of the University of Rochester and Mrs. Valentine, short, intense Dr. Koussevitzky appeared deeply stirred by the outbreak of war with Japan.

"It is terrible, but I feel it is very good for America, very bad for Japan," he said. "It is good for America because it makes the situation very clear. It will unite all elements of the nation.

"It is bad for Japan. She has believed Hitler's promises that he will give her the whole Orient, to realize her dream of centuries of dominating Asia to the middle of the Pacific.

"But Japan counts badly. She is facing a formidable arrangement of nations—The United States, China, Russia, Britain. She already is exhausted from the war in China, and is doomed to absolute prostration and destruction."

Dr. Koussevitzky recalled his prophecy at the start of the European war.

"I said then that Hitler would meet his end in Russia. It did not seem conceivable then that he would be so stupid as to fight Russia. But he did, and he is finding now that he is not fighting just a Russian army, but all the people, every peasant, every man, woman and child. They may die for defense of their soil, but they will kill 20 Germans for every Russian. I am proud for Russia."

Lists 'Star Spangled Banner'

At tonight's concert, Dr. Koussevitzky will open the performance by asking the audience to join in singing "The Star Spangled Banner," which he will make a regular part of the Boston Symphony's Concerts from now on.

Conducting his own Third and "Romantic" symphonies, Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music, will take over the baton with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts next week.

He will appear with the orchestra Dec. 18 at Cambridge, and the next two days in Boston, at the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the ensemble's regular conductor.

Promise Music

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, here today, Dr. Koussevitzky, pledged that if great music makes a great army, America shall have both.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 8th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Antonio Brosa, violinist, was the soloist. Also assisting was the Cecilia Society Chorus, Arthur Fiedler, director. The program was as follows:

Mozart...Excerpts from the Requiem Mass
Mozart..Concerto for Violin in D Major, K. 218
Mozart...Symphony in C major, K. 551

This concert was a plendid tribute to the genius of Mozart, whose melancholy death 150 years ago it commemorated. There was a time when a good deal of nonsense was written about Mozart, but happily that day has largely passed. Recent scholars have shrewdly analyzed his greatness and discussed his art with some sense for what it is, not what it might have been.

Mr. Koussevitzky set before us, as a matter of fact, three sides of that art and thereby constructed a program of contrast and provided a real insight into the composer's achievement. The Requiem shows Mozart's admiration for Bach, whose works he came to know after he had been a composer for some time. The Violin Concerto shows his gallant and youthful side and also his handling of concerto form as he established it. The Symphony, finally, shows the absolute master in one of his finest works. We submit that it would be hard to design a better commemorative program.

It is certainly one of the tragedies of art that Mozart did not live to finish his Requiem. The parts that he did complete are so perfect that the whole work would undoubtedly have become one of the monuments of choral music. Even as it stands the music is infinitely moving. Its affinity is for Bach, so that it is doubtful if any composer in 1791 would have known how to finish it as Mozart would have. Bach was a dead letter at that time, though Mozart knew him from seeing his manuscripts.

We last heard the Requiem in the Salzburg Cathedral in 1934 as a memorial service for Dolfuss, the murdered chancellor of Austria. It was an impressive occasion and more so now from hindsight. The performance yesterday was on the whole a good one. We could ask for a higher degree of choral excellence than the Cecilia Society was able to summon. But in view of the general apathy of the public towards choral music we are probably lucky to get routine competence.

This, the most popular of Mozart's Violin Concertos, heard right after the Requiem, provided a startling contrast of light and shadow. It is a charming work and not so easy to play as it sounds. Mr. Brosa was a bit uneven at first, especially in matters of pitch; but he played the andante most gracefully and the finale in admirable taste. The audience brought him back several times to the stage.

The best performance all afternoon, however, was that of the great C major Symphony. Every time you hear one of the three—the C major, the E flat and the G minor—you think of it as the finest of the lot. Both the first movements of the other two are a shade better than the Jupiter. But it has the advantage of perhaps the loveliest slow movement and, of course, the extraordinary finale. It never ceases to amaze us how Mozart juggles his themes and keeps the whole thing going up to the final chord. Mr. Koussevitzky has a most sympathetic ear for Mozart, and he and the orchestra gave an astonishingly fine performance of the Symphony.

Next week the orchestra goes on its western tour. At the concerts of Dec. 19 and 20 Howard Hanson will conduct his own 3rd Symphony, and Richard Burgin will conduct Walton's "Portsmouth Point" Overture and Strauss' Symphonia Domestica. Meanwhile, if you were not at Friday's Mozart concert, do not miss it tonight.

37

KOUSSEVITZKY LEADS SINGING

Turns to Audience to Conduct Anthem

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Because he had a chorus at his disposal—the Cecilia Society, assembled to sing portions of Mozart's Requiem, in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the composer's death—Dr. Koussevitzky decided yesterday afternoon to have "The Star Spangled Banner," which now precedes all orchestral concerts, sung as well as played. And having started chorus and orchestra on their way, he turned his back to these forces and conducted the standing audience. Those who were not too fascinated by the conductor's facial play, in their first experience of it, joined in the singing.

As befitted the occasion, the programme was all Mozart. In addition to excerpts from the Requiem, it offered the Violin Concerto No. 4 in D major, with Antonio Brosa as soloist, and the "Jupiter" Symphony. Since there was no solo quartet, only these parts of the Requiem were heard: The Requiem, Dies Irae, Rex Tremendae, Confutatis, Lacrimosa and "Cum sanctis tuis," from the Agnus Dei.

Between the Requiem and the "Jupiter," the Concerto, one of the five that Mozart wrote in his 20th year, was snowed under. And added to the natural disadvantage of being placed between two examples of Mozart at his greatest, this youthful and agreeable work suffered further from a rather wooden performance at the hands of Mr. Brosa. The leader of a renowned quartet, now disbanded, Mr. Brosa is probably more at home in chamber music, where his reticence and sobriety and his rather small tone would be more suitable and appropriate. As it was, the Concerto came and went as pleasant enough interlude, and the listener, homeward bound, found his thoughts turning to the two masterpieces so divergently representative of the composer's genius.

There has been much written about the Requiem. At first it was held that Suessmayr could not possibly have been capable of completing the score, and then it was maintained, since the music was not Mozart at his best, there was no reason why his apt pupil should not have finished the job in a perfectly satisfactory manner. The truth of the matter would seem to be that the Requiem is really of the greater Mozart, but that a well-schooled musician like Suessmayr, working from Mozart's sketches, could actually continue the music at the composer's own level, even though he would have been quite incapable of creating it in the first place. Those who think of Mozart's music as relatively slight could not hold that point of view when confronted with such powerful examples of it as the Dies Irae and Rex Tremendae. Here is the Mozart who, in somewhat different vein, wrote the final score in "Don Giovanni."

Trying to cover up his tracks after having rashly called Brahms' C minor "the Tenth Symphony," the always wise-cracking von Buelow hastened to explain that he would put it between the Second and the "Eroica" of Beethoven, and that for Beethoven's First he would substitute Mozart's "Jupiter." Hearing that Symphony yesterday one could agree with Buelow, and go still further and proclaim it the highest point in symphonic composition until the "Eroica" dwarfed all previous symphonies by Beethoven or any other master.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Just 150 years ago this afternoon the body of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart was taken, during a bad storm, to the churchyard of St. Marx, beyond the city gates of Vienna, and there placed in a pauper's grave. The composer, who had been working during his last days on the Requiem Mass, had died shortly before 1 o'clock on the morning of Dec. 5 1791. Not one of his friends was present at the actual burial, and the Baron van Swieten, Mozart's wealthy patron, did no more than advise the widow Constanze Mozart to arrange the cheapest funeral. In such pathetic loneliness and neglect the mortal Mozart vanished.

Mozart the Immortal, the creator of the great symphonies, the operas, chamber music and concertos, lives on. The music he left behind is one of the fabulous treasures of the art. Because it is so, the memory of the gay little genius is honored today.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are this week observing the anniversary of Mozart's death with a program that includes excerpts from the Requiem, the Violin Concerto in D major (K. 218), and the "Jupiter" Symphony. The chorus of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, assists in the Requiem music, and the soloist for the concerto is Antonio Brosa.

Yesterday afternoon all three works were superbly performed. The Cecilia chorus sang with a thrilling solidity and vitality, and Boston's great orchestra was at its best. What if the slow movement of the Symphony was taken very slowly, and the finale very fast? Neither the spirit nor the letter of the score was disturbed.

No doubt Mr. Koussevitzky had his reasons for giving us part of the Requiem. That much served only to make some listeners wish they could have heard it all. It does seem unfortunate that four soloists were not found and the whole presented. Yet some was better than none at all. The Requiem is one of the greatest of choral religious works of art, even if Mozart's death resulted in its being completed by his pupil, Suessmayr.

Mr. Brosa, a Spanish violinist now living in this country, made his Boston debut yesterday afternoon. He is a sound musician, on the evidence of a single performance. His tone is clear, bright and warm, though not large. There was style, elasticity and delicacy in his Mozart, qualities which were not obscured by a few tentative places in the first movement, and a momentary mixup between orchestra and soloist at the outset of the finale. His playing was not exactly brilliant, but it was fine.

The audience had a chance to see Mr. Koussevitzky as the orchestra sees him; the conductor turned about after the first measure of "The Star Spangled Banner," which opened the concert, and invited the audience to sing. In this position he remained to the end of the National Anthem, conducting an audience who could have responded much better than they did to his thoughtful and gracious invitation.

Next week the orchestra goes on its annual tour of the Mid-West. At the concerts of Dec. 19 and 20, Richard Burgin will conduct William Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point," and the "Domestic Symphony" by Strauss; Howard Hanson will again give us his Third Symphony.

C. W. D.

This Clipping From
Ann Arbor Mich News
DEC 8 1941

Conductor

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in its Choral Union appearance here at 8:30 Wednesday night. The concert will be presented in Hill auditorium.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
DEC 8 - 1941

Boston Symphony To Play Tonight At Eastman

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra will make its annual Rochester visit this evening playing a program at the Eastman Theater under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

For the symphony there will be the Tschaikowsky "Pathetique," the program including also Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" and Debussy's "La Mer."

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
DEC 8 - 1941

Bostonians

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to Columbus Friday night, visits the colleges of our eastern states as a regular and important part of its yearly itinerary.

In its tours the Boston Symphony has played within the following college precincts: Wellesley, Mt. Holyoke, Smith College, the University of Vermont, Middlebury College, Dartmouth College, Yale, Connecticut College, Princeton University, Rutgers University, Cornell University, University of Michigan, University of Minnesota, under the auspices of Northwestern University, and at the Theater of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, N. Y.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
DEC 8 - 1941

Boston Symphony Slated Saturday

The Third Symphony of William Schuman will be introduced by Serge Koussevitzky to Pittsburgh at the Boston Symphony concert next Saturday evening. The symphony had its first performance at the Boston concerts in New York in October, and was introduced to New York by the Boston Symphony last month.

William Howard Schuman, a native of New York, born in 1910, has attracted considerable attention recently by his orchestral works. Mr. Schuman is a graduate of Columbia University. His new symphony is inscribed to Serge Koussevitzky, and after the New York performance Olin Downes, noted music critic, wrote: "It is the best work by an American of the rising generation that I have ever heard." Mr. Schuman will come to Pittsburgh to be present at the performance next Saturday night. Other numbers on Mr. Koussevitzky's Saturday evening program are Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique."

Next Sunday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky will give an entirely different program, opening with Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," which rates as one of this composer's most beautiful works. Other Sunday afternoon numbers are Samuel Barber's "Essay for Orchestra," "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
DEC 8 - 1941

Boston Programs American's Work; Event Is Friday

Thirty-one years old and a native of West Chester, Pa., is Samuel Barber, whose "Essay for Orchestra" will be on the Columbus program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Symphony Club is presenting the great Boston organization Friday night in Memorial Hall.

Toscanini first introduced the piece three years ago at a concert of the NBC Symphony in New York and at the same time played Barber's "Adagio for Strings." A year later, Sir Henry Wood introduced the "Essay" in London.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston orchestra in the "Pathetique" Symphony of Tschaikowsky, the "Eulenspiegel" of Strauss, Ravel's "Tomb of Couperin" and the work by Barber, who, by the way, is a nephew of Louise Homer, famed contralto.

Tickets for the orchestra concert are selling at Heaton's and at Long's Bibliophile.

Rochester Times-Union N.Y.
Dec 8

Conductor Offers Music For Soldiers

If great music will make a great army, America's fighting forces shall have both, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky pledged today.

One of the most famous living musicians, Dr. Koussevitzky came to Rochester to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert tonight at the Eastman Theater.

He revealed in an interview that he will seek permission on his return to Boston to take his famous orchestra, conceded by many critics to be the world's finest, on a tour of army camps to give concerts free for the soldiers.

Cites Music Aids

"It is the duty of all artists in such moments as this to give service for everybody everywhere," said the Russian-born musician who became an American citizen a year ago. "Music will help keep the highest spirit in the people and in those who are fighting for them."

Striding about the library at Eastman House, where he is a guest of President Alan Valentine of the University of Rochester and Mrs. Valentine, short, intense Dr. Koussevitzky appeared deeply stirred by the outbreak of war with Japan.

"It is terrible, but I feel it is very good for America, very bad for Japan," he said. "It is good for America because it makes the situation very clear. It will unite all elements of the nation.

"It is bad for Japan. She has believed Hitler's promises that he will give her the whole Orient, to realize her dream of centuries of dominating Asia to the middle of the Pacific.

"But Japan counts badly. She is facing a formidable arrangement of nations—The United States, China, Russia, Britain. She already is exhausted from the war in China, and is doomed to absolute prostration and destruction."

Dr. Koussevitzky recalled his prophecy at the start of the European war.

"I said then that Hitler would meet his end in Russia. It did not seem conceivable then that he would be so stupid as to fight Russia. But he did, and he is finding now that he is not fighting just a Russian army, but all the people, every peasant, every man, woman and child. They may die for defense of their soil, but they will kill 20 Germans for every Russian. I am proud for Russia."

Lists 'Star Spangled Banner'

At tonight's concert, Dr. Koussevitzky will open the performance by asking the audience to join in singing "The Star Spangled Banner," which he will make a regular part of the Boston Symphony's Concerts from now on.

Conducting his own Third and "Romantic" symphonies, Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music, will take over the baton with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts next week.

He will appear with the ochestra Dec. 18 at Cambridge, and the next two days in Boston, at the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the ensemble's regular conductor.

Promise Music

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, here today, Dr. Koussevitzky, pledged that if great music makes a great army, America shall have both.

Symphony Honors Mozart

Christian Science Monitor Dec. 6, 1941

By L. A. Sloper

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, yesterday honored the memory of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, who passed on 150 years ago, on Dec. 5, 1791, by devoting its eighth program of the season to that master's music. The list comprised excerpts from the Requiem Mass, the Violin Concerto in D major, No. 4 (G. 218), and the "Jupiter" Symphony. The soloist was Antonio Brosa. The chorus was that of the Cecilia Society, of which Arthur Fiedler is conductor.

Mozart is probably the most generally liked of all composers. You will find people who do not care for the music of Bach, or Handel, or Schubert, or Brahms, or Wagner, or Debussy, or Sibelius, or even Beethoven; but how many have you ever met who disliked the music of Mozart? How can anyone dislike it? There are, to be sure, those passages of filling (de-da-de-dá, de-da-de-dá) in much of his work; but then he's only pausing to catch his breath before leading us into another entrancing lyrical flight. He is the most natural, the most ingratiating, the most irresistible of composers.

* * *

Yesterday's program, which will be repeated this evening, was well chosen for the anniversary observation. Any Mozart festival would be incomplete without representation of his vocal music; and what better choice for a concert than the Requiem choruses? As the program book reminded us, the first performance of the Requiem by this orchestra was given on April 10, 1888, under Gericke, and the proceeds were devoted to a Mozart monument in Vienna. And the concerto and the "Jupiter" Symphony are of course among his greatest creations.

The Requiem as a whole was last given by this orchestra [illegible] years ago, with the Bach Cantata Club furnishing the chorus, and with a quartet of soloists. The excerpts sung yesterday (the Requiem, Dies Irae, Rex Tremendae, Confutatis, Lacrimosa, and the Cum Sanctis tuis from the Agnus Dei), which do not require soloists, had been performed last summer at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. The performance under review was eloquent and moving. The chorus sang with a greater vitality and authority than I had heard before from the Cecilia Society. Mr. Fiedler deserves much credit for so well making it ready. Dr. Koussevitzky welded voices and instruments with sure skill and interpretive vision.

Mr. Brosa is a Spaniard, founder and leader of the Brosa Quartet, now devoting himself to solo concert work. He has played often in London and New York, and has become known chiefly as an exponent of modern music. He brought to his task yesterday an excellent technique, a rather thin tone, and an incomplete understanding of the Mozartean style. Mozart is much easier on listeners than on players. His demands of performers are so onerous that it needs a very special sympathy and a very long and arduous training to meet them. Soloists who can meet his requirements are not readily available nowadays to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Spalding was the last man to play this concerto at a Friday concert in Symphony Hall. By edict of Mr. Petrillo of the Musicians' Union, Mr. Spalding may not now play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Neither may Mr. Heifetz. Neither may Mr. Zimbalist. So we have Mr. Brosa, an excellent musician and performer in his field; but his field is apparently not Mozart.

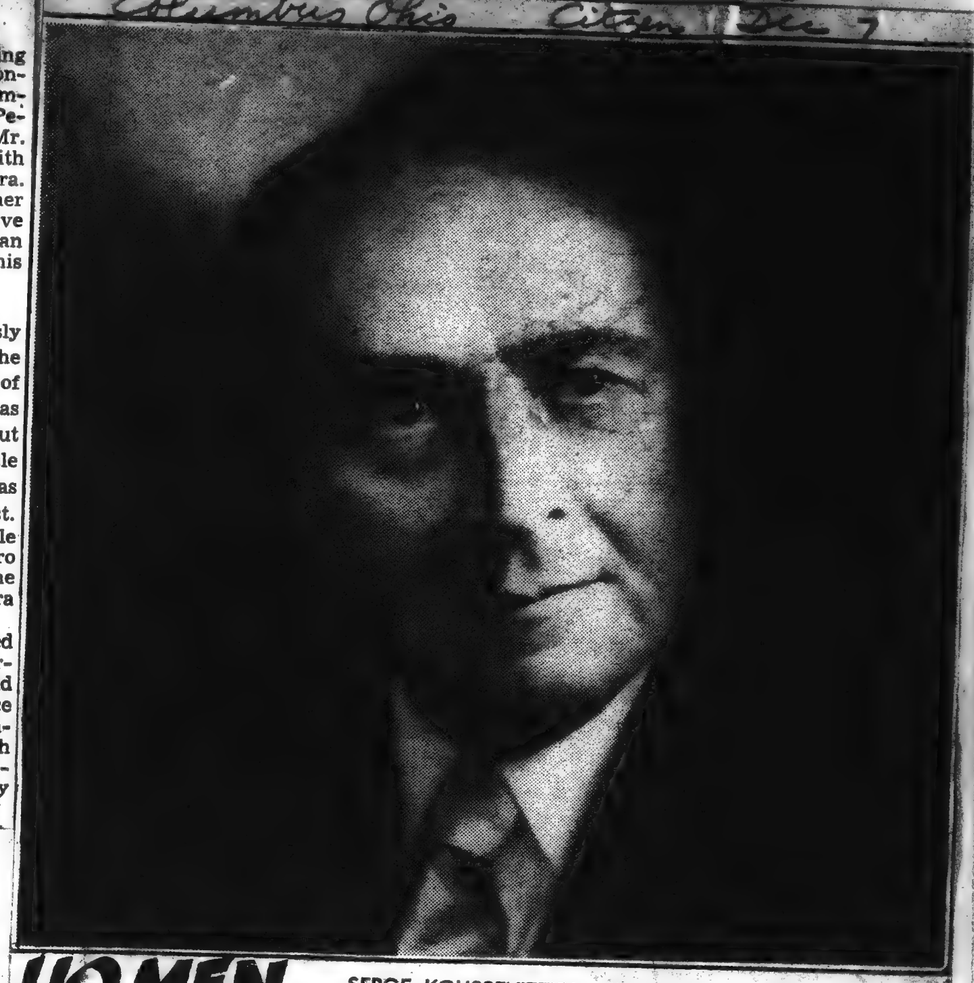
* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky had obviously made the preparation of the "Jupiter" Symphony a labor of love, and the performance was astounding for its virtuosity. But the conductor had striven a little too hard. The slow movement was too slow and the Finale too fast. The Andante cantabile had little motion or lyricism, and the Allegro molto went at such a pace that the articulation even of this orchestra was blurred.

When Dr. Koussevitzky opened the concert with "The Star-Spangled Banner" he went beyond custom by calling on the audience to sing it. Responding to his inspiriting baton, they did so, with results that, if not notable for precision or tonal beauty, were at any rate obviously heart-felt.

38

Columbus Ohio Citizen Dec 7



110 MEN

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will conduct the 110 men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Memorial Hall next Friday, the second of two concerts scheduled for this week. Symphany Club of Central Ohio is the sponsor.

Boston Orchestra Plays Here For Symphony Club on Friday

Columbus Ohio Dispatch Dec 7

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which the Symphony club brings to Memorial hall Friday night. Dr. Koussevitzky came to that organization in 1924. That span of years to the present covers more than a quarter of the orchestra's entire history. The Friday program includes Ravel's Suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Samuel Barber's "Essay for Orchestra," Strauss' "Tyl Eulenspiegel," and the Tschaikowski "Pathetique" symphony.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, PA.
REPORTER
DEC 9-1941

Boston Symphony In Pittsburgh On Weekend

An opportunity will be presented to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will appear at Syria Mosque in Pittsburgh, Saturday and Sunday.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony is one of the highlights of the Pittsburgh musical season and attracts music-lovers within a large radius of Pittsburgh.

Two concerts will be given by this celebrated orchestra of 110 players under the direction of Serge Koussvitskey, and both promise to be excellent.

On Saturday evening the program will feature a modern work in the "Third Symphony" by William Schuman, which was pronounced the best work by an American of the present generation, when it was given in New York City last month. Other numbers on the program are the Mozart "Haffner Symphony" and the Pathetique Symphony" by Tschaikovsky.

The Sunday afternoon presentation will open with Ravel's most beautiful work, "Tombeau de Couperin." Other important numbers are "Brahms Fourth Symphony," "Essay for Orchestra," by the American composer Samuel Barber; and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION
DEC 9 - 1941

All Join In Singing U. S. Anthem

By RUTH B. CHAMBERLAIN

THAT MAJOR MUSIC EVENT of the winter season—the annual concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting — again brought Rochester Socialites and music lovers in capacity numbers through the chill and the drizzle of a December night to the Eastman Theater.

Second only to the spring performance by the Metropolitan Opera Company in the interest of this music loving community, the orchestra now in its 61st season received an enthusiastic welcome by salvos of applause.

The audience seemed in a sober mood. Even the sartorial display usually a dominant feature at this concert was lacking, the gowns and wraps reflecting, perhaps the mood of their wearers, and a predominance of black and dark colored frocks were noted on some of our leading hostesses and music patrons.

A great thrill passed through the assembled body as the first notes of the national anthem were sounded by the orchestra and the audience joined in with a lusty rendition of the "Star Spangled Banner" before the start of the concert.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
DEC 7 - 1941

39

Koussevitzky Will Present Rich Music at Eastman Tomorrow Evening

WHEN the matchless Boston Symphony Orchestra plays its annual concert in the Eastman Theater tomorrow evening, that organization will be in the midst of its 61st consecutive season.

Such a background has given rise to a tradition in performance as rich as may be boasted by any orchestra in the world.

Rochester is one of the few cities in the country that hears the Boston Symphony and its celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, year after year. This in itself reflects the high standard of musical taste abounding in local music patrons and results in some of the finest playing of these Boston tours.

Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen a program that will place on display the special attributes of the Boston ensemble through which it has attained the title of "virtuoso orchestra."

It includes Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin"; Debussy's "La Mer" and the Tschaikowsky Symphony "Pathetique."

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
DEC 10 1941

Music a Necessity Says Conductor

"Great music is a necessity of life. Nothing less—a necessity."

The words were spoken in tones of deep conviction by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes Friday to Columbus. His eyes flashed as he went on to say:

"Great music makes life complete. It combines with something else. Do you know, I am convinced that what makes a life full is the experience of tragedy in some form, and rising to its challenge. The great composers all have had their trials by tragedy. Their greatest music is the utterance which that experience has drawn from their souls. And very often the music itself is not tragic. It may be quite the opposite, because the composer has had the greatness of soul not to expose his private concerns to the world.

"In great music there is the bond of the most profound sympathy between genius and the rest of humanity. The genius expresses what is in the souls of the rest better than they can. We musicians draw out what the great composers have attempted to express within the limitations of musical notes printed on paper. We sense, and we continually develop, what we sense there. Through the intermediary of the conductor, if you please, the composer, the musicians and the listeners are brought together in communion with life."

Tickets for the Boston's concert are being sold now at the Symphony Club box office at Heaton's.

This Clipping From
PASADENA, CALIF.
STAR NEWS
DEC 10 1941

American History

Many people are refreshing their memories on historic events, places, and people of our country these days. Books which stimulate this interest are appearing in even greater numbers. "Historic Restorations of the Daughters of the American Revolution," compiled by Lewis Barrington, is a useful and convenient source book. The D. A. R. has done a commendable work in preserving buildings whose historic interest contribute to the growth of the United States and offer interesting examples of architectural types and tendencies in our development. All are eloquent symbols and landmarks of ways of life of the past and a demonstration of the spirit behind American development.

The first restoration made by the D. A. R. was in 1878 by the women in the vicinity of Philadelphia. This project was the restoration of Washington's Valley Forge Headquarters. That date to the present has seen a long line fo historic spots repaired and protected. This book by Mr. Barrington is an album of these restorations. A page is devoted to each. Each is accompanied by a photograph, a brief description of the place and the reason for its historic significance and data as to when it may be viewed. The arrangement is geographic beginning with the New England states. The restorations include residences, taverns, block houses, log houses, birthplaces of famous Americans and other sites of note.

New England Glimpses

"An Adventure in Remembrance," by M. A. DeWolf Howe, distinguished member of a family distinguished in American life and literature, is the autobiography of a scholar and a gentleman and the representative of a period and group of people in New England now largely legend or merely a chapter in a history of American literature. Mr. Howe's life has been devoted to the appreciation and cultivation of literature and he has directly contributed to it as well. He has found his happiness, he tells us, in books and writing and the people who create them.

In this small volume Mr. Howe shares his rich life with books and illustrious friends, with the reader, and affords us a glimpse at his Rhode Island childhood, his early schooling, and his long literary activities. His story is gracefully and modestly told and of course well told. There is only a hint of the multiplicity of his honors and offices ranging from Harvard College, trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as editor and poet and many other services to cultural branches of life.

FAMED CONDUCTOR IN ACTION

Above, Serge Koussevitzky calls for "sostenuto" from Boston Symphony double basses, and gives first downbeat for soft beginning. Orchestra plays at Eastman tomorrow night. Right, Miriam Winslow and Foster Fitz-Simons in "Saturday Night," to be seen in Kilbourn Hall on Dec. 16. Below, Gaby and Robert Casadesus, celebrated pianists with Philharmonic at Eastman Dec. 18.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
DEC 10 1941

Boston Orchestra Established 60 Years Ago

TO PROBE backwards 60 years is to encompass almost all that is important in the history of musical performance in this country. As the Boston Symphony orchestra passes its sixtieth season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, it can look back to a leading part in this development.

In 1881, when Henry Lee Higginson assembled 60 musicians and called them the Boston Symphony orchestra, there were no others to look upon as really serious rivals. Boston had its Germania society and its Harvard Musical association concerts; New York had Theodore Thomas and Frank Damrosch, good pioneer spirits. But the musicians at their disposal were often of indifferent ability who for the most part had to expend their regular energies on things more prosaic than symphonies of Beethoven or Haydn.

The inception of the Boston orchestra is traceable to the realization of a young Bostonian student of music in Vienna that America should have a symphony orchestra of the high standard which one could hear in the old world. Mr. Higginson held tenaciously to his dream for more than twenty years until at last, in 1881, he had acquired sufficient means to make it a fact. Mr. Higginson's principal thought was to create "an orchestra which should play the best music in the best way, and give concerts to all who could pay a small price." That was a characteristically quiet statement. But if it lacked grandiloquence, it did not lack ambition. The word "best" is a short and usually a loose one. When Mr. Higginson used it, he meant exactly what he said.

The word still holds good, for there are many who believe that the music of the Boston Symphony, under Koussevitzky, who will conduct the orchestra at Memorial hall Friday night, is the best symphonic music in the world, or that it is pretty close to it.

The Symphony club is presenting the orchestra and seats on the first floor in well varied locations are still available. The box office it at Heaton's.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
DEC 13 1941

Boston Symphony Concerts Listed

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give the ninth pair of concerts in the longer series next Friday afternoon and Saturday night in Symphony Hall, Boston. The third of the Cambridge concert will be in Sanders Theater, Thursday night. The same program will be presented at the three concerts.

Richard Burgin will be conductor of the week, and Howard Hanson, as guest composer and conductor, will lead his Third Symphony, which was introduced at these concerts two seasons ago.

The program will open with William Walton's overture, "Portsmouth Point," which takes as its subject the print of Rowlandson made in the early part of the last century. Second portion of the program will consist of Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica."

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
DEC 12 1941

Boston Programs 2 New Composers

Serge Koussevitzky will feature two rising young American composers on his Boston Symphony programs at the Syria Mosque tomorrow night and Sunday afternoon. William Schuman's Third Symphony, which will be heard tomorrow, was pronounced by Olin Downes the best work by an American composer of the rising generation when it was given in New York City by the Boston Symphony last month. On Sunday afternoon, Samuel Barber's work, "Essay for Orchestra," will be given under Koussevitzky's baton.

In addition to the Schuman work tomorrow night, Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony will be given. An entirely different program will be played on Sunday afternoon, including Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the old-fashioned manner, in rondo form, and the Brahms Fourth Symphony.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION
DEC 18 1941

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION
DEC 15 1941

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
DEC 18 1941

This Clipping From
MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
PRESS
DEC 18 1941

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD
DEC 18 1941

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
DEC 18 1941

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N.Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
DEC 18 1941

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
DEC 18 1941

This Clipping From BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
DEC 18 1941

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
DEC 18 1941

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
DEC 18 1941

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
DEC 13 1941

Great Concert Given By Boston Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky and Orchestra Acclaimed By Capacity Audience in Memorial Hall

By Samuel T. Wilson

AFTER an absence of some eight or nine years the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, returned to Memorial hall on Friday evening to give a concert under the auspices of the Symphony club. The concert was one well calculated to remind us that no other orchestra in the country is consistently the equal of the one from Boston and that none is its peer. The reminder was scarcely needed if the thunderous applause that greeted Mr. Koussevitzy's first "dignified and stately" entrance to the stage was any indication.

Just as one does not think or speak of a well-trained, properly used voice in terms of registers, so one does not think or speak of the Boston orchestra, at its best, in terms of its several sections. Certainly last night strings, woodwinds, brasses, percussives were perfectly fused to form a single, magnificent instrument which produced indescribably beautiful tone and upon which Mr. Koussevitzky was able to play with all of the virtuosity at his command.

Patrician refinement of musical perception and of executive ability characterized the conductor's reading and the orchestra's playing of the Ravel suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin" which opened the program. All the vitality, the individuality of thought and of craftsmanship and the immediately appealing beauty that are in Samuel Barber's "Essay for Orchestra" were realized in the eloquent performance accorded it. The "Essay" is the first of Mr. Barber's orchestral scores that has been given a hearing in Columbus.

LUMINOUS and multi-colored tonal account was given of the merry pranks of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." There was lusty humor and sharp wit to this tale of Till's rowdy adventures and a compassionateness, too. The latter characteristic of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading gave to the narrative a warmth and a certain humanity it does not invariably seem to possess.

Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, the "Pathetique," had the last ounce of anguish wrung from it. Sheerly theatrical exaggerations in matters of tempo and dynamic shading abounded in the first and last movements. There was infinite grace and loveliness to the second and enormous potency to the third. The bravura of the orchestra's work throughout the symphony was breath-taking.

The concert opened with "The Star Spangled Banner" and this time it was given more than a perfunctory performance. Letting his orchestra serve as accompanist, Mr. Koussevitzky turned his attention to the vast chorus that was the audience and, at his energetic and graphic prompting, the national anthem was sung with an amazing degree of musical and textual expressiveness.

The concert ended without an encore being played. For a second time in the seven seasons of my experience here a conductor complimented a Columbus audience by electing to regard it as a metropolitan rather than as a provincial assembly.

Cancel Date At Symphony

Boston Herald

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Dec. 17 (AP)—Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music and noted composer, today revealed he had canceled three engagements to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week in one of his own compositions on the ground the musicians' union has forbidden him to appear with a non-union orchestra. Dec. 18, 1941

Dr. Hanson said Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, had released him from the engagements and that Koussevitsky himself would conduct the Hanson composition, his third symphony, at concerts Thursday, Friday and Saturday in Boston and Cambridge.

Dr. Hanson in a statement declared that as a member of the musicians' union he had no choice but to decline the Boston invitation, when directed to.

The Boston Symphony

Christian Science Monitor Dec. 13, 1941

By L. A. Sloper

Novelties have been relatively few in the first third of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's sixty-first season. The repertory so far has consisted largely of standard works, with special attention to two composers for whom this is a year of commemoration—Mozart and Dvořák. The orchestra is as usual in its top form. What with the Pop concerts in the spring, the Esplanade concerts in early summer, and the Berkshire Symphonic Festival later, it is never out of form. Changes in personnel have again been few and unimportant. Dr. Koussevitzky still demands and receives the utmost in virtuosity and expressiveness.

Of the new works the most impressive was William Schuman's Third Symphony. It marks a definite advance over his last composition in this form—although as to form, none of his symphonic works adheres very closely to convention. This one consists of a Passacaglia, Fugue, Chorale, and Toccata. The important thing is that it contains some good music, especially in the first half, which shows uncommon skill and imagination.

Another novelty was the Second Symphony of Arthur Lourié, which he labels "Kormtchaia." Here again, growth of the composer is evident. Although the "symphony" is encumbered by obscure program notes, the music is fortunately clearer than the explanations. This is Russian music with a liturgical atmosphere, but there are tunes which recall Moussorgsky and rhythms that are Stravinskyan. The claims of originality made for the work can hardly be sustained; there is nothing new about writing in no definite tonality, nor in building up themes from scraps.

Two pieces which had their first performances at these concerts are well known elsewhere: Respighi's Suite, "The Birds," and Lekeu's Adagio for string orchestra. There was also a new Concerto Grosso by Martinů which I did not hear.

Soloists have not been numerous; and here a problem enters Because the Boston orchestra is not unionized, it is not now permitted to employ the services of members of the musicians' union. Since these members include most of the ranking virtuosi, the problem of soloists for the orchestra becomes serious. So far, we have had Ruth Posselt in Dvořák's Violin Concerto and Antonio Brosa in Mozart's D major, No. 4. Miss Posselt gave a really superb performance; no one could complain of a let-down. Mr. Brosa disclosed a good technique, a small tone, and an inadequate feeling for the Mozartean style. He is without doubt an excellent musician, especially proficient in modern music; but he is evidently not the man for Mozart.

The only guest conductor so far has been Désiré Defauw, the distinguished and accomplished Belgian who made his first American appearance a year ago with the Boston orchestra. This time besides the near-novelties by Respighi and Lekeu mentioned above, he gave a brilliant account of Dukas' "Apprentice-Sorcerer" and a commendable one of the Franck Symphony, marred, however, by extravagant ritards and holds.

Programs of Yesterday and Today

Columbus-Ohio-Dispatch

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Metropolitan Opera House, Columbus.

SEASON OF 1890.

ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE ORPHEUS CLUB.

Monday Evening, May 5,
At 8 o'clock.

PROGRAMME.

Goldmark — Overture, "Sakuntala"

Mozart — Aria, "Thou may'st learn to hate me," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail"
Mme. STEINBACH-JAHNS.

Lalo — Symphonie Espagnole, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Scherzando.
IV. Andante.
V. Rondo.
Mr. C. M. LOEFFLER.

Grieg — Suite, "Peer Gynt," Op. 46
"Daybreak"
"The Death of Aase"
"Anitra's Dance."
"In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains."
(The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)

Songs with Piano.
(a) Liszt — "Liebesluat"
(b) Brahms — "Lullaby"
(c) Goldmark — "Die Quelle"
Mme. STEINBACH-JAHNS.

Schumann — Symphony No. 1, in B-flat
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo
Allegro animato e grazioso.

SOLOISTS

Mme. STEINBACH-JAHNS. Mr. C. M. LOEFFLER.

Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

MEMORIAL HALL
Columbus, Ohio
FRIDAY, DECEMBER 12th, 1941

"Le Tombeau de Couperin," Suite — Ravel
I. Prelude
II. Forlane
III. Menuet
IV. Rigaudon

Essay for Orchestra — Samuel Barber

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner, in Rondo Form," Op. 28 — Strauss

INTERMISSION

Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetique," Op. 74 — Tschaikowsky
I. Adagio—Allegro non troppo
II. Allegro con grazio
III. Allegro molto vivace
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso

ABOVE are two programs for Boston Symphony orchestra appearances in Columbus. In May, 1890, the orchestra played here at the Metropolitan opera house under the auspices of the Orpheus club. Arthur Nikisch was the conductor. One of the soloists, Charles Martin Loeffler, was later to become famous throughout the world as a composer.

It is interesting to compare the content and arrangement of the 1890 program with that which the Boston orchestra will play tonight in Memorial hall, under the management of the Symphony club of Central Ohio. Serge Koussevitzky is, of course, the 1941 conductor.

The 1890 program is from the collection of Mr. Eugene Grey.

Boston Herald Dec. 18, 1941

MUSIC

Youth Concert

The third concert of the Youth Series by members of the Boston Symphony, conducted by Wheeler Beckett. The Apollo Club chorus assisted. The program was as follows:

Beethoven, Overture, "Leonore" No. 3; Prisoners' Chorus from "Fidelio"
Gounod, Ballet Music, Waltz Scene and Soldiers' Chorus from "Faust"
Wagner, Venusberg Music and Pilgrims' Chorus from "Tannhaeuser"
J. Strauss, "Blue Danube" Waltzes

Mr. Beckett's program for the third youth concert yesterday afternoon was somewhat in the nature of a Pops session. The 3rd Leonore Overture might be considered an exception to this view, though in itself it is always in favor with the public—and small wonder.

It was an excellent idea to have the Apollo Club Chorus, of which Mr. Beckett is now the director, sing at this concert. The more that can be done to eradicate the prejudice against choral music that has grown up in recent years in this city the better; and giving some of the music in that form from "Fidelio," "Faust" and "Tanhaeuser," not to mention the "Blue Danube" in its original form, is as good a way as any.

The "Faust" selections were sugar plums, and the Venusberg music written in Wagner's mature style years after the original "Tannhaeuser," was certainly the plum pudding. In fact the whole program might be considered as Mr. Beckett's Christmas present to his youthful audience, and it was quite obvious that it proved acceptable.

A. W. W.

Boston Record - Dec. 18, 1941

PIANIST SANROMA SUBSTITUTES FOR HANSON IN SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The program has been changed for the Boston Symphony concerts this week which are to be given in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, tonight, and in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Howard Hanson, who had been invited to conduct his Third Symphony, has not been able to come to Boston. In place of the symphony, Sanroma will appear as soloist with the orchestra in the Emperor Concerto of Beethoven, No. 5 in E-flat major. The remainder of the program which is to be played at the three concerts, Richard Burgin conducting, will be as announced: Walton's overture, "Portsmouth Point," and Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica."

Important Change In Symphony Program

Owing to the inability of Howard Hanson to come to Boston, the program this Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall and Thursday in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, has been radically changed. Instead of Hanson's 3d Symphony, Beethoven's 5th Piano Concerto in E flat major, "Emperor," will be played, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist. Otherwise Richard Burgin will conduct William Walton's "Portsmouth Point" Overture and Strauss' Symphonia Domestica.

This Clipping From
MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 15 1941

Orchestra

By HERBERT F. PEYSER

So incomparably glorious is the sheer sound of the Boston Symphony that it sometimes has a way of making questions of interpretation appear subsidiary. Mr. Koussevitzky began the season's first New York concert on the evening of Thanksgiving Day with a performance of Beethoven's Eroica which aroused storms of applause. The beauty and virtuosity of the playing could probably not have been excelled by any orchestra on earth and, in the scherzo, the horn trio was done with a perfection one probably does not hear more than half a dozen times in a life span.

But as a reading, pure and simple, Mr. Koussevitzky's could not compare with Bruno Walter's monumental one with the Philharmonic-Symphony a short time before. The Eroica is a work that requires above all else bigness and smashing force; if it has these qualities it will endure even an execution to a certain degree unpolished. The Boston conductor's was sand-papered to the last square inch yet, by and large, of surface effect. But edge, depth, immensity—these things were more or less generally lacking.

During the second half of the program the conductor wasted some minutes on four movements from the second suite that Serge Prokofieff extracted from his ballet Romeo and Juliet, in which singular opus Juliet does not die at all and "the grave is a deception." Worse piffle has seldom in recent years afflicted the infinite patience of music paper. The concert concluded with a resounding virtuoso performance (in which the brass was driven hard) of Moussorgky's Pictures at an Exposition in Ravel's orchestral version, one of Mr. Koussevitzky's hardest worked battle horses.

and the Fourth of Brahms.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
DEC 13 1941

Great Concert Given By Boston Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky and Orchestra Acclaimed By Capacity Audience in Memorial Hall

By Samuel T. Wilson

AFTER an absence of some eight or nine years the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, returned to Memorial hall on Friday evening to give a concert under the auspices of the Symphony club. The concert was one well calculated to remind us that no other orchestra in the country is consistently the equal of the one from Boston and that none is its peer. The reminder was scarcely needed if the thunderous applause that greeted Mr. Koussevitzy's first "dignified and stately" entrance to the stage was any indication.

Just as one does not think or speak of a well-trained, properly used voice in terms of registers, so one does not think or speak of the Boston orchestra, at its best, in terms of its several sections. Certainly last night strings, woodwinds, brasses, percussives were perfectly fused to form a single, magnificent instrument which produced indescribably beautiful tone and upon which Mr. Koussevitzky was able to play with all of the virtuosity at his command.

Patrician refinement of musical perception and of executive ability characterized the conductor's reading and the orchestra's playing of the Ravel suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin" which opened the program. All the vitality, the individuality of thought and of craftsmanship and the immediately appealing beauty that are in Samuel Barber's "Essay for Orchestra" were realized in the eloquent performance accorded it. The "Essay" is the first of Mr. Barber's orchestral scores that has been given a hearing in Columbus.

LUMINOUS and multi-colored tonal account was given of the merry pranks of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel." There was lusty humor and sharp wit to this tale of Till's rowdy adventures and a compassionateness, too. The latter characteristic of Mr. Koussevitzky's reading gave to the narrative a warmth and a certain humanity it does not invariably seem to possess.

Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, the "Pathetique," had the last ounce of anguish wrung from it. Sheerly theatrical exaggerations in matters of tempo and dynamic shading abounded in the first and last movements. There was infinite grace and loveliness to the second and enormous potency to the third. The bravura of the orchestra's work throughout the symphony was breath-taking.

The concert opened with "The Star Spangled Banner" and this time it was given more than a perfunctory performance. Letting his orchestra serve as accompanist, Mr. Koussevitzky turned his attention to the vast chorus that was the audience and, at his energetic and graphic prompting, the national anthem was sung with an amazing degree of musical and textual expressiveness.

The concert ended without an encore being played. For a second time in the seven seasons of my experience here a conductor complimented a Columbus audience by electing to regard it as a metropolitan rather than as a provincial assembly.

Cancel Date At Symphony

Boston Herald

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Dec. 17 (AP)—Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music and noted composer, today revealed he had canceled three engagements to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week in one of his own compositions on the ground the musicians' union has forbidden him to appear with a non-union orchestra. Dec. 18, 1941

Dr. Hanson said Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, had released him from the engagements and that Koussevitsky himself would conduct the Hanson composition, his third symphony, at concerts Thursday, Friday and Saturday in Boston and Cambridge.

Dr. Hanson in a statement declared that as a member of the musicians' union he had no choice but to decline the Boston invitation, when directed to.

The Boston Symphony

Christian Science Monitor Dec. 13, 1941

By L. A. Sloper

Novelties have been relatively few in the first third of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's sixty-first season. The repertory so far has consisted largely of standard works, with special attention to two composers for whom this is a year of commemoration—Mozart and Dvořák. The orchestra is as usual in its top form. What with the Pop concerts in the spring, the Esplanade concerts in early summer, and the Berkshire Symphonic Festival later, it is never out of form. Changes in personnel have again been few and unimportant. Dr. Koussevitzky still demands and receives the utmost in virtuosity and expressiveness.

Of the new works the most impressive was William Schuman's Third Symphony. It marks a definite advance over his last composition in this form—although as to form, none of his symphonic works adheres very closely to convention. This one consists of a Passacaglia, Fugue, Chorale, and Toccata. The important thing is that it contains some good music, especially in the first half, which shows uncommon skill and imagination.

Another novelty was the Second Symphony of Arthur Lourié, which he labels "Kormtchaia." Here again, growth of the composer is evident. Although the "symphony" is encumbered by obscure program notes, the music is fortunately clearer than the explanations. This is Russian music with a liturgical atmosphere, but there are tunes which recall Moussorgsky and rhythms that are Stravinskyan. The claims of originality made for the work can hardly be sustained; there is nothing new about writing in no definite tonality, nor in building up themes from scraps.

Two pieces which had their first performances at these concerts are well known elsewhere: Respighi's Suite, "The Birds," and Lekeu's Adagio for string orchestra. There was also a new Concerto Grosso by Martinů which I did not hear.

Soloists have not been numerous; and here a problem enters. Because the Boston orchestra is not unionized, it is not now permitted to employ the services of members of the musicians' union. Since these members include most of the ranking virtuosi, the problem of soloists for the orchestra becomes serious. So far, we have had Ruth Posselt in Dvořák's Violin Concerto and Antonio Brosa in Mozart's D major, No. 4. Miss Posselt gave a really superb performance; no one could complain of a let-down. Mr. Brosa disclosed a good technique, a small tone, and an inadequate feeling for the Mozartean style. He is without doubt an excellent musician, especially proficient in modern music: but he is evidently not the man for Mozart.

The only guest conductor so far has been Désiré Defauw, the distinguished and accomplished Belgian who made his first American appearance a year ago with the Boston orchestra. This time besides the near-novelties by Respighi and Lekeu mentioned above, he gave a brilliant account of Dukas' "Apprentice-Sorcerer" and a commendable one of the Franck Symphony, marred, however, by extravagant ritards and holds.

Programs of Yesterday and Today

Columbus-Ohio-Dispatch

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Metropolitan Opera House, Columbus.

SEASON OF 1890.

ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.
UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE ORPHEUS CLUB.

Monday Evening, May 5,
At 8 o'clock.

PROGRAMME.

Goldmark — Overture, "Sakuntala"

Mozart — Aria, "Thou may'st learn to hate me," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail"
Mme. STEINBACH-JAHNS.

Lalo — Symphonie Espagnole, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Scherzando.
IV. Andante.
V. Rondo.
Mr. C. M. LOEFFLER.

Grieg — Suite, "Peer Gynt," Op. 46
"Daybreak."
"The Death of Aase"
"Anitra's Dance."
"In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains."
(The songs are missing Peer Gynt.)

Songs with Piano.

(a) Liszt — "Liebesbilet"
(b) Brahms — "Lullaby"
(c) Goldmark — "Die Quelle"
Mme. STEINBACH-JAHNS.

Schumann — Symphony No. 1, in B-flat
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.

SOLOISTS

Mme. STEINBACH-JAHNS. Mr. C. M. LOEFFLER.

Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

MEMORIAL HALL
Columbus, Ohio
FRIDAY, DECEMBER 12th, 1941

"Le Tombeau de Couperin," Suite — Ravel
I. Prelude
II. Forlane
III. Menuet
IV. Rigaudon

Essay for Orchestra — Samuel Barber

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner, in Rondo Form," Op. 28 — Strauss

INTERMISSION

Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetique," Op. 74 — Tschaikowsky
I. Adagio—Allegro non troppo
II. Allegro con grazio
III. Allegro molto vivace
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso

ABOVE are two programs for Boston Symphony orchestra appearances in Columbus. In May, 1890, the orchestra played here at the Metropolitan opera house under the auspices of the Orpheus club. Arthur Nikisch was the conductor. One of the soloists, Charles Martin Loeffler, was later to become famous throughout the world as a composer.

It is interesting to compare the content and arrangement of the 1890 program with that which the Boston orchestra will play tonight in Memorial hall, under the management of the Symphony club of Central Ohio. Serge Koussevitzky is, of course, the 1941 conductor.

The 1890 program is from the collection of Mr. Eugene Grey.

Boston Herald Dec. 18, 1941

MUSIC

Youth Concert

The third concert of the Youth Series by members of the Boston Symphony, conducted by Wheeler Beckett. The Apollo Club chorus assisted. The program was as follows:

Beethoven, Overture; "Leonore" No. 3.
Prisoners' Chorus from "Fidelio"
Gounod, Ballet Music, Waltz Scene and Soldiers' Chorus from "Faust"
Wagner, Venusberg Music and Pilgrims' Chorus from "Tannhaeuser"
J. Strauss, "Blue Danube" Waltzes

Mr. Beckett's program for the third youth concert yesterday afternoon was somewhat in the nature of a Pops session. The 3rd Leonore Overture might be considered an exception to this view, though in itself it is always in favor with the public—and small wonder.

It was an excellent idea to have the Apollo Club Chorus, of which Mr. Beckett is now the director, sing at this concert. The more that can be done to eradicate the prejudice against choral music that has grown up in recent years in this city the better; and giving some of the music in that form from "Fidelio," "Faust" and "Tanhaeuser," not to mention the "Blue Danube" in its original form, is as good a way as any.

The "Faust" selections were super plums, and the Venusberg music written in Wagner's mature style years after the original "Tannhaeuser," was certainly the plum pudding. In fact the whole program might be considered as Mr. Beckett's Christmas present to his youthful audience, and it was quite obvious that it proved acceptable.

A. W. W.

Boston Record - Dec. 18, 1941

PIANIST SANROMA SUBSTITUTES FOR HANSON IN SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The program has been changed for the Boston Symphony concerts this week which are to be given in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, tonight, and in Symphony Hall, tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Howard Hanson, who had been invited to conduct his Third Symphony, has not been able to come to Boston. In place of the symphony, Sanroma will appear as soloist with the orchestra in the Emperor Concerto of Beethoven, No. 5 in E-flat major. The remainder of the program which is to be played at the three concerts, Thursday, Friday and Saturday, will be as announced: Walton's overture, "Portsmouth Point," and Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica."

Important Change In Symphony Program

Owing to the inability of Howard Hanson to come to Boston, the program this Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall and Thursday in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, has been radically changed. Instead of Hanson's 3d Symphony, Beethoven's 5th Piano Concerto in E flat major, "Emperor," will be played, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist. Otherwise Richard Burgin will conduct William Walton's "Portsmouth Point" Overture and Strauss' Symphonia Domestica.

This Clipping From
MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 15 1941

Orchestra

By HERBERT F. PEYSER

So incomparably glorious is the sheer sound of the Boston Symphony that it sometimes has a way of making questions of interpretation appear subsidiary. Mr. Koussevitzky began the season's first New York concert on the evening of Thanksgiving Day with a performance of Beethoven's Eroica which aroused storms of applause. The beauty and virtuosity of the playing could probably not have been excelled by any orchestra on earth and, in the scherzo, the horn trio was done with a perfection one probably does not hear more than half a dozen times in a life span.

But as a reading, pure and simple, Mr. Koussevitzky's could not compare with Bruno Walter's monumental one with the Philharmonic-Symphony a short time before. The Eroica is a work that requires above all else bigness and smashing force; if it has these qualities it will endure even an execution to a certain degree unpolished. The Boston conductor's was sand-papered to the last square inch yet, by and large, of surface effect. But edge, depth, immensity—these things were more or less generally lacking.

During the second half of the program the conductor wasted some minutes on four movements from the second suite that Serge Prokofieff extracted from his ballet Romeo and Juliet, in which singular opus Juliet does not die at all and "the grave is a deception." Worse piffle has seldom in recent years afflicted the infinite patience of music paper. The concert concluded with a resounding virtuoso performance (in which the brass was driven hard) of Moussorgky's Pictures at an Exposition in Ravel's orchestral version, one of Mr. Koussevitzky's hardest worked battle horses.

DEC 15 1941 THE PITTSBURGH PRESS, MONDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1941

Audience Captivated By Boston Symphony

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic.

From the stirring opening notes of the National Anthem to the whispered B-minor chord that ends Tschaikowsy's gripping "Pathetique" symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra captivated a capacity audience in Syria Mosque Saturday night, the event marking the first of two concerts under Pittsburgh Orchestra Association auspices that culminated yesterday afternoon in performance of a different program.

Each year thousands of music lovers here eagerly await the coming of these eloquent ambassadors of orchestral art who always deliver their inspirational message.

Mr. Lewando

Such was the case on Saturday night when superlative performance was accorded a fascinating program that also included Mozart's "Haffner" symphony in D, and the third symphony of the 31-year-old American composer, William Howard Schuman, heard in this city for the first time.

Proves Welcome Work

Mr. Schuman's symphony, coming after a recent performance of his American Festival overture by the Pittsburgh Symphony Society under Dr. Fritz Reiner, proved a welcome work of amazing and significant content, the brilliant performance of which won an ovation. Here is downright absolute music in the fullest sense. It is expresesd in a vital modern medium, with the complete panoply of instrument regalia utilized with surpassing skill.

The forms employed are drawn from the storehouse of classicism, namely, the passacaglia and fugue that comprise the first portion of the symphony, and a chorale and toccata which constitute the second half of the work. Mr. Schuman shows that much can be achieved in merging ancient forms with modern equipment, and he proceeds to reach his goal with admirable craftsmanship, ingenuity and inspiration.

Stimulate the Spirit

Some might call this core cerebrated music. What contrapuntally devised work is otherwise? Yet while it is fascinating to follow the exquisite architecture unfold in technical glory, there are balancing portions that take lyric flight and stimulate the spirit.

Time on end one listens to the moody Tschaikowsky "Sixth." But each reiteration by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony adds further beauties for the listener to cherish. The playing by them of this work was as perfect in accomplishment as it was commanding in interest.

The contrasting Mozart work which started the program was given in Dr. Koussevitzky's customary style, full of vitality and masculine spirit, without recourse to the sentimentality that so often mars performance of Mozartean works.

Yesterday afternoon's program brought to performance Ravel's suite, The Tomb of Couperin; Samuel Barber's Essay; Richard Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

Virtuosity Shown

The orchestral response represented supreme virtuosity upon which Dr. Koussevitzky drew upon for giving utterance to his highly individual interpretative sense. The Ravel work was set forth in the manner typical of the conductor, brilliancy, tempo excitement and tonal effects of unusual quality marking its entire presentation.

The audience also took to its heart the symphonic piece, "Essay," by Samuel Barber, another young American creative musician of endowment. This work is redolent with fine ideas and it is scoted with exceptional ingenuity. Heard here for the first time it proved to be music of the times that is grateful to hear.

Playing of the Strauss work evoked an extended ovation for leader and players, Dr. Koussevitzky being recalled several times and sharing the approbation with his men.

CECILIA SOCIETY CHORUS, directed by Arthur Fiedler, sings Christmas carols on steps of Symphony Hall.

32

Symphony, Opera and Soloists

BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER (GREEN MAGAZINE, DEC. 21, 1941

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will give its next pair of concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, December 26 and 27.

The program will open with "Through the Looking Glass," by Deems Taylor, after Lewis Carroll's book. "Suite Grotesque" by Isidor Achron will have its first performance, and the Third Symphony of Roy Harris will conclude the first portion of the program.

The second part will consist of three Russian pieces based on the folklore of that nation: Moussorgsky's Fantasy, "A Night on Bald Mountain"; Liadov's Folk Tale, "Kikimora," and a Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, "The Fire-Bird."

THE omission of the familiar "Soldier's Chorus" from its presentation of Gounod's "Faust" in English at the Boston Opera House on Jan. 8, will be another of the Philadelphia Opera Co.'s moves in the direction of increasing opera's dramatic validity. In more conservative opera performances, the "Soldier's Chorus" in the fourth act is chanted by a handful of supers who parade back and forth across the scene vainly trying to simulate an entire battalion.

"If we cannot have a full regiment, however, we would rather have no soldiers at all," says Director Sylvan Levin.

WHEN Mischa Elman comes to Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, Jan. 18, he will use a two-century old Stradivarius (1722). This once belonged to Joseph Joachim. Elman's father presented it to Mischa on the occasion of his American debut.

Musicians Asked To Give Services In Defense Work

BOSTON, Dec. 24 (INS) — Musicians should be willing to perform individually and collectively for the benefit of national defense, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today in an appeal to the masters of his craft.

"We must bring the gladness of music to all soldiers in their camps, forts, and battle areas," Koussevitzky said. "We must give the vitalizing beauty of music to all the wounded, sick and disabled soldiers in their hospitals, homes and elsewhere.

"This great service can be discharged by musicians individually and collectively by giving performances in all these places for all these groups."

MUSICIANS ARE URGED TO PLAY FOR DEFENSE

Dec 24 41

BOSTON, Dec. 24.—(INS) Musicians should be willing to perform individually and collectively for the benefit of national defense, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra stated today in an appeal to the masters of his craft.

"We must bring the gladness of music to all soldiers in their camps, forts, and battle areas," Koussevitzky said. "We must give the vitalizing beauty of music to all the wounded, sick and disabled soldiers in their hospitals, homes and elsewhere.

Calls on Musicians to Help Victory in War

BOSTON, Dec. 24 (UP)—Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony orchestra conductor, today called on all musicians in the United States to "bring the gladness of music to all soldiers in their camps, forts and battle areas regardless of any profit."

In a rare public statement, Koussevitzky, who became a citizen in February, said that for the duration of war, "we (musicians) must give the vitalizing beauty of music to all the wounded, sick and disabled soldiers in their hospitals, homes and elsewhere.

In this way, Koussevitzky said, musicians "can help in the attainment of the grand immediate objective. Victory."

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
DEC 24 1941

Urges Musicians To Give Services

Koussevitzky Calls for Music for Fighters

BOSTON, Dec. 23 (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, internationally-known conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, urged all American musicians tonight to "bring the gladness of music to all soldiers" through voluntary performances.

His plea was made in an open statement "to the musicians of the great American democracy," in which he said:

"'Business as usual' and contention for our own advantage must, for the duration of the war, give way to the privilege of serving the country to the maximum of our efforts, regardless of any profit.

"Without any remuneration we must add to our ordinary duties, the extraordinary ones."

THIS CLIPPING FROM MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.

DEC 13 1941

Boston Symphony Opens Season

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their first New York concert of the season, Nov. 20, at Carnegie Hall. Placed between the Eroica Symphony of Beethoven and Ravel's arrangement of Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition, Prokofieff's Ballet Suite, Romeo and Juliet, made an effective contrast to the classical and romantic works on the program. It is delightful music, fresh, vital and pungent, and it was played with the customary enthusiasm which the Bostonians afford modern composers. Although there were moments of greatness in the Eroica, the performance was not up to the usual standard. However, the Moussorgsky work, played with clarity, precision and magnificent orchestral tone, compensated for earlier lapses.—H.V.S.

* * * *

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra took Brooklyn by storm on Nov. 21, with a concert at the Academy of Music. The program, planned to commemorate the anniversaries of Mozart's death and Dvorak's birth, also included the second Romeo and Juliet Suite by Prokofieff. The choice of the "Haffner" and "New World Symphonies" were as good as any. The tonal richness and balance of the orchestra was magnificent. No doubt the fine acoustics of the hall contributed to this factor, for the orchestra sounded considerably better than on the previous evening at Carnegie Hall. It was a refreshing experience to hear the New World Symphony played well. This work can sound very hackneyed when given an exaggerated performance. Koussevitzky conducted it as music pure and simple—the result—the natural beauty of Dvorak's music, unadulterated. The Prokofieff suite is a clever piece of orchestration, full of the composers whimsical modulations and never really attempting to be serious, even in the last scene. The performance was brilliant, as was the occasion.—J.F.S.

DEC 15 1941 THE PITTSBURGH PRESS, MONDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1941

Audience Captivated By Boston Symphony

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic.

From the stirring opening notes of the National Anthem to the whispered B-minor chord that ends Tschaikowsky's gripping "Pathetique" symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra captivated a capacity audience in Syria Mosque Saturday night, the event marking the first of two concerts under Pittsburgh Orchestra Association auspices that culminated yesterday afternoon in performance of a different program.

Each year thousands of music lovers here eagerly await the coming of these eloquent ambassadors of orchestral art who always deliver their inspirational message.

Mr. Lewando

Such was the case on Saturday night when superlative performance was accorded a fascinating program that also included Mozart's "Haffner" symphony in D, and the third symphony of the 31-year-old American composer, William Howard Schuman, heard in this city for the first time.

Proves Welcome Work

Mr. Schuman's symphony, coming after a recent performance of his American Festival overture by the Pittsburgh Symphony Society under Dr. Fritz Reiner, proved a welcome work of amazing and significant content, the brilliant performance of which won an ovation. Here is downright absolute music in the fullest sense. It is expressed in a vital modern medium, with the complete panoply of instrument regalia utilized with surpassing skill.

The forms employed are drawn from the storehouse of classicism, namely, the passacaglia and fugue that comprise the first portion of the symphony, and a chorale and toccata which constitute the second half of the work. Mr. Schuman shows that much can be achieved in merging ancient forms with modern equipment, and he proceeds to reach his goal with admirable craftsmanship, ingenuity and inspiration.

Stimulate the Spirit

Some might call this core cerebrated music. What contrapuntally devised work is otherwise? Yet while it is fascinating to follow the exquisite architecture unfold in technical glory, there are balancing portions that take lyric flight and stimulate the spirit.

Time on end one listens to the moody Tschaikowsky "Sixth." But each reiteration by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony adds further beauties for the listener to cherish. The playing by them of this work was as perfect in accomplishment as it was commanding in interest.

The contrasting Mozart work which started the program was given in Dr. Koussevitzky's customary style full of vitality and masculine spirit, without recourse to the sentimentality that so often mars performance of Mozartean works.

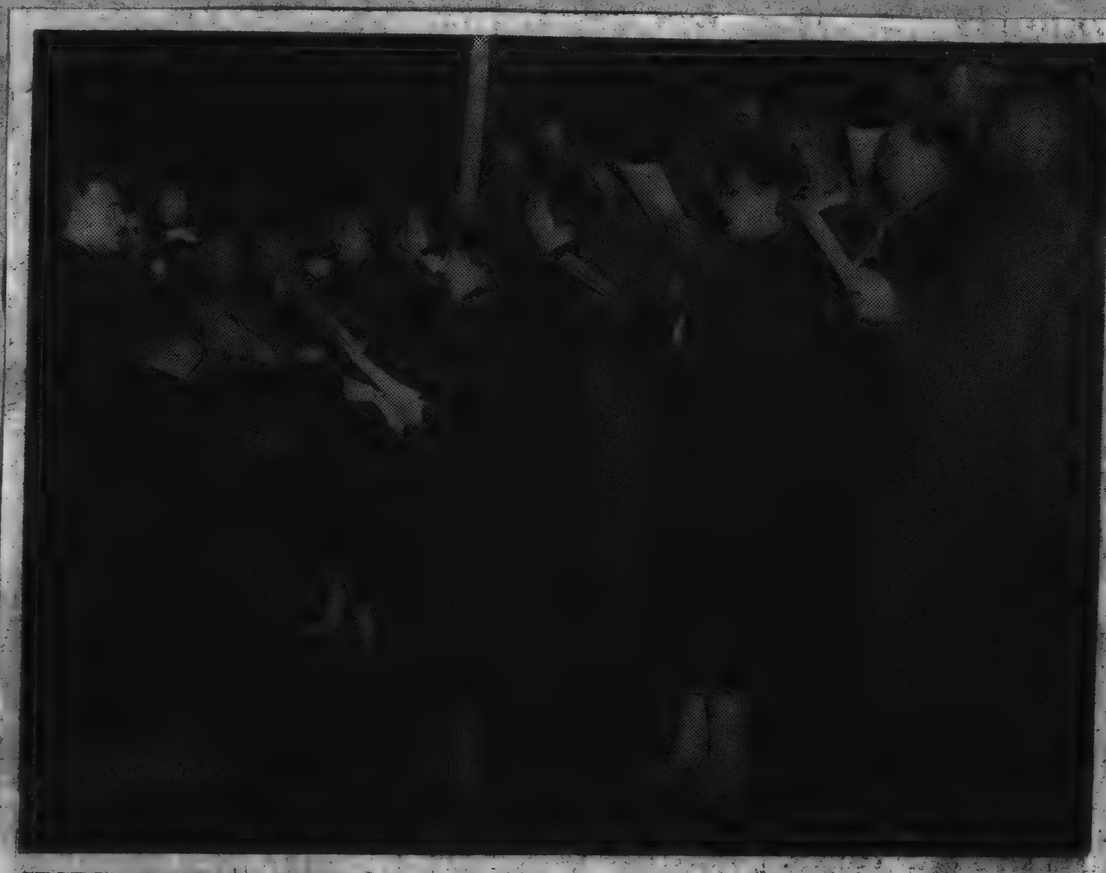
Yesterday afternoon's program brought to performance Ravel's suite, The Tomb of Couperin; Samuel Barber's Essay; Richard Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

Virtuosity Shown

The orchestral response represented supreme virtuosity upon which Dr. Koussevitzky drew upon for giving utterance to his highly individual interpretative sense. The Ravel work was set forth in the manner typical of the conductor, brilliancy, tempo excitement and tonal effects of unusual quality marking its entire presentation.

The audience also took to its heart the symphonic piece, "Essay," by Samuel Barber, another young American creative musician of endowment. This work is redolent with fine ideas and it is scored with exceptional ingenuity. Heard here for the first time it proved to be music of the times that is grateful to hear.

Playing of the Strauss work evoked an extended ovation for leader and players, Dr. Koussevitzky being recalled several times and sharing the approbation with his men.



CECILIA SOCIETY CHORUS, directed by Arthur Fiedler, sings Christmas carols on steps of Symphony Hall.

Boston Globe Dec 25, 1941

32 BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER MAGAZINE, DEC. 21, 1941

Symphony, Opera and Soloists

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will give its next pair of concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, December 26 and 27.

The program will open with "Through the Looking Glass," by Deems Taylor, after Lewis Carroll's book. "Suite Grotesque" by Isidor Achron will have its first performance, and the Third Symphony of Roy Harris will conclude the first portion of the program.

The second part will consist of three Russian pieces based on the folklore of that nation: Moussorgsky's Fantasy, "A Night on Bald Mountain"; Liadov's Folk Tale, "Kikimora," and a Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, "The Fire-Bird."

THE omission of the familiar "Soldier's Chorus" from its presentation of Gounod's "Faust" in English at the Boston Opera House on Jan. 3, will be another of the Philadelphia Opera Co.'s moves in the direction of increasing opera's dramatic validity. In more conservative opera performances, the "Soldier's Chorus" in the fourth act is chanted by a handful of supers who parade back and forth across the scene vainly trying to simulate an entire battalion.

"If we cannot have a full regiment, however, we would rather have no soldiers at all," says Director Sylvan Levin.

WHEN Mischa Elman comes to Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, Jan. 18, he will use a two-century old Stradivarius (1722). This once belonged to Joseph Joachim. Elman's father presented it to Mischa on the occasion of his American debut.

Worcester Evening Gazette Dec 24 1941

Musicians Asked To Give Services In Defense Work

BOSTON, Dec. 24 (INS) — Musicians should be willing to perform individually and collectively for the benefit of national defense, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today in an appeal to the masters of his craft.

"We must bring the gladness of music to all soldiers in their camps, forts, and battle areas," Koussevitzky said. "We must give the vitalizing beauty of music to all the wounded, sick and disabled soldiers in their hospitals, homes and elsewhere.

"This great service can be discharged by musicians individually and collectively by giving performances in all these places for all these groups."

Bridgeport Post

MUSICIANS ARE URGED TO PLAY FOR DEFENSE

Dec 24 41

BOSTON, Dec. 24.—(INS) Musicians should be willing to perform individually and collectively for the benefit of national defense, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra stated today in an appeal to the masters of his craft.

"We must bring the gladness of music to all soldiers in their camps, forts, and battle areas," Koussevitzky said. "We must give the vitalizing beauty of music to all the wounded, sick and disabled soldiers in their hospitals, homes and elsewhere.

Sunday Herald Dec 24 Eagle—Dec 24

Calls on Musicians to Help Victory in War

BOSTON, Dec. 24 (UP)—Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony orchestra conductor, today called on all musicians in the United States to "bring the gladness of music to all soldiers in their camps, forts and battle areas regardless of any profit."

In a rare public statement, Koussevitzky, who became a citizen in February, said that for the duration of war, "we (musicians) must give the vitalizing beauty of music to all the wounded, sick and disabled soldiers in their hospitals, homes and elsewhere.

In this way, Koussevitzky said, musicians "can help in the attainment of the grand immediate objective. Victory."

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
DEC 24 1941

Urges Musicians To Give Services

Koussevitzky Calls for Music for Fighters

BOSTON, Dec. 23 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, internationally-known conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, urged all American musicians tonight to "bring the gladness of music to all soldiers" through voluntary performances.

His plea was made in an open statement "to the musicians of the great American democracy," in which he said:

"'Business as usual' and contention for our own advantage must, for the duration of the war, give way to the privilege of serving the country to the maximum of our efforts, regardless of any profit.

"Without any remuneration we must add to our ordinary duties, the extraordinary ones."

THIS CLIPPING FROM MUSICAL LEADER
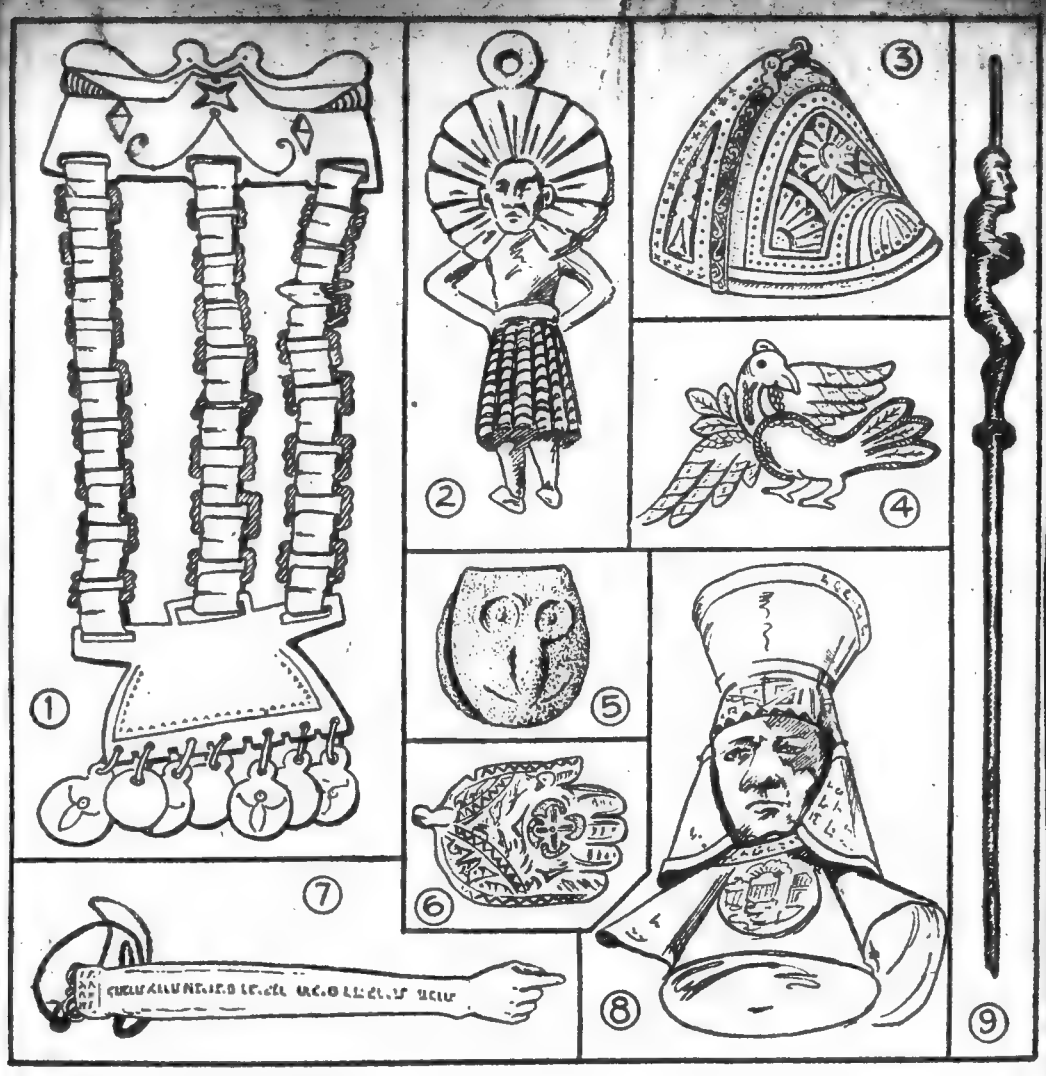
CHICAGO, ILL.
DEC 13 1941

Boston Symphony Opens Season

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their first New York concert of the season, Nov. 20, at Carnegie Hall. Placed between the Eroica Symphony of Beethoven and Ravel's arrangement of Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition, Prokofieff's Ballet Suite, Romeo and Juliet, made an effective contrast to the classical and romantic works on the program. It is delightful music, fresh, vital and pungent, and it was played with the customary enthusiasm which the Bostonians afford modern composers. Although there were moments of greatness in the Eroica, the performance was not up to the usual standard. However, the Moussorgsky work, played with clarity, precision and magnificent orchestral tone, compensated for earlier lapses.—H.V.S.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra took Brooklyn by storm on Nov. 21 with a concert at the Academy of Music. The program, planned to commemorate the anniversaries of Mozart's death and Dvorak's birth, also included the second Romeo and Juliet Suite by Prokofieff. The choice of the "Haffner" and "New World Symphonies" were as good as any. The tonal richness and balance of the orchestra was magnificent. No doubt the fine acoustics of the hall contributed to this factor, for the orchestra sounded considerably better than on the previous evening at Carnegie Hall. It was a refreshing experience to hear the New World Symphony played well. This work can sound very hackneyed when given an exaggerated performance. Koussevitzky conducted it as music pure and simple—the result—the natural beauty of Dvorak's music, unadulterated. The Prokofieff suite is a clever piece of orchestration, full of the composers whimsical modulations and never really attempting to be serious, even in the last scene. The performance was brilliant, as was the occasion.—J.E.S.



Drawings by Martha Burnham

South American Handicraft at Symphony Hall

Textiles and curios of silver, pottery, stone, and feathers, from Chile, Peru, Argentina, and Ecuador: (1) Araucanian breast pin from Chile. (2) Araucanian talisman from Chile. (3) Stirrup of carved wood within a silver stirrup. (4) Araucanian Indian charm. (5) Ancient bell. (6 and 7) Hebrew relics brought to Peru by refugees of Spanish Inquisition in 16th century. (8) Ceremonial cup in silver, portraying Manco Capac, legendary founder of Cuzco and the Incan monarchy. (9) Bobbin from 1,500-year-old Peruvian work box.

South American Handicraft To Be Shown at Symphony Hall

Coincidentally with the appearance of the Chilean pianist, Claudio Arrau, as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts this Friday and Saturday, an exhibition of South American handicraft has been arranged at Symphony Hall.

Textiles and curios of silver, pottery, stone, and feathers—from Chile, Peru, Argentina, and Ecuador—will be displayed in the small gallery off the west corridor of the first balcony. The items are from the Grace Lines Collection.

Included are some objects of an antiquity far antedating Pizarro's conquest of 1533. For example, there is a 1500-year-old Peruvian work box filled with bobbins, which came from near Cuzco, capital of the Empire of the Incas, and site of the gold-lined Temple of the Sun.

Manco Capac, legendary founder of Cuzco and the Incan Monarchy, is portrayed in a striking silver bust. His crown and mantle are formed of silver plates looped into shape, and decorated with a tapped-out pattern by metal punches. The space within the crown forms a flagon used for ceremonial purposes, with the loops of the robe serving as handles.

Very old is a set of what rather resemble sleighbells, on the verdigris-covered, bronze surfaces of which the face of an owl can be made out in relief. These, too, are from Peru, as is a sort of prodigious lapel pin—the decorated top being of frying-pan circumference, the pin of stilletto length and thickness. All the figures are in relief. The outer border has a pattern of laughing jackasses—which also kick.

Spanish occupancy of Chile and Peru shows some of its influence on handicraft in a collection of stirrups. For a woman riding side-saddle, there is a single stirrup of silver, encrusted with hammered ornamentation like brocade. For cavaliers, there are stirrups of carved wood with silver mountings.

In a class quite by themselves are Hebrew religious objects brought to Peru by Jewish refugees expelled from Spain in the sixteenth century. These were collected in various parts of Peru by Mauricio Halle of Lima. A striking item is an arm and hand of silver.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mid-West Tour

Breakfast

Choice of Fruit or Cereal

Old Fashioned Corned Beef Hash

Boiled, Scrambled, Poached or Shirred Eggs

Ham or Bacon, Fried Eggs

Scrambled Eggs, Chopped Ham

Rolls Toast

Guava Jelly Orange Marmalade

Tea Coffee Individual Milk Cocoa

Enroute December 15, 1941

B. J. Bohlender,
Manager, Dining Service, New York

NEW YORK CENTRAL SYSTEM

Symphony Concert, Mr. Burgin Conducting

Strauss comes through triumphant with his "Domestic" Symphony, which was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Richard Burgin in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Doubts for a long time existed about the ranking of this work of his; but they were evidently a consequence of imperfect interpretation. The same thing happened, when we stop to think, with his earlier compositions as they broke on the public ear. No sooner, however, did conductors get the upper hand of their difficulties and search into their meaning than they won their place in the repertory to stay. Very little of Strauss's product lies on the neglected shelf; and if for some time the "Domestic" Symphony seemed likely to rest there, it is in all likelihood permanently out in the world now along with "Don Juan," "Zarathustra," "Hero's Life," and the other accepted things.

An objection that persisted was that most of Strauss's works classify as tone poems; and while his ability in that field stood proved beyond question, his powers outside of it fell in dispute. He figured splendidly, indeed, as another Liszt, but did he count as another Beethoven?

Plain to see, the case stands altogether in his favor, since the "Domestic" Symphony is no more of a symphony than the composer's "Don Quixote" is; and "Don Quixote," in turn, is no more of a tone poem than the "Domestic" Symphony is. Both proclaim the genius of Strauss, their differences in form being not half so important as their likenesses in method and style. They represent his way of speaking, though each of them carries an individual communication. The tragedy, the comedy, the gentle sentiment, the loud magniloquence, the humility, the exaltation—the same contrasts of mood and manner surprise and entrance a listener, whichever of the two is sounding.

To make the matter convincing, performers have got to handle the "Domestic" Symphony with extraordinary skill. They must know the work well and they must see clearly its construction and get at its inner expression. To mark out its exterior traits as a study in "program" music is not enough.

Either that, or what you will; but in any event, here was a performance. Give Mr. Burgin the credit, or say that the Symphony men just played the piece as they played it because from their practice in Strauss and their acquaintance with his output from beginning to end they could not do otherwise.

Something must be the making of an occasion, no one knows what until the break-up. No harm if Beethoven's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 5 in E flat major, with Jesús María Sanromá became a secondary consideration. It proved a valuable half hour illustrating the classic period and setting forth the ideas of the greatest orchestral master in it. All in the way of exposition and development went off smoothly and clearly. The shading varied precisely according to the book. The tempi were without haste or drag. The soloist's execution was of a prime order, his sonority, both in light and full-voiced passages held the right balance with the orchestra's. Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point," which started the concert off, gave the men a chance to break loose with a little joyful noise which they do not too often get.

W. P. T.

SRAUSS POEM BY SYMPHONY

"Domestica" Is Superbly Done Under Burgin

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

On general principles it is far from pleasant to have the musicians' union controlling and curtailing the activities of the non-union Boston Symphony Orchestra. However, in the matter of depriving of us of Howard Hanson's Third Symphony, with the composer as conductor, president Petrillo did some of us an actual service. The Symphony, a derivative work, if ever there was one, was heard here twice in the season before last and the threatened performances of this weekend would have been highly superfluous. Besides, we are having instead an exhilarating reading of Beethoven's "Emperor" Pianoforte Concerto from Jesus Maria Sanroma.

Making his first appearance of the season in his capacity of assistant conductor, Richard Burgin scored a distinct triumph yesterday afternoon. To be sure, his first piece, William Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point" seemed to fall a little flat, as far as the audience was concerned, but the performance of the Concerto, hastily put together, reflected great credit on both conductor and soloist, and the closing number, Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" went over with a bang. Mr. Burgin was thrice recalled, and the applause was redoubled when he summoned the deserving players to their feet.

The once absurdly underrated "Domestica" is now nearing its 40th birthday, but it still taxes an orchestra and leader as do few compositions. There are many tests of virtuosity here, all of them superbly met yesterday, and the conductor has to keep in hand a score of enormous complexity, running at considerable length, in a single movement, and reflecting a multitude of ever-changing moods. This reviewer has stood up for the "Domestica" through thick and thin for many years. He cherishes a particular affection for the work and would feel himself cheated if a conductor failed to realize any of its emotional or technical possibilities. For Mr. Burgin's interpretation he has nothing but the highest praise to offer. As for the music, he is still perverse enough to feel that it represents Strauss at the summit of his powers.

The present performances of "Portsmouth Point" are the third by our orchestra. The work has a certain pictorial quality. It is full of the bustle suggested by Rowlandson's print which inspired it, and it has, withal, an engaging bluffness and heartiness, typically British. In spite of these things it is difficult to get excited about it.

If the "Domestica" seems to some over-long, surely Beethoven's "Emperor" has the same failing. It is one that runs in the German blood. But yesterday Mr. Sanroma's vigorous treatment of the first movement, combined with his finished and discriminating playing, made the music's repetitiousness a little easier to take.

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 9th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Walton.....Overture, "Portsmouth Point"
Beethoven.....Concerto for piano No. 5 in E flat major, Op. 73
Strauss.....Symphonia Domestica Op. 55

As originally designed this concert was hardly a very festive offering for the approaching holidays. But the Musicians' Union surprise Christmas gift to the Boston Symphony public in preventing Mr. Hanson from conducting his 3rd Symphony here and thereby letting us have the Beethoven Concerto instead turned it into an occasion for rejoicing. The Hanson Symphony never seemed to us worth playing in the beginning, except perhaps as an essay in imitation, whereas no one disputes the fact that the 5th Piano Concerto of Beethoven is one of the world's masterpieces in this form.

This union business has actually had the result that we don't hear the great concertos quite so often. This one of Beethoven, for example, familiar as it is, was last done in 1937 with Gieseking as soloist. Our own Mr. Sanroma brought to its performance yesterday all that remarkable musicianship and firm technical precision for which he is justly famous. Beyond this the performance was a good one without being great. Between them you felt that Mr. Sanroma and Mr. Burgin had set the work forth efficiently, but not magnificently, not ultimately, as it were. The best movement was, to our ears, the adagio.

Walton's "Portsmouth Point" Overture is an interesting piece of a work by perhaps the most talented of the modern English composers. For its time in the composer's career it must have been very promising indeed. Unfortunately we have never been allowed to follow that career in such of his later works as his Symphony and viola and violin concertos. This ought to be remedied, for, pleasant as this bustling piece of program music is, "Portsmouth Point" is not a highly important work. It sounded rather episodic and scrappy yesterday, but we gathered the impression that this was the fault of the performance.

You will have to be content with the fact that the Symphonia Domestica is one of our personal blindspots. We no longer pay any attention to its idiotic program, which is what its admirers tell you to do. We have relaxed almost entirely an early antipathy to Strauss and take a gluttonous delight in his juicy and often vulgar scores. At his best Strauss was never ineffective and he certainly could do just what he wanted with his material.

But for the life of us we cannot swallow the Symphonia Domestica. It still seems to us flat and pretentious, with next to none of that coarse vitality and bounce which distinguish "Till" and "Don Juan" and "Zarathustra" and keep them alive. It is tempting to suggest that the well of his inspiration was running dry, and so it may have as far as the symphonic poems went; but all his best operas lay ahead of him at the time of the Symphonia Domestica. At any rate it left us perfectly cold yesterday, and Mr. Burgin's conducting of it seemed more industrious than inspired.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week, Mr. Koussevitzky returns to lead a U. S.-Russian program, as follows: Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking-glass" Suite; Aaron Copland's "Quiet City" (not the Achron suite as announced in the program); Roy Harris's 3rd Symphony; Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain"; Liadov's "Kikimora"; Stravinsky's "Fire Bird."

Symphony's Next Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third pair of concerts of the shorter Boston series on next Monday evening and Tuesray afternoon—and the eleventh pair in the regular series on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 2 and 3.

The soloist for the Friday and Saturday concerts will be Alexander Borovsky, celebrated Russian pianist, who last appeared with this orchestra at the Bach Festival given in the spring of 1931. Mr. Borovsky will play the First piano Concerto of Tchaikovsky, in B-flat minor.

Serge Koussevitsky will open the program with the first performance hereabouts of the "Sinfonia da Requiem" of Benjamin Britten.

The "Concerto Grosso" for Chamber Orchestra of Martinu, the Czech composer, which had its first premiere at those concerts last November, will be repeated. The closing number will be Tchaikovsky's "Ouverture Solennelle, 1812."

The program for the Monday and Tuesday concerts, to be conducted by Koussevitzky, will be Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, No. 102; Arthur Lourie's symphony, "Kormtchaia", and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor.

ORCHESTRA HAILS NEW RETREAT FROM MOSCOW

The News of the World of Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

GRANTED that Tchaikovsky's Overture, "1812," is more a Pop concert than a symphony concert piece, Dr. Koussevitzky has already seen fit to include it in his programmes, and it was inevitable that he would turn to it in order to celebrate the new retreat from Moscow. Some enterprising musician might bring the work up to date, under the title "1941," substituting fragments of the "Horst Wessel Lied" and "Deutschland Ueber Alles" for the quotations from "La Marseillaise." With our present conceptions of counterpoint it would be quite simple. Anyway, "1812" will be the concluding number at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Before it will come Benjamin Britten's "Sinfonia da "Requiem," written in memory of his parents, Martinu's Concerto Grosso, which recently received its world-premiere at Symphony Hall, and the now newly popularized B-flat minor Piano Concerto of Tchaikovsky, with Alexander Borovsky as the soloist. Dr. Koussevitzky will offer three symphonies at the concerts of tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon; Haydn's No. 102, Lourie's "Kormtchaia" and the Fourth of Brahms.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin made his first appearance of the season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon. As the program was originally planned, he was to have presented only William Walton's Overture "Portsmouth Point" and the Strauss "Domestic Symphony," leaving the middle portion to Howard Hanson as guest conductor of his own Third Symphony.

A sudden development that made one think of "An ill wind, etc.," prevented Mr. Hanson from appearing, so in place of his Sibelian Third Symphony we had the infinitely more attractive "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and Mr. Burgin conducting.

The 1920's having been a notoriously barren period for musical composition, Walton's lean and rugged Overture might be expected to have lost vitality in the more than 10 years since it was last played at Boston Symphony concerts. To some extent it has, but not nearly so much as certain other music sired in the period.

The reason is not easy to isolate. Perhaps it is chiefly because Walton's idiom, brusque and dissonant though it was, yet made a direct and effective musical expression of the tavern hurly-burly in Thomas Rowlandson's print of Portsmouth Point, the British naval center.

Even bad pictorial music—which Mr. Walton's Overture is not—will interest more than bad "absolute" music, simply because there is something extraneous the listener can fasten upon.

"Portsmouth Point" is more pictorial than anything else, no matter how clever its form and structure, and it does have something musical to say. Furthermore, the dissonance and thumping rhythms are relieved by folk song quotations of a "Whoop it up, me hearties" fascination.

Mr. Sanroma deserved the sustained applause that brought him back to the stage a number of times after the "Emperor" Concerto. He played clearly and sensitively, with a considerable range of dynamic expression, and without taking the slow movement too slow or the finale too fast. This was the sort of performance that gave an idea of the architecture of the piece, and at the same time was emotional.

That the performance must have been quickly prepared was suggested by occasional rough spots between piano and orchestra. There were also places where Mr. Sanroma seemed uneasy. But the total impression of soloist, orchestra and conductor, was one of competent and sincere music-making that served the Concerto well.

Mr. Burgin continues to increase his technical mastery of conducting. As interpreter, also, he is more mature. Yesterday's performances of Walton, Beethoven and Strauss were the best work one has ever heard from him. The "Domestic Symphony", so long, so tricky and exacting, went off splendidly.

It was not a "virtuoso" reading in the sense of nervous tension, glitter or exaggeration. Instead, the music was allowed to sound for itself; the tempi were right, the humor was not labored, and the texture was clear. More than that was not needed for honest and sympathetic performance.

Next week the program will consist of comparatively short works, as follows: Deems Taylor, Excerpts from "Through the Looking-glass"; Aaron Coplan, "Quiet City"; Roy Harris, Third Symphony; Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain"; Liadov, "Kikimora"; Stravinsky, Suite from "The Fire-Bird". Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.—C. W. D.

43

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 10th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Deems Taylor ..... Suite, "Through the Looking-Glass"
Aaron Copland ..... "Quiet City," for trumpet, English horn and strings
Roy Harris ..... Symphony No. 3
Dmitri Shostakovitch ..... Symphony No. 5, Op. 47

Mr. Koussevitzky made a considerable change in this program from that which he had given out last week, and in so doing he altered it very much for the worse. We do not just at present stand in any need of hearing the Shostakovitch 5th Symphony so soon again. After all, the Boston Symphony audiences form something of a community, and we heard this work twice at the regular concerts, at the Monday-Tuesday series and at the Berkshires last season. Even if it were a masterpiece—which it distinctly is not—that would be too much of a good thing.

As it is, much good and neglected music has been crowded out to make room for repetitions of this lengthy score. Mr. Koussevitzky has every right to regard this Symphony as a modern masterpiece, but we wish merely to protest his power in putting it on at concert after concert when there is other music crying out for performance and when some of us are heartily sick of the very name of Shostakovitch.

We have criticized the 5th Symphony so often and have shifted our ground so little, that we shall offer here only a precis of opinion. The best movement is the first, which in its last pages contains music of real imagination. Next best movement is the second, which is more or less modeled after Prokofieff, only not so good or so clever. The largo seems to us quite barren and extraordinarily tedious, and the finale is just bombast. That is one man's opinion, but it has been arrived at over a thorny path.

Another fault in Mr. Koussevitzky's change of program was the repetition of Copland's "Quiet City," an amorphous score which does not wear well. It would have been much better to have had the complete novelty originally announced. "Quiet City" sounds rather like music for a documentary film. Heard by itself it quickly palls. There is a curious resemblance, probably unconscious, of Moussorgsky's "Pictures" at the beginning and the end. Mr. Copland is an honest composer, but it is his hard luck to write better about music than music itself.

Copland's piece was done last season and at the Berkshires, and Harris's 3rd Symphony has also had many recent performances. It looks as though Mr. Koussevitzky were resting on his oars in the task of widening the Boston Symphony's repertory, which is something he has not been guilty of before. At any rate, the Harris symphony was much the strongest and most interesting music on the program. It has all that the composer might claim for it—originality, contrast and something which Mr. Harris has often painfully avoided, charm. The ending now seems a bit long drawn out, especially in the use of that drum device. Mr. Harris was in the audience and came out to acknowledge the applause.

The excerpts from Deems Taylor's "Looking-glass" Suite are nice enough and have a lot of skillful orchestration to recommend them. We cannot own to much enthusiasm for them beyond their value as pleasing trifles. Everything on the program was brushed up and decked out as only Mr. Koussevitzky and his men can contrive; but, as far as we were concerned and except for the Harris Symphony, they might have saved their breath.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the program is as follows: Britten's Sinfonia da Requiem; Martinu's Concerto Grosso; Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 (Alexander Borovsky, soloist) and his 1812 Overture.

This Clipping From
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
DEC 30 1941

Kin of Mrs. Pratt Dies; With Boston Symphony

Vincent H. Mariotti, 51, of Newton Highlands, a first violinist with the Boston Symphony orchestra for 19 years and a brother of Mrs. James B. Pratt of Lynde lane, wife of Prof. Pratt of the philosophy department at Williams college, died Sunday at Peter Bent Brigham hospital, Boston.

A native of Rome, Italy, Mr. Mariotti studied music in Rome, Vienna and Prague before coming to this country in 1921. Shortly afterward he joined the Boston symphony which in the summer season becomes the Berkshire Symphonic festival orchestra at Stockbridge. He was interested in violin construction and was the developer of a violin varnish. He had taught at the New England Conservatory, Boston, and for 16 years was a member of the Lake Placid club ensemble.

Besides Mrs. Pratt he leaves a widow, Mrs. Marion Willis Mariotti; two daughters, the Misses Adele and Fiora Mariotti; two other sisters, Mrs. Percival Truman and Mrs. Margherita Santagata and a brother, Lionello Mariotti.

SYMPHONY IN HAPPIEST MOOD

Post Dec 27

Russo-American Pieces Prove Delightful

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The holiday hodge-podge announced by Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of this week-end finally shook itself down to a reasonable, well-considered programme of four numbers, though still preserving its original Russo-American character. From the original list there still remained the three numbers from Deems Taylor's Suite, "Through the Looking-glass," and Roy Harris' Third Symphony, while Copland's "Quiet City" held over from the first revision. As substitute for the pieces by Moussorgsky, Liadov and Stravinsky, the conductor turned to the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch, which he played twice last season, to the increasing annoyance of the reviewers.

As far as this particular critic is concerned Dr. Koussevitzky may be said to have scored his point. He is prepared to eat humble pie, and not for the first time in his life, either. No longer does he find the engaging frankness of this work to be a mere truckling to conservative officialdom, even though the circumstances attending its composition and premiere seemed to warrant such an interpretation. Heard in the light of a better acquaintance with the First Symphony, which Dr. Koussevitzky has promised for this season, the Fifth seems wholly typical of its composer's methods.

Equipped, through his remarkable technique, to write in almost any style, Shostakovitch in the two symphonies known hereabouts prefers directness and clarity to contemporary cacophonies, confusions and complications. The Finale is a bit rowdy to be sure, and the Vienese-sounding Scherzo seems odd in a Russian symphony, but this 35-year-old Soviet composer has an inquiring mind and a streak of acquisitiveness. He is also a master of musical satire. After Mr. Harris' grapplings and strivings, Shostakovitch seemed yesterday afternoon so refreshingly sure of himself. The performance, like those of last season, was superb.

It would be futile to deny Mr. Harris a considerable measure of both originality and forcefulness of utterance. In this Third Symphony he shows himself capable of beauty and power, but there remains the feeling that his technical means, whether from necessity or from choice, are tiresomely limited. The Symphony is too prevailingly legato in style, and there is too much of the canonic imitation in which Mr. Harris delights. He reminds one a little of a painter who has a sense of form and color, but has not mastered the problems of perspective.

"Quiet City" was good to hear again. The music generates a mood which for some listeners is finally somewhat dissipated because of a lack of contrasing matter. However, it definitely marks Mr. Copland as a poet in tone and the time was when he was anything but.

If Mr. Taylor's Suite is to be played at all, it should be played in its entirety. The "Jabberwocky" is witty and "The White Knight" is the crown of the whole. Perhaps the humor of the one and the sentiment of the other are too Anglo-Saxon for Dr. Koussevitzky's comprehension. The first three movements, charming and imaginative if a bit old-fashioned, judged by present-day standards, were deftly played. Neither Mr. Taylor nor Mr. Copland showed up yesterday, but Mr. Harris was right on the job.

Globe MUSIC Dec 29

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was prefaced with the spoken request of Conductor Serge Koussevitzky: "Ladies and gentlemen, will you please sing 'The Star Spangled Banner' with us? Merry Christmas to you!" They did sing, not as heartily as one would expect from an audience of some 2500 people, but they sang. Perhaps next week we shall hear an adequate volume of tone from the Friday subscribers.

The program ultimately played was twice altered after its original announcement. The second of these changes, not made public beforehand, brought the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch in place of three short pieces by Moussorgsky, Liadov and Stravinsky.

Was this a clever riposte at the town's music critics who not only have regarded the Shostakovitch symphony sourly, but only a week ago were rejoicing at the fortune which eliminated Howard Hanson's Third Symphony, also championed by Mr. Koussevitzky, but disparaged by the critics? If so the word this morning is "touche," because conductor and orchestra gave a marvelous performance of the disputed Russian work.

In fact the whole afternoon showed the orchestra at its peak of magnificence, from the opening three excerpts from Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking-Glass" Suite, to Aaaron Copland's "Quiet City" and the Third Symphony by Roy Harris.

What was particularly striking was the clear, brilliant and ocean-deep tone of the orchestra, that never sounded clearer, deeper or more brilliant. Habitual concert-goers can take speed, precision and technical wizardry for granted (although they shouldn't) but the Boston Symphony tone is something for endless wonder.

Shostakovitch's Fifth may yet be one of the famous battles of musical history, locally speaking. Perhaps those who don't like it are presently goin gto find themselves a dwindling, harassed band, perishing like Louis XVI's Swiss Guard, faithful to their principles but impractical in the trivial matter of survival.

There are many who admire the Shostakovitch Fifth, who find it enthralling, original and full of artistic substance. Those qualities are precisely the ones that are missing, according to this reviewer's lights. Not all the splendor of tone (thanks largely to Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra), not all the imposing length, and the intellectual fascination of the patterns of the notes on paper can make it seem like anything but the futile swirling of winds upon an arid plain.

Aaron Copland and Roy Harris had it al over Shostakovitch. Hear the concentrated, short music of these two and then observe the panting length of the Fifth Symphony. Note the quick mood-painting of "Quiet City" and then the restlessness of the Fifth Symphony's three fast movements.

Compare the steady upward sweep of Harris' Third Symphony, one of the most important American scores ever penned, with the freight-train stop-and-go of Shostakovitch. And, most importantly, consider the distinctive personal idioms of Copland and Harris as against the largely imitative technique of Shostakovitch.

The pleasant if not remarkable music of Deems Taylor, most ingeniously orchestrated, made an excellent beginning. Mr. Harris was present and bowed from the stage after his music.

The program next week: Benjamin Britten: Sinfonia da Requiem (first performance in Boston); Martinu: Concerto Grosso; Tchaikovsky: B-flat minor Piano Concerto (Alexander Borovsky, soloist); "1812 Overture."

C. W. D.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
DEC 28 1941

Orchestra Life To Carry On Despite War

"AMERICAN orchestral life will not be affected by the war," declares Arthur M. See, executive secretary of the Civic Music Association, bringing back impressions from the recent conference of managers of the major symphony orchestras held in New York.

The conference discussed common problems such as ways of increasing audiences, raising musical standards, questions of taxation, sustaining fund campaigns and other methods of finding money to meet deficits.

In a series of informal meetings managers agreed that although a temporary slump might be anticipated, there was every reason to believe that a definite increase in attendance could be looked for during the coming year. During wartime, according to past experiences and present indications, music would be more necessary than ever before to sustain civilian morale.

Draft Not Yet

The only immediate problem was that of the blackout, which up to now has touched only the Pacific Coast. This is being solved locally by substituting afternoon concerts wherever possible for evening events. The draft has not yet materially affected orchestra personnels to any extent but managers will not ask exemption for such men as are subject to call.

Open-air organizations presenting symphony concerts, such as the Stadium in New York, Hollywood Bowl, Washington and Cleveland are planning for next summer as usual.

In general, reports of concert managers show heavier business than ever before with no cancellations or signs of indecision or timidity in planning for the future.

Composed of 16 orchestras whose budgets are more than $100,000 a year, the association includes the following orchestras and their managers: Rochester Philharmonic, Boston Symphony, Philadelphia Orchestra, Chicago Symphony, New York Philharmonic-Symphony, Cleveland Orchestra, Cincinnati Symphony, St. Louis Symphony, Detroit Symphony, Minneapolis Symphony, Pittsburgh Symphony, Los Angeles Philharmonic, San Francisco Symphony, National Symphony, Washington; Indianapolis Symphony, Kansas City Symphony.

Attendance Increases

A report prepared by Arthur Gaines of Minneapolis and covering the operating statements of 10 important American symphony orchestras for the past five years, showed that from the season 1936-37 through the season 1940-41, there was an increase of 96 per cent in the number of concerts given en tour, an increase of 27.7 per cent in attendance at concerts at home and an increase of 97.3 per cent in attendance of concerts en tour.

The digest showed the trend of musical development in the United States to be toward more concerts in more places and to greater audiences everywhere. With little increase in operating expenses the figures revealed that the orchestras are serving a much larger public than heretofore. It is believed that attendance at concerts and other forms of entertainment, during the war, are likely to show a substantial increase rather than a decline.

Rochester shows the same proportionate increase in attendance this year, Mr. See said, the figures for the season being considerably ahead those of last year, which in itself was a particularly good season.

This Clipping From
FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTINEL
DEC 27 1941

Conductor Wins Convert For Russian Symphony

BOSTON, Dec. 27 (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony conductor who has been a feuding with Boston's hard boiled newspaper critics for more than a year over the relative merits of Soviet composer Dimitri Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony, has dented their solid front against the work.

Koussevitzky, who said last season he would keep playing the symphony "until the critics realize its greatness," conducted it again yesterday, and won one new convert out of four reviewers present.

Warren Storey Smith, writing in the Post, said that hearing the work "In the light of a better acquaintance of the Fifth Symphony . . . this reviewer is prepared to eat humble pie—and not for the first time in his life, either."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 29 1941

Vincent H. Mariotti Dies; Boston Symphony Player

First Violinist With Orchestra and Teacher Was 51

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—Vincent H. Mariotti, of Newton Highlands, a first violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for nineteen years, died today at the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital. He was fifty-one years old.

A native of Rome, Italy, he studied music in Rome, Vienna and Prague before coming to this country in 1921. Shortly afterwards he joined the symphony. He was interested in violin construction and discovered a violin varnish. He had taught at the New England Conservatory of Music, and for sixteen years was a member of the Lake Placid Club Ensemble.

Surviving are his wife, Mrs. Marion Willis Mariotti; two daughters, the Misses Adele and Fiora Mariotti; three sisters, Mrs. James B. Pratt, Mrs. Percival Truman and Mrs. Margherita Santagata, and a brother, Lionello Mariotti.

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE
DEC 29 1941

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
DEC 29 1941

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 30 1941

Novelty for Symphony Concerts—

Christian Science Monitor Dec. 31, 1941

Dr. Koussevitzky to Offer Britten 'Sinfonia da Requiem'

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Not so long ago, the concert public marvelled at the temerity of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in bringing out so much new music and cutting down the number of performances of classics. Today the wonder more probably is, where would Dr. Koussevitzky be if he had refused to extend hospitality to the composers of the moment and had neglected to give his audiences a chance to judge their works. For plainly enough, if he had kept on conservatively presenting only things that his people had heard him offer year after year, and that they heard repeated over the radio and reproduced on records again and again, he would simply find himself behind the times; and the Boston Symphony, instead of holding its place at the forefront of American artistic institutions, would be a gone-to-seed museum.

Perhaps it is not so long either, since the concert public took umbrage at Dr. Koussevitzky's submitting to its attention now and then something out of all hope of upper rating, and something that nobody would care to hear more than once and that a minority could tolerate even for a single experience. But the general attitude of late seems to favor the choices the conductor makes and to go along with him for a trial exhibition, if no further.

* * *

Every orchestral leader has his special preferences. There is no help for that. A musician has certain predilections according to his early training, according to the associations of his prime, and according to many other things. One of British likings will push the British school, one of Italian the Italian, one of French the French. No escape, we have to take that. Nevertheless, when it comes to Dr. Koussevitzky, we meet a policy of extraordinary breadth. He may at times shove the Russians out in front; yet again, he lets every nationality have a turn.

At this week's concerts, Benjamin Britten, of England, comes to notice with his work entitled "Sinfonia da Requiem," which was brought out at the end of last season by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, under John Barbirolli. It consists of three parts bearing the designations, "Lacrymosa," "Dies Irae," and "Requiem Aeternam." Although a sort of triptych, it plays right through as a single movement, and it is not long. Perhaps the name, "Sinfornia," borrowed from the old Italian musical vocabulary, is intended to indicate that it is not a real symphony but only a short orchestral study in symphonic style.

* * *

By the looks of the score, which still stands in manuscript and is lent to the Boston Symphony for the occasion, the "Sinfonia" is an example of modernism of a quite up-to-date kind. But every keen concert listener has learned that music can be very modern indeed and still be very far from new. In some cases, the more modern its sound, the more past and gone its ideas. It then proves to be merely "modernistic," disclosing little that can be called novel.

Hearing alone tells; and in the "Sinfonia" there appears from the score plenty to hear, for the array of instruments is vast. To make a hasty pre-judgment, which may not stand for longer than the time it takes to say it, the "Sinfonia" goes smoothly and interestingly. It is a problem, however, chiefly of execution. It hardly offers anything but easily surmountable difficulties of interpretation.

Alexander Borovsky

Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

This Clipping From
MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 15 1941

Christian Science Monitor - Dec 30, 1941

Monday Symphony Concert

Letting in the Monday night subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts for hearing some new music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky repeated for their benefit last night the work by Arthur Vincent Lourié which he produced for his Friday and Saturday people in November. Again he invited the composer on from New York to attend the performance and to receive the applause of the audience. He interpreted the piece, which bears the title, "Kormtchaia" Symphony No. 2, as something that he thinks highly of and that he regards as likely to win a place in the orchestra's permanent repertory; or at any rate as something that will stand among the primary enterprises of the present season.

Dr. Koussevitzky prepares a novelty with such care as to make it go off smoothly, no matter what may be its difficulties and no matter what its unusual sonorities. We do not have to excuse inadequacies of execution and we do not have to wait to pass judgment at some future time when he has better mastered the score and when the players have got more thoroughly into their parts. The ensemble is completely organized at the outset; the job is perfectly done the first time.

It comes about under such conditions that a composer is rather well shown up if he is of the second line, and that he takes on pretty nearly his true value if he is of the first. We are almost certain to be convinced one way or the other, even if we express ourselves in undecisive terms. Our persuasion stands, even if our spoken opinions waver this way and that.

A first-rate symphony simply will not let go of us; it will not be talked down or thought down. And is not "Kormtchaia" one of that sort? A disconcerting circumstance is that this composition conveys little effect of oddity or irregularity; and yet it parallels nothing in either our classic or our romantic experience. The form seems straightforward and even familiar, yet it resembles nothing conventional and historic. The melodies are certainly tuneful; but let someone say where they in any respect borrowed. The harmonies seem logical; they bind the notes of an air together, as harmonies ought; but tell us the page of the schoolbook where the rules for them stand written.

The work gives an impression of diversity and of unity as well, but this state of affairs is not explained according to the nineteenth-century four-movement plan. The term "variation" may apply, but let nobody try to figure out a sonata or a fugue or anything else on the old carpentry order.

On the program, to open, was the Haydn Symphony in B flat, No. 102 (drums delicately in tune in the Adagio, which is another way of observing that the intonation of the whole orchestra was close to perfection). To close, the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op 98. Exacting company for Lourié, and he held up his corner.

W. P. T.

BOSTON: Defauw Applauded G
With Koussevitzky Fo

By IRVING SCHWERKE

BOSTON.—The seventh Saturday evening program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Désiré Defauw as guest conductor, was one of the most interesting of the season thus far. M. Defauw was given a warm welcome by the almost-capacity audience, and shared his success throughout the evening with his collaborators. The orchestra was at its best, responding to Defauw's expansive and magnetic directions with its wonted elasticity and ensemble perfection.

Opening his list with Franck's symphony, Defauw infused into the work that subtle flavor and atmosphere which, for want of better terms, may be labelled French. It was a rare musical joy to hear the symphony played with such soaring eloquence.

A brace of works new to the Boston Symphony repertoire included Respighi's The Birds, suite for small orchestra, and Lekeu's Adagio for string orchestra. The Respighi opus (premiered by Defauw at the Augusteo, Rome, back in the good old days of 1928) was utterly charming, both as to text and performance. Choosing material from seventeenth century harpsichord pieces, the composer tastefully and cleverly compiled a pleasing score including a Prelude, after Pasquini; the Dove, after Jacques de Gallot; The Hen, after Rameau; The Nightingale, after an anonymous English composer, and The Cuckoo, after Pasquini. The Lekeu work, in spite of numerous exquisite solo passages for the string section, is overlong and curiously indefinite in form.

A rousing finale was provided in a brilliant reading of Dukas' Sorcerer's Apprentice, in which conductor and band showed superlative virtuosity.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
DEC 28 1941

Boston Symphony To Play Classics At Local Concert

Interesting New Work Also Included on Bushnell Program

Two melodious classics and an interesting new work are included in the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at the Bushnell Memorial on Tuesday evening, January 6 in the fourth event of the Bushnell Smyphony Series. The list in which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead his noted band has been announced by William H. Mortensen, mangaing director of the Bushnell Memorial as follows:

Symphony in B-flat, No. 102, by Haydn; "Kormtchaia," Symphony No. 2, by Lourie; and Symphony No. 4 in E minor, by Brahms.

The Haydn Symphony is one of six which the great musician composed for his second visit to London in 1794 and 1795—he composed twelve in all for performance by the orchestra of Salomon in the British capital. The symphony was written, according to C. F. Pohl, Haydn's biographer, in 1795, and must accordingly have been performed in that year. Haydn was required by the terms of his agreement with Salomon to write a new work for each of the weekly concerts in the subscription series which that impressario arranged, and the composer was as good as his word.

Prof. Donald Francis Tovey calls this symphony of Haydn's "three greatest instrumental works." As the annotator for the Boston program writes: "Tovey points out at length Haydn's success in obtaining that symmetry expected of a symphony in the eighteeth century while avoiding the rather barren means of an almost identical recapitulation, to balance the exposition. 'What the orthodox textbooks assume to be Haydn's recapitulation is neither more nor less than a true Beethoven coda of the ripest kind.

Where then does symmetry come in? It comes in at the end of the exposition, which Haydn always rounds of very nearly in a phrase quietly reproduced at the end of the movement, just where it is the last thing you would expect . . . The only way to get the benefit of Haydn's or any great composer's sense of form is to listen naively to the music, with expectation directed mainly to its sense of movement. Nothing in Haydn is difficult to follow, but almost everything is unexpected if you listen closely, and without preconceptions.' Haydn, the subtle vagrant in modulation, here plies his skill to the utmost. Near the end of the exposition he drops his ingratiating ways to establish his new keys with sudden loud chords. They have a boldness foretelling Beethoven."

Novelty for Symphony Concerts—

Christian Science Monitor
Dec. 21, 1941

Dr. Koussevitzky to Offer Britten 'Sinfonia da Requiem'

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Not so long ago, the concert public marvelled at the temerity of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in bringing out so much new music and cutting down the number of performances of classics. Today the wonder more probably is, where would Dr. Koussevitzky be if he had refused to extend hospitality to the composers of the moment and had neglected to give his audiences a chance to judge their works. For plainly enough, if he had kept on conservatively presenting only things that his people had heard him offer year after year, and that they heard repeated over the radio and reproduced on records again and again, he would simply find himself behind the times; and the Boston Symphony, instead of holding its place at the forefront of American artistic institutions, would be a gone-to-seed museum.

Perhaps it is not so long either, since the concert public took umbrage at Dr. Koussevitzky's submitting to its attention now and then something out of all hope of upper rating, and something that nobody would care to hear more than once and that a minority could tolerate even for a single experience. But the general attitude of late seems to favor the choices the conductor makes and to go along with him for a trial exhibition, if no further.

* * *

Every orchestral leader has his special preferences. There is no help for that. A musician has certain predilections according to his early training, according to the associations of his prime, and according to many other things. One of British likings will push the British school, one of Italian the Italian, one of French the French. No escape, we have to take that. Nevertheless, when it comes to Dr. Koussevitzky, we meet a policy of extraordinary breadth. He may at times shove the Russians out in front; yet again, he lets every nationality have a turn.

At this week's concerts, Benjamin Britten, of England, comes to notice with his work entitled "Sinfonia da Requiem," which was brought out at the end of last season by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, under John Barbirolli. It consists of three parts bearing the designations, "Lacrymosa," "Dies Irae," and "Requiem Aeternam." Although a sort of triptych, it plays right through as a single movement, and it is not long. Perhaps the name, "Sinfonia," borrowed from the old Italian musical vocabulary, is intended to indicate that it is not a real symphony but only a short orchestral study in symphonic style.

* * *

By the looks of the score, which still stands in manuscript and is lent to the Boston Symphony for the occasion, the "Sinfonia" is an example of modernism of a quite up-to-date kind. But every keen concert listener has learned that music can be very modern indeed and still be very far from new. In some cases, the more modern its sound, the more past and gone its ideas. It then proves to be merely "modernistic," disclosing little that can be called novel.

Hearing alone tells; and in the "Sinfonia" there appears from the score plenty to hear, for the array of instruments is vast. To make a hasty pre-judgment, which may not stand for longer than the time it takes to say it, the "Sinfonia" goes smoothly and interestingly. It is a problem, however, chiefly of execution. It hardly offers anything but easily surmountable difficulties of interpretation.

Alexander Borovsky

Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

This Clipping From
MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 15 1941

Christian Science Monitor—Dec 30, 1941

Monday Symphony Concert

Letting in the Monday night subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts for hearing some new music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky repeated for their benefit last night the work by Arthur Vincent Lourié which he produced for his Friday and Saturday people in November. Again he invited the composer on from New York to attend the performance and to receive the applause of the audience. He interpreted the piece, which bears the title, "Kormtchaia" Symphony No. 2, as something that he thinks highly of and that he regards as likely to win a place in the orchestra's permanent repertory; or at any rate as something that will stand among the primary enterprises of the present season.

Dr. Koussevitzky prepares a novelty with such care as to make it go off smoothly, no matter what may be its difficulties and no matter what its unusual sonorities. We do not have to excuse inadequacies of execution and we do not have to wait to pass judgment at some future time when he has better mastered the score and when the players have got more thoroughly into their parts. The ensemble is completely organized at the outset; the job is perfectly done the first time.

It comes about under such conditions that a composer is rather well shown up if he is of the second line, and that he takes on pretty nearly his true value if he is of the first. We are almost certain to be convinced one way or the other, even if we express ourselves in undecisive terms. Our persuasion stands, even if our spoken opinions waver this way and that.

A first-rate symphony simply will not let go of us; it will not be talked down or thought down. And is not "Kormtchaia" one of that sort? A disconcerting circumstance is that this composition conveys little effect of oddity or irregularity; and yet it parallels nothing in either our classic or our romantic experience. The form seems straightforward and even familiar, yet it resembles nothing conventional and historic. The melodies are certainly tuneful; but let someone say where they in any respect borrowed. The harmonies seem logical; they bind the notes of an air together, as harmonies ought; but tell us the page of the schoolbook where the rules for them stand written.

The work gives an impression of diversity and of unity as well, but this state of affairs is not explained according to the nineteenth-century four-movement plan. The term "variation" may apply, but let nobody try to figure out a sonata or a fugue or anything else on the old carpentry order.

On the program, to open, was the Haydn Symphony in B flat, No. 102 (drums delicately in tune in the Adagio, which is another way of observing that the intonation of the whole orchestra was close to perfection). To close, the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op 98. Exacting company for Lourié, and he held up his corner.

W. P. T.

BOSTON: Defauw Applauded G
With Koussevitzky Fo

By IRVING SCHWERKE

BOSTON.—The seventh Saturday evening program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Désiré Defauw as guest conductor, was one of the most interesting of the season thus far. M. Defauw was given a warm welcome by the almost-capacity audience, and shared his success throughout the evening with his collaborators. The orchestra was at its best, responding to Defauw's expansive and magnetic directions with its wonted elasticity and ensemble perfection.

Opening his list with Franck's symphony, Defauw infused into the work that subtle flavor and atmosphere which, for want of better terms, may be labelled French. It was a rare musical joy to hear the symphony played with such soaring eloquence.

A brace of works new to the Boston Symphony repertoire included Respighi's The Birds, suite for small orchestra, and Lekeu's Adagio for string orchestra. The Respighi opus (premiered by Defauw at the Augusteo, Rome, back in the good old days of 1928) was utterly charming, both as to text and performance. Choosing material from seventeenth century harpsichord pieces, the composer tastefully and cleverly compiled a pleasing score including a Prelude, after Pasquini; the Dove, after Jacques de Gallot; The Hen, after Rameau; The Nightingale, after an anonymous English composer, and The Cuckoo, after Pasquini. The Lekeu work, in spite of numerous exquisite solo passages for the string section, is overlong and curiously indefinite in form.

A rousing finale was provided in a brilliant reading of Dukas' Sorcerer's Apprentice, in which conductor and band showed superlative virtuosity.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
DEC 28 1941

Boston Symphony To Play Classics At Local Concert

Interesting New Work Also Included on Bushnell Program

Two melodious classics and an interesting new work are included in the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at the Bushnell Memorial on Tuesday evening, January 6 in the fourth event of the Bushnell Smyphony Series. The list in which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead this noted band has been announced by William H. Mortensen, mangaing director of the Bushnell Memorial as follows:

Symphony in B-flat, No. 102, by Haydn; "Kormtchaia," Symphony No. 2, by Lourie; and Symphony No. 4 in E minor, by Brahms.

The Haydn Symphony is one of six which the great musician composed for his second visit to London in 1794 and 1795—he composed twelve in all for performance by the orchestra of Salomon in the British capital. The symphony was written, according to C. F. Pohl, Haydn's biographer, in 1795, and must accordingly have been performed in that year. Haydn was required by the terms of his agreement with Salomon to write a new work for each of the weekly concerts in the subscription series which that impressario arranged, and the composer was as good as his word.

Prof. Donald Francis Tovey calls this symphony of Haydn's "three greatest instrumental works." As the annotator for the Boston program writes: "Tovey points out at length Haydn's success in obtaining that symmetry expected of a symphony in the eighteeth century while avoiding the rather barren means of an almost identical recapitulation, to balance the exposition. 'What the orthodox textbooks assume to be Haydn's recapitulation is neither more nor less than a true Beethoven coda of the ripest kind.

Where then does symmetry come in? It comes in at the end of the exposition, which Haydn always rounds of very nearly in a phrase quietly reproduced at the end of the movement, just where it is the last thing you would expect . . . The only way to get the benefit of Haydn's or any great composer's sense of form is to listen naively to the music, with expectation directed mainly to its sense of movement. Nothing in Haydn is difficult to follow, but almost everything is unexpected if you listen closely, and without preconceptions.' Haydn, the subtle vagrant in modulation, here plies his skill to the utmost. Near the end of the exposition he drops his ingratiating ways to establish his new keys with sudden loud chords. They have a boldness foretelling Beethoven."

Novelty for Symphony Concerts—

44

Christian Science Monitor
Dec. 21, 1941

Dr. Koussevitzky to Offer Britten 'Sinfonia da Requiem'

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Not so long ago, the concert public marvelled at the temerity of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in bringing out so much new music and cutting down the number of performances of classics. Today the wonder more probably is, where would Dr. Koussevitzky be if he had refused to extend hospitality to the composers of the moment and had neglected to give his audiences a chance to judge their works. For plainly enough, if he had kept on conservatively presenting only things that his people had heard him offer year after year, and that they heard repeated over the radio and reproduced on records again and again, he would simply find himself behind the times; and the Boston Symphony, instead of holding its place at the forefront of American artistic institutions, would be a gone-to-seed museum.

Perhaps it is not so long either, since the concert public took umbrage at Dr. Koussevitzky's submitting to its attention now and then something out of all hope of upper rating, and something that nobody would care to hear more than once and that a minority could tolerate even for a single experience. But the general attitude of late seems to favor the choices the conductor makes and to go along with him for a trial exhibition, if no further.

* * *

Every orchestral leader has his special preferences. There is no help for that. A musician has certain predilections according to his early training, according to the associations of his prime, and according to many other things. One of British likings will push the British school, one of Italian the Italian, one of French the French. No escape, we have to take that. Nevertheless, when it comes to Dr. Koussevitzky, we meet a policy of extraordinary breadth. He may at times shove the Russians out in front; yet again, he lets every nationality have a turn.

At this week's concerts, Benjamin Britten, of England, comes to notice with his work entitled "Sinfonia da Requiem," which was brought out at the end of last season by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, under John Barbirolli. It consists of three parts bearing the designations, "Lacrymosa," "Dies Irae," and "Requiem Aeternam." Although a sort of triptych, it plays right through as a single movement, and it is not long. Perhaps the name, "Sinfonia," borrowed from the old Italian musical vocabulary, is intended to indicate that it is not a real symphony but only a short orchestral study in symphonic style.

* * *

By the looks of the score, which still stands in manuscript and is lent to the Boston Symphony for the occasion, the "Sinfonia" is an example of modernism of a quite up-to-date kind. But every keen concert listener has learned that music can be very modern indeed and still be very far from new. In some cases, the more modern its sound, the more past and gone its ideas. It then proves to be merely "modernistic," disclosing little that can be called novel.

Hearing alone tells; and in the "Sinfonia" there appears from the score plenty to hear, for the array of instruments is vast. To make a hasty pre-judgment, which may not stand for longer than the time it takes to say it, the "Sinfonia" goes smoothly and interestingly. It is a problem, however, chiefly of execution. It hardly offers anything but easily surmountable difficulties of interpretation.

Alexander Borovsky

Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

This Clipping From
MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 15 1941

Christian Science Monitor Dec 30, 1941

Monday Symphony Concert

Letting in the Monday night subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts for hearing some new music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky repeated for their benefit last night the work by Arthur Vincent Lourié which he produced for his Friday and Saturday people in November. Again he invited the composer on from New York to attend the performance and to receive the applause of the audience. He interpreted the piece, which bears the title, "Kormtchaia" Symphony No. 2, as something that he thinks highly of and that he regards as likely to win a place in the orchestra's permanent repertory; or at any rate as something that will stand among the primary enterprises of the present season.

Dr. Koussevitzky prepares a novelty with such care as to make it go off smoothly, no matter what may be its difficulties and no matter what its unusual sonorities. We do not have to excuse inadequacies of execution and we do not have to wait to pass judgment at some future time when he has better mastered the score and when the players have got more thoroughly into their parts. The ensemble is completely organized at the outset; the job is perfectly done the first time.

It comes about under such conditions that a composer is rather well shown up if he is of the second line, and that he takes on pretty nearly his true value if he is of the first. We are almost certain to be convinced one way or the other, even if we express ourselves in undecisive terms. Our persuasion stands, even if our spoken opinions waver this way and that.

A first-rate symphony simply will not let go of us; it will not be talked down or thought down. And is not "Kormtchaia" one of that sort? A disconcerting circumstance is that this composition conveys little effect of oddity or irregularity; and yet it parallels nothing in either our classic or our romantic experience. The form seems straightforward and even familiar, yet it resembles nothing conventional and historic. The melodies are certainly tuneful; but let someone say where they in any respect borrowed. The harmonies seem logical; they bind the notes of an air together, as harmonies ought; but tell us the page of the schoolbook where the rules for them stand written.

The work gives an impression of diversity and of unity as well, but this state of affairs is not explained according to the nineteenth-century four-movement plan. The term "variation" may apply, but let nobody try to figure out a sonata or a fugue or anything else on the old carpentry order.

On the program, to open, was the Haydn Symphony in B flat, No. 102 (drums delicately in tune in the Adagio, which is another way of observing that the intonation of the whole orchestra was close to perfection). To close, the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op 98. Exacting company for Lourié, and he held up his corner.

W. P. T.

BOSTON: Defauw Applauded Guest With Koussevitzky Forces

By IRVING SCHWERKE

BOSTON.—The seventh Saturday evening program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Désiré Defauw as guest conductor, was one of the most interesting of the season thus far. M. Defauw was given a warm welcome by the almost-capacity audience, and shared his success throughout the evening with his collaborators. The orchestra was at its best, responding to Defauw's expansive and magnetic directions with its wonted elasticity and ensemble perfection.

Opening his list with Franck's symphony, Defauw infused into the work that subtle flavor and atmosphere which, for want of better terms, may be labelled French. It was a rare musical joy to hear the symphony played with such soaring eloquence.

A brace of works new to the Boston Symphony repertoire included Respighi's The Birds, suite for small orchestra, and Lekeu's Adagio for string orchestra. The Respighi opus (premiered by Defauw at the Augusteo, Rome, back in the good old days of 1928) was utterly charming, both as to text and performance. Choosing material from seventeenth century harpsichord pieces, the composer tastefully and cleverly compiled a pleasing score including a Prelude, after Pasquini; the Dove, after Jacques de Gallot; The Hen, after Rameau; The Nightingale, after an anonymous English composer, and The Cuckoo, after Pasquini. The Lekeu work, in spite of numerous exquisite solo passages for the string section, is overlong and curiously indefinite in form.

A rousing finale was provided in a brilliant reading of Dukas' Sorcerer's Apprentice, in which conductor and band showed superlative virtuosity.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
DEC 28 1941

Boston Symphony To Play Classics At Local Concert

Interesting New Work Also Included on Bushnell Program

Two melodious classics and an interesting new work are included in the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at the Bushnell Memorial on Tuesday evening, January 6 in the fourth event of the Bushnell Smyphony Series. The list in which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead his noted band has been announced by William H. Mortensen, mangaing director of the Bushnell Memorial as follows:

Symphony in B-flat, No. 102, by Haydn; "Kormtchaia," Symphony No. 2, by Lourie; and Symphony No. 4 in E minor, by Brahms.

The Haydn Symphony is one of six which the great musician composed for his second visit to London in 1794 and 1795—he composed twelve in all for performance by the orchestra of Salomon in the British capital. The symphony was written, according to C. F. Pohl, Haydn's biographer, in 1795, and must accordingly have been performed in that year. Haydn was required by the terms of his agreement with Salomon to write a new work for each of the weekly concerts in the subscription series which that impressario arranged, and the composer was as good as his word.

Prof. Donald Francis Tovey calls this symphony of Haydn's "three greatest instrumental works." As the annotator for the Boston program writes: "Tovey points out at length Haydn's success in obtaining that symmetry expected of a symphony in the eighteeth century while avoiding the rather barren means of an almost identical recapitulation, to balance the exposition. 'What the orthodox textbooks assume to be Haydn's recapitulation is neither more nor less than a true Beethoven coda of the ripest kind.

Where then does symmetry come in? It comes in at the end of the exposition, which Haydn always rounds of very nearly in a phrase quietly reproduced at the end of the movement, just where it is the last thing you would expect . . . The only way to get the benefit of Haydn's or any great composer's sense of form is to listen naively to the music, with expectation directed mainly to its sense of movement. Nothing in Haydn is difficult to follow, but almost everything is unexpected if you listen closely, and without preconceptions.' Haydn, the subtle vagrant in modulation, here plies his skill to the utmost. Near the end of the exposition he drops his ingratiating ways to establish his new keys with sudden loud chords. They have a boldness foretelling Beethoven."

MUSIC

N.Y. Herald Tribune Dec 27, 1941

By VIRGIL THOMSON

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting, concert Thursday night in Carnegie Hall with the following program:

Oredo (first time here) . . Bach-Boessenroth
Symphony in E flat (first time here). Hindemith
Thus Spake Zarathustra . . . . . Strauss
Suite Provencale (first time here) . Milhaud

Real Stuff

WHATEVER else one may say about Mr. Mitropoulos's tenure at the Philharmonic this year, there can be no complaint about his not playing enough modern music. Curiously enough, this attendant found little of any sort to complain about in Thursday night's program and a great deal to enjoy wholeheartedly.

* * *

Mr. Herman Boessenroth's transcription of the Bach chorale-prelude for organ on Martin Luther's Nicene Creed is clear and reasonable. It is not strikingly original; but it makes perfectly good sense out of a very fine piece, and it was a pleasure to listen to. Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is not a very interesting piece; neither audiences nor professionals ever care much for it. Last night it served as an occasion to watch Mr. Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic boys work. There was not a dull moment for this watcher, because both were working superbly and in the groove. Last Sunday afternoon all was tense and nervously exasperating. Yesterday the stage was calmness itself and one didn't have to wait for the end of a piece to relax. Rarely have I witnessed a more admirable workout. It sounded well, too, if I may make the slight reserve that the extremes, both of loudness and of softness, were a little lacking in resonance. There is a cannonading repercussion in Mr. Mitropoulos's fortes that gets a bit monotonous after twice, and his pianissimo sonorities are a little tensely pushed out. They lack ease. Of top-notch quality was the solo work of Mr. Piastro, the first violinist, Mr. Goodman, the kettledrummer, and Mr. Glantz, the first trumpet player, though this is not to say that the whole group was not playing up to the best Philharmonic standard.

* * *

Paul Hindemith's Symphony in E-flat is a grand work, vigorous in thought and sumptuous in auditory effect. There is no lollipop emotionalism about it and no wandering counterpoint. Most unusual to the work of this composer is its great rhythmic vitality. Typical of its author is the dryness of its whole thought and texture, though I mean no discredit to it by that word. Its conjunction with the dryness (and here my word is not pejorative either; it is merely descriptive of Mr. Mitropoulos's interpretative style) produced a performance remarkable for unity of spirit and convincing effect. The Symphony sounded to me (from one hearing) like a very fine piece of music indeed, and I take off my hat to its author.

* * *

The evening closed with a work I have long loved, Darius Milhaud's "Suite Provençale." This is Milhaud being gay and brilliant and tender about his own part of the world. It is melodically direct, harmonically both fanciful and strong, instrumentally brilliant without any vulgarity. Last night I thought it was overblown a bit by the brasses and its clean, bright timbre somewhat muddied and coarsened in the process. But one was so happy to hear it at all that one felt like condoning the fault, merely noting it in memory as one more example of this conductor's inability to let a piece sound as if it were playing itself, unless it happens to be something like Strauss or Hindemith that is sufficiently complex in texture to keep his brilliant and restless mind preoccupied with the mere conducting of it.

Darius Milhaud

Whose "Suite Provençale" was played Thursday night by the Philharmonic

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
DEC 31 1941

Boston Symphony Superb In Haydn, Brahms, Lourie

It was an admirable adventure in program making that gave to the Monday-Tuesday series of this week's Boston Symphony Haydn's symphony in B flat, No. 102; Lourie's "Kormtchaia," symphony No. 2 and Brahm's symphony No. 4 in E minor. Op. 98. Tried old friends worthy of the ever fresh interpretation Dr. Koussevitzky and his men bestowed upon them stood guard either side the recent work "at once simple and strange" of Dr. Koussevitzky's biographer, Arthur V. Lourie.

A Modern to Thrill

Here was a modern composer who neither annoyed nor bored. Nor could he be remembered by any definite form or characteristic style. Yet he held respect and attention by a fullness of instrumentation occasionally spaced into sections by a delicate, long sustained chord; by reliance upon predilections toward rare churchly expressions; above all by employment of his chosen material into exciting insistencies. One listened, accepted, followed, was swept along. Something massive, mighty, epochal was happening. Mr. Lourie, a slender scholarly man in appearance, personally accepted the applause.

Haydn's symphony had a performance that combined dignity and a certain impressiveness with an ever-emerging grace and high spirit.

The brief, stately Largo leading into the Allegro vivace suggested Papa Haydn in Sunday coat relaxing into sunny, flowery fields. What refinement of tender mood in the wondrous Adagio so stripped of the saccharine to which it might have been tempted; its violins against violas and cellos; its breaking out at the end into a folksy tune reflected again in the Allegro of the third movement. After the insouciant fleetness of the finale has delighted, how like quicksilver the old fellow turns grave and weighty as to say: "This is not all jest. I can be important even as I started."

Sublime Brahms

To this hearer, the Brahms Fourth opens with a movement of sighs—sighs in all registers, tempos and moods—his natural modulations bearing us along into the foreboding portion. How poignant the harmonies of the Andante and the song over the march beat—a sublimity of unfolded beauties!

Always of fresh inspiration and changing moods the magnificence of the structure of this Brahms Fourth was brought into a seeming simplicity for our enjoyment by the clarity and understanding of the performance.

South American Art

Of the two exhibits now on at Symphony Hall ,that in the small gallery off the west corridor is most important. It is of South American art shown by courtesy of the Grace Lines and assembles photographs, gorgeously dyed textiles, dainty silver stirrups from Peru and ornaments wrought from the metal.

A. C. R.

This Clipping From
GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
PRESS
JAN 1 1942

THE NATIONAL ANTHEM.

The song most commonly heard in America today is "The Star Spangled Banner." Symphony orchestra programs and band concerts open with its stirring measures; its exultant words and melody are to be heard on the street and in the theaters. It took no act of congress or presidential decree to encourage the playing and singing of our national anthem. Nor was it a false patriotism which urged its inclusion at almost every public event; rather was it the spontaneous expression of a people intent on preserving "the land of the free and the home of the brave!"

In the more than 127 years of its existence the history of "The Star Spangled Banner" has been as unusual as were the circumstances under which it was composed. Although the author of its words, Francis Scott Key, is commonly believed to have been a prisoner of war on the British fleet which attacked Fort McHenry, actually he was only detained because the attack on Baltimore was about to begin and it was feared he might carry information back to the Americans of the impending attack. He had gone to the fleet to negotiate the release of a prisoner and stayed to write the words of America's most stirring song. Few will recall that they were set to the air of "Anacreon in Heaven."

In the first World war the German conductor, Karl Muck, through a tragic misunderstanding concerning his alleged refusal to include the national song on a Boston Symphony orchestra program, was removed from his post—because of the public clamor—and interned for the duration of the war. It was later revealed that he had intended no disrespect for the anthem.

More recently another of foreign birth has figured in the saga of "The Star Spangled Banner." Russian born Igor Stravinsky, now a resident here and a prospective citizen, out of his deep devotion to America has written a new musical setting for it—one which is said to enhance its noble qualities.

Most curious of all is the fact that although recognized by all the nations of the world as our national anthem it did not attain that status until March 3, 1931, when by an act of congress, approved by the president, the words and music were so designated.

Today as we wait for word of those Americans defending our outposts in the Pacific we know something of the deep anxiety with which Francis Scott Key awaited the coming of the dawn, wondering whether the star spangled banner yet waved. Today we know that no single incident can harm it, no foe cause it to be struck for long—if our own devotion to our cause and principles remains unwavering.

This Clipping From
NEW LONDON, CONN.
DAY
JAN 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony to Give Concert at Conn. College

The Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky will be heard as the third in the series of Connecticut college concerts in the Frank Loomis Palmer auditorium Wednesday evening. This will be the second performance in the Palmer auditorium of the world famous orchestra whose appearance in the college concert series last year was one of the most notable occasions of the season.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is more than half a century old, its span covering almost all that is important in the history of musical performance in America. When in 1881 Henry Lee Higginson, a Bostonian who had studied music in Vienna, assembled sixty musicians and called them the Boston Symphony orchestra, there were no serious rivals. Its purpose was "to play the best music in the best way, and give concerts to all who could pay a small price." This has been the orchestra's guiding star throughout its long and brilliant history.

Dr. Koussevitsky has led the Boston Symphony orchestra for more than a quarter of a century, far exceeding the tenure of any previous leader. He is widely known in the world of music for his artistic direction, catholic taste, technical mastery and inexhaustible ardor.

A native of Russia, Koussevitzky gave memorable concerts with his own orchestra in Moscow and St. Petersburg as a young man. He took his musicians the length of the Volga through his vast country, bringing to the musically starved people of innumerable provincial towns their first symphony concert. Following the Russian revolution he assembled an orchestra in Paris and gave his famous "Concerts Koussevitzky."

Koussevitzky came to America in 1924 and took his place at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra. In the years since he has brought the orchestra to new and surpassing importance, noted the world over for its precision, its perfection of ensemble and its tonal beauty.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
CITIZEN
JAN 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Will Present Second Season Concert, Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will present the second concert of its series at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Friday evening January 9, at 8:30 o'clock. Alexander Borovsky, Russian pianist, will be the soloist with the orchestra in the performance of the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto in B flat minor.

Dr. Koussevitsky begins the program with the contemporary English composer Benjamin Britten's "Sinfonia da Requiem," to be followed by Martinu's "Concert Grosso for Chamber Orchestra." The second half featuring the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto, will close with that composer's Overture, "1812."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 5 - 1942

Arthur P. Fiedler to Wed

Boston Conductor Engaged to Miss Ellen M. Bottomley

BOSTON, Jan. 4 (UP).—Mr. Arthur P. Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra "pop" concerts, and Miss Ellen M. Bottomley filed marriage intentions yesterday at City Hall. The forty-seven-year-old musician also conducts outdoor summer concerts. Miss Bottomley gave her age as twenty-seven.

This Clipping From DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
JAN 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
JAN 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR
JAN 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
JAN 4 - 1942

Walter to Lead Boston Orchestra

Boston American Jan 4, 1942

Bruno Walter is announced as the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the next pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and likewise at the concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on the previous Thursday evening.

Since the orchestra will visit New York and cities en route during the coming week, these concerts will take place on Jan. 15, 16 and 17. Bruno Walter announces the following program for the three concerts: Handel's "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra, Op. 6, No. 6, in G minor; Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony, No. 92; and the First Symphony of. Gustav Mahler in D major.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 4 - 1942

CALL TO MUSICIANS

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has issued an appeal to the musicians of the United States, in which he points out the significant contribution they are privileged to make to the national welfare during the present emergency, and also urges all music makers to serve the country to the utmost, without thought of remuneration. It is natural for Dr. Koussevitzky to take such a stand, for he always has been keenly alive to the responsibilities of musicians to the general public.

The appeal is as follows:

"We, the musicians of the great American democracy, must fully participate in the gigantic struggle for the highest human values our glorious country and her Allies are engaged in. We must share the joys and sorrows, the achievements and toils, the victories and defeats, finally, the necessary sacrifice, involved in the struggle. 'Business as usual' and fight for our advantages must, for the duration of the war, give way to the privilege of serving the country to the maximum of our efforts, regardless of any profit. Without any remuneration we must add to our ordinary duties the extraordinary ones.

"We must bring the gladness of music to all soldiers in their camps, forts and battle areas.

"We must give the vitalizing beauty of music to all the wounded, sick and disabled soldiers in their hospitals, homes and elsewhere.

"By the consoling power of music we must lighten the sorrows of all those who lost their dear ones in this tragic conflict. The sublime joy of music must be accessible to all who need it in this trying moment of history.

"This great service can be discharged by musicians individually and collectively by giving the performances in all these places for all these groups.

"We must become new bards, new Orpheuses—inspiring, invigorating, ennobling and consoling. In this way we can help the attainment of the grand immediate objective: Victory."

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
JAN 4 - 1942

BRUNO WALTER TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Bruno Walter is announced as the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the next pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and likewise at the concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on the previous Thursday evening. Since the Orchestra will visit New York and cities en route during the coming week, these concerts will take place on January 15, 16 and 17. Bruno Walter announces the following program for the three concerts: Handel's "Concerto Grosso," for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 6, in G minor; Haydn's Oxford Symphony, No. 92; and the First Symphony of Gustav Mahler in D major.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 6 - 1942

Boston Symphony At Bushnell Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitsky, will visit Hartford to give a concert at the Bushnell Memorial tonight. This program, which starts at 8:15, is the fourth event of the Bushnell Symphony series. The program will be as follows: Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, No. 102; Arthur Lourié's Symphony No. 2, "Kormtchaia"; and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor.

Arthur Lourié, the Russian composer now in this country, wrote "Kormtchaia" in Paris in 1939. It had its first public performance in Boston, Nov. 7 last. The title "Symphony" is here used in the broadest sense. It consists of ten sections closely connected. "Kormtchaia" is taken from a Greek liturgical verse in which Mary is hailed as the "guiding mother." It is a very old Russian folkterm indicating a "steersman" or "pilot, and it stands for the lode-star. In a figurative sense it is sometimes taken as a designation of Mother Russia herself. Mr. Lourié has inscribed a motto on the score which is attributed to Michelangelo in reference to his "Moses": "Ricordati che vivi, e cammina!" ("Remember that thou livest, and go thy way.") "The link between the title of the symphony and the quotation," according to the composer, "lies in the words 'guide' and 'go.' The influence of these ideas on the musical form of the work may be seen in the 'Tempo di Marcia' ('go') and the various ostinati ('guide'), as well as in the 'rock-like' masses of its sonorities."

This Clipping From HOUSTON, TEXAS
POST
JAN 4 - 1942

Symphony Organizations Plan To Make Music a War Service

NEW YORK, Jan. 3.—(UP)—Managers of the major symphony orchestras in the United States departed for their home bases last week after a pow-wow in New York, convinced that the war will have no adverse effect on musical activity.

On the contrary, they agreed that interest in music and consequent attendance at concerts is likely to increase as the result of a desire to leaven the horror of war with spiritual diversion.

The conference was informal, for the purpose of exchanging information. All reports were optimistic, despite the temporary slump which came with the first few days of the war. The theaters suffered similarly, it was pointed out, but already have made a strong comeback.

Orchestras represented at the meeting were those of Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, New York, Cleveland, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Detroit, Minneapolis, Pittsburgh, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Rochester, Washington, Indianapolis and Kansas City. Recalling the experience of 1917-18, a spokesman for the managers said:

"During war-time, according to past experience and present indications, music would be more necessary than ever before to sustain civilian morale. The only immediate problem is that of the blackout, a problem which up to now has touched only the Pacific coast. This is being solved locally by substituting afternoon concerts, wherever possible, for evening events."

None of the large open-air symphonic organizations has considered cancelling next summer's programs. They include the Lewisohn Stadium in New York, Robin Hood Dell in Philadelphia, the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, and the concerts in Chicago, St. Louis and Cleveland.

The spokesman for the managers said that conscription so far has not affected seriously orchestra personnel, but that they will not seek exemption for players subject to call.

As the meeting ended, Mrs. Charles S. Guggenheimer, chairman of the Stadium Concerts in New York, announced plans for the next seasog. It will open on June 18 and last for eight weeks, marking the silver anniversary of the concerts. They were started in 1918 especially for the benefit of soldiers and sailors and to bolster civilian morale generally.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 7 - 1942

Music

Memorable Concert By Boston Orchestra

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

It is all very well to say of a superlative musical performance that it was what the composer might have wished but that is to deprive one's self of a choice fantasy.

Could anyone imagine what an overwhelming experience it would have been for Joseph Haydn to sit in Bushnell Memorial last night and hear his B flat Symphony No. 102? It was impossible during his lifetime to have heard anything approaching the Bostonians' exquisite art.

In the very nature of things neither the feudal band of the Esterhazy's nor Salomon's London Orchestra of the 1790's could have been anything but sandlot outfits, composed as they were of musicians who had to double as scullions and clerks. So Haydn would doubtless have been either transported by the other-worldliness of Dr. Koussevitzky's music making, if not a bit startled by the sensuousness of the tonal textures. The interpretation had a rococo urbanity without losing the essential country dewiness that sets the composer apart.

Transparent Orchestra

It is the transparency of the Boston Orchestra that makes Dr. Koussevitzky so eloquent an advocate for new scores. While "Kormtchaia," the Second Symphony of Arthur Vincent Lourie, is not the kind of work to make friends easily, last night's listeners were provided with a fairly lucid idea of what is in it. Even with the most elaborate instrumentation (six horns, four flutes, two piccolos and two tubas, no less) there was never any mystery about what the composer had assigned his instruments to say. With the manner of saying it, or even the need, issue might be taken.

Laborious, sour and quite unoiled, the dissonances were less extravagant than the timbres which must be called at least bizarre. The spirit of the piece was wholly ascetic.

A respected friend, who has spent a long lifetime in music, once said to me: "If my foot keeps time to it, I know it's good, honest music." By that criterion Lourie's Symphony should go a long way, although there was a good deal of mysticism, if not plain fog, besides the rather persistent alla marcia mood.

Easier to Take

Dr. Koussevitzky can be depended upon to bring us a bit of something new and there seems to be a progressive cordiality on the part of the audience toward these departures from standard repertory.

The return to the tried and true in the form of Brahms' E minor Symphony was completely beguiling. The first movement had an inner urgency that is not usually felt. It seemed to shut out the accustomed philosophical ripeness, or at least delayed it until the slow movement. The discursive yet quietly ecstatic finale, taken con amore and with the greatest freedom, spoke a golden benison for the entire program. Not to be recaptured were the performances of the chanting trombones and the solo flute—"sweet, O Pan! Piercing sweet by the river."

For the first time this concert season has a conductor been able to loosen up an audience to sing —everyone, loud and fervently— The Star Spangled Banner. Dr Koussevitzky did that.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
JAN 7 - 1942

Symphony Concert Arranged

Boxholders Listed For Academy Event

The second concert of the season in Brooklyn of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on Friday evening in the Opera House of the Academy of Music.

Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, executive chairman for Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts, has announced the following box holders for this concert: Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Dean C. Osborn, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Thomas Lauderdale, Col. Clarence Lininger, commanding officer of the Fort Hamilton U. S. Army Post; the Brooklyn Woman's Club, the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy, the Brooklyn Friends School, Packer Collegiate Institute and Poly Prep Country Day School.

Under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony will present a program of orchestral music, including works by Britten, Martinu, and Tchaikovsky. Alexander Borovsky, pianist, will be the soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are in their 56th season in Brooklyn and are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Committee.

This Clipping From
TERRE HAUTE, IND.
TRIBUNE
JAN 7 1942
Niagara Falls Gazette
Jan 10, 1942

Carlos Chavez, composer and conductor, is now in his native Mexico but will come to the United States next month to conduct the Chicago Symphony and the Boston Symphony during February, and to conduct two radio broadcasts from Detroit in March.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 5 - 1942

46

Boston Includes Three Symphonies On Program Here

An unusual aspect of the program in which Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial Tuesday evening, is a fact that the list is made up of three symphonies. The program includes: Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, No. 102; "Kormtchaia." Symphony No. 2 by Lourie and the Brahm's Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98.

In his notes for the concert, John N. Burk has this to say of the Haydn work:

"This symphony is one of the six which Haydn composed for his second visit to London in 1794 and 1795—he composed 12 in all for performance by the orchestra of Salomon in the British capital. The symphony was written, according to C. F. Pohl, Haydn's biographer, in 1795, and must accordingly have been performed in that year. Haydn was required by the terms of his agreement with Salomon to write a new work for each of the weekly concerts in the subscription series which that impressario arranged, and the composer was as good as his word. He stipulated (hearing, perhaps, that the British public had late-coming habits) that the new piece should be played always at the beginning of the second part of the program. When each particular symphony was played it is usually impossible to tell, for the programs simply state: 'New Grand Overture (Symphony), or Grand Overture (Symphony) mss.' There is every evidence that England took the symphonies to its heart. The concerts were crowded, and another management had only to announce a work of Haydn to be sure of an audience. The Morning Chronicle probably voiced the general opinion when it praised the "agitating modulations" of the symphonies, and the "harmoyant passages" in their slow movements. Everyone was charmed by Haydn's grace and humor, and the arias and choruses of Handel were momentarily overlooked in the interest of those unaccustomed forms to which Haydn had given such abundant life—the symphony and the string quartet. The second of the London symphonies (in D major), and the "Surprise" Symphony were singled out for special favor, and often repeated. Also of the Salomon series were the so-called Clock. Drum Roll, and Military symphonies."

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
JAN 7 - 1942

ALEXANDER BOROVSKY, Russian pianist, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky Friday evening at the Academy of Music, in a performance of Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto. This marks Mr. Borovsky's first appearance in New York since his Carnegie Hall recital last March 28.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 7 - 1942

Koussevitzky Superlative At Bushnell

Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra in Handsome Performance; New Work Presented

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, was presented in the Bushnell Symphonic Series in the Memorial auditorium Tuesday night. The program:

Symphony No. 102 .....Haydn
Symphony No. 2 .....Lourie
Symphony No. 4 .....Brahms

Last night's concert by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony was like nothing else on this musical earth.

There have been many times when this incomparable orchestra and this pearl among conductors have raised the local heads of hair with the excitement of their performances, but now those occasions stand next after the rhapsody of last evening. The program itself included two of the most inspirational symphonies in the realm of music, the Haydn 102 and the Brahms Fourth. Dr. Koussevitzky was in one of his most inspired moods, practically enrapt. The orchestra played away like a hundred little furies, as he waved his pencil stub of a baton over them, and sang his siren songs. At moments the performance became so intense, that I expected a flash of lightning and a clap of thunder and to see the whole business going whirling aloft in a fiery chariot, complete with re-capped turns.

It was a memorable evening. Right at the outset, Dr. Koussevitzky made a record here, being the first conductor actually to get the orchestra to sing "The Star Spangled Banner" as if they meant the words, as well as remembered them.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said, "we shall sing 'The Star Spangled Banner.'"

And they did, too, with Dr. Koussevitzky leading them and marking out the tempo and the dynamics, ever mindful of the fact that the national anthem deserves musical respect as well as the zeal of patriotism.

Haydn On Olympus.

Aside from a general letting-down of the hair, there is nothing in specific to be said about the performance of the Haydn or the Brahms, except that perhaps the former has been more precisely played in the first two movements. Doubtless this is the most dastardly carping, when the work has never been played so off the heart, so genially, so pastorally and so lyrically here before. No loving conductor does so much with Haydn, gives him such stature and withal such graciousness. Like the Koussevitzky and Boston Brahms, their Haydn is Olympian in translation and far from the papa-aspects with which lesser conductors belittle them. The Brahms last night again was one of the most superlative readings and performances in the whole repertoire of the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky, a pillar of smoke by day and flame by night. It brooks no description. Either you have heard it done by the Boston, or you haven't heard it done at all.

Lourie The Lorelei.

But if the Haydn and Brahms were like nothing else on earth last night, so to much of the audience was the Lourie Second Symphony, and are they glad of it! The work by the Parisianate Russian, which was being performed here for the first time, ruffled a great many feathers. I was surrounded by people who grimaced throughout it and who were loud and salty in denouncing it on its completion.

Well, if this be treason, make the most of it, as the fellow said, because nine tenths of it (there are ten tenths altogether actually) struck me as one of the most interesting, engaging and imaginative pieces of abstract writing to come over the pike in a long time. I thought the inspiration or the momentum gave out at the last section opened and that Mr. Lourie waded around in notes quite a while before getting up to the climax. Still, when the thunder came, it was a fine, showy finish.

The composer calls the Symphony "Kormtchaia," and there is a great deal of metaphysical balderdash in the program to tell you why. My advice would be to skip the words and get on to the music, which is laid out in ten variation panels, tonally interrelated, but widely different in mood as doubtless all good variations should be.

All-Out Pan-Slavism.

The music itself struck me as deep-dyed Russian in feeling and general sound worked up in ways highly suggestive of Stravinsky at one moment (rhythmically and harmonically) and at others of Prokofieff (in martness and wit). Despite the continuous presence of dissonance, it is some of the most melodious, its is a work of remarkable beauty. Like all modern Russian work, it is most ingenious orchestrally. Inventive ideas and effects abound on all sides. I do not feel any special "message", or depth to the work spiritually, despite the program note, but it is rampant with more mondaine emotion. Some of it is slightly shi-shi and over smart, like Shostakovitch, too Parisian, insufficiently Russian. But by and large it is a composition rich in ideas orchestral and compositional, and a fascinating piece of business all around.

I think Dr. Koussevitzky was inwardly amused at the reception of the Lourie Symphony here. He has come up against Hartford reactions before, and he certainly smiled to himself as he left the podium and disappeared into the wings.

T. H. P.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
CITIZEN
JAN. 7 - 1942

47

Society Notes....

Boston Symphony Orch. Concert To Be Held Friday Evening Under Direction of Serge Koussevitzky

Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, executive chairman for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, has announced the folowing box holders for the second concert of the season here which will take place in the Opera House of the Academy of Music, No. 30 Lafayette avenue, on Friday evening. Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Dean C. Osborn, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Thomas Lauderdale, Col. Clarence Lininger, commanding officer of the Fort Hamilton U. S. Army Post, the Brooklyn Woman's Club, the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy, the Brooklyn Friends School, Packer Collegiate Institute and Poly Prep Country Day School.

Under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzy, a program of orchestral music, including works by Britten, Martinu, and Tchaikovsky wil lbe presented. Alexander Borovsky, pianist, will be the soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and the Brooklyn Committee. This is the orchestra's fifty-sixth season in this borough.

CHAIRMAN OF CONCERT

Kesslere

Mrs. Henry J. Davenport of No. 31 Grace court is the executive chairman for Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts. The orchestra's second concert of the season, in tris borough will take place Friday evening at the Opera House of the Academy of Music.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
VILLAGER
JAN 8 - 1942

To Play New Symphony

Tonight, at Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will introduce to New York audiences the Second Symphony by Arthur Vincent Lourie, Russian composer now living on lower Fifth Ave. The symphony was first performed in Boston on Nov. 7, and has been played three times since, with increasing critical interest and acclaim.

A student under Glazounov at the Imperial Conservatory in Russia, Mr. Lourie had played, before he was 21, some of his own compositions before the late Tsar. His work attracted the attention of the greatest symphonic conductor in Russia, Serge Koussevitzky.

Under the Soviet regime Mr. Lourie remained as head of the Musical Commission and Minister of Instruction until 1924, when politics began to interfere too strenuously with the arts. He took refuge in Paris, where he lived until June, 1940, when he and Mrs. Lourie fled just one day ahead of the Nazis. At the invitation of Koussevitzky they came to the United States.

Mr. Lourie's music was first heard in New York in 1925, at chamber music concerts arranged by the League of Composers. Later his Spiritual Concerto was performed here by the Schola Cantorum, and his First Symphony in Philadelphia and Boston.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
7 - 1942

Raphael Silverman Joins Symphony

Raphael Silverman, violinist, of the Longy School and Boston chamber music affiliations, has joined the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing his first concert last Friday afternoon. It is understood Mr. Silverman is filling a sudden vacancy in the violin section and was hurriedly summoned from New York for the emergency.

Son of Prof. L. L. Silverman of Dartmouth College and Mrs. Silverman, pianist and lecturer on music, Mr. Silverman has been several times heard in concert in this city. He played before a Jewish organization here when 12 years old. On April 10, 1938, he assisted Lily Dymont, European refugee pianist, in her local debut at the New Bedford Hotel. He is a graduate of Dartmouth and has been working for a master's degree in music at Harvard. He is a nephew of Mrs. Joseph Lipsitt of Marion, Bashka Paeff, Boston sculptress, and Spinoza Paeff of the Paeff quartet.

GALETON, PA
LEADER
1/8/42

Writer Reviews Year's Musical Activities

NUMERICALLY, 1941 was an odd year.

Yet in the world of music it contained more than its usual share of even anniversaries. 1941, writes George Marek in the December issue of Good Housekeeping magazine, was the hundred and fiftieth anniversary of Mozart's death, and the hundredth anniversary of Dvorak's birth.

The New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Marek observes, celebrated its one hundredth birthday, and the Chicago Philharmonic became fifty years old. Fifty years ago Cavalleria Rusticana was the year's sensational novelty; seventy years ago an American audience first heard Lohengrin; and one hundred years ago a Boston audience was first introduced to Beethoven's Fifth. And this year some ten thousand people drove, bicycled and walked to "Tanglewood," an out-of-the-way New England spot, to hear the Boston Symphony play the Fifth once more.

January 7, 1942
THE HARTFORD TIMES, WEDNESDAY,

Music

Memorable Concert By Boston Orchestra

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

It is all very well to say of a superlative musical performance that it was what the composer might have wished but that is to deprive one's self of a choice fantasy.

Could anyone imagine what an overwhelming experience it would have been for Joseph Haydn to sit in Bushnell Memorial last night and hear his B flat Symphony No. 102? It was impossible during his lifetime to have heard anything approaching the Bostonians' exquisite art.

In the very nature of things neither the feudal band of the Esterhazy's nor Salomon's London Orchestra of the 1790's could have been anything but sandlot outfits, composed as they were of musicians who had to double as scullions and clerks. So Haydn would doubtless have been either transported by the other-worldliness of Dr. Koussevitzky's music making, if not a bit startled by the sensuousness of the tonal textures. The interpretation had a rococo urbanity without losing the essential country dewiness that sets the composer apart.

Transparent Orchestra

It is the transparency of the Boston Orchestra that makes Dr. Koussevitzky so eloquent an advocate for new scores. While "Kormtchaia," the Second Symphony of Arthur Vincent Lourie, is not the kind of work to make friends easily, last night's listeners were provided with a fairly lucid idea of what is in it. Even with the most elaborate instrumentation (six horns, four flutes, two piccolos and two tubas, no less) there was never any mystery about what the composer had assigned his instruments to say. With the manner of saying it, or even the need, issue might be taken.

Laborious, sour and quite unoiled, the dissonances were less extravagant than the timbres which must be called at least bizarre. The spirit of the piece was wholly ascetic.

A respected friend, who has spent a long lifetime in music, once said to me: "If my foot keeps time to it, I know it's good, honest music." By that criterion Lourie's Symphony should go a long way, although there was a good deal of mysticism, if not plain fog, besides the rather persistent alla marcia mood.

Easier to Take

Dr. Koussevitzky can be depended upon to bring us a bit of something new and there seems to be a progressive cordiality on the part of the audience toward these departures from standard repertory.

The return to the tried and true in the form of Brahms' E minor Symphony was completely beguiling. The first movement had an inner urgency that is not usually felt. It seemed to shut out the accustomed philosophical ripeness, or at least delayed it until the slow movement. The discursive yet quietly ecstatic finale, taken con amore and with the greatest freedom, spoke a golden benison for the entire program. Not to be recaptured were the performances of the chanting trombones and the solo flute—"sweet, O Pan! Piercing sweet by the river."

For the first time this concert season has a conductor been able to loosen up an audience to sing—everyone, loud and fervently—The Star Spangled Banner. Dr. Koussevitzky did that.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
JAN 8 - 1942

KOUSSEVITZKY GETS A PERMIT

Petrillo to Let Him Direct Philharmonic Concerts.

The question whether Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony, only major non-union orchestra in the country, would be permitted to fulfill an engagement as one of the guest-conductors of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony's current centennial season, was settled today. Although the Philharmonic-Symphony's personnel are members of the American Federation of Musicians, James C. Petrillo, president of the Federation, announced that the union would permit its members to play under Dr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Petrillo, in a statement, said that he had decided to make an exception to the strict union rule forbidding union musicians to play under a non-union conductor, out of consideration for Marshall Field, president of the board of directors of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, and in recognition of the good relations which have existed between the Federation and that organization.

Six Concerts Scheduled.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct six Philharmonic-Symphony concerts, on January 22, 23, 25, 29 and 30, and February 1. Mr. Petrillo's statement, which brings to a favorable solution a problem which for weeks has threatened to mar the Philharmonic-Symphony's one-hundredth anniversary celebration, follows in part:

"For many years the American Federation of Musicians has refused to permit members of the Federation to play with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or permit Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony to conduct any orchestra composed of union musicians. Every effort has been made by the Federation to secure for the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the right to become members of the American Federation of Musicians, and to receive the benefits of union organization.

"Negotiations have not yet resulted in any agreement between the Federation and the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I, as president of the American Federation of Musicians, refused to permit Dr. Koussevitzky to conduct the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, composed entirely of members of the Federation, on the occasion of its centennial anniversary. This afternoon I received a personal appeal from Marshall Field 3d. Mr. Field is a man for whom I have great respect. In my desire to show my appreciation to Mr. Marshall Field, and to cooperate with him in any endeavor in which he is concerned, and in recognition of the position he is placed in, having announced that Dr. Koussevitzky would conduct, I am giving permission to the union musicians who are members of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra on this special occasion to play under the leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Consideration for Mr. Field.

"It must be understood that this is wholly out of consideration and respect to Mr. Marshall Field and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and its board of directors, which has always co-operated with the American Federation of Musicians, and it does not in any way affect the position of the Federation in so far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra or Dr. Koussevitzky is concerned, and in no event is it to be considered a precedent or a departure from the position which the Federation has taken.

"My position with regard to Dr. Koussevitzky does not in any way mean that I do not acknowledge his great musicianship, his ability as a conductor, and it is one of the regrets of my life that Dr. Koussevitzky is not in a position to bring his orchestra into the Federation."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 8 - 1942

PETRILLO RELAXES KOUSSEVITZKY BAN

Allows Non-Union Leader to Conduct Philharmonic for Series in Centennial

Revoking for the occasion a ban of many years standing against performances by union musicians under non-member conductors, James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, gave permission last night for a series of concerts by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concerts will be held in connection with the society's centennial season on Jan. 22, 23, 25, 29 and 30 and on Feb. 1. In announcing his action, Mr. Petrillo said he revoked a previous refusal at the personal appeal of Marshall Field 3d, president of the society's board of directors.

The Philharmonic orchestra is composed entirely of members of the Federation. Mr. Petrillo's announcement pointed out that there is no agreement between that organization and the Boston Symphony, of which Dr. Koussevitzky is the regular conductor.

Announcement that Dr. Koussevitzky would occupy the podium at the centennial concerts already had been made, Mr. Petrillo said, and he added that the revocation of the union's prohibition had been made in part in recognition of the position in which Mr. Field might be placed should the conductor fail to appear.

"It must be understood," his statement declared, "that this is wholly out of consideration and respect to Mr. Marshall Field and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and its board of directors, which has always cooperated with the American Federation of Musicians, and it does not in any way affect the position of the Federation in so far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra or Dr. Koussevitzky is concerned, and in no event is it to be considered a precedent or a departure from the position which the Federation has taken."

Mr. Petrillo added that the union's stand against non-member conductors "does not in any way mean that I do not acknowledge Dr. Koussevitzky's great musicianship, and it is one of the regrets of my life that he is not in a position to bring his orchestra into the Federation."

"For many years the American Federation of Musicians has refused to permit members of the Federation to play with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or permit Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, to conduct any orchestra composed of union musicians," the statement said.

"I, as president of the American Federation of Musicians, refused to permit Dr. Koussevitzky to conduct the New York-Philharmonic-Symphony, composed entirely of members of the Federation on the occasion of its centennial anniversary."

Outlining the appeal of Mr. Field, whom he characterized as "a great humanitarian with a civic consciousness and regard for the social rights of labor which I admire and respect," Mr. Petrillo then announced the action with regard to the Boston conductor "for this special occasion."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
JAN 8 - 1942

Musicians' Union Says Yes To Serge Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the non-union Boston Symphony Orchestra, received permission yesterday from James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, to conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony. There have been rumors lately that the Boston Symphony was on the verge of joining the musicians' union. Dr. Koussevitzky was given permission as a special gesture to the Philharmonic, which is now celebrating its centennial season. He will conduct for a fortnight, beginning Thursday evening, January 22.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 8 - 1942

Petrillo Allows Concerts Here UnderKoussevitzky

Lets Philharmonic Engage Him for Its Centennial

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society announced yesterday that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Philharmonic for two weeks during its centennial celebration without fear of any hitch arising because of the conductor's non-union status.

The society said that James Caesar Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, in a letter yesterday, gave Dr. Koussevitzky permission to conduct the Philharmonic, the members of which are unionized, during the two weeks. Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, none of the members of which are in the A. F. of M., will conduct his opening Philharmonic concerts on Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, Jan. 22 and 23, and will offer the following program:

Concerto in D major for stringed instruments .....C. P. E. Bach
(arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg)
"Quiet City," for strings, trumpet and English horn .....Copland
"Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 2....Ravel
Symphony No. 5.....Shostakovich

In his letter, Mr. Petrillo said that he was permitting a non-union conductor to conduct a union orchestra "out of consideration and respect to Mr. Marshall Field (president of the board of directors of the society) and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony," but he added that this was not to be regarded as a precedent.

As president of the A. F. of M., which has jurisdiction over virtually all musicians in the nation, Mr. Petrillo could order union musicians not to play on the same program with non-union men. He had previously refused permission for Dr. Koussevitzky to conduct the Philharmonic, which Dr. Koussevitzky will also conduct on Jan. 25, 29 and 30 and Feb. 1.

This Clipping From
BRONX, N.Y.
HOME NEWS
JAN 8 - 1942

Petrillo Relaxes His Ban for Philharmonic Series

James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, last night delaxed a ban of many years' standing against performances by union musicians under non-union conductors when he gave permission for a series of concerts by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concerts, planned in connection with the society's centennial season, will be held on Jan. 22, 23, 25, 29 and 30 and on Feb. 1.

Announcing his action, Petrillo said he had previously refused to permit union musicians to play for the series, but had reconsidered at the request of Marshall Field, 3d, president of the society's board of directors.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
JAN 8 - 1942
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES
QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER
JAN 8 - 1942
HOLYOKE, MASS. Transcript Telegram

Koussevitzky Allowed To Lead Philharmonic

BOSTON, Jan. 8 (UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today was free to conduct the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra during its two-week centennial observance after permission was granted by James C. Petrelli, president of the American Federation of Musicians (A.F.L.).

Petrillo announced his decision last night in response to an appeal by Marshall Field 3d, president of the board of directors of the Philharmonic Symphony Society. Petrillo said Koussevitzky had been barred because the Boston Orchestra was non-union.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
JAN 8 - 1942

Petrillo Allows Concerts Here UnderKoussevitzky

Lets Philharmonic Engage Him for Its Centennial

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society announced Wednesday that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Philharmonic for two weeks during its centennial celebration without fear of any hitch arising because of the conductor's non-union status.

The society said that James Caesar Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, in a letter Wednesday, gave Dr. Koussevitzky permission to conduct the Philharmonic, the members of which are unionized, during the two weeks. Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, none of the members of which are in the A. F. of M., will conduct his opening Philharmonic concerts on Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, Jan. 22 and 23, and will offer the following program: N.Y. Herald-Trib

Concerto in D major for stringed instruments .....C. P. E. Bach
(arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg)
"Quiet City," for strings, trumpet and English horn .....Copland
"Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 2....Ravel
Symphony No. 5.....Shostakovich

In his letter, Mr. Petrillo said that he was permitting a non-union conductor to conduct a union orchestra "out of consideration and respect to Mr. Marshall Field (president of the board of directors of the society) and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony," but he added that this was not to be regarded as a precedent.

As president of the A. F. of M., which has jurisdiction over virtually all musicians in the nation, Mr. Petrillo could order union musicians not to play on the same program with non-union men. He had previously refused permission for Dr. Koussevitzky to conduct the Philharmonic, which Dr. Koussevitzky will also conduct on Jan. 25, 29 and 30 and Feb. 1.

KOUSSEVITZKY WILL CONDUCT

Post—Jan. 8/42 Page 8

Musicians' Union Lets Him Lead N. Y .Orchestra

Yielding to a "personal appeal from Marshall Field, 3d," James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, last night announced his permission for Serge Koussevitzky to conduct the 100 per cent unionized New York Philharmonic Orchestra next week in the centennial concerts.

Last September, President Petrillo announced that if the conductor of the non-union Boston Symphony Orchestra stepped on the stage at Carnegie Hall, the members of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra would walk off.

He stated at the time that every other symphony orchestra in the United States and Canada had joined the federation and that 95 per cent of the members of the Boston orchestra, including Serge Koussevitzky, wished to join.

Last night he gave his permission for Koussevitzky to conduct the New York group.

Union Lifts Ban on Koussevitzky

Globe Jan 8/42 Page 7

NEW YORK, Jan. 7 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra for two weeks during its centennial observance, it was announced tonight by James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians.

Petrillo said that Koussevitzky had been barred from conducting the New York orchestra and other unionized orchestras in the United States and Canada for several years because his own orchestra was not a member of the federation.

The decision to allow his appearance in New York late this month and early in February, Petrillo said, was made out of consideration for and in response to an appeal by Marshall Field 3d, president of the board of directors of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society.

JAN 8 1942
BOSTON HERALD
Pittsfield, Mass. Eagle
New Bedford Mercury
Burlington, Vt. News

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
JAN 8 - 1942
This Clipping From
WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS
JAN 8 - 1942
This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
JAN 8 - 1942
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
JAN 9 - 1942

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
JAN 8 - 1942

AFM OK's Koussevitzky

Fear that Serge Koussevitzky might not be permitted to conduct his scheduled six concerts with the Philharmonic-Symphony because his Boston Symphony is not a union orchestra were dispelled last night.

James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, sent a letter yesterday to the Philharmonic-Symphony Society making an exception for this engagement only. The letter stressed that the exception is being made out of respect for the Society's board of directors and especially its president, Marshall Field, who had addressed a personal appeal to Mr. Petrillo.

Koussevitzky's first concert is scheduled for Jan. 22.

This Clipping From CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN
JAN 10 1942

Petrillo O. K. On Koussevitzky

Symphony Hurdles Non-Union Barrier

New York Bureau of The Chicago Sun.

New York, Jan. 9.—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct two weeks of the Philharmonic Symphony centennial season, beginning Jan. 22. James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, has granted formal permission to the orchestra to engage a non-union conductor to direct a union orchestra. Several months' negotiations preceded Mr. Petrillo's decision.

In a letter to Marshall Field, president of the Philadelphia-Symphony board of directors, Mr. Petrillo gave as his reasons for making the exception the orchestra's centennial season and the long record of good relations existing between the society and the federation. Koussevitzky will conduct the concerts of Jan. 22, 23, 25, 29, 30 and Feb. 1.

This Clipping From
NEW LONDON, CONN.
DAY

JAN 8 - 1942

Boston Symphony Gives Great Performance Here

By DR. J. LAWRENCE ERB

In the Boston Symphony orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, master and medium are well met. The organization has been moulded into an expressive instrument, responsive to every impulse of the conductor, with a unanimity, a finish and withal a musicality which makes a Boston Symphony evening something unique even in this day of superlative musical offerings.

There was nothing particularly new to say about last evening's concert—it has all been said before—but both orchestra and conductor were in top form, and that means one of those rare artistic experiences which come only once in a blue moon. Lovers of orchestral music, and they are many in these parts, will not soon forget the concert which they heard last evening. It was a blessed interlude in these days that are charged with anxiety. Music never better worked its beneficent charm and it was never more welcome or more appreciated.

Timely Message

The program was perfectly chosen. Beethoven's mighty Eroica symphony, written at a time when his own life was dark with impending tragedy, breathes the spirit of hope and confidence and courage. Fate could not crush such a soul. The message is timely for us, and its timeliness may have added just a bit to our response to it and to its overwhelming effect. Koussevitsky's Hero is no weakling nor whiner but a full-blooded human-being who could suffer and triumph over suffering, who could hold up his head in the face of misfortune, and was withal a tender, emotional being with love in his heart. The Eroica has been called an autobiographical symphony. Koussevitzky's reading of it made Beethoven very much alive to those who listened appreciatively last evening. It was great music greatly performed.

Moussorgsky's Works

The second half of the program was given over to works of Moussorgsky, that pathetic, unfortunate genius, who at his best was one of the blazing lights of the Russian school. The first selection, the Prelude to his last completed opera, Khovanstchina, was an unusually fine example of true Russian music. Kaleidoscopically orchestrated, it was a beautiful piece of music which was played con amore, with a finesse and delicacy almost inconceivable.

With the second Moussorgsky number, Pictures at an Exhibition, many were already familiar with the original form as piano pieces. To such there was naturally a question whether the orchestration would add to or detract from the effect of the pieces as they knew them. In the hands of the master-orchestrator, Ravel, they soon found that they were perfectly safe. Every shade of color, every turn of fancy every play of humor was enhanced by the remarkable handling given them by Ravel. For once, the saxophone found a place as a solo instrument, and the tuba sang like its more familiar brothers. The orchestra fairly scintillated in many of the colorful passages, and before the composition ended, practically everybody had had a first-class "work-out". It was great fun to listen to, and no doubt great fun to play, but no sort of thing for a second-rate organization to attempt.

Incidentally, it would be a joy and an inspiration to sing the Star Spangled Banner always with Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra to lead it.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
CITIZEN
JAN 10 1942

Boston Symphony Heard in Concert At Boro Academy

Tchaikowsky's 1812 Overture and Piano Concerto Cheered By Audience

A cheering audience at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last night greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky fo rtheir redition of Tchaikowsky's piano concerto No. 1 in B flat minor, and the same composer's 1812 overture which celebrated the Russian victory over Napoleon.

Alexander Borovsky was at the piano during the concerto. Both he and the members of the orchestra were successful in extracting new values from this work which has appeared in danger of quick extinction because of its popularity as a motif for swing, boogie-woogie and torch music. The performers last night proved that there is not and can never be a substitute for the full concerto played by a great orchestra and a fine pianist.

The concert opened with Haydn's symphony in B flat, No. 102. Next was played Bohuslav Cocerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra which was written in 1937 by the Czech composer who had to flee from country to country as the crisis widened. He was on hand last night to receive the generous plaudits of the audience.

Tchaikowsky's famous overture brought the concert to a close.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
JAN 9 - 1942

Lourie 2d Symphony Played

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Orchestra in Performance of Russian Work

By GRENA BENNETT

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky devised an interesting program for last evening's concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall with the attention of the subscribers directed to the first New York performance of Lourie's "Kormtchaia" Second Symphony.

According to the composer's analysis, the work was inspired by a motto of Michelangelo reading "Remember that thou livest and go thy way," and translates the Russian title meaning the "steersman" or "pilot" signifying the lode-star.

The ten sections of the work are built upon Slavic melodies of dissonant foundations with occasional emergings into melodic cadences.

There are no special programmatic pictures, the music, leaning more to symbolic suggestions in the form of variations and with no attempt to reflect the romantic or the emotional except in separated instances with hints of the elements of sacred music.

The score is fragmentary, markedly individual in its texture; frequently rhythmic and measured in tempo and generously punctuated with atonalities.

Apparently the composer sought and aimed to express himself in an unconventional pattern.

Music more easy to understand and digest was Haydn's B Flat Symphony which began the program. Here was matter more amiable to the ears and to the palate and its performance was marvelously brilliant, straightforward and compensating, a faultless performance of a thing of beauty.

• • •

"The Daughter of the Regiment" was repeated at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening with the same singers that had participated in the previous presentations.

They were Mmes. Pons, Petina and Savage and Messrs. Jobin, Baccaloni, D'Angelo, Engelman, Oliviero, Kosloff and Fischer. Mr. St. Leger conducted.

JAN 9 1942

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GIVES LOURIE WORK

N.Y. TIMES

Koussevitzky Directs Group in 'Kormtchaia' Symphony by the Russian Composer

FIRST PERFORMANCE HERE

Brahms Fourth and Number by Haydn in B Flat Presented on Carnegie Hall Program

By NOEL STRAUS

Three symphonies from three centuries made up the program presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, last night in Carnegie Hall. In addition to Haydn's work in the form in B flat (No. 9 in the Salomon series) and the Brahms Fourth, the list contained the "Kórmtchaia" symphony by Arthur Vincent Lourié, which received its first New York performance.

This novelty by the 50-year-old Russian composer now resident in the United States was composed in Paris in 1939. Its title, "Kórmtchaia," is taken from a Greek liturgical verse and refers to the Virgin as the "guiding mother" and in a figurative sense to Russia itself. Beneath this symbolical word on the title page of the score the composer inscribed as a motto the line written by Michelangelo for his statue of Moses, "Remember that thou livest, and go thy way."

That to Mr. Lourié "Kormtchaia," his second symphony, bears deep religious significance is implicit in its title. In his earlier days in St. Petersburg he was one of the extreme radical composers of his country. But after he came to Paris in 1923 his work gradually assumed its present religious character. As long ago as 1930 his "Concerto Spirituale," representative of this phase, was performed here by the Schola Cantorum. But his output is still little known in America.

The symphony is in ten sections and is in the form of a theme and variations. But the variations are not on the theme itself but on the "intonation of intervals," these intervals being those known as the second, minor third and fourth. Mr. Lourié had a complicated theoretical basis for the formal structure of the work, but in reality the symphony proved anything but abstruse, being almost banal in its melodies and having for the most part the character of an eighteenth century "Turkish" march, so that its sacred connotations were not readily decipherable. Its orchestration, moreover, was not that of a master of the craft. Often the sonorities reminded of Scriabin, but in general they were not well integrated, if sometimes bizarre in effect. The symphony, however, was well received and brought the composer to the stage for repeated bows.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave the novelty a masterly reading. In the Haydn and Brahms symphonies his approach was unusually impersonal for him, but he made them noble in outline and rich in texture.

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

JAN 9 - 1942
HARRISBURG, PA. - PATRIOT

Koussevitsky Issues An Appeal To Musicians Of The Country

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has issued an appeal to the musicians of the United States, in which he points out the significant contribution they are privileged to make to the national welfare during the present emergency, and also urges all music makers to serve the country to the utmost, without thought of remuneration. It is natural for Dr. Koussevitzky to take such a stand, for he always has been keenly alive to the responsibilities of musicians to the general public. The appeal is as follows:

"We, the musicians of the great American democracy, must fully participate in the gigantic struggle for the highest human values our glorious country and her Allies are engaged in. We must share the joys and sorrows, the achievements and toils, the victories and defeats, finally, the necessary sacrifice, involved in the struggle. 'Business as usual' and fight for our advantages must, for the duration of the war, give way to the privilege of serving the country to the maximum of our efforts, regardless of any profit. Without any remuneration we must add to our ordinary duties the extraordinary ones. We must bring the gladness of music to all soldiers in their camps, forts and battle areas. We must give the vitalizing beauty of music to all the wounded, sick and disabled soldiers in their hospitals, homes and elsewhere. By the consoling power of music we must lighten the sorrows of all those who lost their dear ones in this tragic conflict .The sublime joy of music must be accessible to all who need it in this trying moment of history. This great service can be discharged by musicians individually and collectively by giving the performances in all these places for all these groups. We must become new bards, new Orpheuses—inspiring, invigorating, ennobling and consoling. In this way we can help the attainment of the grand immediate objective: Victory."

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

JAN 9 - 1942

Lourie's Second Symphony Played by Koussevitzky

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Between such standard symphonic fare as Haydn's Symphony in B Flat, No. 102 and Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Koussevitzky sandwiched in a third, Lourie's "Kormtchaia," Symphony No. 2, for a first New York performance by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night. No doubt there were several who might like also to have this recorded as its last performance, or as one person remarked "to have had it left in Boston in the first place." Such reaction, however, would suggest prejudiced listening with a landslide preference for Haydn and Brahms. As a matter of fact, the new symphony not only had no dull moments but proved to be an extremely interesting contemporary work.

Perhaps by definition Mr. Lourie's Symphony is not a symphony inasmuch as it is divided into ten sections, but it is becoming more and more apparent that the designation "symphony" is loosely used by modern composers. The program notes would have led us to expect a rather strange work in "seconds, fourths and thirds," having no real themes and only a mosaic plan of procedure. But the music so transcended the obscurity of the program notes as to make it plain that here was an interplay of musical ideas pursued even to the point of being fascinating.

The work which was composed in Paris in 1939 shows the post-Stravinsky influence, especially in its rhythmic preoccupations and its dry orchestration. That is a distinct Paris style for a large number of present-day composers and not easily dismissed as extreme. In groping for a new artistic expression Lourie has contributed a work of consequence.

To speak of the performances of the evening is only to repeat vainly what has become customary in appraising concerts by Koussevitzky and his men. They have a certain standard which still ranks at the top of the list.

There was one unusual note in the procedure of the evening. Koussevitzky requested the audience to sing the "Star Spangled Banner" while he conducted as he would before the orchestra. For a moment it was possible to imagine what the orchestra has to face every time he conducts because he asked of the audience all that it could give. To its credit, it responded.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 11 1942

Hitler Made Mozart a German but Walter Can Take a Choice

Guest Conductor with Boston Symphony Orchestra Has Taken Out First Citizenship Papers Here; Fled Austria When the Nazis Marched In

BY SHEILAH GRAHAM
North American Newspaper Alliance

HITLER'S propaganda department went to some trouble recently to prove that Mozart was really a German and in that case it was all right for the citizens of the Reich to hear and enjoy the compositions of the great master. (Mozart was born in Austria in 1756.)

Last month, Bruno Walter, the greatest living batoneer of Mozart music, commemorated the 150th anniversary of the death of the composer with a performance of "Don Giovanni" at the New York Metropolitan Opera House. (Providence will hear him on January 20 as a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.)

Herr Walter was born a German—in Berlin. But unlike Mozart, the conductor can himself decide the country of his allegiance.

"I have just taken out my first American citizenship papers," Mr. Walter told me in the apartment he shares with his wife and daughter. "We have all of us taken out American papers," he continues. This adds up to the third change of nationality for the 65-year-old conductor.

When Hitler's storm troopers marched into Austria with the Anschluss, Walter with his family found refuge in France. The Third Republic invited him to become an honorary French citizen. With France under the dominance of the Nazis, the Maestro joined the distinguished group of intellectuals seeking the permanent protection of the United States.

The conductor's deeply lined face is sensitive and sad. He prefers not to discuss the present politics of Europe, but recently when someone suggested that in view of Nazi brutality it might be advisable to avoid the works of Wagner and other German music-makers, he replied:

"We are making war against the Nazis, not against the composers." He describes the current conflict as a fight between the forces of good and evil—"which makes it quite different to the 1914-18 and most previous wars."

Walter, the guiding spirit of the Salzburg Festival in its pre-Hitler days, has a loathing of what he terms —"jazz music." "It's like looking at a Rembrandt through a distorted mirror." As for the current practice of syncopating classical music, the conductor considers a great outrage has been perpetrated against lovers of beautiful sound.

The appreciation of good music is something you are born with, Walter believes. It cannot be acquired by the non-musical. "But," he says, "systematic subjection when young to fine compositions will increase appreciation—if it is already there."

The conductor, in the tradition of all great musicians revealed his future metier at an early age. He started piano lessons when he was four. At nine, Walter made his musical debut—at a students' recital in Berlin. At this time he composed a duet for piano and violin for his father's birthday.

When Walter was 17 he mounted his first podium, directing a performance of Lortzing's opera "Der Waffenschmied" in Cologne. While coaching the Hamburg opera, he met Gustav Mahler with whom he remained for three seasons. Since then Walter has conducted all over the world, including London, Berlin, Vienna, Munich, Boston, Detroit, Los Angeles and New York.

The present season has included a symphony session with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, a British war relief benefit in Montreal, two weeks of guest conductorship with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, and Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and "The Magic Flute," at the Metropolitan.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

JAN 11 1942

MARTINU WORK LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

New Concerto Grosso Feature of the Program by Boston Symphony at Carnegie

BOROVSKY PIANO SOLOIST

Plays Tchaikovsky Concerto in B Flat Minor — Overture '1812' Concludes Concert

By NOEL STRAUS

The concert given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, was one of the memorable events of the current music season. It became so through the superb performance granted Tchaikovsky's piano concerto in B flat minor with Alexander Borovsky as soloist, and the impressive interpretation of Bohuslav Martinu's masterly Concerto Grosso, which received its local première.

This novelty by the gifted Czech composer was written in 1938, but did not gain a hearing until two months ago, when it was presented by Dr. Koussevitzky and his forces in Boston. First slated for Paris in 1937, it could not be given at that time because of the Anschluss, which prevented the orchestral parts from being sent from Central Europe to France.

Later arrangements for presentation of the work in Prague and the French capital also fell through because of the war. Then the manuscript was lost at the time Mr. Martinu made a forced retreat from Paris, but a copy was rescued by George Szell, the conductor, who brought it to this country.

Work Wins an Ovation

It would have been a pity had the music not been found, for the work, which brought on a prolonged ovation yesterday, proved not only expertly contrived in its structure and orchestration, but also replete with interesting musical ideas. It consisted of two rapid corner movements, separated by an andante, and was scored for a chamber orchestra composed of two pianos, woodwinds and strings, employed in the regulation concerto grosso alternations of soli and tutti.

Both corner divisions were full of rhythmic life, fascinating color effects, and though their thematic material was rather dry, it was most deftly developed. But the most original and notable part of the opus was the andante division, in which a noble and far-flung melody, first intoned by the 'cellos, moved steadily forward in an extraordinarily gradual and extensive crescendo to an intense climax, suddenly broken by a several-times-repeated dissonant chord, leading to a tranquil close.

Like the other movements of the neo-classic novelty this one, though modern in content, had an authentic early eighteenth century atmosphere, seldom so closely approximated in contemporary attempts in the genre. Mr. Martinu acknowledged from the stage the warm reception accorded his composition.

Borovsky Is Praised

Mr. Borovsky's playing throughout the Tchaikovsky concerto was remarkably brilliant and powerful. He is one of the few living pianists capable of performing the display piece in the monumental manner it demands without detriment to beauty of tone. Even the tremendous climax built up in the coda of the finale was projected with sounds that never lost a whit of their velvetiness of quality, yet when necessary Mr. Borovsky could summon the most delicate of singing pianissimi from the keyboard, in a reading of rare dramatic intensity, always controlled by a superior intelligence.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who was in his most enthusiastic vein, provided magnificent support in the piano concerto, and did all in his power to make the Martinu composition the success it proved. He also gave Mozart's "Haffner" symphony a finely proportioned performance, especially ingratiating in the ebullient treatment of the finale. And by way of conclusion he led Tchaikovsky's timely "1812" overture with exciting patriotic fervor.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

JAN 12 1942

Boston Symphony Led By Serge Koussevitzky

The Boston Symphony has unearthed a militant classicist in Bohuslaw Martinu, the Czech composer whose Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra was played by the organization on Saturday afternoon, at the second of the pair of concerts which it played in Carnegie Hall last week under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Nearly everyone by now must be familiar with the adventures of Mr. Martinu's concerto, the premier of which was interrupted several times by Hitler's legions. After the last cancelled performance, which was to have taken place in Paris in the summer of 1940, the composer fled the city, leaving the score behind. It was rescued by his countryman, Conductor George Szell, and the long-delayed first hearing finally took place a couple of months ago in Boston.

The Martinu concerto proved to be rather interesting both in form and subject-matter. Mr. Martinu apparently perceives excellence in classic forms without being rigidly bound by them. This state of mind in a composer generally results in compositions that are sound and well-constructed, if nothing else. Add to this the fact that Mr. Martinu is a Bohemian, and as such would be looked on as a rank imposter if he failed to produce a string of lilting, ear-tickling melodies. The whole adds up to an ingratiating piece which deserves a place in concert repertoire, and for the rescue of which a vote of thanks is due Mr. Szell and Dr. Koussevitzky.

The concert also listed the "Haffner" Symphony of Mozart, the Tchaikovsky piano concerto in B-flat minor, with Alexander Borovsky as the soloist, and that composer's "1812" Overture. Mr. Borovsky, with Dr. Koussevitzky's skillful collaboration, did a fine job with the concerto, and the "1812" merited an ovation from the audience.

J. B.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD

JAN 14 1942

Bruno Walter Cancels Concerts in Union Row

NEW YORK, Jan. 13.—Bruno Walter, noted symphony conductor, was forced to cancel a concert series with the Boston Symphony Orchestra today as a result of a union tangle with James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians. Because the Boston Symphony is not unionized, Petrillo ruled that it could not play under the baton of Walter, who is an honorary member of the union.

This Clipping From
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE

JAN 13 1942

Boston, Jan. 13—Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today were disappointed to learn that Bruno Walter, eminent conductor, would not be able to appear this week as guest conductor. Named to substitute for Walter, whose appearance was forbidden by James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, was Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. Walter was ordered not to appear with the Boston Symphony because it is non-union. The Federation of Musicians has been seeking to unionize the orchestra, only major non-union orchestra in the country.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 12 1942

Koussevitzky Offers New ... oncerto

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Thanks to Serge Koussevitzy's addiction to new music, an interesting Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra by Bohuslav Martinu, the Czech composer, was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon.

The Concerto is a virile, rhythmically attractive item, in which the composer has made good use of dissonance. It is one of those pieces of music that listeners take to at once. Its effectiveness was heightened no little by the masterly performance given it. Two pianos play an important part in the scheme and Messrs. Jo... Maria Sanroma and Bernard Z... hera were responsible for sterl... keyboard work.

The Tschaikowsky B-Flat Mi... Piano Concerto, with Alexan... Borovsky as solist, went agreeab... if not excitingly. Mr. Borovs... lagged a bit behind the orches... in certain fast measures, but ... usually caught up. Good thi... too. Other listed numbers w... Tschaikowsky's 1812 Overture ... the Mozart Symphony in D Ma... (K. 385). No major faults to f...

... and Flora that was a pip.

* * *

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

JAN 12 1942

ORCHESTRAS OFFER UNFAMILIAR MUSIC

Lhevinnes Are Soloists With Abravanel.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

Soloists came in pairs at yesterday's orchestral concerts in Carnegie Hall by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and the New York City Symphony. Mishel Piastro and Joseph Schuster, head of the violin and cello sections of the Philharmonic, were the soloists under Dimitri Mitropoulos as he concluded his engagement with the orchestra in the afternoon.

Maurice Abravanel had the assistance of the Lhevinnes, Josef and Rosina, in the evening.

The Philharmonic was also represented in the creative activities of the afternoon, with the playing of a scherzo by Zoltan Kurthy, first violist, which had been introduced at the previous evening's concert. It is an amiable work of no discernible personality, effectively contrived for the orchestra. Another unfamiliar item was the expressive "Pastorale" from the first symphony of Anis Fuleihan, which made its first appearance in the Philharmonic repertory in 1936. It wears a good deal better than many more pretentious works heard during that period.

Of special note in the playing of the Messrs. Piastro and Schuster was the identity of their approach to the double concerto of Brahms, and the excellence of the ensemble they achieved with Mr. Mitropoulos. The tonal values were also adjusted with sensitivity, though Mr. Piastro's intonation was not as consistently dependable as it might have been. On the whole, the performance reached its peak in the slow movement, which was warmly phrased. Yesterday's audience heard Purcell's prelude and death of Dido in place of the Glazounoff overture on Greek themes played Saturday night. Both programs concluded with Milhaud's "Suite Provencale."

By coincidence, this work also appeared on the program directed by Maurice Abravanel and played by the New York City Symphony in the same hall last night. The Lhevinnes gave excellent service to the Poulenc concerto in which they participated, certainly to the satisfaction of the unusually large audience. Mr. Abravanel chose a balance for his program with equal intelligence, offering the fine B flat Sinfonia of J. C. Bach, Aaron Copland's lively "El Salon Mexico" and the second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite of Ravel. One could hardly say that the performances challenged the virtuoso standards of other orchestras heard in this hall, but the musical purposes of the composers were soundly served.

Martinu Warmly Welcomed.

One of the warmest greetings a composer has received this season was tendered to Bohuslav Martinu, Czecho-Slovakian musician, when he appeared on the stage following the playing of his new "Concerto Grosso" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday afternoon. Some of this effusion may have been a belated dividend on works of his played here previously, but one need hardly look beyond the music of this concert for its justification. This is a singularly spirited and absorbing piece, full of rhythmic energy, well set for the chamber orchestra and two pianos. One could scarcely call it tuneful, but it had recognizable melodic fragments. Had the two pianos not blanketed the wood winds (owing to their position on the stage) the effect might have been even greater.

The day's soloist was Alexander Borovsky, playing "that" concerto of Tchaikovsky. Mr. Borovsky operated as though he were unaware of the constancy with which it has been dinned into our ears recently, largely succeeding in the ungrateful task of making it interesting. If he does not have the technical glibness of some other pianists, he did have a good deal of character in his playing, through which a fusion with Tchaikovsky was achieved to the gain of the listener. Mr. Koussevitzky paid his respects to the international situation with a stately performance of "The Star-Spangled Banner" at the beginning of the concert, and a fiery one of Tchaikovsky's "1812" at its conclusion. A neat, if not too idiomatic, reading of Mozart's "Haffner" symphony was also heard by the large audience.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 11 1942

Hitler Made Mozart a German but Walter Can Take a Choice

Guest Conductor with Boston Symphony Orchestra Has Taken Out First Citizenship Papers Here; Fled Austria When the Nazis Marched In

BY SHEILAH GRAHAM
North American Newspaper Alliance

HITLER'S propaganda department went to some trouble recently to prove that Mozart was really a German and in that case it was all right for the citizens of the Reich to hear and enjoy the compositions of the great master. (Mozart was born in Austria in 1756.)

Last month, Bruno Walter, the greatest living batoneer of Mozart music, commemorated the 150th anniversary of the death of the composer with a performance of "Don Giovanni" at the New York Metropolitan Opera House. (Providence will hear him on January 20 as a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.)

Herr Walter was born a German—in Berlin. But unlike Mozart, the conductor can himself decide the country of his allegiance.

"I have just taken out my first American citizenship papers," Mr. Walter told me in the apartment he shares with his wife and daughter. "We have all of us taken out American papers," he continues. This adds up to the third change of nationality for the 65-year-old conductor.

When Hitler's storm troopers marched into Austria with the Anschluss, Walter with his family found refuge in France. The Third Republic invited him to become an honorary French citizen. With France under the dominance of the Nazis, the Maestro joined the distinguished group of intellectuals seeking the permanent protection of the United States.

The conductor's deeply lined face is sensitive and sad. He prefers not to discuss the present politics of Europe, but recently when someone suggested that in view of Nazi brutality it might be advisable to avoid the works of Wagner and other German music-makers, he replied:

"We are making war against the Nazis, not against the composers." He describes the current conflict as a fight between the forces of good and evil—"which makes it quite different to the 1914-18 and most previous wars."

Walter, the guiding spirit of the Salzburg Festival in its pre-Hitler days, has a loathing of what he terms—"jazz music." "It's like looking at a Rembrandt through a distorted mirror." As for the current practice of syncopating classical music, the conductor considers a great outrage has been perpetrated against lovers of beautiful sound.

The appreciation of good music is something you are born with, Walter believes. It cannot be acquired by the non-musical. "But," he says, "systematic subjection when young to fine compositions will increase appreciation—if it is already there."

The conductor, in the tradition of all great musicians revealed his future metier at an early age. He started piano lessons when he was four. At nine, Walter made his musical debut—at a students' recital in Berlin. At this time he composed a duet for piano and violin for his father's birthday.

When Walter was 17 he mounted his first podium, directing a performance of Lortzing's opera "Der Waffenschmied" in Cologne. While coaching the Hamburg opera, he met Gustav Mahler with whom he remained for three seasons. Since then Walter has conducted all over the world, including London, Berlin, Vienna, Munich, Boston, Detroit, Los Angeles and New York.

The present season has included a symphony session with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, a British war relief benefit in Montreal, two weeks of guest conductorship with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, and Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and "The Magic Flute," at the Metropolitan.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD

JAN 14 1942

Bruno Walter Cancels Concerts in Union Row

NEW YORK, Jan. 13.—Bruno Walter, noted symphony conductor, was forced to cancel a concert series with the Boston Symphony Orchestra today as a result of a union tangle with James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians. Because the Boston Symphony is not unionized, Petrillo ruled that it could not play under the baton of Walter, who is an honorary member of the union.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

JAN 11 1942

MARTINU WORK LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

New Concerto Grosso Feature of the Program by Boston Symphony at Carnegie

BOROVSKY PIANO SOLOIST

Plays Tchaikovsky Concerto in B Flat Minor — Overture '1812' Concludes Concert

By NOEL STRAUS

The concert given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, was one of the memorable events of the current music season. It became so through the superb performance granted Tchaikovsky's piano concerto in B flat minor with Alexander Borovsky as soloist, and the impressive interpretation of Bohuslav Martinu's masterly Concerto Grosso, which received its local première.

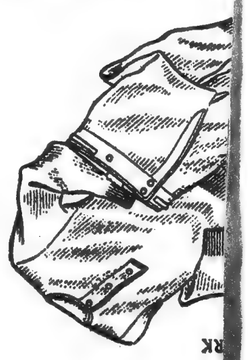
This novelty by the gifted Czech composer was written in 1938, but did not gain a hearing until two months ago, when it was presented by Dr. Koussevitzky and his forces in Boston. First slated for Paris in 1937, it could not be given at that time because of the Anschluss, which prevented the orchestral parts from being sent from Central Europe to France.

Later arrangements for presentation of the work in Prague and the French capital also fell through because of the war. Then the manuscript was lost at the time Mr. Martinu made a forced retreat from Paris, but a copy was rescued by George Szell, the conductor, who brought it to this country.

Work Wins an Ovation

It would have been a pity had the music not been found, for the work, which brought on a prolonged ovation yesterday, proved not only expertly contrived in its structure and orchestration, but also replete with interesting musical ideas. It consisted of two rapid

E-WOOL UNDERWEAR—drawers from $6 to $11.50.
rawers. Ea. $13.75.
long-sleeved undershirts,
sr - light-weight garments
NDERWEAR—100% cash-



RK

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

JAN 12 1942

50

Boston Symphony Led By Serge Koussevitzky

The Boston Symphony has unearthed a militant classicist in Bohuslaw Martinu, the Czech composer whose Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra was played by the organization on Saturday afternoon, at the second of the pair of concerts which it played in Carnegie Hall last week under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Nearly everyone by now must be familiar with the adventures of Mr. Martinu's concerto, the premier of which was interrupted several times by Hitler's legions. After the last cancelled performance, which was to have taken place in Paris in the summer of 1940, the composer fled the city, leaving the score behind. It was rescued by his countryman, Conductor George Szell, and the long-delayed first hearing finally took place a couple of months ago in Boston.

The Martinu concerto proved to be rather interesting both in form and subject-matter. Mr. Martinu apparently perceives excellence in classic forms without being rigidly bound by them. This state of mind in a composer generally results in compositions that are sound and well-constructed, if nothing else. Add to this the fact that Mr. Martinu is a Bohemian, and as such would be looked on as a rank imposter if he failed to produce a string of lilting, ear-tickling melodies. The whole adds up to an ingratiating piece which deserves a place in concert repertoire, and for the rescue of which a vote of thanks is due Mr. Szell and Dr. Koussevitzky.

The concert also listed the "Haffner" Symphony of Mozart, the Tchaikovsky piano concerto in B-flat minor, with Alexander Borovsky as the soloist, and that composer's "1812" Overture. Mr. Borovsky, with Dr. Koussevitzky's skillful collaboration, did a fine job with the concerto, and the "1812" merited an ovation from the audience.

J. B.

This Clipping From
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE

JAN 13 1942

Boston, Jan. 13—Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today were disappointed to learn that Bruno Walter, eminent conductor, would not be able to appear this week as guest conductor. Named to substitute for Walter, whose appearance was forbidden by James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, was Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. Walter was ordered not to appear with the Boston Symphony because it is non-union. The Federation of Musicians has been seeking to unionize the orchestra, only major non-union orchestra in the country.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

JAN 12 1942

ORCHESTRAS OFFER UNFAMILIAR MUSIC

Lhevinnes Are Soloists With Abravanel.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

Soloists came in pairs at yesterday's orchestral concerts in Carnegie Hall by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and the New York City Symphony. Mishel Piastro and Joseph Schuster, head of the violin and cello sections of the Philharmonic, were the soloists under Dimitri Mitropoulos as he concluded his engagement with the orchestra in the afternoon.

Maurice Abravanel had the assistance of the Lhevinnes, Josef and Rosina, in the evening.

The Philharmonic was also represented in the creative activities of the afternoon, with the playing of a scherzo by Zoltan Kurthy, first violist, which had been introduced at the previous evening's concert. It is an amiable work of no discernible personality, effectively contrived for the orchestra. Another unfamiliar item was the expressive "Pastorale" from the first symphony of Anis Fuleihan, which made its first appearance in the Philharmonic repertory in 1936. It wears a good deal better than many more pretentious works heard during that period.

Of special note in the playing of the Messrs. Piastro and Schuster was the identity of their approach to the double concerto of Brahms, and the excellence of the ensemble they achieved with Mr. Mitropoulos. The tonal values were also adjusted with sensitivity, though Mr. Piastro's intonation was not as consistently dependable as it might have been. On the whole, the performance reached its peak in the slow movement, which was warmly phrased. Yesterday's audience heard Purcell's prelude and death of Dido in place of the Glazounoff overture on Greek themes played Saturday night. Both programs concluded with Milhaud's "Suite Provencale."

By coincidence, this work also appeared on the program directed by Maurice Abravanel and played by the New York City Symphony in the same hall last night. The Lhevinnes gave excellent service to the Poulenc concerto in which they participated, certainly to the satisfaction of the unusually large audience. Mr. Abravanel chose a balance for his program with equal intelligence, offering the fine B flat Sinfonia of J. C. Bach, Aaron Copland's lively "El Salon Mexico" and the second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite of Ravel. One could hardly say that the performances challenged the virtuoso standards of other orchestras heard in this hall, but the musical purposes of the composers were soundly served.

Martinu Warmly Welcomed.

One of the warmest greetings a composer has received this season was tendered to Bohuslav Martinu, Czecho-Slovakian musician, when he appeared on the stage following the playing of his new "Concerto Grosso" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday afternoon. Some of this effusion may have been a belated dividend on works of his played here previously, but one need hardly look beyond the music of this concert for its justification. This is a singularly spirited and absorbing piece, full of rhythmic energy, well set for the chamber orchestra and two pianos. One could scarcely call it tuneful, but it had recognizable melodic fragments. Had the two pianos not blanketed the wood winds (owing to their position on the stage) the effect might have been even greater.

The day's soloist was Alexander Borovsky, playing "that" concerto of Tchaikovsky. Mr. Borovsky operated as though he were unaware of the constancy with which it has been dinned into our ears recently, largely succeeding in the ungrateful task of making it interesting. If he does not have the technical glibness of some other pianists, he did have a good deal of character in his playing, through which a fusion with Tchaikovsky was achieved to the gain of the listener. Mr. Koussevitzky paid his respects to the international situation with a stately performance of "The Star-Spangled Banner" at the beginning of the concert, and a fiery one of Tchaikovsky's "1812" at its conclusion. A neat, if not too idiomatic, reading of Mozart's "Haffner" symphony was also heard by the large audience.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 12 1942

Koussevitzky Offers New Martinu Concerto

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Thanks to Serge Koussevitzy's addiction to new music, an interesting Concerto Grosso for Chamber Orchestra by Bohuslav Martinu, the Czech composer, was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon.

The Concerto is a virile, rhythmically attractive item, in which the composer has made good use of dissonance. It is one of those pieces of music that listeners take to at once. Its effectiveness was heightened no little by the masterly performance given it. Two pianos play an important part in the scheme and Messrs. Jesus Maria Sanroma and Bernard Zighera were responsible for sterling keyboard work.

The Tschaikowsky B-Flat Minor Piano Concerto, with Alexander Borovsky as solist, went agreeably, if not excitingly. Mr. Borovsky lagged a bit behind the orchestra in certain fast measures, but he usually caught up. Good thing, too. Other listed numbers were Tschaikowsky's 1812 Overture and the Mozart Symphony in D Major (K. 385). No major faults to find with the playing of either. The audience was large and responsive.

* * *

Page-Stone Recital.

Ruth Page and Bentley Stone shared a dance program at the Guild Theater last night. Pieces offered were solos and duets with Jess Meeker, pianist, to supply the tonal backgrounds. The work of the two artists, particularly in comedy or satiric stuff, was first-rate. Mr. Stone's Punch Drunk earned many chuckles, Miss Page's Park Avenue Odolisque likewise, and both artists did a take-off on the serious classic dance in Zephyr and Flora that was a pip.

* * *

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
JAN 12 1942

51

Verboten Concerto Is Here to Stay

The Concerto Grosso by Bohuslav Martinu, Czech expatriate now living here, got its first New York performance Saturday afternoon by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky only after suffering three years of Nazi persecution. Scheduled to be published in Vienna in 1938, it was buried by Anschluss. Scheduled for a Prague premiere in 1939, it was verboten by the Nazis. Scheduled for a Paris premiere in May 1940, it was lost when the composer had to flee the invaders.

By chance George Szell, the conductor, had rescued a copy in Prague and brought it to America when he too left Europe. The composer did not know about the rescue till he had followed Szell here. Now Boston and New York have heard it. It was worth all that trouble.

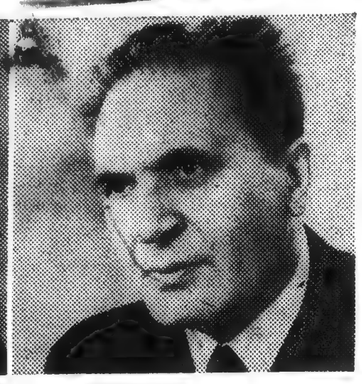
Steeped in Czechish melodies (the main theme reminds one of the Rakoczy March), Mr. Martinu has a liking for the classical concerto grosso form and the skill and imagination to make the most of modern harmonies and orchestras. The listener thus has three comforts. He has themes which have a nationalistic character and are easy to hold on to. He knows what the composer is trying to do—that is, make a kind of chamber music which divides the orchestra into a soloist group and a large group but never attempts to give apocalyptical utterance; and he knows the composer will speak his own contemporary language in the freshness of rhythms and freeness of melody. Mr. Martinu's music lives up to all three expectations. It is compact, direct and always pleasing. I imagine we'll be hearing it again—a sadly unusual fate for a modern work.

The piece got a superlative performance from Dr. Koussevitzky. So, too, did the Mozart Haffner Symphony that opened the concert and the Tchaikowsky 1812 Overture that closed it. Alexander Borovsky, however, who played That Concerto by Tchaikowsky, was not worthy of his accomplishment, lacking the vitality the work demands and discovering far more wrong notes than one expects from so well known a virtuoso. Must have been an off day.—HENRY SIMON.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 13 1942

Union Keeps Dr. Walter from Boston Symphony

JAMES C. PETRILLO: He stopped the baton of . . .



BRUNO WALTER from waving for the Boston Symphony.

Famous Conductor Forbidden to Conduct Non-Union Musicians Playing in Providence Next Week

Another crisis in the relations between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and James C. Petrillo will prevent Rhode Islanders from hearing the famous conductor Bruno Walter a week from tonight.

Petrillo, as president of the American Federation of Musicians, has forbidden Dr. Walter, a union musician, from being guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, a non-union orchestra. Dr. Walter has also been prevented from making three guest appearances with the orchestra in Boston and Cambridge on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday.

Burgin for Walter

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor, will substitute for Dr. Walter in Boston, Cambridge, and Providence, according to George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, will not appear here Tuesday. It is understood also that because of the death of his wife, Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky on Sunday, he will not make a guest appearance with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra next week.

Continued

To Change Program

"I had hoped to clear up the situation," Judd said today, referring to Petrillo's action, "but I have had to give up hope."

He said that another program will take the place of the one made by Dr. Walter. A soloist will be presented, Emanuel Feuermann, renowned 'cellist. What concerto he will play has not been decided, but the entire program probably will be made known tonight.

Mr. Feuermann made his American debut in 1934 with the Philharmonic, conducted by Dr. Walter. He played here last season for the Providence Community Concert Association.

Petrillo and the Boston Symphony have been at odds a number of times. However, he had consented to the guest appearance of Dr. Koussevitzky with the Philharmonic, a union orchestra, because of a "personal appeal from Marshall Field, 3rd." At the same time, Petrillo said that this dispensation "does not in any way affect the position of the Federation so far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra or Mr. Koussevitzky is concerned, and in no event is it to be considered a precedent or departure from the position which the Federation has taken."

Artists Stopped

Among recent measures by Petrillo against the orchestra, which is the only important non-union orchestra in the country, have been orders forbidding violinists Efrem Zimbalist and Joseph Szigeti and composer-conductor Howard Hanson from fulfilling engagements.

Dr. Walter, the latest casualty, is 65 years old and a citizen of France, to which he fled in 1938 from Austria, to which he had fled in 1933 from Germany, after the rise of Hitler. He has applied for American citizenship.

Dr. Walter's program here was to have included the first symphony of Mahler, about whom he recently wrote a book of reminiscences.

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD
JAN 14 1942

CONDUCTOR CANCELS DATE

NEW YORK, Jan. 13. (AP)—James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians (AFL), said today that Conductor Bruno Walter would not appear with the Boston symphony orchestra because the orchestra was not unionized. "Walter said he had been asked to appear with the orchestra and asked me how it stood," Petrillo said. "I told him. That was all. Union musicians just don't play with non-union musicians."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
JAN 14 1942

Music and Musicians

By WILLIAM G. KING.

The shock caused by the sudden death of his wife last Sunday will make it impossible for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to keep his engagement as guest-conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony at the concerts scheduled for January 22, 23, 25, 29 and 30, and February 1. The Board of Directors of the Philharmonic-Symphony has granted his request that his participation in its 100th anniversary celebration be put over until later in the season.

Dr. Bruno Walter has agreed to direct the local orchestra at the concerts on January 22, 23 and 25. Who will take over Dr. Koussevitzky's other three dates has not yet been announced. At all three of his concerts, Dr. Walter will present the Mahler Symphony No. 2 in C Minor, for Orchestra, Soprano and Alto soloists and Mixed Chorus. The assisting artists will be Nadine Connor, soprano, and Mona Paulee, contralto, of the Metropolitan Opera, and the Westminster Choir. The Thursday evening and Friday afternoon programs will be completed by the Schubert Symphony No. 5 in B Flat; that of Sunday afternoon by the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
JAN 14 1942

Bruno Walter Will Conduct Three Koussevitzky Concerts

Bruno Walter, denied permission to conduct Serge Koussevitzky's nonunion Boston Symphony Orchestra, will instead take over Dr. Koussevitzky's three concerts with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra here.

This second shift in conducting engagements, following a renewal of union difficulties with the Boston orchestra, was caused by the death on Sunday of Mrs. Koussevitzky. Yesterday the Boston conductor notified Marshall Field, president of the Philharmonic, that he would be unable to fill his engagements scheduled for next week.

Mr. Walter, who was scheduled to conduct several Philharmonic concerts in April, immediately agreed to substitute. Dr. Koussevitzky will take over three of Mr. Walter's April engagements.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
JAN 13 1942

Petrillo Bans Bruno Walter In Boston

Conductor Not Permitted To Lead Orchestra

BOSTON—Bruno Walter will not appear here this week as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. By order of James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, the eminent conductor has been forbidden, as a union musician, to keep the engagement.

He had been expected to conduct at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evening.

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, will substitute for Mr. Walter.

Unionization Sought

The president of the American Federation of Musicians has for some time desired unionization of the Boston Symphony, now the only nonunion major orchestra in the United States, and already this season has forbidden Efrem Zimbalist and Joseph Szigeti, violinists, and Dr. Howard Hanson, composer-conductor, to appear with the orchestra.

Mr. Petrillo's decision in the case of Mr. Walter followed by less than a week the union official's assent to permit Serge Koussevitzky to conduct the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra as guest next week. At that time Mr. Petrillo said he had agreed to Mr. Koussevitzky's Philharmonic - Symphony appearances as the result of a "personal appeal from Marshall Field 3d . . . a man for whom I have great respect."

Mr. Petrillo added that "It must be understood that this is being done wholly out of consideration and respect to Mr. Field and the New York Philharmonic and its board of trustees, which has always co-operated with the American Federation of Musicians, and does not in any way affect the position of the Federation so far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra or Mr. Koussevitzky is concerned, and in no event is it to be considered a precedent or departure from the position which the federation has taken."

It is understood, however, that due to the death of his wife, Mr. Koussevitzky will not conduct the Philharmonic.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
JAN 13 1942

Walter Passes Up Nonunion Concert

Won't Go to Boston, Petrillo Asserts

Bruno Walter, the noted conductor, will not appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra because that orchestra is not unionized, James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, AFL, announced here today.

"Walter said he had been asked to appear with the orchestra and asked me how it stood," said Mr. Petrillo.

"I told him. That was all. Union musicians just don't play with non-union musicians."

Mr. Walter has conducted the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra here and at opera performances at the Metropolitan.

Last October he ran into union trouble in Detroit. He arrived there to be guest conductor of the Detroit Symphony and at the first rehearsal only a lone bass fiddler showed up.

The 80 or so others in the orchestra had walked out in an effort to force an extension of the 21-week season.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 14 1942

51

DR. BRUNO WALTER BARRED BY UNION

Petrillo Orders Conductor to Cancel Appearance Here with Boston Orchestra.

James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, has blocked the appearance of Dr. Bruno Walter, a union musician, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a non-union organization, at a concert here next Tuesday night, it was learned yesterday.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the regular conductor, was to have made a guest appearance with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra next week, but the fate of this engagement was in doubt because of the death of the conductor's wife, Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, on Sunday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducted here by Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor. The soloist will be Emanuel Feuermann, noted 'cellist.

George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced last night that the program would consist of Brahms's Piano Quartet in G Minor, arranged for orchestra by Schoenberg; Schumann's Concerto for Violoncello, with Mr. Feuermann as soloist, and Smetana's "The Moldau," a symphonic poem.

In addition to forbidding Dr. Walter's appearance here, Petrillo ordered him not to appear with the orchestra in scheduled concerts in Boston and Cambridge tomorrow, Friday and Saturday nights.

"I had hoped to clear up the situation," Judd said yesterday, referring to Petrillo's action, "but I have had to give up hope."

Mr. Feuermann made his American debut in 1934 with the Philharmonic, conducted by Dr. Walter. He played here last season for the Providence Community Concert Association.

Petrillo and the Boston Symphony have been at odds a number of times. However, he had consented to the guest appearance of Dr. Koussevitzky with the Philharmonic, a union orchestra, because of a "personal appeal from Marshall Field, 3rd." At the same time, Petrillo said that this dispensation "does not in any way affect the position of the Federation so far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra or Dr. Koussevitzky is concerned, and in no event is it to be considered a precedent or departure from the position which the Federation has taken."

Among recent measures by Petrillo against the orchestra, which is the only important non-union orchestra in the country, have been orders forbidding violinists Efrem Zimbalist and Joseph Szigeti and composer-conductor Howard Hanson from fulfilling engagements.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 16 1942

NOISE NOT MUSIC

The Program Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Criticized

To the Editor of The Courant:—

Tuesday evening, January 6, 1942, should be a date long to be remembered in Hartford musical circles for two reasons: First, the Boston Symphony Orchestra thrust three symphonies,—at least we think all three were symphonies,—upon us; second, the one work which Lourie calls a symphony was a degraded example of such a high form of composition. There was absolutely no form, no beauty of design, none of that stuff we call harmony! True, Dr. Koussevitzky does the "moderns" and "does 'em up brown"; but why doesn't he select something that can be called music, and not a mess of noise?

I may be wrong in my judgment of the thing, but I hope that our venerable music director will doctor

Bruno Walter's Appearance Here Barred by Union

Richard Burgin to Lead Boston Symphony Concerts Friday and Saturday

Bruno Walter will not appear here this week as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. By order of James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, the eminent conductor has been forbidden, as a union musician, to keep the engagement. He had been expected to conduct at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evening.

BRUNO WALTER

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, will substitute for Mr. Walter.

Unionization Here Sought

The president of the American Federation of Musicians has for some time desired unionization of the Boston Symphony, now the only nonunion major orchestra in the United States, and already this season has forbidden Efrem Zimbalist and Joseph Szigeti, violinists, and Dr. Howard Hanson, composer-conductor, to appear with the orchestra.

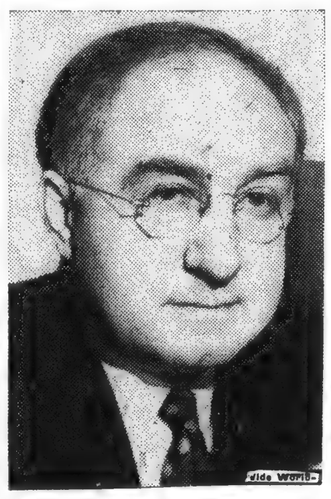
Mr. Petrillo's decision in the case of Mr. Walter followed by less than a week the union official's assent to permit Serge Koussevitzky to conduct the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra as guest next week. At that time Mr. Petrillo said he had agreed to Mr. Koussevitzky's Philharmonic - Symphony appearances as the result of a "personal appeal from Marshall Field 3d . . . a man for whom I have great respect."

Mr. Petrillo added that "It must be understood that this is being done wholly out of consideration and respect to Mr. Field and the New York Philharmonic and its board of trustees, which has always cooperated with the American Federation of Musicians, and does not in any way affect the position of the Federation so far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra or Mr. Koussevitzky is concerned, and in no event is it to be considered a precedent or departure from the position which the Federation has taken."

To Honor Mme. Koussevitzky

It is understood, however, that due to the death of his wife Mr. Koussevitzky will not conduct the Philharmonic.

At all three concerts which Mr. Walter was to have conducted here



JAMES C. PETRILLO

Mr. Burgin will offer the following program: Andante Funebre from the E-flat minor String Quartet No. 3, by Tchaikovsky, in memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, wife of the orchestra's famed leader, who died Sunday night; the First Piano Concerto, in D minor, of Brahms, with the Chilean pianist, Claudio Arrau, making his first local appearances as soloist, and the orchestral transcription by Arnold Schoenberg of Brahms' G minor Piano Quartet, Op. 25.

Bruno Walter is acknowledged as one of the greatest conductors in the world today. Born Bruno Walter Schlesinger in Berlin 65 years ago, he left Germany after the advent of Hitler in 1933 and went to Austria. From that country he fled after the Nazi anschluss in 1938 and became a French citizen in October of that year. Last April he applied for American citizenship in New York.

This Clipping From JOHNSTOWN, PA.
DEMOCRAT

JAN 14 1942

SYMPHONY LOSES UNION CONDUCTOR

NEW YORK, Jan. 13—(INS)—Because the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not unionized, Bruno Walter who is an honorary member of the American Federation of Musicians has been refused permission to conduct a series of six concerts with that organization.

This was confirmed tonight by James C. Petrillo, president of the federation, who said there has been a long-standing policy against permitting union musicians to play with non-union organizations.

The noted opera and symphony conductor contracted for the Boston series in March 1941 and did not join the union until the following May. His contract called for concerts beginning Thursday at Cambridge and subsequently at Boston and Providence, R. I. Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, has been engaged to take Walter's place.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

JAN 14 1942

Petrillo Forbids Walter to Lead Symphony

Because he became a union member two months after signing a contract to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Bruno Walter, noted conductor, has been forbidden to lead that non-union organization in a scheduled series of concerts this month.

James C. Petrillo, czar of the American Federation of Musicians, admitted he had issued an order informing Walter that it would jeopardize his union status if he conducted the Boston group.

Walter, who has appeared frequently in New York, said he had signed for the Boston series last March. He became an honorary members of the Federation in May.

BURGIN TO CONDUCT.

In his place, Richard Burgin, concert-master of the organization, will conduct the Boston Symphony.

Serge Koussevitzky, regular conductor of the latter group, received a "special dispensation" from Petrillo to conduct a two-week cycle with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra starting next Monday.

Because of the death this week of his wife, however, he will not appear until later in the season. Walter will conduct in his stead, the Society announced.

PHILADELPHIANS MADE GOOD IMPRESSION HERE

THE NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

WITH Dictator Petrillo's drastic action in regard to Bruno Walter and the passing of Mme. Koussevitzky occuring almost simultaneously, Symphony Hall must have thought last week that misfortunes never come singly. Unhappy Concertmaster Richard Burgin, pinch-hitting for the great Walter, is sort of on the spot. And since the next best thing to a star conductor is a soloist, there will be another "assisting artist" this week, the distinguished 'cellist, Emanuel Feuermann, who will be heard in the Concerto of Schumann. Mr. Burgin will take this opportunity to acquaint us with the new Symphony of Hindemith. The other numbers on the programme will be a Concerto for Strings by Vivaldi and Smetana's "The Moldau."

In particular, Mr. Walter's inability to appear was a blow to the local Mahlerites, who had counted heavily upon his performance of that master's First Symphony, unheard here for six years and not nearly so well known in Boston as it deserves to be. These disappointed individuals must perforce console themselves with the Mahler broadcasts from Radio City, the third of which takes place next Sunday at the usual hour, 12:30. Mr. Rapee will then devote himself to the Second or "Resurrection" Symphony, which has an alto solo for its fourth movement and a choral finale.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

JAN 14 1942

Walter, Barred in Boston by Union, To Replace Dr. Koussevitzky Here

Petrillo's Action Coincides With Russian's Cancellation, Because of Wife's Death, of Plan to Lead Philharmonic

Bruno Walter was scheduled to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week in Boston while Serge Koussevitzky, its regular leader, was conducting the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra here. But now, by two twists of fate, the German conductor will replace the Russian next week not in Boston but in New York.

Mrs. Koussevitzky died Sunday night and because of the shock Dr. Koussevitzky has informed Marshall Field, president of the Philharmonic's board of directors, that he will be unable to give the three concerts he was scheduled to conduct with the orchestra here next week.

The reason Mr. Walter is free to step in at such short notice to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's assignment here is that James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, refused to relax his union's regulations that no union leader should conduct the non-union Boston Symphony Orchestra, thereby forcing Mr. Walter, an honorary member of the union, to cancel his appearance there. Mr. Walter was elected to his membership after he had signed his contract to appear in Boston.

Philharmonic subscribers, however, will not be deprived of Dr. Koussevitzky's full quota of concerts, for he will take over three of Mr. Walter's April concerts.

Mr. Walter will not conduct the programs announced for Dr. Koussevitzky. On Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, Jan. 22 and 23, he will conduct Schubert's Fifth Symphony, which he had planned to play in April, and Mahler's Second Symphony, which he had not planned to perform this season at all. The Mahler symphony will be repeated on Sunday afternoon, with the Prelude and Love Death from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde."

Meanwhile, Mr. Walter's concerts in Boston for this week and next are being conducted by Richard Burgin, the assistant conductor.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

JAN 14 1942

Union Bars Walter From Boston Concerts

Bruno Walter, an honorary member of the American Federation of Musicians, A. F. L., has been barred from conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston because it is non-union.

Walter, instead, will conduct the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra here on Jan. 22 and 23 in place of Serge Koussevitsky, whose wife died Sunday night. Koussevitsky, regular leader of the Boston group, was to conduct the Philharmonic in its New York concerts on those dates.

Walter had been scheduled to conduct six concerts in Boston this month, but James C. Petrillo, president of the musicians' union, refused to relax the union's regulations which prevent union musicians from playing with non-union musicians.

Koussevitsky informed Marshall Field, president of the Philharmonic's board of directors, that he would be unable to conduct the concerts this month because of his wife's death.

Koussevitsky, however, will take over three of Walter's April concerts here.

This Clipping From BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS

JAN 14 1942

Petrillo Forbids Walter To Keep Boston Contract

A. F. M. Head Says He Can't Conduct Nonunion Orchestra; Six Concerts Were Planned

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS New York Bureau.

NEW YORK, Jan. 14.—Bruno Walter, opera and symphony conductor, who is an honorary member of the American Federation of Musicians, has been refused permission to conduct a series of six concerts this month with the Boston Symphony Orchestra because the orchestra is not unionized, he disclosed Tuesday. The decision was confirmed by James C. Petrillo, president of the federation.

Mr. Walter, who has appeared frequently as guest conductor with the orchestras of the Metropolitan Opera and the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, both of which are unionized, signed the contract for the Boston series several months before he became a union member last year, he said. The series was to start tomorrow in Cambridge, Mass. In Boston it was announced that Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, would take Mr. Walter's place.

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

JAN 14 1942

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

JAN 15 1942

This Clipping From
VIRGINIA, MINN.
ENTERPRISE

JAN 14 1942

Allows Koussevitzky To Conduct Orchestra

New York—The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society announces that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Philharmonic for two weeks during its centennial celebration without fear of any hitch arising because of the conductor's non-union status.

The society said that James Caesar Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, in a letter, gave Dr. Koussevitzky permission to conduct the Philharmonic, the members of which are unionized, during the two weeks. Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, none of the members of which are in the A. F. of M., will conduct his opening Philharmonic concerts on Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, Jan. 22 and 23.

In his letter, Mr. Petrillo said that he was permitting a non-union conductor to conduct a union orchestra "out of consideration and respect to Mr. Marshall Field (president of the board of directors of the society) and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony," but he added that this was not to be regarded as a precedent.

As president of the A. F. of M., which has jurisdiction over virtually all musicians in the nation, Mr. Petrillo could order union musicians not to play on the same program with non-union men. He had previously refused permission for Dr. Koussevitzky to conduct the Philharmonic, which Dr. Koussevitzky will also conduct on Jan. 25, 29 and 30 and Feb. 1.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.
REPORTER-DISPATCH

APR

Soviet
Fl

Petrillo Forbids Bruno Walter To Conduct Boston Symphony

N.Y. Herald Tribune Jan. 14

Forces Director to Cancel Dates Because Orchestra Players Are Non-Union

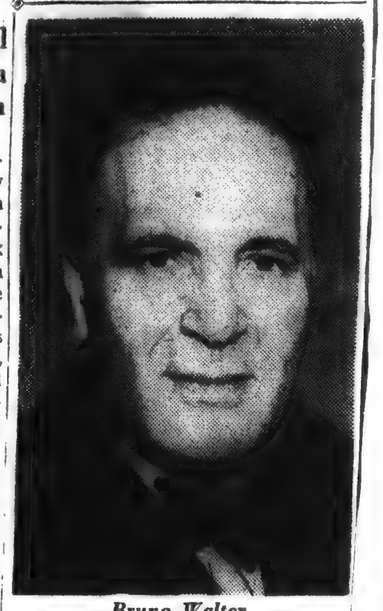
Bruno Walter, opera and symphony conductor, who is an honorary member of the American Federation of Musicians, has been refused permission to conduct a series of six concerts this month with the Boston Symphony Orchestra because the orchestra is not unionized, he disclosed yesterday. The decision was confirmed by James Caesar Petrillo, president of the federation, who said it has long been a policy not to permit union musicians to play with non-union musicians.

Mr. Walter, who has appeared frequently as guest conductor with the orchestras of the Metropolitan Opera and the Philharmonic - Symphony Society, both of which are unionized, signed the contract for the Boston series several months before he became a union member last year, he said. The contract was signed in March, 1941, and he joined the union the following May.

Mr. Walter had agreed to conduct the Boston Symphony in concerts tomorrow at Cambridge, Thursday and Friday at Boston, on Jan. 20 at Providence, R. I., and on Jan. 23 and 24 at Boston. In Boston it was announced that Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, would take Mr. Walter's place.

Mr. Petrillo previously had grantec special permission to Serge Kousse-

(Continued on page 17, column 2)



Bruno Walter

Petrillo Forbids Bruno Walter To Conduct Boston Symphony

Appearance in Orchestra Concerts Is Off Because Players Are Non-Union

(Continued from page one)

vitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, to conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra here for the fortnight beginning Monday because the New York orchestra is celebrating its centennial. The permission was granted, he said, only at the request of Marshall Field, chairman of the society's board of directors. This "special dispensation," however, he said yesterday, did not establish a precedent.

But Mr. Koussevitzky will not be able to fulfill his engagement, and Mr. Walter will conduct the Philharmonic - Symphony next week. Mrs. Koussevitzky died Sunday in Boston and in a telegram received yesterday by Mr. Field, the Boston conductor asked that his engagement be postponed.

Mr. Walter's program at Carnegie Hall for Thursday night, Jan. 22, and Friday afternoon, Jan. 23, will consist of Schubert's fifth symphony and Mahler's second symphony, in C minor. The Westminster Choir will sing the Mahler work with Nadine Connor, soprano, and Mona Paulee, mezzo-soprano, both of the Metropolitan Opera, as the soloists.

Herald Tribune—Acme

James C. Petrillo

Wagner's Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde" and the Mahler symphony will be played on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 25. As previously announced, Fritz Busch will conduct tomorrow night and Friday and Sunday afternoons.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ENDICOTT, N. Y.
DAILY BULLETIN
JAN 14 1942

Union Bars Conductor From Concert

● New York, INS—Bruno Walter, famous opera and symphony orchestra conductor, today was prohibited by order of the American Federation of Musicians from conducting three scheduled concerts of the Boston symphony.

Walter, an honorary member of the musicians revealed the union's action which was confirmed by James C. Petrillo, president. Petrillo said it was the long standing policy of the union not to permit union musicians to play with non-union. The Boston symphony is a non-union organization.

This Clipping From TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
JAN 14 1942

This Clipping From CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN
JAN 15 1942

Walter to N. Y. for Koussevitzky

New York Bureau of The Chicago Sun.

New York, Jan. 14.—Bruno Walter, denied permission to conduct Serge Koussevitzky's non-union Boston Symphony Orchestra, will instead take over Dr. Koussevitzky's three concerts with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra here.

This second shift in conducting engagements, following a renewal of union difficulties with the Boston orchestra, was caused by the death on Sunday of Mrs. Koussevitzky. Yesterday the Boston conductor notified Marshall Field, president of the Philharmonic, that he would be unable to fill his engagements scheduled for next week.

Walter, who was scheduled to conduct several Philharmonic concerts in April, immediately agreed to substitute. Dr. Koussevitzky will take over three of Walter's April engagements.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 16 1942

53

Dictatorship in Music

To the New York Herald Tribune:

May I, through the Herald Tribune, add my name to the list of those who are disturbed to the point of protest over the czarism which seems to be a growing characteristic of the rule of the American Federation of Musicians under Mr. James C. Petrillo?

Granted that Mr. Petrillo has done something for the federation—at a salary most of us would rejoice to have for but one year of our mortal existence—is not the federation pursuing a short-sighted policy in sanctioning such power as can grant a "special dispensation" to a Koussevitzky today or can block the way for a Bruno Walter tomorrow?

These things sound too foreign just now for the field of American music; and the recent action barring Mr. Walter seems the more reprehensible since, as we understand it, he was but to substitute for Mr. Koussevitzky during the latter's bereavement.

GORDON BRICE FEAR.

Goldenbridge, N. Y., Jan. 14, 1942.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 15 1942

Petrillo to Press Drive Upon Boston Symphony

Calls It Only Major Orchestra Not Yet Unionized

James Caesar Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, said yesterday that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the only major orchestra in the country not unionized and that he would continue his efforts to enroll its members in the federation.

So far as he knew, Mr. Petrillo said, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, was the only top-flight conductor not a member of the federation. He said he did not know of any other conductors, "top-flight or low-flight," who were capable of conducting symphony orchestras and were not members of the A. F. of M.

Mr. Petrillo said he would continue to enforce the policy of not permitting union musicians to play with non-union musicians. His latest move in attempting to unionize the Boston Symphony Orchestra was in refusing permission to Bruno Walter to conduct the orchestra in a series of six concerts this month. Mr. Walter is an honorary member of the A. F. of M.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
JAN 15 1942

Petrillo Intensifies Boston Symphony Push

James Caesar Petrillo, head of the American Federation of Musicians, has announced intensification of efforts to unionize the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the only top-flight orchestra in the country outside the AFM.

The union president said he would continue to bar union members from playing with non-union musicians. Most recent case was that of Bruno Walter, who was denied permission to conduct the Boston orchestra.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
JAN 17 1942

Feuermann, 'Cellist, To Appear as Soloist

Emanuel Feuermann, 'cellist, will be the soloist at the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, and Richard Burgin will be the conductor. The concerts will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

The program will open with Vivaldi's Concerto in E minor for String Orchestra as edited by A. Mistovski. Feuermann will appear in the Violincello Concerto of Robert Schumann. Feuermann, celebrated Austrian 'cellist, has made one previous appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He first came to this country in 1934, and has confirmed his high European reputation in many concerts.

A notable new number will be the Symphony in E flat by Paul Hindemith, the first venture of the composer in this form. The Symphony has had its first performance in the present season, and will be heard for the first time in Boston. The closing number will be Smetana's Symphonic Poem Vltava ("The Moldau").

THIS CLIPPING FROM EL DORADO, ARK.
NEWS
JAN 17 1942

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, non-union conductor of the Boston Symphony has been given permission by James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, to conduct the unionized Philharmonic Symphony for a two week's engagement during this, its centennial year. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct six concerts between Jan. 22, and Feb. 1.

New York Times, Sun., Jan. 18 1942

CONCERT AND OPERA

Music to Rub Shoulders With Lecturers, in Newly Arranged Selling Setup

YOU can't complain that symphony conductors have been sticking entirely with the same old stuff this season. There have been so many premières that the theme song for the maestri seems to be "My Time Is First Time." Serge Koussevitzky, for instance, brought to Carnegie Hall Arthur Lourié's second symphony, "Kórmtchaia," which turned out to be pleasant, skillfully colored music. I say "turned out to be," because the official analysis printed in the program book made the symphony sound like a complicated exercise in tough listening. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony gave "Kórmtchaia" superb treatment, which treatment also was applied to symphonies by Haydn and Brahms. It was one of those full, satisfying evenings that you get when the Boston band and its conductor are at their tops.

James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, in explaining that he had given permission to members of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra to play under Serge Koussevitzky as a personal favor to Marshall Field, gave the first direct indication that there have actually been talks between members of the union and trustees of the non-union Boston Symphony Orchestra. "Negotiations have not yet resulted in any agreement between the federation and the trustees," Mr. Petrillo's statement said.

This Clipping From
HANOVER, PA.
SUN
JAN 17 1942

A telegram received by Marshall Field, President of the Board of Directors of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society from Boston states that "due to the sudden death of Madame Koussevitzky and great shock caused by her passing Dr. Koussevitzky is unable to conduct Philharmonic concerts in January and asks that the engagement be postponed."

Accordingly the Society turned to Bruno Walter who, in an effort to help his colleague and the Philharmonic, has agreed to direct the first of the two weeks originally scheduled for Dr. Koussevitzky: i.e., the concerts of January 22, 23 and 25. Mr. Walter's program for all three days will include the Mahler Symphony No. 2 in C minor, for orchestra, soprano and alto solos and mixed chorus. The chorus will be that of the Westminster Choir, Dr. John Finley Williamson, Director. The soloists are two young singers of the Metropolitan Opera, Nadine Connor and Mona Paulee. As previously announced Fritz Busch will be in charge of the orchestra this week. The dates of Dr Koussevitzky's concerts will be announced shortly.

This Clipping From
AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
JAN 18 1942

GETS UNION NOD

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, non-union conductor of the Boston Symphony, has been given permission by James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, to conduct the unionized Philharmonic Symphony for a two weeks' engagement during this, its centennial year. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct six concerts between Jan. 22 and Feb. 1.

Petrillo Forbids Bruno Walter To Conduct Boston Symphony

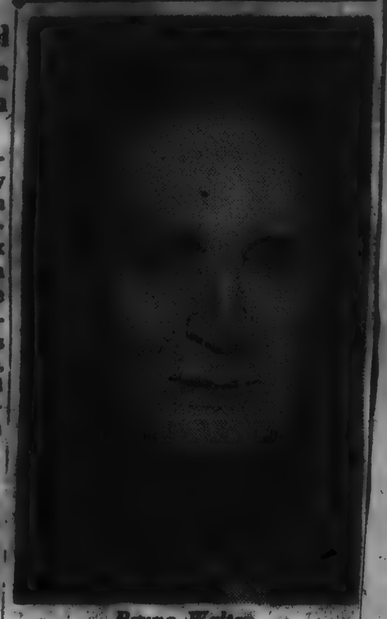
N.Y. Herald Tribune Jan. 14

Forces Director to Cancel Dates Because Orchestra Players Are Non-Union

Bruno Walter, opera and symphony conductor, who is an honorary member of the American Federation of Musicians, has been refused permission to conduct a series of six concerts this month with the Boston Symphony Orchestra because the orchestra is not unionized, he disclosed yesterday. The decision was confirmed by James Caesar Petrillo, president of the federation, who said it has long been a policy not to permit union musicians to play with non-union musicians.

Mr. Walter, who has appeared frequently as guest conductor with the orchestras of the Metropolitan Opera and the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, both of which are unionized, signed the contract for the Boston series several months before he became a union member last year, he said. The contract was signed in March, 1941, and he joined the union the following May.

Mr. Walter had agreed to conduct the Boston Symphony in concerts tomorrow at Cambridge, Thursday and Friday at Boston, on Jan. 20 at Providence, R. I., and on Jan. 23 and 24 at Boston. In Boston it was announced that Richard Burgin concert master and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony would take Mr. Walter's place.



Bruno Walter

Mr. Petrillo previously had granted special permission to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, to conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra here for the fortnight beginning Monday because the New York orchestra is celebrating its centennial. The permission was granted, he said, only at the request of Marshall Field, chairman of the society's board of directors. This "special dispensation," however, he said yesterday, did not establish a precedent.

(Continued on page 17, column 2)

Petrillo Forbids Bruno Walter To Conduct Boston Symphony

Appearance in Orchestra Concerts Is Off Because Players Are Non-Union

(Continued from page one)

But Mr. Koussevitzky will not be able to fulfill his engagement, and Mr. Walter will conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony next week. Mrs. Koussevitzky died Sunday in Boston and in a telegram received yesterday by Mr. Field, the Boston conductor asked that his engagement be postponed.

Mr. Walter's program at Carnegie Hall for Thursday night, Jan. 22, and Friday afternoon, Jan. 23, will consist of Schubert's fifth symphony and Mahler's second symphony, in C minor. The Westminster Choir will sing the Mahler work with Nadine Connor, soprano, and Mona Paulee, mezzo-soprano, both of the Metropolitan Opera, as the soloists.

Herald Tribune—Acme

James C. Petrillo

Wagner's Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde" and the Mahler symphony will be played on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 25. As previously announced, Fritz Busch will conduct tomorrow night and Friday and Sunday afternoons.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ENDICOTT, N. Y.
DAILY BULLETIN
JAN 14 1942

Union Bars Conductor From Concert

● New York, INS—Bruno Walter, famous opera and symphony orchestra conductor, today was prohibited by order of the American Federation of Musicians from conducting three scheduled concerts of the Boston symphony.

Walter, an honorary member of the musicians revealed the union's action which was confirmed by James C. Petrillo, president. Petrillo said it was the long standing policy of the union not to permit union musicians to play with non-union. The Boston symphony is a non-union organization.

This Clipping From TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE
JAN 14 1942

This Clipping From CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN
JAN 15 1942

Walter to N. Y. for Koussevitzky

New York Bureau of The Chicago Sun.

New York, Jan. 14.—Bruno Walter, denied permission to conduct Serge Koussevitzky's non-union Boston Symphony Orchestra, will instead take over Dr. Koussevitzky's three concerts with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra here.

This second shift in conducting engagements, following a renewal of union difficulties with the Boston orchestra, was caused by the death on Sunday of Mrs. Koussevitzky. Yesterday the Boston conductor notified Marshall Field, president of the Philharmonic, that he would be unable to fill his engagements scheduled for next week.

Walter, who was scheduled to conduct several Philharmonic concerts in April, immediately agreed to substitute. Dr. Koussevitzky will take over three of Walter's April engagements.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 16 1942

Dictatorship in Music

To the New York Herald Tribune:

May I, through the Herald Tribune, add my name to the list of those who are disturbed to the point of protest over the czarism which seems to be a growing characteristic of the rule of the American Federation of Musicians under Mr. James C. Petrillo?

Granted that Mr. Petrillo has done something for the federation—at a salary most of us would rejoice to have for but one year of our mortal existence—is not the federation pursuing a short-sighted policy in sanctioning such power as can grant a "special dispensation" to a Koussevitzky today or can block the way for a Bruno Walter tomorrow?

These things sound too foreign just now for the field of American music; and the recent action barring Mr. Walter seems the more reprehensible since, as we understand it, his was but to substitute for Mr. Koussevitzky during the latter's bereavement.

GORDON BRICE FEAR.
Goldenbridge, N. Y., Jan. 14, 1942.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 15 1942

Petrillo to Press Drive Upon Boston Symphony

Calls It Only Major Orchestra Not Yet Unionized

James Caesar Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, said yesterday that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the only major orchestra in the country not unionized and that he would continue his efforts to enroll its members in the federation.

So far as he knew, Mr. Petrillo said, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, was the only top-flight conductor not a member of the federation. He said he did not know of any other conductors, "top-flight or low-flight," who were capable of conducting symphony orchestras and were not members of the A. F. of M.

Mr. Petrillo said he would continue to enforce the policy of not permitting union musicians to play with non-union musicians. His latest move in attempting to unionize the Boston Symphony Orchestra was in refusing permission to Bruno Walter to conduct the orchestra in a series of six concerts this month. Mr. Walter is an honorary member of the A. F. of M.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
JAN 15 1942

Petrillo Intensifies Boston Symphony Push

James Caesar Petrillo, head of the American Federation of Musicians, has announced intensification of efforts to unionize the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the only top-flight orchestra in the country outside the AFM.

The union president said he would continue to bar union members from playing with non-union musicians. Most recent case was that of Bruno Walter, who was denied permission to conduct the Boston orchestra.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
JAN 17 1942

Feuermann, Cellist, To Appear as Soloist

Emanuel Feuermann, 'cellist, will be the soloist at the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, and Richard Burgin will be the conductor. The concerts will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

The program will open with Vivaldi's Concerto in E minor for String Orchestra as edited by A. Mistovski. Feuermann will appear in the Violincello Concerto of Robert Schumann. Feuermann, celebrated Austrian cellist, has made one previous appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He first came to this country in 1934, and has confirmed his high European reputation in many concerts.

A notable new number will be the Symphony in E flat by Paul Hindemith, the first venture of the composer in this form. The Symphony has had its first performance in the present season, and will be heard for the first time in Boston. The closing number will be Smetana's Symphonic Poem Vltava ("The Moldau").

THIS CLIPPING FROM EL DORADO, ARK.
NEWS
JAN 17 1942

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, non-union conductor of the Boston Symphony has been given permission by James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, to conduct the unionized Philharmonic Symphony for a two week's engagement during this, its centennial year. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct six concerts between Jan. 22, and Feb. 1.

New Yorker, N.Y. Jan 17

YOU can't complain that symphony conductors have been sticking entirely with the same old stuff this season. There have been so many premières that the theme song for the maestri seems to be "My Time Is First Time." Serge Koussevitzky, for instance, brought to Carnegie Hall Arthur Lourié's second symphony, "Kórmtchaia," which turned out to be pleasant, skillfully colored music. I say "turned out to be," because the official analysis printed in the program book made the symphony sound like a complicated exercise in tough listening. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony gave "Kórmtchaia" superb treatment, which treatment also was applied to symphonies by Haydn and Brahms. It was one of those full, satisfying evenings that you get when the Boston band and its conductor are at their tops.

CONCERT AND OPERA

N.Y. Times—Sun., Jan 18 1942

Music to Rub Shoulders With Lecturers, in Newly Arranged Selling Setup

James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, in explaining that he had given permission to members of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra to play under Serge Koussevitzky as a personal favor to Marshall Field, gave the first direct indication that there have actually been talks between members of the union and trustees of the non-union Boston Symphony Orchestra. "Negotiations have not yet resulted in any agreement between the federation and the trustees," Mr. Petrillo's statement said.

This Clipping From
HANOVER, PA.
SUN
JAN 17 1942

A telegram received by Marshall Field, President of the Board of Directors of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society from Boston states that "due to the sudden death of Madame Koussevitzky and great shock caused by her passing Dr. Koussevitzky is unable to conduct Philharmonic concerts in January and asks that the engagement be postponed."

Accordingly the Society turned to Bruno Walter who, in an effort to help his colleague and the Philharmonic, has agreed to direct the first of the two weeks originally scheduled for Dr. Koussevitzky: i.e., the concerts of January 22, 23 and 25. Mr. Walter's program for all three days will include the Mahler Symphony No. 2 in C minor, for orchestra, soprano and alto solos and mixed chorus. The chorus will be that of the Westminster Choir, Dr. John Finley Williamson, Director. The soloists are two young singers of the Metropolitan Opera, Nadine Connor and Mona Paulee. As previously announced Fritz Busch will be in charge of the orchestra this week. The dates of Dr Koussevitzky's concerts will be announced shortly.

This Clipping From
AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
JAN 18 1942

GETS UNION NOD

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, non-union conductor of the Boston Symphony, has been given permission by James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, to conduct the unionized Philharmonic Symphony for a two weeks' engagement during this, its centennial year. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct six concerts between Jan. 22 and Feb. 1.

This Clipping From DOVER, OHIO
DAILY REPORTER
JAN 16 1942

This Clipping From
SAN DIEGO, CAL.
TRIBUNE SUN
JAN 15 19[illegible]

This Clipping From
SANTA BARBARA, CALIF.
EVENING NEWS PRESS
JAN 14 19[illegible]

This Clipping From
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CALL BULLETIN
JAN 14 1942

This Clipping From
YPSILANTI, MICH.
PRESS
JAN 14 1942

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
JAN 14 1942

This Clipping From
BAYONNE, N. J.
TIMES
JAN 14 1942

This Clipping From
OAKLAND, CALIF.
POST-INQUIRER
JAN 14 1942

This Clipping From
NEW PHILADELPHIA, O.
TIMES
JAN 14 1942

This Clipping From
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES
JAN 14 1942

This Clipping From CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER
JAN 15 1942

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES
JAN 14 1942

This Clipping From
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JOURNAL EVERY EVENING
JAN 14 1942

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
JAN 14 1942

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
JAN 15 1942

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
HERALD-EXPRESS
JAN 14 1942

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION
JAN 14 1942

This Clipping From
CORPUS CHRISTI, TEXAS
CALLER
JAN. 18, 1942

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
JAN. 18, 1942

This Clipping From
BILLINGS, MONT.
MORNING GAZETTE
JAN 18 1942

This Clipping From
SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
JAN 18 1942

This Clipping From
SAN MATEO, CALIF.
TIMES & NEWS LEADER
JAN 20 1942

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin, able concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, stepped into the breach made when James Caesar Petrillo forbade Bruno Walter to be guest conductor of our non-union orchestra. Mr. Burgin is known for his excellence as conductor, so the enforced change simply necessitated his assumption of the baton and a new choice of program.

No doubt from the Boston Symphony public's point of view, and quite rightly it seems to this reviewer, it is deplorable that purely business affairs should be conducted in a way to affect adversely the artistic mission of a great conductor and a great orchestra. But while Mr. Petrillo's autocratic pronouncement has deprived us of the considerable pleasure of hearing Bruno Walter, it has not deprived us of some good concerts at Symphony Hall this week.

Mr. Burgin began the program, which was performed yesterday afternoon and will be repeated tonight at 8:15, with the andante funebre e doloroso from the E-Flat Minor String Quartet, No. 3, by Tchaikovsky, as a memorial to the late Mme. Koussevitzky. The other numbers were the D Minor Piano Concerto of Brahms, with Claudio Arrau as soloist, and Arnold Schoenberg's orchestral transcription of the G Minor Piano Quartet, Op. 25, by the same composer.

Mr. Arrau is a Chilean musician, just under 38, who made a single appearance with the Boston Symphony in 1924. Thus his present performances do not, as inadvertently stated in last Tuesday's Globe, mark his Boston debut. Mr. Arrau played with as much neatness and precision as were to be observed in the impeccable tailoring of the clothes he wore. He is a Romantic musician, to judge by this performance, but first he is accurate and secondly emotional. The style of his Brahms was admirable. There was warmth and poise and reflection in the slow movement, and he exhibited throughout a fine sense of rhythm.

What one did miss was the emotional upheaval most pianists bring to the first movement, and the bustle usually accorded to the finale. These terms are not intended to belittle his accomplishment but simply to point out that his conception of the Brahms D minor Concerto is gentler than most. Actually, his performance was satisfying, and it made a favorable impression upon the Friday audience, who called him back repeatedly to the stage.

Mr. Burgin introduced the Schoenberg transcription of Brahms' youthful chamber work last January, when it caught just part of the spotlight because it was on a program with two other pieces new to Boston. A second hearing gave this reviewer less pleasure than the first. As he pointed out last season, you have neither pure Brahms nor pure Schoenberg, but a huge and inflated score without individuality.

If you take almost any chamber piece with sufficiently good basic ideas you can build it up into symphonic proportions by means of many wind and string instruments. It will sound impressive enough. But whether you have produced good music is another matter. More than likely you will have spoiled the original, and that is just what Schoenberg appears to have done, no matter that the last movement is gay in Gypsy fashion.

Mr. Burgin's conducting was of its familiar high quality. He will direct again next week, with this program: Vivaldi: Concerto for strings in E minor; Hindemith: Symphony in E-flat (first times in Boston); Schumann: Cello Concerto (Emanuel Feuermann, soloist); Smetana: "The Moldau." C. W. D.

MISS WALTER AT SYMPHONY

Guest Conductor Unable to Appear Here

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Two events of the past week both altered and ordered the course of yesterday afternoon's and this evening's Symphony Concerts. Thanks to the last-minute interference of President Petrillo of the Musicians' Union, the long and eagerly anticipated appearance of Bruno Walter as guest-conductor did not take place, and Richard Burgin conducted in his stead. The latter had planned an all-Brahms programme, the first number of which, the "Academic Festival" Overture, was rendered unsuitable by the death last Sunday of Mme. Koussevitzky. In its place the strings of the orchestra played, as a memorial, the "Andante funebre e doloroso" from Tchaikovsky's String Quartet in E-flat minor, Opus 30, as arranged by Glazounov.

Of Mr. Burgin's Brahms programme two numbers remained, the First Pianoforte Concerto, in which Claudio Arrau was the soloist, and the Quartet for Strings in G minor, Opus 25, as orchestrated, or rather over-orchestrated, by Arnold Schoenberg. In this reviewer's opinion there was quite enough Brahms, as it was.

Born in Chile in 1904, Mr. Arrau toured Europe and South America before he came to us at the age of 20 to play Chopin's F minor Concerto at a pair of Symphony Concerts directed by Pierre Monteux. In the intervening years his reputation has grown and he made a marked impression when he played not long ago in New York.

For a Latin, Mr. Arrau seemed singularly restrained yesterday and some regretted that he did not go at the Brahms more ferociously. In point of fact, his came close to being an ideal performance of this music, one that was thoroughly in accord with its spirit. For fitting comparison one had to go back to that given by Arthur Schnabel at the Symphony Hall Brahms Festival of 1930. The Chilean, no less than the Austrian, displayed a profound understanding of both the composer and his composition, and this deep comprehension was reflected no less in Mr. Burgin's conducting and in the playing of the orchestra. It is gratifying to report that Mr. Arrau created as much of a sensation as though he had torn to tatters some one of the more showy and external pieces for piano and orchestra, let us say the Liszt E-flat or the Tchaikovsky B-flat minor. He was immediately re-engaged yesterday for the concerts of Monday evening, Jan. 26, and Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 27.

The Brahms-Schoenberg concoction also made an enormous hit yesterday and the sound of cheering could be heard amid the general hubub when the final "Rondo alla Zingarese" came to its brilliant close. Mr. Burgin introduced this piece to us just a year ago and this listener must confess that he was less amused by it on a second hearing. Not only is much of Schoenberg's highly elaborate instrumentation unsuitable to the music, it is curiously foreign to that composer's present style. Rather does it hark back to such early efforts in post-Romanticism as his "Gurrelieder" and the tone poem "Pelleas and Melisande."

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 12th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Claudio Arrau, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Tschaikovsky — Andante Funebre e doloroso from String Quartet No. 3 in E flat minor

Brahms.....Piano Concerto No. 1 in D Minor Op. 15

Brahms — Quartet for Piano and Strings in G Minor Op. 25, arranged for orchestra by Arnold Schoenberg

Yesterday's concert appropriately began with a memorial tribute to Mme. Koussevitzky by the playing of the andante from Tchaikovky's 3rd Quartet. Mme. Koussevitzky's influence on music here in Boston was important, though unobtrusively exercised. She had supported and promoted her husband's musical career for so long and had watched over him and his welfare with such indulgent care that she was undoubtedly the silent, but necessary, partner in the team that has so faithfully and zealously guarded Boston's musical culture in the past 18 years. Her loss will be deeply felt not only by those who knew and admired her personally, but also in less obvious fashion, if only they knew it, by the entire musical public of Boston.

The presence yesterday of the excellent Chilean pianist, Claudio Arrau, in no small measure compensated the audience for Mr. Petrillo's cruel and capricious decree against the guest-conductorship of Bruno Walter. Mr. Arrau is now at the height of his powers and has been widely acclaimed for them recently in this country. He chose no easy vehicle with which to win one of the most remarkable ovations from the Friday afternoon public in some time. The Brahms D minor Concerto is by no means as popular as the B flat, yet Mr. Arrau was cheered to the echo for his singularly convincing and dynamic performance. That second adjective should be used with the utmost caution, but it is justified in this instance.

There are those who maintain that the First Concerto is better and more profound than its more cheerful companion. But the first movement of the Second is pretty deep too. And sometimes you catch yourself wondering if the adagio of the First is really so spiritual after all, if there is not a distinct grain of religiosity in it. There comes a time when you want to say, in the manner of Lady Catherine de Bourgh: "You have delighted us long enough. As to the finales of both Concertos it is simply a matter of whether you prefer your fun in the minor or major mode.

Last year Mr. Burgin proved to a majority's satisfaction that the long-felt public need for a new Brahms symphony had been brilliantly solved by Mr. Schoenberg, who some years ago abandoned for a spell the intricacies of the 12-tone system and gave himself up to the fascinating task of making over the G minor Piano Quartet into a symphony. There will doubtless always be a certain body of purist taste, the chamber music die-hards, which will disapprove of Schoenberg's ruthless and daring way with Brahms. And it is highly probable that this sumptuous scoring, in altering the values of the combination of piano and three strings, does spoil the taste for the original version.

On the other hand there is a long tradition of composers' delight in transcription. Bach enjoyed the practice, and he did not have to face the purist criticism encountered by Busoni. Then, too, it is fair to argue that the G minor Quartet is too big in its ideas for its medium of instrumental combination. It seems to us that Schoenberg has justified his work of face-lifting by the success of his version in the concert hall. There is no doubt that Mr. Burgin and the orchestra again achieved a triumph with the new "symphony." It is barely possible that some of us also enjoy it for the rather naughty details of scoring in the finale. Audiences have a way of being so solemn about their Brahms.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Burgin will conduct the following program: Vivaldi's String Concerto in E minor; Hindemith's Symphony in E flat; Schumann's Cello Concerto, with Feuermann as soloist; Smetana's "Vltava."

Claudio Arrau Soloist With Symphony

By L. A. Sloper

Claudio Arrau, distinguished Chilean pianist, was soloist at the twelfth Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony season, given yesterday in Symphony Hall, with Richard Burgin conducting.

In memory of Mme. Koussevitzky, the concert opened with the Andante funebre e doloroso from Tchaikovsky's String Quartet in E flat minor, as transcribed for orchestra by Glazounoff.

Apart from this tribute to the memory of Mme. Koussevitzky, the program had been radically altered because of the last-minute refusal of the head of the American Federation of Musicians to permit Bruno Walter to keep his engagement to direct the concerts of the Boston orchestra this week and next. This engagement had been made before Mr. Walter joined the union last May, and it was announced last fall, but the notice that he was not to be allowed to keep it was received at Symphony Hall only last Monday.

The management was fortunate to be able to obtain the services of Mr. Arrau, who had played with the orchestra in 1924 but had not been heard here since.

Otherwise, the program had to be completed as well as might be, and Mr. Burgin fell back upon the Schönberg transcription of the Brahms Piano Quartet in G minor, which he himself had introduced only a year ago. This gave the program rather too much of chamber music transcriptions, and it provided an anti-climax in the case of the two Brahms numbers; but no doubt it was the best that could be done under very difficult circumstances. Incidentally, Mr. Burgin will also be called upon to conduct the concerts of next week.

The assistant conductor gave a good account of himself yesterday. He is of course a thorough musician and he has by now had a great deal of experience as a conductor. He leads with authority and he has the willing co-operation of the players. He deserved the applause that he received yesterday.

Mr. Arrau was cordially welcomed when he entered, and he received an ovation after his performance in the concerto. (He has already been engaged to play at the next Monday-Tuesday concerts.) He is obviously a musician of penetration and an artist of taste. He had a clear conception of the score and was able to reveal that conception, in co-operation with the orchestra.

Nevertheless, this performance did not attain to the full stature of the music. The pianist's tone might have been more lyric, and his legato more flowing; he had not quite enough power for the first movement, and his rhythms were not quite supple enough for the best results in the Rondo. The slow movement was more Largo than Adagio, and the orchestra tended to lag a little throughout. I cannot but feel that Mr. Arrau's artistic understanding would be more successfully engaged by a musical style for which he had a greater natural sympathy.

This Clipping From SPRINGFIELD, OHIO
NEWS
JAN 18 1942

Conductor Urges Loyalty In Service

Musicians all over the United States have been given a call to loyalty by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In this call, the conductor urges all musicians to serve their country to the utmost, without thought of renumeration. Dr. Koussevitzky has always been keenly aware of the responsibility of the musician to the public at large.

He urges that musicians share the joys and sorrows, toils and achievements, victories and defeats and even sacrifice, involved in the present world conflict. Bring gladness of music to all soldiers in the forts, battle areas and camps, he urges; give the vitalizing beauty of music to all the wounded, sick and disabled soldiers, no matter where they are.

The conductor points out the consoling power of music to lighten sorrows of those who have lost dear ones and says that the sublime joy of music must be accessible to all who need it now especially. This service can be done by musicians individually and collectively and points out that musicians can help to attain the grand immediate object, which is that of victory.

Boston Symphony Revises Its Program Interestingly

Feuermann Will be Soloist in 'Cello Work by Schumann.—Concertmaster Picks up Baton from Union-Banned Walther

THE recast lineup for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday night brings Richard Burgin as conductor instead of Bruno Walter, and the recast program brings Smetana's "Moldau," Brahms's G-minor piano quartet orchestrated by Schoenberg, and Schumann's concerto for 'cello. Emanuel Feuermann will be soloist.

The "Moldau," among the most popular and highly-regarded of symphonic poems, is one of six under the general title of "My Fatherland," describing Bohemia. Its story is of the great river Moldau, of its journey through the woods to the city of Prague, and on its progress to the sea. The music describes scenes along the way—hunters, a rustic wedding, various sprites that inhabit the river and its banks, furious rapids. Memorable melodies are numerous.

The 'cello concerto, which is in A minor and is Schumann's Op. 129, is not particularly well known.

"Terse exposition, short ruminating developments, and interludes all gathered up as quickly as possible to the business of schematic recapitulation; every feature indicates Schumann's growing dislike of anything that could be called display. Still, the work was written before this dislike merged into the morbid condition which ended in fatal illness . . . as a flow of intimate melody the first two movements rank high in his art."

Mr. Feuermann, the soloist, is one of the foremost 'cellists in the world.

Feuermann, soloist with the Boston Symphony

He was a prodigy—a conservatory professor at 16—and he has continued to maintain a leading position among great instrumentalists. Last season he came here as recitalist for the Providence Community Concert Association.

The third piece on the program is a work familiar to most chamber-music fanciers. It was played twice by Frank Sheridan, pianist, and members of the Musical Art Quartet at this season's series in the Museum of the School of Design. The orchestral coloring applied by Schoenberg is generally admired.

BLANK PAGE

This Clipping From
NORWICH, CONN.
RECORD
JAN 12 1942

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR'S WIFE IS DEAD

BROOKLINE, Mass., Jan. 12—(AP)—Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, wife of Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, died late last night in her home here after a long illness. She was 61.

A prominent sculptor in her own right, Mme. Koussevitzky had been failing for more than a year and was unable to attend any of the concerts which her husband conducted here this season.

Mme. Koussevitzky and her husband together became American citizens last year. They had no children.

Funeral services will be held on Wednesday.

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N.Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
ELIZABETH, N. J.
JOURNAL
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
JAN. 12, 1942

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 12 1942

Death Takes Wife Of Koussevitzky

Brookline, Mass. — (AP) — Mme. Natalya Koussevitsky, wife of the Boston Symphony conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, died last night in her home here after a long illness. She was 61.

A prominent sculptor in her own right, Mme. Koussevitsky had been failing for more than a year and was unable to attend any of the concerts which her husband conducted here this season.

Among her best-known sculptored work were the heads of Ann Sibelius, Maurice Ravel and her husband. She was born in Viatka, Northern Russia, and her maiden name was Natalya Ouchkoff.

This Clipping From
PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
HERALD-TIMES
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
DAYTON, O.
NEWS
JAN. 12, 1942

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
WESTERLY, R. I.
SUN
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
JAN 13 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
JAN 12 1942

KOUSSEVITZKY'S WIFE DIES AT 61 IN BROOKLINE

Spouse of Boston Symphony Conductor Was Prominent Sculptor

BROOKLINE, Jan. 12 (AP)—Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, wife of Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, died late last night in her home here after a long illness. She was 61.

Prominent Sculptor

A prominent sculptor in her own right, Mme. Koussevitzky had been failing for more than a year and was unable to attend any of the concerts which her husband conducted this season.

Among her best-known sculptored work were the heads of Jan Siberlius, Maurice Ravel and her husband. She was born in Viatka, Northern Russia, and her maiden name was Natalya Ouchkoff.

Mme. Koussevitzky was a wealthy girl of 21 when she first met Koussevitzky, a promising young double bass fiddler, in Moscow in 1901. They were married in 1905 and their salon in Moscow soon became an intellectual center. She helped organize his concerts and was an active partner in his musical publishing house in Moscow.

During his concerts in Boston, she became a familiar figure to patrons who, until this year always, saw her in the same first balcony seat in Symphony Hall, well up front, near the stage.

Became U. S. Citizens

Mme. Koussevitzky and her husband together became American citizens last year. They had no children.

Funeral services will be held Wednesday.

Officials at Symphony Hall said that they did not know what Dr. Koussevitzky would do about scheduled appearances as guest conductor with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. He was taking his annual midwinter vacation this week and was to have appeared with the New York orchestra for two weeks after that.

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JAN 14 1942

NATALYA KOUSSEVITZKY

Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, 61, prominent sculptress, wife of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Brookline, Mass., Jan. 11.

Mme. Koussevitzky, Russian-born, who, together with her husband became an American citizen last year, helped organize Koussevitzky's concerts and was an active partner in his music publishing firm in Moscow. The composer-conductor is the lone immediate survivor. They had no children.

This Clipping From
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE
JAN 12 1942

DEATH TAKES WIFE OF SYMPHONY LEADER

Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky Ill for Long Period of Time

Boston, Jan. 12—(INS)—Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, 61, wife of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, died last night at her home in Brookline, it was disclosed today at Symphony Hall.

Mrs. Koussevitsky, ill for more than a year, became almost as famous as her husband for her work as a sculptress. Until her illness, she constantly aided her husband in preparing his concert tours.

Born in Viatka, North Russia, she spent her childhood in Moscow and later attended the University of Sorbonne, Paris. She was the former Natalya Ouchkoff.

After she married Koussevitsky she helped fullfill his life ambition by helping him organize a symphony orchestra. Until his marriage the famous conductor of the Boston orchestra played a bass viola in various Russian music halls.

The two came to the United States in 1924 when Koussevitsky began conducting the Boston Symphony. Funeral services will be held Wednesday.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
SANTA BARBARA, CALIF.
EVENING NEWS PRESS
JAN 12 1942

Wife Of Symphony Conductor Dies

BROOKLINE, Mass., Jan. 12 (AP)—Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, wife of Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, died late Sunday night in her home here after a long illness. She was 61.

A prominent sculptor in her own right, Mme. Koussevitzky had been failing for more than a year and was unable to attend any of the concerts which her husband conducted here this season.

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
JAN. 12, 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL
JAN. 12, 1942

This Clipping From
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
STAMFORD, CONN.
ADVOCATE
Jan. 12, 1942

This Clipping From
LYNN, MASS.
ITEM
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
JAN 14 1942

This Clipping From
HOLLYWOOD, CALIF.
CITIZEN NEWS
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
KINGSTON, N. Y.
FREEMAN
JAN 12 1942

Mme. Koussevitzky Dead

Brookline, Mass., Jan. 12 (AP)—Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, 61, wife of Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, died late last night in her home here after a long illness. A prominent sculptor in her own right, Mme. Koussevitzky had been failing for more than a year. Among her best-known sculptured work were the heads of Jan Siberlius, Maurice Ravel and her husband. She was born in Viatka, northern Russia, and her maiden name was Natalya Ouchkoff. Mme. Koussevitzky was a wealthy girl of 21 when she first met Koussevitzky, a promising young double bass fiddler, in Moscow in 1901.

This Clipping From BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
JAN 13 1942

Natalya Koussevitzky, Wife Of Boston Conductor, Dies

Special to the BUFFALO EVENING NEWS.

BROOKLINE, Mass., Jan. 13.—Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, wife of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, herself a sculptor, died at her home here Sunday night. She was 61 years old.

Mme. Koussevitzky's health had been poor for more than a year. Funeral services will be held Wednesday.

As a sculptor, Mme. Koussevitzky was best known for her heads of her husband and of Jean Sibelius, Finnish composer, and Maurice Ravel, French composer.

She was born Natalya Ouchkoff in Viatka, northern Russia, and attended Moscow University. She met Dr. Koussevitzky, then a noted double bass player, in Moscow in 1901 and they were married in 1905.

This Clipping From
N. ATTLEBORO, MASS.
EVE. CHRONICLE
JAN 12 1942

MRS. KOUSSEVITSKY DEAD IN BROOKLINE

BOSTON (INS)—Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, 61, wife of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, died last night at her home in Brookline, it was disclosed today.

Mrs. Koussevitsky, ill for more than a yea her hu
tress.

This Clipping From
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
NEW YORKER
JAN 12 1942

Wife of Noted Conductor Dies

Mme. Koussevitzky Sculptor, Succumbs

BROOKLINE, MASS. — (AP) — Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, 61, wife of Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitzky, died late last night in her home here after a long illness.

A prominent sculptor in her own right, Mme Koussevitzky had been failing for more than a year.

Among her best-known sculptored work were the heads of Jan Sibelius, Maurice Ravel and her husband. She was born in Viatka, northern Russia, and her maiden name was Natalya Ouchkoff.

Mme. Koussevitzky was a wealthy girl of 21 when she first met Koussevitzky, a promising young double bass fiddler, in Moscow in 1901.

They were married in 1905 and their salon in Moscow soon became an intellectual center. She helped organize his concerts and was an active partner in his musical publishing house in Moscow.

Mme. Koussevitzky and her husband together became American citizens last year. They had no children.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
JAN 12 1942

ORCHESTRA LEADER'S WIFE

BROOKLINE, Jan. 12 (UP)—Mrs. Natalya Koussevitzky, 61, wife of Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at her home here last night after a long illness.

Born in Viatka, Russia, she was educated at Moscow University and married Koussevitzky in 1905 when he was known as a viol virtuoso.

She helped him organize concerts, including a famous Volga River trip which brought symphonic music to places where it had not been heard before. Their Moscow house was noted as a musical and intellectual center.

There were also partners in the musical publishing house "Editions Russes de Musique."

On April 16, 1941, she and her husband became United States citizens.

This Clipping From
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
JAN. 12, 1942

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
JAN. 12, 1942

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
NORWICH, CONN.
RECORD
JAN 12 1942

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR'S WIFE IS DEAD

BROOKLINE, Mass., Jan. 12—(AP)—Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, wife of Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, died late last night in her home here after a long illness. She was 61.

A prominent sculptor in her own right, Mme. Koussevitzky had been failing for more than a year and was unable to attend any of the concerts which her husband conducted here this season.

Mme. Koussevitzky and her husband together became American citizens last year. They had no children.

Funeral services will be held on Wednesday.

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N.Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
ELIZABETH, N. J.
JOURNAL
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
JAN. 12, 1942

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 12 1942

Death Takes Wife Of Koussevitzky

Brookline, Mass. — (AP) — Mme. Natalya Koussevitsky, wife of the Boston Symphony conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, died last night in her home here after a long illness. She was 61.

A prominent sculptor in her own right, Mme. Koussevitsky had been failing for more than a year and was unable to attend any of the concerts which her husband conducted here this season.

Among her best-known sculptored work were the heads of Ann Sibelius, Maurice Ravel and her husband. She was born in Viatka, Northern Russia, and her maiden name was Natalya Ouchkoff.

This Clipping From
PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
HERALD-TIMES
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
DAYTON, O.
NEWS
JAN. 12, 1942

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
WESTERLY, R. I.
SUN
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
JAN 13 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
JAN 12 1942

KOUSSEVITZKY'S WIFE DIES AT 61 IN BROOKLINE

Spouse of Boston Symphony Conductor Was Prominent Sculptor

BROOKLINE, Jan. 12 (AP)—Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, wife of Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, died late last night in her home here after a long illness. She was 61.

Prominent Sculptor

A prominent sculptor in her own right, Mme. Koussevitzky had been failing for more than a year and was unable to attend any of the concerts which her husband conducted this season.

Among her best-known sculptored work were the heads of Jan Siberlius, Maurice Ravel and her husband. She was born in Viatka, Northern Russia, and her maiden name was Natalya Ouchkoff.

Mme. Koussevitzky was a wealthy girl of 21 when she first met Koussevitzky, a promising young double bass fiddler, in Moscow in 1901. They were married in 1905 and their salon in Moscow soon became an intellectual center. She helped organize his concerts and was an active partner in his musical publishing house in Moscow.

During his concerts in Boston, she became a familiar figure to patrons who, until this year always, saw her in the same first balcony seat in Symphony Hall, well up front, near the stage.

Became U. S. Citizens

Mme. Koussevitzky and her husband together became American citizens last year. They had no children.

Funeral services will be held Wednesday.

Officials at Symphony Hall said that they did not know what Dr. Koussevitzky would do about scheduled appearances as guest conductor with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. He was taking his annual midwinter vacation this week and was to have appeared with the New York orchestra for two weeks after that.

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR
JAN 13 19[illegible]

This Clipping From VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JAN 14 1942

NATALYA KOUSSEVITZKY

Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, 61, prominent sculptress, wife of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Brookline, Mass., Jan. 11.

Mme. Koussevitzky, Russian-born, who, together with her husband became an American citizen last year, helped organize Koussevitzky's concerts and was an active partner in his music publishing firm in Moscow. The composer-conductor is the lone immediate survivor. They had no children.

This Clipping From
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE
JAN 12 1942

DEATH TAKES WIFE OF SYMPHONY LEADER

Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky Ill for Long Period of Time

Boston, Jan. 12—(INS)—Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, 61, wife of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, died last night at her home in Brookline, it was disclosed today at Symphony Hall.

Mrs. Koussevitsky, ill for more than a year, became almost as famous as her husband for her work as a sculptress. Until her illness, she constantly aided her husband in preparing his concert tours.

Born in Viatka, North Russia, she spent her childhood in Moscow and later attended the University of Sorbonne, Paris. She was the former Natalya Ouchkoff.

After she married Koussevitsky she helped fullfill his life ambition by helping him organize a symphony orchestra. Until his marriage the famous conductor of the Boston orchestra played a bass viola in various Russian music halls.

The two came to the United States in 1924 when Koussevitsky began conducting the Boston Symphony. Funeral services will be held Wednesday.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
SANTA BARBARA, CALIF.
EVENING NEWS PRESS
JAN 12 1942

Wife Of Symphony Conductor Dies

BROOKLINE, Mass., Jan. 12 (AP)—Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, wife of Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, died late Sunday night in her home here after a long illness. She was 61.

A prominent sculptor in her own right, Mme. Koussevitzky had been failing for more than a year and was unable to attend any of the concerts which her husband conducted here this season.

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
JAN. 12, 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL
JAN. 12, 1942

This Clipping From
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
STAMFORD, CONN.
ADVOCATE
Jan. 12, 1942

This Clipping From
LYNN, MASS.
ITEM
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
JAN 14 1942

This Clipping From
HOLLYWOOD, CALIF.
CITIZEN NEWS
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
KINGSTON, N. Y.
FREEMAN
JAN 12 1942

Mme. Koussevitzky Dead

Brookline, Mass., Jan. 12 (AP)—Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, 61, wife of Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, died late last night in her home here after a long illness. A prominent sculptor in her own right, Mme. Koussevitzky had been failing for more than a year. Among her best-known sculptured work were the heads of Jan Siberlius, Maurice Ravel and her husband. She was born in Viatka, northern Russia, and her maiden name was Natalya Ouchkoff. Mme. Koussevitzky was a wealthy girl of 21 when she first met Koussevitzky, a promising young double bass fiddler. in Moscow in 1901.

This Clipping From BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
JAN 13 1942

Natalya Koussevitzky, Wife Of Boston Conductor, Dies

Special to the BUFFALO EVENING NEWS.

BROOKLINE, Mass., Jan. 13.—Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, wife of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, herself a sculptor, died at her home here Sunday night. She was 61 years old.

Mme. Koussevitzky's health had been poor for more than a year. Funeral services will be held Wednesday.

As a sculptor, Mme. Koussevitzky was best known for her heads of her husband and of Jean Sibelius, Finnish composer, and Maurice Ravel, French composer.

She was born Natalya Ouchkoff in Viatka, northern Russia, and attended Moscow University. She met Dr. Koussevitzky, then a noted double bass player, in Moscow in 1901 and they were married in 1905.

This Clipping From
N. ATTLEBORO, MASS.
EVE. CHRONICLE
JAN 12 1942

MRS. KOUSSEVITSKY DEAD IN BROOKLINE

BOSTON (INS)—Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, 61, wife of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, died last night at her home in Brookline, it was disclosed today.

Mrs. Koussevitsky, ill for more than a year, became almost as famous as her husband for her work as a sculptress.

W... Con... Dies

Mme. Koussevitzky Sculptor, Succumbs

BROOKLINE, MASS. — (AP) — Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, 61, wife of Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitzky, died late last night in her home here after a long illness.

A prominent sculptor in her own right, Mme Koussevitzky had been failing for more than a year.

Among her best-known sculptored work were the heads of Jan Sibelius, Maurice Ravel and her husband. She was born in Viatka, northern Russia, and her maiden name was Natalya Ouchkoff.

Mme. Koussevitzky was a wealthy girl of 21 when she first met Koussevitzky, a promising young double bass fiddler, in Moscow in 1901.

They were married in 1905 and their salon in Moscow soon became an intellectual center. She helped organize his concerts and was an active partner in his musical publishing house in Moscow.

Mme. Koussevitzky and her husband together became American citizens last year. They had no children.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
JAN 12 1942

ORCHESTRA LEADER'S WIFE

BROOKLINE, Jan. 12 (UP)—Mrs. Natalya Koussevitzky, 61, wife of Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at her home here last night after a long illness.

Born in Viatka, Russia, she was educated at Moscow University and married Koussevitzky in 1905 when he was known as a viol virtuoso.

She helped him organize concerts, including a famous Volga River trip which brought symphonic music to places where it had not been heard before. Their Moscow house was noted as a musical and intellectual center.

There were also partners in the musical publishing house "Editions Russes de Musique."

On April 16, 1941, she and her husband became United States citizens.

This Clipping From
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
JAN. 12, 1942

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
JAN. 12, 1942

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 13 1942

Mme. Koussevitzky, Sculptor And Wife of Conductor, Dies

Helped Husband Organize Russian Tours and Run Music Publishing House

Special to the Herald Tribune

BROOKLINE, Mass., Jan. 12.—Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, wife of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, herself a sculptor, died at her home here last night. She was sixty-one years old.

Mme. Koussevitzky's health had been poor for more than a year and she was unable to attend any of the concerts which her husband conducted in Boston this season. The funeral services will be held on Wednesday.

Officials at Symphony Hall said they did not know whether her death would affect Dr. Koussevitzky's plans to appear as guest conductor with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society during its centennial celebration. Dr. Koussevitzky, who was taking his annual mid-winter vacation this week, is scheduled to conduct in New York on Jan. 22, 23, 25, 29 and 30 and on Feb. 1.

As a sculptor Mme. Koussevitzky was best known for her heads of her husband and of Jean Sibelius, Finnish composer, and Maurice Ravel, French composer.

She was born Natalya Ouchkoff in Viatka, in northern Russia, and attended Moscow University. She met Dr. Koussevitzky, then a noted double bass player, in Moscow in 1901 and they were married in 1905. Their Moscow home became known as a meeting place for musicians.

Mme. Koussevitzky helped her husband organize his concerts and plan a trip down the Volga River which took fine music into parts of Russia where it never before had been heard. With him she also organized and operated a music publishing house, Editions Russe de Musique, in Moscow. Dr. Koussevitzky left Russia in 1920 because of his bitterness toward the Bolshevist regime and accepted the conductorship of the Boston orchestra in 1924.

During his Boston concerts Mme. Koussevitzky became a familiar sight to patrons, almost always occupying the same first-balcony seat in Symphony Hall. She and her husband became American citizens last April 16.

They had no children.

Herald Tribune—Acme
Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 13 1942

MME. KOUSSEVITZKY DEAD IN BROOKLINE

Boston Conductor's Wife Made Her Own Name as a Sculptor

Brookline, Mass., Jan. 12.—Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, wife of Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitzky, died late last night in her home here after a long illness. She was 61.

A prominent sculptor, Mme. Koussevitzky had been failing for more than a year and was unable to attend any of the concerts which her husband conducted here this season.

Among her best-known scupltored work were the heads of Jan Sibelius, Maurice Ravel and her husband. She was born in Viatka, northern Russia, and her maiden name was Natalya Ouchkoff.

Mme. Koussevitzky was a wealthy girl of 21 when she first met Koussevitzky, a promising young double bass fiddler, in Moscow in 1901. They were married in 1905 and their salon in Moscow soon became an intellectual centre. She helped organize his concerts and was an active partner in his musical publishing house in Moscow.

During his concerts in Boston, she became a familiar figure to patrons who, until this year, always saw her in the same first balcony seat in Symphony Hall, well up front, near the stage.

Mme. Koussevitzky and her husband together became American citizens last year. They had no children.

Funeral services will be held Wednesday.

Officials at Symphony Hall said they did not know what Dr. Koussevitzky would do about scheduled appearances as guest conductor with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. He was taking his annual mid-winter vacation this week and was to have appeared with the New York orchestra for two weeks after that.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
JAN. 13, 1942

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
JAN 13 1942

MRS KOUSSEVITZKY DIES AT BROOKLINE

Wife of Boston Symphony Conductor Assisted Him in Planning Concerts — Was Prominent Sculptor

Brookline, Jan. 12 — (AP) — Mrs Natalya Koussevitzky, wife of Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, died late last night at her home here after a long illness. She was 61.

A prominent sculptor in her own right, Mrs Koussevitzky had been failing for more than a year and was unable to attend any of the concerts which her husband conducted this season.

Among her best-known sculptored work were the heads of Jan Sibelius, Maurice Ravel and her husband. She was born in Vitaka, Northern Russia, and her maiden name was Natalya Ouchkoff.

Mrs Koussevitzky was a wealthy girl of 21 when she first met Koussevitzky, a promising young double bass fiddler, in Moscow in 1901. They were married in 1905 and their salon in Moscow soon became an intellectual center. She helped organize his concerts and was an active partner in his musical publishing house in Moscow.

During his concerts in Boston, she became a familiar figure to patrons who, until this year always, saw her in the same first balcony seat in Symphony hall, well up front, near the stage.

Mrs Koussevitzky and her husband together became American citizens last year. They had no children. Funeral services will be held Wednesday.

Officials at Symphony hall said that they did not know what Dr Koussevitzky would do about scheduled appearances as guest conductor with the New York Philharmonic Symphony orchestra. He was taking his annual midwinter vacation this week and was to have appeared with the New York orchestra for two weeks after that.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR
JAN 12 1942

Koussevitzky's Wife Dies

Boston Traveler Jan 12

Was Well-Known As Sculptor

Natalya Koussevitzky, 61, wife of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at her home here last night after a long illness.

WELL-KNOWN SCULPTOR

She was a well-known sculptor in her own right, and in that line of art she made heads of such famous composers as Jan Sibelius, composer of "Finlandia," and Maurice Ravel, best known for his "Bolero."

Born in Viatka, Pussia, she attended Moscow University and met Koussevitzky in that city in 1901, when he was known as a viol virtuoso.

They were married in 1905, and their Moscow home became noted as a musical and intellectual center. Mme. Koussevitzky helped her husband organize his concerts and arranged with him for a famous Volga river trip that brought symphonic music to parts of Russia, where it had never before been heard.

Together they organized and operated a musical publishing house, "Editions Russe de Musique," in Moscow.

FAMILIAR SYMPHONY FIGURE

During Koussevitzky's concerts in Boston, Mme. Koussevitzky became a familiar figure to patrons who could almost always see her occupying the same first balcony seat in Symphony Hall, watching her husband conduct.

Mme. Koussevitzky and her husband became American citizens together on April 16 last year. They had no children.

Funeral services will be held Wednesday.

Symphony officials said they did not know what Dr. Koussevitzky would do about scheduled appearances as guest conductor with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. Koussevitzy was taking his annual midwinter vacation this week and was to have appeared with the New York orchestra for two weeks after that.

MME. NATALYA KOUSSEVITZKY

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
JAN 12 1942

Haverhill Mass. Gazette
Portland, Maine Express
New Britain, Conn. Herald
Lewiston, Maine Journal

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 13 1942

MRS. KOUSSEVITZKY DIES IN BROOKLINE

Wed to Leader of the Boston Symphony in Moscow in 1905 —Is Stricken at 61

WELL-KNOWN SCULPTOR

She Did Portraits of Sibelius, Ravel and Her Husband— Became Citizen Last Year

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Jan. 12—Mrs. Natalya Koussevitzky, wife of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died last night at her home in Brookline, at the age of 61, after a long illness.

The daughter of a wealthy Russian family, she was married to Dr. Koussevitzky in 1905 after a romance that began when the musician saw her in the first row at a recital he was giving in Moscow.

She was well known as a sculptor and among her works were the heads of Jan Sibelius, Maurice Ravel, and her husband. She was born in Viatka, Northern Russia.

Made Tour Down the Volga

Together they financed an orchestra and the youthful conductor gave a series of concerts in Moscow and St. Petersburg with great success. A ferryboat later was hired by the couple and with the orchestra, a 2,300 mile concert tour was made on the Volga River.

By 1910, Koussevitzky was the most widely known maestro in Czarist Russia and their Moscow home had become the musical center of the capital. It was through the famous Volga River concerts that symphonic music was brought to some parts of Russia for the first time.

She aided her husband in the organization of a publishing house, Editions Russe de Musique, in Moscow, for music by contemporary Slavic composers.

Not at Concerts for Year

In Boston, she had become a familiar figure at the Symphony Hall concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which she always heard from the same first balcony seat. For more than a year, however, she had not attended the concerts because of illness.

She and her husband together became naturalized citizens of the United States here April 16, 1941. The conductor and his wife made their home at 88 Druce Street, Brookline.

Officials at Symphony Hall would not say whether Dr. Koussevitzky would make his scheduled appearance as guest conductor with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. The conductor was on his annual mid-Winter vacation and was to have appeared with the New York Orchestra for two weeks after his return.

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
JAN 12 1942

Death Takes Wife of Serge Koussevitzky

Member of Old Russian Family Had Been Ill Long

Mme. Natalya Ouchkoff Koussevitzky, 61, wife of Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, died at 11 last night at her home in Brookline after a lingering illness. Services will be Wednesday.

Because of ill health, Mme. Koussevitzky had been unable to attend any of the orchestra's concerts this season although she had attended performances at Tanglewood last summer.

Mme. Koussevitzky, who met the conductor in Moscow in 1901, when he was a promising bull fiddler, had always been keenly interested in his career. They were married in 1905. It was she who inspired the historic trips up and down the Volga River when great music was brought to the masses in the hinterland and it was she who inspired him in his dream of a great world music center which she saw come to fulfillment at Tanglewood. She was especially fond of their home in Lenox acquired two years ago and during her long illness said she always seemed to gain strength when she was able to return. She became an American citizen last year.

Mme. Koussevitzky, member of a prominent Russian family of tremendous wealth before the revolution, was a talented sculptor.

Among her best known works were heads of Jan Sibelius, Maurice Ravel and her husband. She was born in Viatko, northern Russia.

She attended school at Moscow and the University of Moscow and the Sorbonne in Paris where she made a special study of the social sciences. She was a partner with her husband in Editions Russes de Musique.

Condolences poured into Dr. Koussevitzky's home from all over the country. The following message was received from the trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, signed by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president, and George W. Edman, clerk:

"The board of trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival extend to you their deepest sympathy in your great loss which is shared by each member of the board. Madame Koussevitzky always showed real understanding, friendship and great interest in our mutual efforts and we will feel her loss keenly."

The only near survivors are Dr. Koussevitzky and a niece, Miss Olga Naumoff, who was a constant attendant and who for several years has managed the Koussevitzky household.

Dr. Koussevitzky had returned to Boston before the end came. He conducted the orchestra Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, New York and is scheduled to return there Jan. 22 to conduct the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society in one of its anniversary concerts.

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD JOURNAL
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
JAN 12 1942

Koussevitzky's Wife Dies at 61

BROOKLINE, Mass., Jan. 12.—(AP.)—Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, 61, wife of Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, died late last night in her home here after a long illness. She was a prominent sculptor.

58

MME. NATALIE KOUSSEVITZKY

Koussevitzky's Wife Is Dead

Boston Traveler
Jan 13,

Symphony to Play At Funeral Tomorrow

Funeral services for Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, wife of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be held at noon tomorrow at the Church of The Advent.

Mme. Koussevitzky died Sunday night at the age of 61 after a long illness. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which her husband had conducted since 1924, will play at the funeral and trustees will be honorary pallbearers. Selections will be sung by a choir of the Russian Orthodox Church of Boston.

BORN IN RUSSIA

The daughter of wealthy Russian parents, she was born in Viatka, Russia, and was married to Dr. Koussevitzky in 1905 after a romance that began when the musician observed her in the first row at a recital he was giving in Moscow.

As a young girl she went to Paris to make a special study of social science and philosophy in the Sorbonne under Mixim Kovalevsky. She attended Moscow University and was 21 when she first met Koussevitsky, then known as a virtuoso of the double bass.

She was well-known as a sculptress and among her works were heads of Jan Sibelius, Maurice Ravel and her husband. Much of her work in this field has been exhibited at Symphony Hall.

Together they had financed an orchestra and the youthful conductor gave a series of concerts in Moscow and St. Petersburg with great success. The couple hired a ferryboat and with the orchestra made a 2300-mile concert tour on the Volga river.

By 1910 Koussevitzky was the most widely known maestro in Tsarist Russia, and their Moscow home had become the musical center of the capital. It was through the famous Volga river concerts that symphonic music was brought to parts of Russia for the first time.

She aided her husband in the organization of a publishing house, Russian Musical Edition, in Moscow for the music of contemporary Slavic composers. Through this enterprise, which returned all profit to the composers, several compositions of Alexander Scriabin, Igor Stravinsky and Serge Prokofieff were published.

In Boston, she had become a familiar figure at the Symphony Hall concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which she always heard from the same first balcony. For more than a year, however, she has not attended the concerts because of illness.

She and her husband together became naturalized citizens of the United States in Boston, April 16, last year. They made their home at 88 Druce street, Brookline.

Officials at Symphony Hall announced that Dr. Koussevitzky would not make his scheduled appearance as guest conductor with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky was on his annual mid-winter vacation and was to have appeared with the New York orchestra for two weeks after his return.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
JAN 15 1942

Many Attend Last Rites

Funeral Services for Mrs. Koussevitzky Held in Boston

BOSTON—Funeral services for Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, wife of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were held at noon yesterday at the Church of the Advent on Mount Vernon Street.

Rev. Samuel Whitney Hale, rector, officiated at the services, which were attended by hundreds of friends and music lovers, to whom Mrs. Koussevitzky was a familiar figure at the Symphony Hall concerts for many years. The stringed ensemble of the Bosston Symphony Orchestra played the chorale by Abert, and Kyrie of Palestrina, while selections were sung by a choir of the Russian Orthodox Church of Boston.

Very Rev. Theo Chepeleff, pastor of the Holy Trinity Russian Church of Boston, assisted Mr. Hale. Much of the service followed the ritual of the Russian Orthodox Church.

Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra served as honorary bearers. They included Henry B. Cabot, Ernest B. Dane, Reginald C. Foster, Alvan T. Fuller, Jerome D. Greene, N. Penrose Hallowell, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Roger I. Lee, Richard C. Paine, Henry B. Sawyer and Bentley W. Warren.

Representing the Berkshire Symphonic Festival were Mrs. Andrew Hepburn of Concord and George W. Edman of Pittsfield.

Ushers were Russell Codman Jr., Carl Dreyfus, Arthur Davis, Dr. Wallace Goodrich, Prof. Edward Bulingame Hill, George E. Judd, Prince Toumanoff, Prof. Samuel E. Morison, Nicolas Berezowski, William James and J. Lovell Little.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
JAN 13 1942

Mme. Koussevitzky Dies

BOSTON, Jan. 12 (AP)—Boston symphony Orchestra trustees will be honorary pallbearers at funeral services for Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, wife of the conductor, Wednesday at the Church of the Advent.

Born Natalya Ouchkoff in Viatka, Russia, Mrs. Koussevitzky died at her Brookline home Sunday after being in failing health for more than a year. She was 61.

This Clipping From
KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL
JAN 15 1942

OFFICIATES AT FUNERAL

Rev. S. Whitney Hale, formerly of Keene and Marlboro, now rector of the Church of the Advent, Boston, officiated at the funeral of Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, wife of the Boston Symphony orchestra leader, Wednesday noon, in his church.

Mme. Koussevitzky, an accomplished sculptor and member of a noted Russian family, died Sunday night at her home, 88 Druce street, Brookline. She was 61 and had been ill for almost a year.

She was born Natalya Ouchkoff in Viatka, northern Russia, and met Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in Moscow in 1901. They were married four years later, and set up a salon which was one of Moscow's leading art and intellectual centers. Besides aiding her husband in organizing concerts, she was an active partner in his Moscow music publishing house.

The Koussevitzkys came to America about 20 years ago and both became naturalized citizens last year.

Mme. Koussevitzky executed many well known pieces of sculpture, including heads of her husband, Jan Sieblius and Maurice Ravel.

Dr. Koussevitzky is on his mid-winter vacation, but is scheduled to begin a two-weeks' engagement as guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra next week. It is not known whether he will go through with this engagement.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 15 1942

Mme. Koussevitzky's Rites

Service in Boston for Wife of Symphony Orchestra Conductor

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, Jan. 14.—Funeral services for Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, wife of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were held at noon today at the Church of the Advent on Mount Vernon Street. Mrs. Koussevitzky, who was sixty-one years old, died Sunday at her home in Brookline.

The Rev. Samuel Whitney Hale, rector, officiated at the services, which were attended by hundreds of friends. The stringed ensemble of the orchestra played the chorale by Abert and the "Kyrie" of Palestrina, while selections were sung by a choir of the Russian Orthodox Church of Boston. Trustees of the orchestra were honorary pallbearers. They included Henry B. Cabot, Ernest B. Dane, Reginald C. Foster, Alvan T. Fuller, Jerome D. Greene, N. Penrose Hallowell, M. A. Dewolfe Howe, Roger I. Lee, Richard C. Paine, Henry B. Sawyer and Bentley W. Warren.

Mme. Koussevitzky's Funeral Tomorrow at Church of Advent

Boston Globe
Jan 13

The funeral of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, wife of the Boston Symphony Orchestra director, will be held tomorrow, with Rev. S. Whitney Hale, rector, officiating at a service in the Church of the Advent, Boston, at noon.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the honorary pallbearers. Russell Codman will be the chief usher. There will be special music under the direction of Richard Burgin.

Mme. Koussevitzky, an accomplished sculptor and member of a noted Russian family, died Sunday night at her home, 88 Druce st., Brookline. She was 61 and had been ill for almost a year.

She was born Natalie Ouchkoff in Viatka, northern Russia, and met Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in Moscow in 1901. They were married four years later, and set up a salon which was one of Moscow's leading art and intellectual centers. Besides aiding her husband in organizing concerts, she was an active partner in his Moscow music publishing house.

The Koussevitzkys came to America about 20 years ago and both became naturalized citizens last year.

Mme. Koussevitzky executed many well known pieces of sculpture, including heads of her husband, Jan Sibelius and Maurice Ravel.

Dr. Koussevitzky is on his mid-Winter vacation, but is scheduled to begin a two-weeks' engagement as guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra next week. It is not known whether he will go through with this engagement.

This Clipping From
GADSDEN, ALA.
TIMES
JAN. 13, 1942

This Clipping From
CONCORD, N. H.
MONITOR & N. H. PATRIOT
JAN. 12, 1942

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
JAN 14 1942

Symphony Plays at Rites For Koussevitzky's Wife

BOSTON, Jan. 14 (UP)—A group of 30 musicians from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, nominally led by Serge Koussevitzky, played today at funeral services for his wife, Natalie, 61, noted sculptor, in the Church of the Advent.

Services for Mrs. Koussevitzky, who died Sunday at her Brookline home after a year's illness, were conducted by Rev. Whitney Hale, rector of the church, and Rev. Theodore Chepeleff of the Rusisan Orthodox Church.

The musicians were directed by Concertmaster Richard Burgin. Honorary pallbearers were headed by Ernest B. Dane, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and former Gov. Alvan T. Fuller. The body was to be cremated at Forest Hill Cemetery.

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN & CITIZEN-LEADER
JAN 16 1942

Sadly Missed

All who have known Madame Koussevitzky will regret her death and will sympathize with her husband in his great bereavement. She has shared his musical career from the early days in the Moscow of a happier era, and in addition was a skilled and gifted sculptress. Those who have enjoyed her hospitality in Boston or during the summer in the Berkshires know what a gracious hostess she has been. In the first balcony of Symphony hall when Dr. Koussevitzky was conducting, she was a familiar figure. It was fitting that at the funeral services in the Church of the Advent, there was music by a stringed orchestra from the symphony and also by a choir from the Russian Orthodox church. Naturally, the trustees and staff of the Symphony were represented at the service.

This Clipping From
FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS
JAN 15 1942

Funeral Services Held For Mme. Koussevitzky

Funeral services for Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, wife of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, were held yesterday at noon in the Church of the Advent, Boston.

Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra acted as honorary bearers and the stringed ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered selections during the services.

This Clipping From
CHARLESTON, W. VA.
MAIL
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
BURLINGTON, N. C.
TIMES NEWS
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
TUSCALOOSA, ALA.
NEWS
JAN 12 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM TALLADEGA, ALA.
DAILY HOME
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
ALBUQUERQUE, N. M.
TRIBUNE
JAN 12 1942

CONDUCTOR'S WIFE DIES

BROOKLINE, Mass., Jan. 12 (AP)—Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, wife of Serge Koussevitzky, Boston symphony conductor, died late last night in her home after a long illness. She was 61.

This Clipping From
EVERETT, MASS.
NEWS GAZETTE
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM-TRIBUNE
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
TAMPA, FLA.
TIMES
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
FLORENCE, ALA.
TIMES
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
JAN 13 1942

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
LYNN, MASS.
TELEGRAM-NEWS
JAN 12 1942

This Clipping From
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR-JOURNAL
JAN. 12, 1942

This Clipping From
BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER
JAN 12 1942

CORSICANA, TEXAS
SUN

JAN 27 1942

This Clipping From
N. TONAWANDA, N. Y.
EVENING NEWS

JAN 26 1942

This Clipping From
EVANSVILLE, IND.
COURIER

JAN 20 1942

This Clipping From
RIVERSIDE, CALIF.
PRESS

JAN 26 1942

This Clipping From
BETHLEHEM, PA.
GLOBE-TIMES

JAN 21 1942

This Clipping From
WEST PALM BEACH, FLA.
TIMES

JAN 31 1942

This Clipping From

21 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM TAMAQUA, PA.
COURIER

JAN 23 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DURANGO, COLO.
HERALD-DEMOCRAT

21 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, C. H., OHIO
OHIO HERALD

JAN 27 1942

This Clipping From
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
TIMES

JAN 21 1942

THIS CLIPPING FROM TRAVERSE CITY, MICH.
RECORD EAGLE

JAN 29 1942

This Clipping From
COVINGTON, VA.
VIRGINIAN

JAN 23 1942

This Clipping From
ONEONTA, N.Y.
STAR

JAN 19 1942

This Clipping From
CHARLES CITY, IA.
PRESS
JAN 21 1942

IS THIS AMERICA?

Here is a dispatch to the Chicago Sun from its New York Bureau:

"Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct two weeks of the Philharmonic centennial season, beginning Jan. 22, James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, has granted formal permission to the orchestra to engage a non-union conductor to direct a union orchestra. Several months' negotiations preceded Mr. Petrillo's decision.

"In a letter to Marshall Field, president of the Philadelphia-Symphony board of directors, Mr. Petrillo gave as his reasons for making the exception the orchestra's centennial season and the long record of good relations existing between the society and the federation."

Now of course it's nice to know the orchestra has had a long record of good relations with the federation. Perhaps it means that its musicians have been paid a comfortable and adequate wage—which everyone likes to have them get. It's nice to know that Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct six of the centennial concerts.

But since when has it been the American way for an orchestra which has been giving pleasure, education and spiritual grace to Americans for a hundred years to be obliged to undergo several months' negotiations with a union dictator before it can engage a conductor of known value and musical eminence such as Serge Koussevitzky to direct its music?

Collective bargaining to get decent wages, hours and conditions of labor is one thing; that's what unions are for. But this sort of totalitarian monkey-business is something else.

This Clipping From
RIVERSIDE, CALIF.
ENTERPRISE
JAN 27 1942

This Clipping From
VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JAN 21 1942

Walter Is Shut Out By Petrillo From Boston Symph Date

Boston, Jan. 20.

James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, stepped in again against the Boston Symphony Orchestra by barring Bruno Walter from appearing as guest conductor last weekend. A few weeks ago he stopped Howard Hanson from a similar appearance, and, previously, Efrem Zimbalist and Joseph Szigeti.

The program listing Walter's appearance was already printed when the notification arrived. Walter is an honorary member of the union. The Boston Symph is the only major one in the country not in the AFM fold.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER
JAN 22 1942

Bruno Walter Plays Mahler

Bruno Walter conducts the Philharmonic-Symphony this coming week, featuring the Mahler Second Symphony with Nadine Conner and Mona Paulee as soloists with the Westminister Choir assisting the orchestra, at all three concerts—Thursday night, Friday afternoon, and next Sunday afternoon.

Fritz Busch has been engaged to conduct the following week, which includes the concerts of Jan. 29, 30 and Feb. 1. Mr. Walter and Mr. Busch replace Dr. Koussevitzky who has postponed his fortnight with the Philharmonic until later in the season because of the death of his wife.

CELLIST—When Emanuel Feuermann, the famous cellist, appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall Friday and Saturday, he will be soloist in the Schumann Cello Concerto, unheard at these concerts since 1931.

Globe, Wed., Jan. 21/42

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
JAN 22 1942

Richard Burgin Conducting Boston Symphony

BOSTON—In the absence o Serge Koussevitzky, whose wif died recently, Richard Burgin, as sistant conductor, continues to lea the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a he did with a hearty public re sponse last week. His powers as conductor, ofter respected, now ar winning high esteem. Marked in terest also is being attracted by hi programs and the eminent soloist assisting in them.

By an adroit stroke, Mr. Burgi opens the program tomorrow an Saturday with two works new t the orchestra, which will form fascinating complement and con trast. Of this pair, particular in terest will center on Paul Hinde mith's Symphony in E flat, his firs formal symphony, composed i New Haven in 1940. This will b preceded by the Concerto in A minor of 18th century Vivaldi, a arranged for violin and string or chestra by the late Hungarian vio linist-composer, Tividar Nachez The solo part will be played by a group of the Boston Symphony's famed string choir.

The great cello virtuoso, Eman uel Feuermann, will play Schu mann's Concerto in A minor, Opus 129. Smetana's melodious sym phonic poem, "The Moldau," com pletes the program.

Chile's remarkable pianist, Claudio Arrau, won such a recep tion last week in the First Concer to of Brahms, that he was immedi tely re-engaged for the program f Monday evening and Tuesday fternoon (Jan. 26 and 27). He will lay the Fourth Concerto of Bee hoven, in whose music he excels. his program, opening with the ivaldi-Nachez Concerto, will close ith Dvorak's Symphony No. 5.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 21 1942

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 21 1942

MUSIC

Richard Burgin Conducts Boston Symphony at Metropolitan

By G. Y. LOVERIDGE

It is no light matter for an assistant conductor, however considerable his ability, to take the place of Dr. Bruno Walter. Richard Burgin accepted this assignment with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre last night and acquitted himself excellently.

Dr. Walter, a union man, was prevented by the union from conducting the non-union Bostonians. Mr. Burgin had to take the date, as well as several in Boston. He prepared a program neither desperately novel nor depressingly hackneyed; he performed it with superior results.

Arnold Schoenberg's arrangement of the Brahms piano quartet in G minor, Op. 25, brought more tonal warmth from the orchestra than we remember to have heard in some time. It sounded as though everybody not only liked to play the music but intended to give Mr. Burgin solid support. There was, in general, a glow about it, something beyond the deft manipulation of strings and the incredibly polished bubbling of the woodwinds. Only in the final movement, it seemed to us, did the conductor and orchestra fail to sustain the spirit; yet even there Mr. Burgin recovered his grasp in the last few measures and came through with what is known in prize-fighting as a garrison finish. It is just as effective in music.

We do not, by the way, often feel qualified to say flatly what a composer intended or did not intend with regard to the performing of his music, but we feel reasonably sure that neither Brahms nor Mr. Schoenberg intended the lights to go up and the orchestra to rest after the first movement while late comers clambered into their pews.

Through the after-intermission smoke we could discern Emanuel Feuermann about to play the Schumann 'cello concerto, in A minor, Op. 129. He was well into the first movement when the A-string broke on a high B-flat, and he had to retire and put on another string. Perhaps it is a good thing for an artist of Mr. Feuermann's ability to break a string in public once in a while; it brings the public closer to him.

He began at the beginning again, to our delight, and soared through this expressive music. We have never heard anybody play anything more beautifully than Mr. Feuermann played the slow movement of this concerto, music nobly melancholy, the true voice and mood of the 'cello. Before and after it did not matter particularly that Mr. Feuermann displayed a skill quite out of reach of all but a few in this imperfect world.

The orchestra gave comparable support.

For a close, Mr. Burgin selected "The Moldau," by Smetana, one of the familiar works that cannot be heard too often. The orchestral tone was not entirely at its best in this, but the lapses in clarity and roundness were not sufficient to mar seriously the eloquence and sincerity of Mr. Burgin's intent.

The audience gave prolonged applause.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
JAN 24 1942

Music Union Bars Chavez

Carlos Chavez, leading Mexican composer and conductor, has been refused permission to conduct the nonunion Boston Symphony Orchestra by James Caesar Petrillo and the American Federation of Musicians.

Senor Chavez was to appear with the Boston orchestra Feb. 27 and 28. The ruling was revealed here by Herbert Barrett, his personal representative, and confirmed by a union official.

NBC

Emanuel Feuermann

Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 22 1942

Words About
MUSIC
And Musicians

Emanuel Feuermann, noted cellist, will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts in Boston this week.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has programmed Vivaldi's Concerto in E minor for String Orchestra, Hindemith's Symphony in E flat, Schumann's Concerto for Cello and Orchestra in A minor, Op. 129; and Smetana's Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau."

Traveler, Thu., Jan 22/42

NOTED 'CELLIST — Emanuel Feuermann, who plays the Schmann Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Richard Burgin conducting.

This Clipping From LONG BEACH, CALIF.
SUN
JAN 24 1942

Union Bans Boston Concert by Chavez

NEW YORK, Jan. 23.—(U.P.)—According to Herbert Barrett, representative of the Mexican composer and director, Carlos Chavez, the American Federation of Musicians has refused permission for Chavez to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The union secretary, Fred W. Birnbach, confirming the ban, said it was the policy not to allow its members to play with non-union organizations. The Boston union is not affiliated with the American Federation of Musicians and long has been a special target of James C. Petrillo, head of the musicians' union.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL
JAN 24 1942

Chavez Can't Conduct Hub Symphony In N.Y.

NEW YORK, Jan. 24 (AP) — The American Federation of Musicians has refused Carlos Chavez, Mexican composer and conductor, permission to appear with the non-union Boston Symphony orchestra Feb. 27 and 28 as guest conductor, Chavez' personal representative said last night.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
JAN 24 1942

States Chavez Cannot Lead Boston Symphony

NEW YORK, Jan. 23 (AP)—The American Federation of Musicians has refused Carlos Chavez, Mexican composer and conductor, permission to appear with the nonunion Boston Symphony Orchestra Feb. 27 and 28 as guest Conductor, Chavez' personal representative said tonight.

Fred W. Birnbach, secretary of the union, said it was the established policy to refuse to let its members play with any nonunion organization. Asked whether Chavez was a regular or honorary member of the union, Birnbach said: "He's one of those special considerations we made in the Latin-American friendship program."

BRUNO WALTER IS SILENT ON HUB CONCERT BAN

THE NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

A BRIEF but exciting visit to New York last week netted your correspondent three memorable experiences: the performance of "Das Rheingold," which opened, on Thursday afternoon, the Metropolitan's annual "Ring" cycle (something on this next Sunday); the performance that evening of Mahler's Second, or "Resurrection," Symphony at a Philharmonic-Symphony concert under Bruno Walter, and a subsequent call on Mr. Walter, which, if not a "feast of reason," was at least a "flow of soul," since both conductor and reviewer had as common meeting ground a vast enthusiasm for Mahler's music.

On the subject of his cancelled visit to Boston the conductor was almost agressively non-committal. An innocent victim of union politics, he plainly has no desire to become further involved. Protesting against President Petrillo's dictatorial high-handedness comes better and more safely from others. And of these there is no lack.

That he regretted not having had a second engagement with the B. S. O. (he conducted a pair of concerts in 1923), Mr. Walter freely admitted. In particular, he voiced his disappointment at not being able to conduct here the Mahler First, still known to us only by the two performances, at the respective hands of Messrs. Monteux and Mitropoulos.

* * * *

Since the principal topic of conversation was Mahler, with Bruckner as a counter-theme, it is to the point to repeat a few of Mr. Walter's observations, the most embracing of which was that he had never conducted a Mahler performance that did not bring forth both public acclaim and a large measure of critical disapproval. Mr. Walter maintained that in our liking for any music there was bound to be something of the irrational, some purely personal response that eludes analysis.

The critic, he feels, goes at a composition the wrong way. Instead of saying, "What is there here that I can enjoy?" he sets out to judge it coolly and impersonally. On one side, of course, we have the composer and interpreter and on the other, the professional appraiser (only Mr. Walter didn't put it just that way), whose habitat is Missouri.

Anyway, he got a very good press on the Mahler Second and the public response measured up to specifications. The ensuing demonstration lasted close on to a quarter of an hour!

This epic and monumental symphony, known to Boston only by the special performances under Muck in 1918, is a huge tonal fresco that has for its underlying theme man's mortality and the ultimate triumph over the grave—pure stuff for music, though contemporary composers do not concern themselves with such cosmic matters. The fourth movement, an alto solo of mystical meaning and of rare and touching loveliness, paves the way for the finale, a choral setting of Klopstock's "Resurrection Ode," with a long and significant instrumental preface.

The chorus Thursday was John Finley Williamson's Westminster Choir, of Princeton, N. J. When Mr. Walter found he was to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's concerts in New York he asked Dr. Williamson—a week ago last Tuesday—to make ready his singers for this apocalyptic and transfiguring utterance. The result was something to make a Bostonian prick up his ears, aside from the profounder reactions involved. The women even sang their part from memory. As for the orchestra, when Walter leads it one need ask for no better.

Though these young women sang with taste and feeling, richer voices than those of Nadine Conner and Mona Paulee, the two soloists, would have made the performance even more effective. Of special significance to the conductor, by the way, was the fact that the still uncompleted manuscript of this overpowering finale lay on Mahler's desk when the two first met at Hamburg in 1894.

* * * *

Mr. Walter's performance will be broadcast today at 3:00 and there will be one, with necessary cuts, sent over the air from Radio City at 12:30. Any listener would enjoy the second movement, an Andante of Schubertian charm, though the cynical scherzo is a little harder to get. To hear the finale, as suggested above, is an experience.

* * * *

Somewhat cautiously, Mr. Burgin is introducing Mahler's Fourth Symphony to Boston at this week's Symphony Concerts, by way of the third and fourth movements, with Cleora Wood to sing the soprano solo in the latter. A new Sinfonietta of Walter Piston, a Suite from Aaron Copland's music for "Billy the Kid," and Ravel's "Alborado del Gracioso," will complete the programme. At the concerts of tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon Claudio Arrau, Chilean pianist, will return as soloist in the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven. The other numbers will be Dvorak's "New World" Symphony and the A minor Concerto of Vivaldi heard last week.

The Met.'s Wagnerian wing is all over the place. Helen Traubel, 'nuf sed, is giving her first Symphony Hall recital this afternoon and a week later Lauritz Melchior will give at Jordan Hall his first complete recital in Boston, outside the Morning Musicales. Two pianists: Jan Smeterlin will play at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening and the sensational Horowitz at Symphony Hall next Sunday.

On Wednesday evening Joseph Bonnet, the great French organist, will give a free recital at the Church of the Advent.

This Clipping From TACOMA, WASH.
NEWS-TRIBUNE
JAN 23 1942

From the Far Flung Field

One Opera in English Not So Hot; Petrillo Talks It Over; Sleeping Busses Solve a Problem; NYA Orchestra's Hit.

Though it was sung in English, the Metropolitan's recent operatic performance of Bach's dramatic cantata, "Phoebus and Pan" is said to have given little comfort to those who advocate the translation of foreign opera into our tongue. With a few exceptions, the words were not much more comprehensible to the audience than if they had been sung in German or Greek. The fault, according to music writers, perhaps lies with the singers, who might enunciate more clearly with practice.

None of the music was particularly good Bach, but it was melodious and at times as sprightly as Bach's measured style could possibly permit. Sir Thomas Beecham, who conceived this form of presentation, made his debut as a conductor at the Metropolitan, and gained instant audience favor.

* * *

James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, in explaining that he had given permission to members of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra to play under Serge Koussevitzky as a personal favor to Marshall Field, gave the first direct indication that there have actually been talks between members of the union and trustees of the non-union Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This has been one of the hot spots of the far flung controversy between the musicians' union and the sponsors of some of the great orchestras.

* * *

The Philadelphia Opera company, that up and coming organization which has made such a success of presenting standard opera in English with young American singers will undertake its first transcontinental tour next season under the management of S. Hurok.

The company, now in its fourth season, will have a repertoire of twenty operas and will carry its own scenery, choras and orchestra.

* * *

The New Friends of Music Orchestra is starting its winter tour today, traveling as no orchestra has probably ever traveled before—in sleeping busses. The novel mode of touring solves both the problem of transportation and of sleeping quarters. The orchestra consists of thirty-two people, including Fritz Stiedry, the conductor. They will be accommodated in two busses.

* * *

Of the nearly half a hundred standard symphony orchestras sponsored by the NYA that were in existence two months ago, only four survive. These are in Chicago, New York, Boston and Philadelphia and is said to be a question of a very short time when they may fold up. Many of the players have graduated to full time jobs in major symphony orchestras; a few have gone into the army but the greatest number of the organizations passed away because of the curtailment of the federal funds for NYA.

* * *

Bidu Sayao's unusual first name is a dimunitive of Baldwine, the name of her Swiss-French grandmother.

* * *

Roy Harris has arranged his symphony, "When Johnny Comes Marching Home," for school bands.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
JAN 24 1942

Petrillo Bars Chavez From Boston Dates

Right Denied Mexican To Appear As Conductor

NEW YORK—The American Federation of Musicians, which is ruled by James Caesar Petrillo, has refused Carlos Chavez, Mexican composer and conductor, permission to appear with the non-union Boston Symphony Orchestra twice in February in Boston as guest conductor, it was disclosed yesterday.

Announcement of the union's action came from Herbert Barrett, personal representative of Mr. Chavez, who is in Mexico. It was confirmed in a roundabout way by Fred W. Birnbach, secretary of the union. Mr. Petrillo has gone to Miami, Fla., to attend a meeting of the union's international executive board.

Mr. Birnbach said that he supposed it was true, because it was the union's policy to refuse to let its members play with non-union organizations.

"Just the regular procedure we employ in those things," he explained.

He was asked whether Mr. Chavez was a regular or honorary member of the union.

"He's one of those special considerations we made in the Latin-American friendship program," the union secretary said.

The Boston Symphony has long been one of Mr. Petrillo's special targets. Recently he kept Bruno Walter, opera and symphony conductor, from making six scheduled appearances with the orchestra, although Mr. Walter had signed the contract last year before he became an honorary member of the union.

Mr. Chavez is the founder and conductor of the Symphony Orchestra of Mexico and has appeared in New York as conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and other musical organizations. In 1937 he published a book, "Toward a New Music."

This Clipping From DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
JAN 25 1942

'So Beautiful', Says Conductor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in an especially arranged test demonstrated to its conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, that frequency modulation avoids all the distortion present in AM radio transmissions of large orchestras.

The demonstration was held in Boston Symphony Hall where Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, directed the orchestra. Koussevitsky heard the broadcast at a listening post prepared for him by officials of WBZ. The music was transmitted over WIXK, now known as W67B, associate station of WBZ.

"Astonishing," Dr. Koussevitsky exclaimed, adding that he was hearing his orchestra as it really was for the first time on the air.

"Never before in a broadcast have I been able to pick out each instrument individually," he said. "Every instrument sounds so clear, so beautiful, so natural. Each instrument keeps just the right color and timbre, particularly the clarinet which has always been so bad on the air. It is now clear and has the whole beauty of the instrument.

"My musicians, through FM, will now be sure that the public hears what they give them by their instruments."

The broadcast was heard by an audience of reporters and persons prominent in music performance, including Arthur Fiedler and Dr. Wallace Goodrich of the New England Conservatory of Music, Prof. Mimno and Prof. Hunt of Harvard University; Prof. Alfred H. Meyer of the College of Music of Boston University, all of whom supported Koussevitsky's opinions.

Petrillo Bars Chavez From Boston Dates

Right Denied Mexican to Appear With Non-Union Orchestra as Conductor

The American Federation of Musicians, which is ruled by James Caesar Petrillo, has refused Carlos Chavez, Mexican composer and conductor, permission to appear with the non-union Boston Symphony Orchestra twice in February in Boston as guest conductor, it was disclosed yesterday.

Announcement of the union's action came from Herbert Barrett, of 250 West Fifty-seventh Street, personal representative of Mr. Chavez, who is in Mexico. It was confirmed in a roundabout way by Fred W. Birnbach, secretary of the union. Mr. Petrillo has gone to Miami, Fla., to attend a meeting of the union's international executive board.

Mr. Birnbach said that he supposed it was true, because it was the union's policy to refuse to let its members play with non-union organizations.

"Just the regular procedure we employ in those things," he explained.

He was asked whether Mr. Chavez was a regular or honorary member of the union.

"He's one of those special considerations we made in the Latin-American friendship program," the union secretary said.

The Boston Symphony has long been one of Mr. Petrillo's special targets. Recently he kept Bruno Walter, opera and symphony conductor, from making six scheduled appearances with the orchestra, although Mr. Walter had signed the contract last year before he became an honorary member of the union.

Mr. Chavez is the founder and conductor of the Symphony Orchestra of Mexico and has appeared in New York as conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and other musical organizations. In 1937 he published a book, "Toward a New Music."

Would Eliminate One Number

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, Jan. 23.—George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony, said today that Carlos Chavez had been asked to conduct the orchestra in Boston on Feb. 27 and 28 in one of his own compositions and that the American Federation of Musicians ruling against Mr. Chavez's appearance would only mean elimination of the one number from the program for the concerts.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
JAN 26 1942

The International Society for Contemporary Music announces today that its nineteenth festival will be held in San Francisco next July. The concerts of the festival will be made up of performances of works for symphony orchestra, for small chamber music combinations, and for solo voice with instrumental accompaniment. Composers of such works, written during the last five years, are invited to submit scores (not parts) to the secretary of the society, Henry S. Gerstle, 654 Madison avenue, New York city, before March 1 for possible inclusion in the festival programs. . . . Carlos Chavez, the noted Mexican composer and conductor, also has been refused permission to conduct the non-union Boston Symphony Orchestra. He's had to cancel his scheduled appearances as its guest conductor on February 27 and 28 therefore. . . . Edward Snowden, of Management Charles L. Wagner, reports that he has just had a letter from Walter Gieseking, distinguished German pianist. Gieseking and his family, according to the letter, are now in Zurich, Switzerland. . . . The MacDowell Club will introduce the winners of its annual young artists' contest at a reception in the clubhouse on Sunday afternoon, February 1. This year's winners, who will appear in recital at the club later in the season, are Stanley Freedman, pianist; Ruth Freeman, flutist; Fredell Lack, violinist, and Ellen Osborn, soprano. . . . The Busoni Society is sponsoring a concert in memory of Ferruccio Busoni, pianist and composer, at Steinway Hall on Wednesday night. Rudolf Kolisch, Michael Zadora and Edward Steuermann will participate.

ARRAU AND FEUERMANN SOLOISTS AT SYMPHONY

Claudio Arrau, notable young Chilean pianist, whose success at Symphony Hall on Jan. 16 brought his re-engagement for Jan. 26-27.

In the absence of Serge Koussevitzky, whose wife died recently, Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, continues to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as he did with a hearty public response last week. His powers as a conductor, often respected, now are winning such high esteem as to make of him almost a discovery. Marked interest also is being attracted by his programs and the eminent soloists assisting in them.

By an adroit stroke, Mr. Burgin opens the program of Friday and Saturday with two works new to the orchestra, which will form a fascinating complement and contrast. Of this pair, particular interest will center on Paul Hindemith's Symphony in E flat, his first formal symphony, composed in New Haven in 1940. This will be preceded by the Concerto in A minor, of eighteenth century Vivaldi, as arranged for violin and string orchestra by the late Hungarian violinist-composer, Tividar Nachez. The solo part will be played by a group of the Boston Symphony's famed string choir.

The great 'cello virtuoso, Emanuel Feuermann, will play Schumann's Concerto in A minor, Opus 129, Smetana's melodious symphonic poem, "The Moldau," completes the program.

Chile's remarkable pianist, Claude Arrau, won such a reception last week in the First Concerto of Brahms, that he was immediately re-engaged for the program of Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon at three o'clock, January 26 and 27. He will play the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven, in whose music he excels. This program, opening with the Vivaldi-Nachez Concerto, will close with Dvorak's Symphony No. 5, "From the New World."

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN

JAN 25 1942

MUSIC IN WAR-TIME

To the Herald-American:

Once more war has come to America, and with it the unfortunate aspect of intolerance which patriotism is prone to create. Patriotism is a highly desirable attribute, but narrow-mindedness is to be deplored.

Music, the most esthetic and sublimely beautiful of all arts, is always singled out for a particularly vicious attack. Music containing a Japanese atmosphere, while not banned, has met with considerable objection. Once this type of action is resorted to and the fallacy that music possesses nationality in a political sense become prevalent it is but a short step to more violent and ridiculous attitudes.

During the last war many outlandish deeds were perpetrated against music. Wholesale cancellation of programs containing German music, removal of talented musicians and able directors from the ranks of American orchestras, occurred.

Perhaps the most notable, and surely the most painful, example is that of the Boston Symphony. This famed orchestra was under the leadership of the German conductor, Karl Muck. In the wave of patriotism, this talented director was thrown out of the organization. The sad result was complete disruption of the orchestra. Several years of mighty effort was required for the Boston Symphony to again attain the place which it now holds.

The fact that a performance of "Madame Butterfly" was cancelled by the Metropolitan, and that the city of Cleveland did likewise in regard to "The Mikado," is an indication of a return to an undesirable situation.

A war is won, not by indulgence in symbolical and emotional practices, but by fighting and producing the essential materials. Music has been created by the masters for the enjoyment of all humanity and the nationality of the composers or their music is immaterial. What matters it that this magnificent contribution comes from a certain country, or is reminiscent of the customs of specific nationalities? In the presence of great music these considerations are insignificant and trifling.

Syracuse. HARRY F. WILLIAMS, JR.

MUSIC
SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

At the third program of the shorter series of Boston Symphony concerts at Symphony Hall last night, Arthur Lourie's Second Symphony was again placed between Haydn and Brahms. Specifically, Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Haydn B-flat major Symphony, No. 102, and the Brahms Fourth Symphony. All were preceded by the "Star Spangled Banner" in which he conducted the audience.

This listener never heard the Boston orchestra and its conductor in better form. Or perhaps that is no longer a cogent observation. Apart from a few technical reservations, everything was superb. Weighty yet pliable tone whose heft one could almost feel; depth which was rarely murky; a texture of satin finish; an irresistible rhythmic surge—these are some of the hallmarks of "our" orchestra which we take for granted, and yet wonder at anew every season.

Arthur Lourie's intellectual and demanding music (both of the players and listeners) is built of prime materials. A concentrated description is impossible. Both in its formal and harmonic patterns are to be found much which is strikingly original. Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra played it with lavish care, drawing hearty applause from the audience and certain gratitude from the composer who was present.

Haydn's playful Symphony was played with a light-footed, Puckish humor, while the Brahms was read at a constant high pitch of excitement.

The program will be repeated this afternoon at 3.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

JAN 25 1942

MUSIC

Our Anthem, Musically, Is A Shuttlecock

The composition most frequently played in the music temples these days is an 18th century song by the Britisher John Stafford Smith called originally To Anacreon in Heaven. You probably know it better as The Star-Spangled Banner; but as no one knows whether or not Francis Scott Key had the Smith tune in mind when he wrote the verses, and as the words are scarcely ever distinguishable—if sung at all—at our concerts, we can consider the frequent performance of Smith's fine tune strictly as a problem in music.

A check-up reveals considerable variety in the ways our eminent maestri treat the anthem. Sir Thomas Beecham, at the Met, for instance, takes it at a brisk, military clip (though it isn't a march, of course, as it is written in three-four time). He faces the audience as he conducts, urging them with smashing gestures to sing along.

Full Force

At the other local opera company's performances, the Salmaggi troupe in Brooklyn on Saturday nights, the entire company groups itself on the stage, and under the supervision of Maestro Alfredo himself (who used to be an operatic tenor), lets go full force.

The succession of conductors of the Philharmonic-Symphony have varied both time and encouragement to the audience to join in. Fritz Busch, for instance, remains facing the orchestra and gives a sturdy, vigorous beat and march-like accent, much slower than Beecham's and more solemn. Mitropoulos, usually the most melodramatic baton-waver on the current schedule, stands straight and quiet for the anthem, signalling the drums in at the climax as the only gesture visible to the audience. Barbirolli and Rodzinski, on the other hand, both face the audience and get very little co-operation despite vigorous demands.

The two conductors who have had the best co-operation from their audiences at Carnegie Hall are Serge Koussevitzky and Leon Barzin. Koussevitsky, who has a devoted following anyway, makes a short speech at the beginning of the concert, continues to face the audience, starts conducting quietly, and as he reaches "'Tis the star-spangled banner" gives it everything. So does his audience, and it really sounds good.

Singable Syllables

Mr. Barzin's device is more ingenious, and it works. He has his National Orchestral Association play the anthem softly so that the audience will not feel embarrassed by being drowned out by the superior musical forces on the stage. Thus encouraged, the audience sings.

The national anthem is a fine tune and not nearly so difficult to sing as many critics insist. Its range is an octave and five notes, which isn't more than most untrained voices can reach (though admittedly there might be a little straining). If some conductor would try transposing the key from the customary B-flat to say, A-flat, the only syllables that would have to be growled would be say, ming (twice) and stripes. And almost everyone could join in The land of the FREE.—HENRY SIMON.

This Clipping From NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN PILOT

JAN 25 1942

61

These Artists Badly Needed In Symphonies

NBC and National Federation of Music Clubs Paying for Training

Talented violinists between the ages of 16 and 22 are being sought to compete for a year's scholarship at the Juilliard School of Music in New York. The contest is sponsored jointly by the Juilliard School, the National Broadcasting Company and the National Federation of Music Clubs.

Announcement of the contest has been made by Mrs. A. M. Bruce, Virginia chairman for the event. Applications will be received up to and including February 10, and the state contests will be held February 13 at Richmond. District contests will be held in Washington about March 5, and semi-finals for the Eastern Region will take place March 13 in New York.

Sortage of Violinists

Offer of the scholarship was motivated by what the Juilliard School terms a shortage of violinists which is seriously handicapping the country's orchestras. The school is giving the tuition, the National Broadcasting Company is paying living expenses of the winner during his New York stay, and the National Federation of Music Clubs is setting up the mechanism for selecting the winner.

Contestants must be native born or naturalized Americans, with a general education equivalent to four years of high school, and having the endorsement of their music teachers or music schools.

Another contest will be held February 13 by the federation to select three recipients of scholarships to the Berkshire Music Centre at Tanglewood, Mass., from July 5 to August 16. This contest is open only to performers on string instruments, ages 17 to 30.

Prospective contestants may get in touch with Mrs. Andrew M Bruce, 2420 Maplewood avenue, Richmond.

This Clipping From MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION

JAN 27 1942

Claudio Arrau To Play With Hub Symphony

CLAUDIO ARRAU.

Special to The Union.

BOSTON, Jan. 26—In the absence of Serge Koussevitzky, whose wife died recently, Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, continues to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra. His powers as a conductor, often respected, now are winning such high esteem as to make of him almost a discovery. Marked interest also is being attracted by his programs and the eminent soloists assisting in them.

Chile's remarkable pianist, Claudio Arrau, won such a reception in the First Concerto of Brahms, that he was immediately reengaged for the program of Tuesday afternoon, January 27, at 3 o'clock. He will play the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven, in whose music he excels. This program, opening with the Vivaldi-Nachez Concerto, will close with Dvorak's Symphony No. 5, "From the New World."

61

ARRAU AND FEUERMANN SOLOISTS AT SYMPHONY

Claudio Arrau, notable young Chilean pianist, whose success at Symphony Hall on Jan. 16 brought his re-engagement for Jan. 26-27.

In the absence of Sergé Koussevitzky, whose wife died recently, Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, continues to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as he did with a hearty public response last week. His powers as a conductor, often respected, now are winning such high esteem as to make of him almost a discovery. Marked interest also is being attracted by his programs and the eminent soloists assisting in them.

By an adroit stroke, Mr. Burgin opens the program of Friday and Saturday with two works new to the orchestra, which will form a fascinating complement and contrast. Of this pair, particular interest will center on Paul Hindemith's Symphony in E flat, his first formal symphony ,composed in New Haven in 1940. This will be preceded by the Concerto in A minor, of eighteenth century Vivaldi, as arranged for violin and string orchestra by the late Hungarian violinist-composer, Tividar Nachez. The solo part will be played by a group of the Boston Symphony's famed string choir.

The great 'cello virtuoso, Emanual Feuermann, will play Schumann's Concerto in A minor, Opus 129, Smetana's melodious symphonic poem, "The Moldau," completes the program.

Chile's remarkable pianist, Claude Arrau, won such a reception last week in the First Concerto of Brahms, that he was immediately re-engaged for the program of Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon at three o'clock, January 26 and 27. He will play the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven, in whose music he excels. This program, opening with the Vivaldi-Nachez Concerto, will close with Dvorak's Symphony No. 5, "From the New World"

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
JAN 25 1942

MUSIC

Our Anthem, Musically, Is A Shuttlecock

The composition most frequently played in the music temples these days is an 18th century song by the Britisher John Stafford Smith called originally To Anacreon in Heaven. You probably know it better as The Star-Spangled Banner; but as no one knows whether or not Francis Scott Key had the Smith tune in mind when he wrote the verses, and as the words are scarcely ever distinguishable—if sung at all—at our concerts, we can consider the frequent performance of Smith's fine tune strictly as a problem in music.

A check-up reveals considerable variety in the ways our eminent maestri treat the anthem. Sir Thomas Beecham, at the Met, for instance, takes it at a brisk, military clip (though it isn't a march, of course, as it is written in three-four time). He faces the audience as he conducts, urging them with smashing gestures to sing along.

Full Force

At the other local opera company's performances, the Salmaggi troupe in Brooklyn on Saturday nights, the entire company groups itself on the stage, and under the supervision of Maestro Alfredo himself (who used to be an operatic tenor), lets go full force.

The succession of conductors of the Philharmonic-Symphony have varied both time and encouragement to the audience to join in. Fritz Busch, for instance, remains facing the orchestra and gives a sturdy, vigorous beat and march-like accent, much slower than Beecham's and more solemn. Mitropoulos, usually the most melodramatic baton-waver on the current schedule, stands straight and quiet for the anthem, signalling the drums in at the climax as the only gesture visible to the audience. Barbirolli and Rodzinski, on the other hand, both face the audience and get very little co-operation despite vigorous demands.

The two conductors who have had the best co-operation from their audiences at Carnegie Hall are Serge Koussevitsky and Leon Barzin. Koussevitsky, who has a devoted following anyway, makes a short speech at the beginning of the concert, continues to face the audience, starts conducting quietly, and as he reaches "'Tis the star-spangled banner" gives it everything. So does his audience, and it really sounds good.

Singable Syllables

Mr. Barzin's device is more ingenious, and it works. He has his National Orchestral Association play the anthem softly so that the audience will not feel embarrassed by being drowned out by the superior musical forces on the stage. Thus encouraged, the audience sings.

The national anthem is a fine tune and not nearly so difficult to sing as many critics insist. Its range is an octave and five notes, which isn't more than most untrained voices can reach (though admittedly there might be a little straining). If some conductor would try transposing the key from the customary B-flat to say, A-flat, the only syllables that would have to be growled would be say, ming (twice) and stripes. And almost everyone could join in The land of the FREE.—HENRY SIMON.

This Clipping From NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN PILOT
JAN 25 1942

These Artists Badly Needed In Symphonies

NBC and National Federation of Music Clubs Paying for Training

Talented violinists between the ages of 16 and 22 are being sought to compete for a year's scholarship at the Juilliard School of Music in New York. The contest is sponsored jointly by the Juilliard School, the National Broadcasting Company and the National Federation of Music Clubs.

Announcement of the contest has been made by Mrs. A. M. Bruce, Virginia chairman for the event. Applications will be received up to and including February 10, and the state contests will be held February 13 at Richmond. District contests will be held in Washington about March 5, and semi-finals for the Eastern Region will take place March 13 in New York.

Sortage of Violinists

Offer of the scholarship was motivated by what the Juilliard School terms a shortage of violinists which is seriously handicapping the country's orchestras. The school is giving the tuition, the National Broadcasting Company is paying living expenses of the winner during his New York stay, and the National Federation of Music Clubs is setting up the mechanism for selecting the winner.

Contestants must be native born or naturalized Americans, with a general education equivalent to four years of high school, and having the endorsement of their music teachers or music schools.

Another contest will be held Feb ruary 13 by the federation to select three recipients of scholarships to the Berkshire Music Centre at Tanglewood, Mass., from July 5 to August 16. This contest is open only to performers on string instruments, ages 17 to 30.

Prospective contestants may get in touch with Mrs. Andrew M Bruce, 2420 Maplewood avenue, Richmond.

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN
JAN 25 1942

MUSIC IN WAR-TIME

To the Herald-American:

Once more war has come to America, and with it the unfortunate aspect of intolerance which patriotism is prone to create. Patriotism is a highly desirable attribute, but narrow-mindedness is to be deplored.

Music, the most esthetic and sublimely beautiful of all arts, is always singled out for a particularly vicious attack. Music containing a Japanese atmosphere, while not banned, has met with considerable objection. Once this type of action is resorted to and the fallacy that music possesses nationality in a political sense become prevalent it is but a short step to more violent and ridiculous attitudes.

During the last war many outlandish deeds were perpetrated against music. Wholesale cancellation of programs containing German music, removal of talented musicians and able directors from the ranks of American orchestras, occurred.

Perhaps the most notable, and surely the most painful, example is that of the Boston Symphony. This famed orchestra was under the leadership of the German conductor, Karl Muck. In the wave of patriotism, this talented director was thrown out of the organization. The sad result was complete disruption of the orchestra. Several years of mighty effort was required for the Boston Symphony to again attain the place which it now holds.

The fact that a performance of "Madame Butterfly" was cancelled by the Metropolitan, and that the city of Cleveland did likewise in regard to "The Mikado," is an indication of a return to an undesirable situation.

A war is won, not by indulgence in symbolical and emotional practices, but by fighting and producing the essential materials. Music has been created by the masters for the enjoyment of all humanity and the nationality of the composers or their music is immaterial. What matters it that this magnificent contribution comes from a certain country, or is reminiscent of the customs of specific nationalities? In the presence of great music these considerations are insignificant and trifling.

Syracuse. HARRY F. WILLIAMS, JR.

MUSIC
SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

At the third program of the shorter series of Boston Symphony concerts at Symphony Hall last night, Arthur Lourie's Second Symphony was again placed between Haydn and Brahms. Specifically, Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Haydn B-flat major Symphony, No. 102, and the Brahms Fourth Symphony. All were preceded by the "Star Spangled Banner" in which he conducted the audience.

This listener never heard the Boston orchestra and its conductor in better form. Or perhaps that is no longer a cogent observation. Apart from a few technical reservations, everything was superb. Weighty yet pliable tone whose heft one could almost feel; depth which was rarely murky; a texture of satin finish; an irresistible rhythmic surge—these are some of the hallmarks of "our" orchestra which we take for granted, and yet wonder at anew every season.

Arthur Lourie's intellectual and demanding music (both of the players and listeners) is built of prime materials. A concentrated description is impossible. Both in its formal and harmonic patterns are to be found much which is strikingly original. Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra played it with lavish care, drawing hearty applause from the audience and certain gratitude from the composer who was present.

Haydn's playful Symphony was played with a light-footed, Puckish humor, while the Brahms was read at a constant high pitch of excitement.

The program will be repeated this afternoon at 3.

This Clipping From MANCHESTER, N. H.
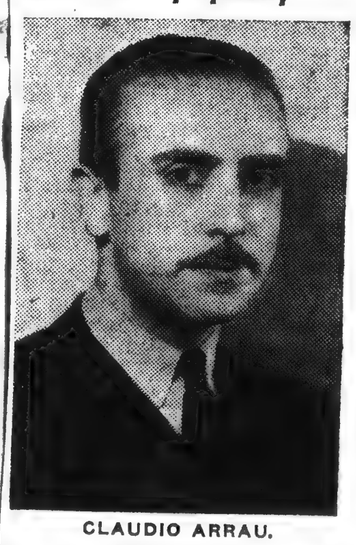
UNION
JAN 27 1942

Claudio Arrau To Play With Hub Symphony



CLAUDIO ARRAU.

Special to The Union.

BOSTON, Jan. 26—In the absence of Serge Koussevitzky, whose wife died recently, Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, continues to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra. His powers as a conductor, often respected, now are winning such high esteem as to make of him almost a discovery. Marked interest also is being attracted by his programs and the eminent soloists assisting in them.

Chile's remarkable pianist, Claudio Arrau, won such a reception in the First Concerto of Brahms, that he was immediately reengaged for the program of Tuesday afternoon, January 27, at 3 o'clock. He will play the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven, in whose music he excels. This program, opening with the Vivaldi-Nachez Concerto, will close with Dvorak's Symphony No. 5, "From the New World."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 25 1942

62

CONDUCTING MODERN MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

THE prime consideration in interpreting new musical works is to avoid doing anything that might possibly make these appear to be emulating the music of the past. Such emulation may or may not have been a part of the composer's intention, but playing it up in presentation produces a false relation between a work and its own time that is fatal to the comprehension of the work by its own time. Dressing and directing "Hamlet" as if it were a modern play is a piquant procedure. Treating a modern play as if it were Shakespeare's "Hamlet" can only make for pretentiousness and obscurity.

* * *

Live Music Cannot Compete in Glamour With the Dead

THERE is a moral prestige attached to any art work that has survived the death of its author that no work by a living hand can enjoy. This fact of survival is correctly called immortality, and that immortality surrounds the surviving work with a white light. In that radiance all becomes beautiful. Obscurities disappear, too; or, at least, they cease to bother. When I refer, as I do not infrequently, to live music and dead music, I mean that there is the same difference between the two that there is between live persons and dead ones. The spirit and influence of the dead are often far more powerful than those of the living. But they are not the same thing, because you can only argue about them, never with. The dead have glory and a magnificent weight. The living have nothing but life.

The glorification of the dead is a perfectly good thing. Indeed, the greater civilizations have always done it more than the lesser. But a clear separation of the dead from the living is also a mark of the higher cultures. That is the fecundating drama between tradition and spontaneity that keeps peoples and empires alive. Consequently, no good is accomplished by pretending, or seeming to pretend, that a work by Igor Stravinsky or Aaron Copland or myself is a museum piece, because it isn't and won't be till we're dead, if then. And framing such a work among museum pieces in such a way that it appears to be subsidiary to them invariably makes the living work seem deader than a doornail. Its lack of white-light immortality must invariably make it appear gravely inferior to the works on the same program that have such an aura and glamour.

The moral of this explanation is that new works must be played alone, in company with other new works, or surrounded by old ones carefully chosen, if one wishes to bring out their resemblances to the traditional past as well as their essential differences from that past. A new work may not be the most important piece on the program; but unless it is the determining item in the choice of the whole program it must always sound like second-rate music, because it is pretty certain to be placed in unfair glamour competition with the classics of repertory. Modern music indiscriminately programmed, no matter what kind of music it is, is framed to flop.

* * *

National Differences Are Significant in Modern Music

NEITHER can it be interpreted in the same style as older music. Insufficient rehearsal often works to a new piece's advantage. When there isn't time to do much but read the notes and observe the author's tempos, it gets a neutral reading that is at least better than a false interpretation. If the conductor has time to work it up into an imitation of all his favorite war horses or to streamline it into a faint reminder of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky, it is very difficult for the listener to hear anything in it but a memory of these authors, or at most a feeble attempt to dethrone them by being arbitrarily different.

The best international style for playing the classics is one which reduces them to a common denominator of clarity and elegance. That was always Toscanini's force as a conductor of standard repertory. He was never very effective as a conductor of modern music (and he avoided it whenever possible, for that reason, I imagine), because he knew no other way of conducting anything. Characteristic national differences, which are of minor importance in standard repertory but which are the very essence of modern stylistic comprehension, seem to have escaped him. And being a musician of too high temperament to be satisfied with a mere neutral reading of anything, he wisely refrained from taking on a job in which neither he nor the living composer was likely to do much shining.

The conductors who do best by the music of our century are seldom equally good at interpreting all the kinds of it. Koussevitzky does well by anything Russian and fair by the English and the Americans, provided these last are not too local in flavor. He is not bad with German music, adds to it a Slavic elegance that is sometimes advantageous. French music escapes him utterly, in spite of his many years' residence in Paris. Mitropoulos is at his best with the central European styles. Beecham is fine for English music, for all Slavic, for some German, for anything that has lyric afflatus or rhythmic punch. The Germans are rather messy when they play German music, always were, as Richard Wagner pointed out. Some are excellent with French music, however, Fürtwaengler, for instance, and Stock, of Chicago. Italians do not always do their best by Italian works, especially those of strong French influence, though they do beautifully by anything Germanic, even Brahms. Only the French (and a few Germans) make sense with French music. Nobody, literally nobody, who has not passed his formative adolescent years in this country ever conducts American music with complete intelligibility.

* * *

A Bird's-Eye View of National Differences

THE basis of American musical thought is a special approach to rhythm. Underneath everything is a continuity of short quantities all equal in length and in percussive articulation. These are not always articulated, but they must always be understood. If for any expressive reason one alters the flow of them temporarily, they must start up again exactly as before, once the expressive alteration is terminated. In order to make the whole thing clear, all instruments, string and wind, must play with a clean, slightly percussive attack. This attack must never be sacrificed for the sake of a beautiful tone or even for pitch accuracy, because it is more important than either. Besides, once a steady rhythm is established, the music plays itself, pitch and sonorities adjust themselves automatically, as in a good jazz band the whole takes on an air of completeness.

French music is the nearest thing in Europe to our music, because French rhythm, like ours, is less accentual than quantitative. Keeping down-beats out of a Debussy rendition, for instance, is virtually impossible to anybody but a Frenchman. Steady quantities, a little longer than ours and requiring no percussive definition at all, are its rhythmic foundation. Definition is achieved by a leisurely breathing between phrases and an almost imperceptible waiting before attacking, with no added force, what in any other music would be played as a down-beat. As with American music, a proper rhythm is cardinal and must be achieved before the pitch and the tone production can be polished up.

Modern German music is not very interesting rhythmically. It needs no exact quantities, only a thwacking down-beat. Even that can be advanced or held back, as is the Viennese custom, to express sentiment. What is most important is to get the harmony right, for pitch is all-important to the German mind. Get the harmony right and don't go too sentimental. Nothing else counts, provided care for the harmony includes a clear plotting out of the key-relations in the whole piece. This means being sure there is always plenty of bass at the piece's joints.

Russian music is an alternation of very free rhythms with rigid and insistent ones. The latter are easy to render. But few conductors ever take enough liberties with the sentimental passages. English formulas are always closely related to the Russian (vide the English novel and the English Church). In music, both peoples conceive of rhythm as either non-existent or quite inflexible. Both observe beat rhythms, too, not quantities. And both alternate speech inflections with foot-work, as in a song-and-dance. The chief difference between them is that the Russian mind dramatizes itself with a grandiloquent simplicity, whereas the English tradition values a more intimate and personal kind of forthrightness in the expression of tender thought. The grander passages of both repertories may be rendered with the utmost of pomp and of panache.

* * *

International Common Denominators Are Less Significant at Present

MATTERS like these seem to me more important to restate than international esthetic principles. All conductors know nowadays what the Neo-Classic style is all about. Also the Neo-Romantic style and the twelve-tone syntax. And certainly the survivals of late-Romanticism are not difficult to decipher. But these are the stylistic elements that underlie all modern music; they have been written about ad infinitum and ad nauseam. What I am pointing out is that underneath these international tendencies and observances there are ethnic differences that must be taken account of. Also to remind my readers that these ethnic differences preclude the possibility that conductors of foreign upbringing now resident among us shall play a leading rôle in our present musical expansion. They render great service by their constant acts of good will toward home-made music. But they have only the vaguest idea of what it's all about. And neither has that part of our musical public that hears it only through their well-intentioned but unconvincing renditions.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
JAN 27 1942

May Decide Tanglewood Issue Friday

Festival Trustees Will Meet in New York

A special meeting of trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival will be held Friday afternoon at the home of Mrs. Charles Robinson Smith in New York. At this meeting there will be a report of the finance committee on its negotiations with the Boston Symphony Orchestra with reference to the Festival concerts at Tanglewood this summer.

The negotiations have been prolonged since last summer because of several points at issue arising through a two-board control of affairs at Tanglewood. A five-year contract expired this year.

When Tanglewood was presented by Mrs. Andrew Hepburn it was deeded to the orchestra. The gift made possible the establishment of the Berkshire Music Center which like the Festival has attracted people from all corners of the globe. The school operates six weeks, the last three coinciding with the Festival concerts.

One point of view in the discussion has been that the Festival concerts and the Music Center, important institutions in themselves could be more important if more closely affiliated even with separate boards, because they serve to complement each other. The other point of view has been that the two institutions should continue their separate ways and would be better off if completely independent of each other. The first point of view is that of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston trustees and some members of the Berkshire board, while the second point of view has been that of the majority of the Berkshire board.

At an informal meeting of the Berkshire board Saturday evening at the home of Mrs. Bruce Crane in Dalton, it was the consensus that the Festival concerts should be continued this year if the finance committee could reach a one-year agreement with the Boston board.

On the Festival's finance committee are Laurence R. Connor and Mrs. Crane with Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith a member ex-officio. Representing the Festival in its long negotiations have been Stuart Montgomery of Boston and Nathan L. Miller, former governor of New York state, both lawyers.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL
JAN 27 1942

Musicians And War

By MARGARET ANN AHLERS

Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestry, recently issued an appeal to the musicians of the United States in which he points out the priceless contribution they are privileged to make to national welfare during wartime. He urges all makers of music to serve the country in every way possible—and without thought of financial compensation.

Such a thing may seem to the professional something to consider leisurely before making any decision, but it is certain that if the matter is viewed in unselfish fashion it will be plainly seen that musicians must give generously of their talents if the victory which will preserve all arts is to be obtained.

To contribute freely of ability and time seems to the noted Russian director a responsibility shared by all musicians in days of national emergency. He says, "We, the musicians of the great American democracy, must fully participate in the gigantic struggle for the highest human values our glorious country and her allies are engaged in . . . we must bring the gladness of music to all soldiers in their camps, forts and battle areas . . . we must give the vitalizing beauty of music to all the wounded, sick and disabled soldiers in their hospitals, homes and elsewhere . . . we must become new bards—inspiring, invigorating, ennobling and consoling. In this way we can help the attainment of the grand immediate objective: Victory."

Wartime brings about a very special need for music of many kinds. To the young soldiers the stirring strains of some military march will be a panacea for somesickness; the lilting tune of "Good bye, Mama, We're Off to Yokahoma" and "We've Done It Before, We'll Do It Again" will give him fresh inspiration to step along and have a part in the grand fight for freedom.

Those who stay at home will find in music courage to face each day and in such magnificent compositions as the tone poem "Finlandia," by Sibelius, they will discover a new patriotism and deeper love of this, our own land. The great music that stemmed from history's past wars will serve well its purpose today when it joins forces with those lighter tunes which already have surged from composers' pens. The Russian National anthem which Tschaikowsky used effectively in his "Marche Slav" is no less stirring today than is the very new song "Remember Pearl Harbor"—but any composition, whether it be new or old, can release its message only when musicians give it voice through the medium of the talent which they possess.

MUSIC

Monday Symphony

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 4th concert in the subsidiary series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Symphony Hall. Richard Burgin conducted; and the soloist was Claudio Arrau, pianist. The program was as follows:

Vivaldi.....Concerto for violin and strings in A minor, arranged for string orchestra by Tividar Nachez
Beethoven.....Piano Concerto No. 4 in G major Op. 58
Dvorak.....Symphony No. 5 in E minor "From the New World" Op. 95

Mr. Arrau, the excellent pianist from Chile, made so remarkable an impression when he played the Brahms First Concerto the other day with the orchestra that it was clearly desirable to have him as soloist as soon again as possible. The opportunity presented itself almost at once, and the memory of one beautiful performance is still fresh when we can now record the impressions of another. Mr. Arrau chose for his second appearance with the orchestra Beethoven's 4th Concerto.

That work was last played here by Rudolf Serkin, and when we say that Mr. Arrau's performance last night was on the same high level we have really said all that need be done in the way of praise. It was a faultlessly clear, graceful and yet never tenuous interpretation. Mr. Arrau is a very fine pianist indeed, and he proved himself as fully in the vein for Beethoven as he previously had for Brahms.

For the rest of the program Mr. Burgin repeated the Vivaldi Concerto, in the arrangement by Nachez, of last week's concerts and the "New World" Symphony of Dvorak, which was played early in November. The Vivaldi is good workaday music of its period and sounds well on the Boston Symphony's strings. We imagine, though, that Nachez's notion, which was not followed, of including an organ in the accompaniment was a sound one. The Dvorak Symphony made an imposing concluding number and a good contrast to the rest of the program. Its familiar beauties were admirably interpreted by Mr. Burgin.

The concert will be repeated this afternoon. The concerts of the Boston Symphony this Friday and Saturday, which Mr. Burgin will also conduct, will offer two new works: Walter Piston's Sinfonietta and Aaron Copland's "Billy the Kid" Suite; also two movements of Mahler's 4th Symphony, with Cleora Wood, soprano, as soloist, and Ravel's Alborada del Gracioso.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin conducted the fourth concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Monday-Tuesday series at Symphony Hall last night. The program consisted of the Nachez arrangement for multiple strings of the A minor Violin Concerto by Vivaldi; Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto, with Claudio Arrau as soloist, and the "New World" Symphony of Dvorak.

Mr. Arrau has achieved a rare success with the Boston public. The reception he earned from the Friday and Saturday subscribers about 10 days ago was duplicated by last night's audience. Granted certain essential differences of style, his way with the Beethoven Fourth resembles his interpretation of the Brahms D minor: strength but not showy display or exceptional volume; clear articulation of the notes, polished phrasing and rhythmic poise. One has heard the Beethoven Fourth done more memorably and emotionally, but never with greater all-'round skill.

Mr. Burgin and the orchestra were at their best in Vivaldi and Beethoven. To Mr. Arrau they supplied a sensitive and alert collaboration that corresponded, interpretively, to the soloist's idea of how the Concerto ought to go. But in Dvorak's popular work they did not rise above routine competence at any point, and in some particulars the reading was technically loose and careless.

Like the D minor Symphony of Franck, the "New World" has begun to date. It is also very familiar to the majority of concert-goers, and despite the charm of melody and harmony must be played with utmost care and distinction to make best effect. Nor, again like Franck, should it be heard too often. The "New World" has very definite merits, but it is not a great masterpiece. And it is axiomatic that only great masterpieces can survive the wear of frequent and sometimes indifferent performances.

The next concerts in this series will be March 2 and 3. C. W. D.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 25 1942

CONDUCTING MODERN MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

THE prime consideration in interpreting new musical works is to avoid doing anything that might possibly make these appear to be emulating the music of the past. Such emulation may or may not have been a part of the composer's intention, but playing it up in

...itation of an Imitation of Life

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
JAN 27 1942

May Decide Tanglewood Issue Friday

Festival Trustees Will Meet in New York

A special meeting of trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival will be held Friday afternoon at the home of Mrs. Charles Robinson Smith in New York. At this meeting there will be a report of the finance committee on its negotiations with the Boston Symphony Orchestra with reference to the Festival concerts at Tanglewood this summer.

The negotiations have been prolonged since last summer because of several points at issue arising through a two-board control of affairs at Tanglewood. A five-year contract expired this year.

When Tanglewood was presented by Mrs. Andrew Hepburn it was deeded to the orchestra. The gift made possible the establishment of the Berkshire Music Center which like the Festival has attracted people from all corners of the globe. The school operates six weeks, the last three coinciding with the Festival concerts.

One point of view in the discussion has been that the Festival concerts and the Music Center, important institutions in themselves could be more important if more closely affiliated even with separate boards, because they serve to complement each other. The other point of view has been that the two institutions should continue their separate ways and would be better off if completely independent of each other. The first point of view is that of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston trustees and some members of the Berkshire board, while the second point of view has been that of the majority of the Berkshire board.

At an informal meeting of the Berkshire board Saturday evening at the home of Mrs. Bruce Crane in Dalton, it was the consensus that the Festival concerts should be continued this year if the finance committee could reach a one-year agreement with the Boston board.

On the Festival's finance committee are Laurence R. Connor and Mrs. Crane with Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith a member ex-officio. Representing the Festival in its long negotiations have been Stuart Montgomery of Boston and Nathan L. Miller, former governor of New York state, both lawyers.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL
JAN 27 1942

Musicians And War

By MARGARET ANN AHLERS

Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestry, recently issued an appeal to the musicians of the United States in which he points out the priceless contribution they are privileged to make to national welfare during wartime. He urges all makers of music to serve the country in every way possible—and without thought of financial compensation.

Such a thing may seem to the professional something to consider leisurely before making any decision, but it is certain that if the matter is viewed in unselfish fashion it will be plainly seen that musicians must give generously of their talents if the victory which will preserve all arts is to be obtained.

To contribute freely of ability and time seems to the noted Russian director a responsibility shared by all musicians in days of national emergency. He says, "We, the musicians of the great American democracy, must fully participate in the gigantic struggle for the highest human values our glorious country and her allies are engaged in . . . we must bring the gladness of music to all soldiers in their camps, forts and battle areas . . . we must give the vitalizing beauty of music to all the wounded, sick and disabled soldiers in their hospitals, homes and elsewhere . . . we must become new bards—inspiring, invigorating, ennobling and consoling. In this way we can help the attainment of the grand immediate objective: Victory."

Wartime brings about a very special need for music of many kinds. To the young soldiers the stirring strains of some military march will be a panacea for somesickness; the lilting tune of "Good bye, Mama, We're Off to Yokahoma" and "We've Done It Before, We'll Do It Again" will give him fresh inspiration to step along and have a part in the grand fight for freedom.

Those who stay at home will find in music courage to face each day and in such magnificent compositions as the tone poem "Finlandia," by Sibelius, they will discover a new patriotism and deeper love of this, our own land. The great music that stemmed from history's past wars will serve well its purpose today when it joins forces with those lighter tunes which already have surged from composers' pens. The Russian National anthem which Tschaikowsky used effectively in his "Marche Slav" is no less stirring today than is the very new song "Remember Pearl Harbor"—but any composition, whether it be new or old, can release its message only when musicians give it voice through the medium of the talent which they possess.

Club's Roster

...nis own part and everybody else's, too. He always had an excellent stage director—and he left the directing to him, just as he left the choosing of his plays to Charles Frohman."

It was the first World War that shifted Mary Boland's acting from dramatic leads to character parts. She went overseas to entertain the troops in France and there she had to go in for melodrama and uproarious comedy.

"I was sent in a unit under the Y. M. C. A.," she recalled. "We had three bills—'Kick In,' 'A Pair of Sixes' and 'The Traveling Salesman' —and we played in hospitals to which soldiers had been brought from other hospitals nearer the front. The soldiers made wonderful audience; they seemed to get so much pleasure out of our plays. It was an experience I'll never forget. I was in France nearly a year."

Returning to this country in 1919, Miss Boland received an offer of a comedy character role in Booth Tarkington's "Clarence." She played the mother of a flapper daughter, a part acted by Helen Hayes, and Alfred Lunt was the Clarence for whom the piece was named. The die was cast for Mary Boland. Her comedy impersonation was so successful that she never went back to those noble heroines. Before long she was finding her new bent very lucrative. One funny part led to the next and the next, and eventually Broadway led to Hollywood, whence she has revisited the New York stage only twice since 1932.

"When I look back on all the parts I have played," she admitted, smiling, "I sometimes wonder how I've had the strength to go through with them." Which is an odd confession from a person who can take both Mrs. Malaprop and pneumonia in her stride.

ances from 1918 to 1921; "The First Year," which ran 760 times; "Seventh Heaven," 704; "Three Wise Fools," 467, and "Turn to the Right," 452. In addition Golden has produced eight other plays which ran 300 performances or more.

No fewer than ten plays have reached the 400 mark in the last two years—"The Philadelphia Story" (417), "Life With Father" (930), "The Little Foxes" (410), "The Man Who Came to Dinner" (738), "Louisiana Purchase" (442), "Panama Hattie" (428), "The Corn Is Green" (475), "My Sister Eileen" (453), "Arsenic and Old Lace" (433), and "Claudia" (400)—all figures as of last Wednesday night.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
JAN 27 1942

PITTSFIELD

Festival and Boston Symphony Agreement Reported Attained

Pittsfield, Jan. 26—The telephone message received here tonight from Stockbridge said an agreement has been reached between the Berkshire Symphonic festival and Boston Symphony orchestra on a contract and that formal announcement will be made this week of nine midsummer concerts at Tanglewood, starting probably Thursday evening, July 30.

It is known that Boston symphony has been demanding a larger share of festival profits and greater control over its excellent management. Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith is president of Berkshire Symphonic festival. Many festival patrons anxious to secure ticket reservations have become apprehensive over the possibility that on account of the war with its many restrictions the festival would be abandoned this year.

Expiration of a five-year contract necessitated a new one and this has been the object of negotiations for five months between groups of Boston and Pittsfield lawyers. It can now be stated that the festival will be given as usual by the Boston symphony orchestra with Dr Serge Koussevitzky as conductor.

MUSIC

Monday Symphony

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 4th concert in the subsidiary series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Symphony Hall. Richard Burgin conducted; and the soloist was Claudio Arrau, pianist. The program was as follows:

Vivaldi.....Concerto for violin and strings in A minor, arranged for string orchestra by Tividar Nachez
Beethoven.....Piano Concerto No. 4 in G major Op. 58
Dvorak.....Symphony No. 5 in E minor "From the New World" Op. 95

Mr. Arrau, the excellent pianist from Chile, made so remarkable an impression when he played the Brahms First Concerto the other day with the orchestra that it was clearly desirable to have him as soloist as soon again as possible. The opportunity presented itself almost at once, and the memory of one beautiful performance is still fresh when we can now record the impressions of another. Mr. Arrau chose for his second appearance with the orchestra Beethoven's 4th Concerto.

That work was last played here by Rudolf Serkin, and when we say that Mr. Arrau's performance last night was on the same high level we have really said all that need be done in the way of praise. It was a faultlessly clear, graceful and yet never tenuous interpretation. Mr. Arrau is a very fine pianist indeed, and he proved himself as fully in the vein for Beethoven as he previously had for Brahms.

For the rest of the program Mr. Burgin repeated the Vivaldi Concerto, in the arrangement by Nachez, of last week's concerts and the "New World" Symphony of Dvorak, which was played early in November. The Vivaldi is good workaday music of its period and sounds well on the Boston Symphony's strings. We imagine, though, that Nachez's notion, which was not followed, of including an organ in the accompaniment was a sound one. The Dvorak Symphony made an imposing concluding number and a good contrast to the rest of the program. Its familiar beauties were admirably interpreted by Mr. Burgin.

The concert will be repeated this afternoon. The concerts of the Boston Symphony this Friday and Saturday, which Mr. Burgin will also conduct, will offer two new works: Walter Piston's Sinfonietta and Aaron Copland's "Billy the Kid" Suite; also two movements of Mahler's 4th Symphony, with Cleora Wood, soprano, as soloist, and Ravel's Alborada del Gracioso.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin conducted the fourth concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Monday-Tuesday series at Symphony Hall last night. The program consisted of the Nachez arrangement for multiple strings of the A minor Violin Concerto by Vivaldi; Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto, with Claudio Arrau as soloist, and the "New World" Symphony of Dvorak.

Mr. Arrau has achieved a rare success with the Boston public. The reception he earned from the Friday and Saturday subscribers about 10 days ago was duplicated by last night's audience. Granted certain essential differences of style, his way with the Beethoven Fourth resembles his interpretation of the Brahms D minor: strength but not showy display or exceptional volume; clear articulation of the notes, polished phrasing and rhythmic poise. One has heard the Beethoven Fourth done more memorably and emotionally, but never with greater all-'round skill.

Mr. Burgin and the orchestra were at their best in Vivaldi and Beethoven. To Mr. Arrau they supplied a sensitive and alert collaboration that corresponded, interpretively, to the soloist's idea of how the Concerto ought to go. But in Dvorak's popular work they did not rise above routine competence at any point, and in some particulars the reading was technically loose and careless.

Like the D minor Symphony of Franck, the "New World" has begun to date. It is also very familiar to the majority of concert-goers, and despite the charm of melody and harmony must be played with utmost care and distinction to make best effect. Nor, again like Franck, should it be heard too often. The "New World" has very definite merits, but it is not a great masterpiece. And it is axiomatic that only great masterpieces can survive the wear of frequent and sometimes indifferent performances.

The next concerts in this series will be March 2 and 3. C. W. D.

Arrau Heard In Concerto By Beethoven

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Just how many symphonies are written in the United States each year can be surmised, if not accurately calculated. Perhaps they come forth from the studios of music professors and others at the rate of one a month. In any case, they continually arrive; and if the total for 50 years were reckoned up, it would be a large number, though the bulk of them would figure in the period since the first World War. Then, take the whole lot together, perhaps but a single one of them has got any particular hold on the affection of the public, and that is the Symphony No. 5 in E minor, op. 95, by Antonín Dvořák, which goes under the designation, "From the New World," and which was recalled to the notice of the town at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, Richard Burgin conducting.

* * *

Precisely how New-World the symphony is, has never been determined; but musicologists agree that it was composed in America, whether it partakes of the soil or not. It could have been somewhat thought out by Dvořák in his native Bohemia before he made his memorable visit to the United States, to add himself to the teachers of composition in the country. But again, if he had stayed at home, his Symphony No. 5 might have had an entirely different sound, if not a much different style, from what it has. It would have been plentifully Slavic, no doubt, and it would very likely have echoed Tchaikovsky even more than it does; and yet that languorous, lonesome down South-ness which is the one captivating element in it might have been absent. Indeed, it would almost inevitably have been lacking. For where else in all that Dvořák has written is the same thing found?

* * *

The work makes a sentimental occasion of any meeting of orchestral listeners at which it is performed, though a warm and gracious mood got possession of the people in Symphony Hall yesterday evening before the moonlight melody of the "New World" Larghetto began its sway. Really, the Romantic movement in music opened and culminated with the two principal items presented, the beginning being made by Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 in G major, op. 58, in which Claudio Arrau took part as soloist. Mr. Arrau went in for expression in his interpretation of the piano part of No. 4, though he forgot not to be brilliant at the same time. The concerto, treated his way, is all sultriness and perfume, as ingratiating as anything by Schumann or Debussy. Here is musical "atmosphere" a century before its time. In a word, Mr. Arrau makes himself out a poet and something more than an instrumentalist. He is the sort that can make conductor lead and orchestra play in keeping with his temper.

To note the first matter last, the program started off with a piece in three movements by Vivaldi; string orchestra, which meant a quartet of reduplicated voices, singing exquisitely in tune.

his performance of the First Concerto of Brahms at a pair of symphony concerts, returned to Symphony Hall last evening to be heard with the orchestra in a quite different work, the Fourth of Beethoven. His success with the audience was as pronounced as before and his treatment of the music as sympathetic. For Beethoven, this G major concerto is a strangely feminine music. Its keynotes are grace and tenderness, together with brilliance in the finale. Those who felt that Mr. Arrau's treatment of the Brahms was insufficiently rugged and forceful (and this reviewer was not one of them) could certainly have had nothing but praise for what he did last evening.

This fourth pair of supplementary concerts has fallen to Richard Burgin, now the chef d'orchestre pro tem. His programme, to be heard again this afternoon, begins with Vivaldi's Concerto in A minor, in the arrangement of Tividar Nachez, heard here for the first times last week. Again the solo part was played by a group of violins. Conventional 18th century music, the concerto goes in one ear and out the other. Only the largo leaves anything like an abiding impression. Dvorak's "New World" Symphony made and will make the end.

ARRAU AT SYMPHONY

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Claudio Arrau, the Chilian pianist who recently made a deep impression with

James Kollar

Cleora Wood

Soprano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Mahler's Fourth Symphony, which Richard Burgin will conduct at the Friday and Saturday concerts.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin, conducting his third consecutive pair of "regular" concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the absence of Serge Koussevitzky, gives again this week a program of extraordinary interest. Three of its four compositions are "first performance at these concerts," specifically the Sinfonietta of Walter Piston; Aaron Copland's ballet suite "Billy the Kid," and the third and fourth movements from the Fourth Symphony of Gustav Mahler. The soprano soloist for the second Mahler movement is Cleora Wood of Boston. The list ends with second-rate but pleasant Ravel, the Alborrada del Gracioso.

The Piston Sinfonietta is an exceedingly adept composition, refinement being its most conspicuous trait. It was not new to Boston because Mr. Bernard Zighera and his chamber orchestra had performed it last March at Jordan Hall. Both in idiom and means of expression the Sinfonietta leans to modesty. In addition to strings, only two each of flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons and horns are required, which limits the dynamic range. Mr. Piston here wrote in terms of fine and small instrumental voices which skip along merrily and somewhat mechanistically in rhythms whose outward ebullience probably conceals internal complexity. Though the harmonic style is free, it is also disciplined (as, indeed, is every work that Mr. Piston writes), and the dissonance is ordered. Emotionally, however, a good deal of dryness prevails. When the composer appeared on the stage after the performance he was cordially greeted.

Antithesis of Sinfonietta

Mr. Copland's hell-for-leather music is the complete antithesis of the Sinfonietta. It was conceived as accompanying music for the stage bustle of a ballet, and contains the qualities of depiction and movement which are a prime requisite of a ballet score. Without having seen the ballet, one is willing to bet that Mr. Copland's music is in large measure responsible for the reputed excellence of "Billy the Kid."

The orchestral suite begins on the plains, shows us the pioneer crudity of a street in a frontier town, dwells melodiously on what must have been a pretty andante card game, and then lets loose, in the percussion instruments, the noisy gun battle in which the Kid was shot by the sheriff's posse. Afterward comes a celebration of Billy's demise, and finally Mr. Copland goes back to the open prairie Those plucked double-bass strings, during the shooting, probably are bullets ricocheting Some of the firing seemed very fast for Billy the Kid's day; no doubt someone was "fanning" the hammer of his six-shooter. Derivations of cowboy tunes, but no actual melodic quotations, are woven into the score. Mr. Copland's only aim was to entertain, and he succeeded most cleverly.

Cleora Wood's Singing Superb

No doubt Mr. Burgin would have played all the Mahler Fourth Symphony had that been possible. As it is, fervent thanks for these excerpts. The slow movement, beginning in a radiant elegy suggestive of the slow movement in Beethoven's last String Quartet, follows a long and freely contrapuntal development to a large climax, and ends as quietly as it began. The text of the fourth movement, sung with beautiful tone and superb musicianship by Cleora Wood, is a child's description of Heaven, taken from that collection of popular German poetry which so attracted Mahler: "The Boy's Magic Horn." These two movements represent more the folkish, lyrical, fanciful side of Mahler than the demoniac intensity and the ever-present sense of tragedy which was his other dominating characteristic. Mahler was long and grandiose, goodness knows, but he had much to say, and he has been misunderstood. We can do with a lot more of his music.

No space is left to dilate upon Mr. Burgin's fine conducting, which made much of Ravel's Alborada del Gracioso, inconsequential stuff that makes you think of his "La Valse."

Mr. Koussevitzky will return, next week, from Florida, where he has been resting under doctor's orders since the death of Mme. Koussevitzky. He will present the B minor Concerto Grosso, No. 12, by Handel and two Symphonies, the Fifth of Sibelius, and the Second of Brahms.

C. W. D.

This Clipping From
PATERSON, N. J.
NEWS
JAN 28 1942

Because the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a non-union organization, the American Federation of Musicians has refused to approve two scheduled appearances of the Mexican conductor, Carlos Chavez, as guest conductor of the group.

WAKEFIELD, MASS.
ITEM
JAN 29 1942

Probably We're Wrong

Not long ago, Bruno Walter was denied the privilege of acting as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Was this at the orchestra's request? Definitely not. The order came from one Jimmy Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, whose career has been mentioned a number of times by that king of labor racketeer exposers, Westbrook Pegler.

Prof. Walter, a native of Germany, left that country when Hitler rose to power. Later, he fled from Austria. He has applied for American citizenship.

Because the Boston Symphony is the only non-union orchestra in the country—that is, the only orchestra whose members are their own bosses—he was not allowed to conduct it. All of which may or may not constitute a fine example in citizenship for a new-comer who left his native land to get away from dictation. However, Mrs. Roosevelt says that "right or wrong, I will not cross a picket line," so it is quite possible that we and others who think otherwise are merely out of step with Mr. Petrillo and Mrs. Roosevelt.

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN & CITIZEN-LEADER
JAN 27 1942

Chavez Banned

Carlos Chavez, Mexican conductor, has been forbidden by the American Federation of Musicians to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in the concerts of Feb. 27 and 28. On those dates it had been arranged that he should conduct one of his short compositions as part of a program that would be conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky. But he has fallen under the same ban as did Bruno Walter recently. In this case, however, it will be a simple matter to rearrange the program. Mr. Chavez made his debut in this country 10 years ago with the Boston Symphony orchestra. He is founder and conductor of the symphony orchestra of Mexico, and has conducted the New York Philharmonic symphony. According to a union official, he is one of those special considerations the union made in the Latin-American friendship program.

Dr. Koussevitzky at last accounts was resting in Florida.

Opera in Boston

The Boston Opera association has announced the repertory for the season of the Metropolitan Opera in Boston beginning on March 28. The operas to be performed are as follows:

March 19, Lohengrin; March 20, The Magic Flute; March 21 (mat.) La Traviata; evening, Barber of Seville; March 23, Gluck's Orfeo; March 24, Die Walkuere; March 25, (mat.) Carmen; evening, La Boheme; March 26, Aida; March 27, Der Rosenkavalier; March 28 (mat.) Faust; evening, Rigoletto.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GREENFIELD, MASS.
RECORDER-GAZETTE
JAN 29 1942

Symphony Will Feature Flute in Second Concert

The second concert by the Pioneer Valley symphony at the high school, Sunday at 3 p. m., will feature a brilliant young flute soloist, Claude Monteux, who has been playing with the orchestra regularly this season.

Monteux, son of Pierre Monteux, is a native of France and has been in this country only three years. His father, now in California, is a former conductor of the Boston Symphony. Monteux' home is in Lexington. For two seasons he has been a special student at Stockbridge with Laurent, first flutist with the Boston Symphony. He will play Mozart's Concerto No. 2 in D. Major for flute and orchestra, Sunday.

The orchestra personnel has had a few changes since the first program in December, but the roster has not been reduced. One of the outstanding combinations in the unit is the Barrington family consisting of Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Barrington and son, Wayne. Mrs. Barrington is first horn player in the Woman's Symphony of Boston and the Woman's Symphony of Montreal. She also is teacher at the Eastern music camp. She and her son play the French horn with the Pioneer Valley symphony. Mr. Barrington plays the bassoon. Their home is Worcester.

This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 30 1942

Q. I noticed in the Sunday Times-Dispatch that the Musicians' Union prohibits the Boston Symphony from making any new recordings. What is the reason for this?—Music Lover, Altavista.

A. The Boston Symphony does not belong to the Musicians' Union. Since the union has ruled that only their members shall make recordings, all of the employees of the Victor Division would probably strike if Victor tried to make records of any but union symphonies. (The Victor Division of RCA makes the Boston Symphony recordings.) However, because Victor expected this move, a number of recordings of the Boston Symphony were made prior to the ruling. Consequently, a few of their recordings can be released from time to time.

This Clipping From TACOMA, WASH.
TIMES
JAN 30 1942

Union Thumbs Down On Chavez

The American Federation of Musicians has decided that Carlos Chavez, the Mexican composer and conductor, will not be allowed to conduct a non-union orchestra such as the Boston Symphony. His engagement as guest conductor of that organization on Feb. 27 and 28 have been cancelled.

This Clipping From TACOMA, WASH.
TIMES
JAN 30 1942

Wife's Death Blow To Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, cancelled his January engagement with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in grief over the sudden death of wife. His assigned programs were taken over by Bruno Walter.

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 14th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Cleora Wood, soprano, was soloist in the Mahler number. The program was as follows:

Sinfonietta.....Piston
Suite from the Ballet "Billy the Kid".....Copland
3rd and 4th Movements of Symphony No. 4 in G major.....Mahler
Alborada del Gracioso.....Ravel

Mr. Aaron Copland is one of the slipperiest creatures for a critic to catch hold of in the whole musical aquarium. Many journalists have snorted angrily at Stravinsky because of the many changes in and apparent inconsistency of his art. He refuses to be regimented and thereby earns black looks and scowling notices. Mr. Copland presents a different problem and one that is more baffling, because it is not entirely musical.

No sooner do you pin him down to your satisfaction and perhaps adversely criticize a serious piece of his than he turns around and writes so judicious and agreeable a book about music that you regret your harsh words. Then, if you turn to and attack him again he will upset the balance in his favor by writing some such delightful and popular music as this "Billy the Kid" Suite or his "El Salon Mexico." There is no gainsaying his importance in contemporary American music, so that it is doubtless wise to take him as he comes.

Nobody is likely to quarrel with the guise he has assumed in this ballet suite. It is an entertaining piece of music, full of spicy rhythms, well known tunes and strung together simply and effectively. The battle caught everyone's fancy, though there were carping people with some pretensions to historical learning who demurred at the notion of machine gun fire in the time of Billy the Kid. But for the purposes of art the device made for a much better battle.

There is a considerable hint of Prokofieff's method from "Peter and the Wolf" in the celebration scene, but that hardly matters in a work that makes no great bid for originality. Mr. Burgin led the orchestra in a decidedly vital reading for a first performance at these concerts. The battle scene is particularly hard to get just right, yet it came off without a hitch.

Another composition by an American was also heard for the first time in Symphony Hall, although Mr. Piston's Sinfonietta had been given last year by Mr. Zighera's chamber orchestra. In the broader version it sounds more serious than it did before, though again the finale emerges as the most attractive as it is also the most vivacious. The first movement is properly more intellectual, and the adagio provides the right contrast between the two. But it is the finale, with its bounce and zest, its neat fugato passages and genial spirits, that makes one want to hear the Sinfonietta again. Mr. Piston was in the audience and came forward to receive the applause.

Oddly enough the 4th Symphony of Mahler has never been done in Boston before, and yet it would serve much better than some of the others as an introduction to this disputed composer's work. Neither the slow movement nor the finale, which was all of the Symphony that Mr. Burgin elected to play, presents any difficulty for the listener. The adagio may tax his patience, for it is solemn and sweet for rather a long spell and there is a curious and unnecessary loud climax just before the end that seems to prove nothing. But the finale, utilizing the song from "Des Knaben Wunderhorn," is pure enchantment.

Mahler, like Wolf, knew how to put the childlike quality into music, and this part of the Symphony expresses simple and innocent joy to perfection. "Innocence" is not the quality needed in its performance, however, for it requires an expert singer. This, fortunately, Mr. Burgin had ready to hand in Cleora Wood who gave a singularly smooth and ingratiating account of the vocal role. Again the orchestra played well for Mr. Burgin, who has most efficiently stepped into Mr. Koussevitzky's shoes this past month.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky returns to play the following program: Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings in B minor; Sibelius's 5th Symphony; Brahms's 2nd Symphony

The Assistant Conductor Carries On

Monitor Jan 31

By L. A. Sloper

For the fourteenth program of the Boston Symphony season, Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, listed four works: Walter Piston's Sinfonietta; Aaron Copland's Suite from his ballet, "Billy the Kid"; the third and fourth movements of Mahler's Fourth Symphony, in G major, and Ravel's "Alborado del Gracioso." Three of these items were new to the symphony concerts: those by Piston, Copland, and, oddly enough, Mahler. Altogether an interesting program.

Probably the debate over Mahler's music will not soon be settled to the satisfaction of everybody. Opinions seem to be too widely divergent, and too violently advanced and defended. Yet are the contestants really so hopelessly at odds? Is it not accurate to say that the facts of the case are pretty generally agreed upon, and that the only question at issue is that of taste? Mahler had grandiose ideas, notable facility as a composer, and the orchestral mastery of a great conductor. The works that resulted from this combination of qualities are for some listeners masterpieces of which they do not tire; for others, the same works are garrulous musical discourses which contain many pages of beauty, along with much that is banal.

* * *

I belong with the latter group. Mahler's compositions, as many of them as I have heard, do not seem to me to justify their length by their interest. Most of the themes strike me as shapeless, their use obvious and redundant.

The two movements of the Fourth Symphony played yesterday afternoon had undeniably a good deal of charm. The theme of the slow movement, if a little sweet, has more salience than much of Mahler's material. The composer is too generous with his variations; but toward the close, when the movement seems about to disintegrate from inanition, there is what Tovey describes as "a tremendous burst of glory" in E major, which makes one sit up in grateful relief. I only wished it had come sooner.

As for the last movement, it is hardly possible to resist the naïve appeal of this picture of a Heaven in which everybody is so pleasant and there are so many good things to eat and so much simple joy. I am not sure that it makes a good final movement for a symphony; I should have to hear the work as a whole to have an opinion on that. Heard after the slow movement only, it disarms us by its earnestness. Cleora Wood rightly sang the unexacting soprano part in strict obedience to the composer's injunction: "With childlike, bright expression, always without parody."

The ballet seems to have inspired good musical scores, from Lully to Ravel, from Tchaikovsky to Stravinsky, from Gluck to Hindemith; and no doubt the dance had a similar effect on composers in Greece and in Babylon. Mr. Copland has responded like the others to this type of Gebrauchtmusik. In fact this program and that of last week bring to notice three contemporaries whose music for the stage tends to hold more appeal than their "absolute" product. At least, I would rather listen to Hindemith's "St. Francis" score than to his symphony; to Copland's "Billy the Kid" than to his works written for the concert hall, and to Piston's "Incredible Flutist" than to his Sinfonietta.

makes it seem so; there is a freedom in the style that smacks of the wide spaces. One of its sections, that of the "Gun Battle," is a little too onomatopoetic for the concert hall; it recalls the song in "Pins and Needles" about the boy who wanted "to be a G-man and go 'bang-bang.'" But otherwise the suite is delightful.

Mr. Piston's Sinfonietta is a scholarly work which holds not much more than an academic interest up to the last movement, which contains a good lyrical theme and some interesting rhythmic patterns.

Mr. Burgin secured excellent performance of all these works, which must have required a good deal of rehearsing. The assistant conductor has distinguished himself by stepping into the breach at a very difficult moment, and carrying through three pairs of concerts with no lapse in program interest or quality of performance.

Next week Dr. Koussevitzky returns for the Friday and Saturday concerts. His program will consist of Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, No. 12; the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, and the Second of Brahms. The Cambridge concert next Thursday evening will be directed by Mr. Burgin, who will offer the Piston Sinfonietta and the Mahler excerpts of this week's program, and the Dvořák Symphony "From the New World.'

NEW NUMBERS AT SYMPHONY

Richard Burgin Directs Delightful Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Once looked upon as a sort of necessary evil, the Symphony Concerts under the direction of Richard Burgin have developed into uncommonly stimulating occasions in which programmes of great interest are most eloquently interpreted. Three of the numbers of this week's list are new to Symphony Hall and two of them new to Boston. Walter Piston's Sinfonietta, the opening piece, was played here last March by the Zighera Chamber Orchestra in Jordan Hall, while for actual novelties, Mr. Burgin is offering the Suite made from Aaron Copland's Ballet, "Billy the Kid," and the third and fourth movements of Mahler's Fourth Symphony, with Cleora Wood as the soprano soloist required by the latter. Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso" supplies the traditional brilliant ending.

When Mr. Piston's Sinfonietta was heard before, the third movement made the strongest impression and such was the case yesterday afternoon. The opening Allegro grazioso has both charm and interest and the sober and restrained lyricism of the Adagio is by no means unappealing. But the Finale shows Mr. Piston in his happiest vein. It is both rhythmically intriguing and melodically beguiling. The composer was present to acknowledge the hearty applause.

Like his "Quiet City," recently played at Symphony Hall, Mr. Copland's music for this ballet of the wild and woolly West is written simply and directly and is therefore in the sharpest contrast to the fearsome creations by which he was first made known to us. Although it would gain, like most ballet music, by association with the action, it tells its story in the concert hall if the listener gives proper heed to the subtitles. The "Gun Battle" kept the percussion section busy and the uninformed might well have uttered the classic query, "What's all the shooting for?"

When Mahler's Fourth Symphony was broadcast from Radio City Jan. 11, as part of the complete cycle of Mahler Symphonies now being offered by Mr. Rapee, there were those who wondered why this delightful, highly individual, picturesquely fanciful and at times deeply moving score had failed to reach Boston in the 40 years that have elapsed since its Munich premiere. There is now good reason to ask why we should be granted but two of its four movements. The traditional Mahler bugaboo of undue length hardly holds in this particular case.

However, half a loaf is better than none. Mr. Burgin, who has long desired to conduct the Symphony here, led a beautifully revealing performance, an Miss Wood, besides giving us beautiful singing, entered fully into the spirit of the Finale which, to the text of an old Bavarian folk song, describes a child's naive concept of Heaven. Conductor, singer and what there was of the Symphony were enthusiastically acclaimed.

This Clipping From
THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

JAN 30 1942

The above picture was taken in 1915 at the San Francisco Cliff House, on the occasion of a luncheon tendered Dr. Karl Muck, at that time conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by the Pacific Musical Society. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was then giving a series of concerts at the Festival Hall of the Panama-Pacific Exposition.

The Pacific Musical Society continues active in the cultural and social life of San Francisco and many of those seen here are still associated with that organization and prominent in musical circles.

Reading from left to right, front row, are: *Mrs. David Hirschler, Mr. George McManus, Miss May Sinsheimer, Mr. Ashley Pettis, Mrs. Toby Schussler, Mrs. Henrietta Cowell, Miss Carolyn Nash, Mrs. Aurelius Buckingham, *Mrs. Margaret May, Mrs. William Ritter. Rear row, left to right, are: Mrs. William Banks, Mr. Fleischmann, *Mr. David Hirschler, *Mr. Elias Hecht, *Mrs. Henry Mannheim, Miss Victoria Lilienthal, *Dr. Karl Muck, Mrs. Miriam Elkus, *Madame Emilie Tojetti, *Mrs. Karl Muck, Mr. Emil Greenebaum. (*Deceased)

This Clipping From GALVESTON, TEXAS
TRIBUNE

JAN 30 1942

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, canceled his January engagements with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in grief over the sudent death of his wife. His assigned programs were taken over by Bruno Walter.

This Clipping From
OSHKOSH, WIS.
NORTHWESTERN

JAN 1942

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, canceled his January engagements with the New York Philharmonic - Symphony in grief over the sudden death of his wife. His assigned programs were taken over by Bruno Walter.

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 14th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Cleora Wood, soprano, was soloist in the Mahler number. The program was as follows:

Sinfonietta.....Piston
Suite from the ballet "Billy the Kid".....Copland
3rd and 4th Movements of Symphony No. 4 in G major.....Mahler
Alborada del Gracioso.....Ravel

Mr. Aaron Copland is one of the slipperiest creatures for a critic to catch hold of in the whole musical aquarium. Many journalists have snorted angrily at Stravinsky because of the many changes in and apparent inconsistency of his art. He refuses to be regimented and thereby earns black looks and scowling notices. Mr. Copland presents a different problem and one that is more baffling, because it is not entirely musical.

No sooner do you pin him down to your satisfaction and perhaps adversely criticize a serious piece of his than he turns around and writes so judicious and agreeable a book about music that you regret your harsh words. Then, if you turn to and attack him again he will upset the balance in his favor by writing some such delightful and popular music as this "Billy the Kid" Suite or his "El Salon Mexico." There is no gainsaying his importance in contemporary American music, so that it is doubtless wise to take him as he comes.

Nobody is likely to quarrel with the guise he has assumed in this ballet suite. It is an entertaining piece of music, full of spicy rhythms, well known tunes and strung together simply and effectively. The battle caught everyone's fancy, though there were carping people with some pretensions to historical learning who demurred at the notion of machine gun fire in the time of Billy the Kid. But for the purposes of art the device made for a much better battle.

There is a considerable hint of Prokofieff's method from "Peter and the Wolf" in the celebration scene, but that hardly matters in a work that makes no great bid for originality. Mr. Burgin led the orchestra in a decidedly vital reading for a first performance at these concerts. The battle scene is particularly hard to get just right, yet it came off without a hitch.

Another composition by an American was also heard for the first time in Symphony Hall, although Mr. Piston's Sinfonietta had been given last year by Mr. Zighera's chamber orchestra. In the broader version it sounds more serious than it did before, though again the finale emerges as the most attractive as it is also the most vivacious. The first movement is properly more intellectual, and the adagio provides the right contrast between the two. But it is the finale, with its bounce and zest, its neat fugato passages and genial spirits, that makes one want to hear the Sinfonietta again. Mr. Piston was in the audience and came forward to receive the applause.

Oddly enough the 4th Symphony of Mahler has never been done in Boston before, and yet it would serve much better than some of the others as an introduction to this disputed composer's work. Neither the slow movement nor the finale, which was all of the Symphony that Mr. Burgin elected to play, presents any difficulty for the listener. The adagio may tax his patience, for it is solemn and sweet for rather a long spell and there is a curious and unnecessary loud climax just before the end that seems to prove nothing. But the finale, utilising the song from "Des Knaben Wunderhorn," is pure enchantment.

Mahler, like Wolf, knew how to put the childlike quality into music, and this part of the Symphony expresses simple and innocent joy to perfection. "Innocence" is not the quality needed in its performance, however, for it requires an expert singer. This, fortunately, Mr. Burgin had ready to hand in Cleora Wood, who gave a singularly smooth and ingratiating account of the vocal role. Again the orchestra played well for Mr. Burgin, who has most efficiently stepped into Mr. Koussevitzky's shoes this past month.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky returns to play the following program: Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings in B minor; Sibelius' 5th Symphony; Brahms's 2nd Symphony.

The Assistant Conductor Carries On

By L. A. Sloper

For the fourteenth program of the Boston Symphony season, Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, listed four works: Walter Piston's Sinfonietta; Aaron Copland's Suite from his ballet, "Billy the Kid"; the third and fourth movements of Mahler's Fourth Symphony, in G major, and Ravel's "Alborado del Gracioso." Three of these items were new to the symphony concerts: those by Piston, Copland, and, oddly enough, Mahler. Altogether an interesting program.

Probably the debate over Mahler's music will not soon be settled to the satisfaction of everybody. Opinions seem to be too widely divergent, and too violently advanced and defended. Yet are the contestants really so hopelessly at odds? Is it not accurate to say that the facts of the case are pretty generally agreed upon, and that the only question at issue is that of taste? Mahler had grandiose ideas, notable facility as a composer, and the orchestral mastery of a great conductor. The works that resulted from this combination of qualities are for some listeners masterpieces of which they do not tire; for others, the same works are garrulous musical discourses which contain many pages of beauty, along with much that is banal.

I belong with the latter group. Mahler's compositions, as many of them as I have heard, do not seem to me to justify their length by their interest. Most of the themes strike me as shapeless, their use obvious and redundant.

The two movements of the fourth Symphony played yesterday afternoon had undeniably a good deal of charm. The theme of the slow movement, if a little sweet, has more salience than much of Mahler's material. The composer is too generous with his variations; but toward the close, when the movement seems about to disintegrate from inanition, there is what Tovey describes as "a tremendous burst of glory" in E major, which makes one sit up in grateful relief. I only wished it had come sooner.

As for the last movement, it is hardly possible to resist the naïve appeal of this picture of a Heaven in which everybody is so pleasant and there are so many good things to eat and so much simple joy. I am not sure that it makes a good final movement for a symphony; I should have to hear the work as a whole to have an opinion on that. Heard after the slow movement only, it disarms us by its earnestness. Cleora Wood rightly sang the unexacting soprano part in strict obedience to the composer's injunction: "With childlike, bright expression, always without parody."

The ballet seems to have inspired good musical scores, from Lully to Ravel, from Tchaikovsky to Stravinsky, from Gluck to Hindemith; and no doubt the dance had a similar effect on composers in Greece and in Babylon. Mr. Copland has responded like the others to this type of Gebrauchtmusik. In fact this program and that of last week bring to notice three contemporaries whose music for the stage tends to hold more appeal than their "absolute" product. At least, I would rather listen to Hindemith's "St. Francis" score than to his symphony; to Copland's "Billy the Kid" than to his works written for the concert hall, and to Piston's "Incredible Flutist" than to his Sinfonietta.

makes it seem so; there is a freedom in the style that smacks of the wide spaces. One of its sections, that of the "Gun Battle," is a little too onomatopoetic for the concert hall; it recalls the song in "Pins and Needles" about the boy who wanted "to be a G-man and go 'bang-bang.'" But otherwise the suite is delightful.

Mr. Piston's Sinfonietta is a scholarly work which holds not much more than an academic interest up to the last movement, which contains a good lyrical theme and some interesting rhythmic patterns.

Mr. Burgin secured excellent performance of all these works, which must have required a good deal of rehearsing. The assistant conductor has distinguished himself by stepping into the breach at a very difficult moment, and carrying through three pairs of concerts with no lapse in program interest or quality of performance.

Next week Dr. Koussevitzky returns for the Friday and Saturday concerts. His program will consist of Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, No. 12; the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, and the Second of Brahms. The Cambridge concert next Thursday evening will be directed by Mr. Burgin, who will offer the Piston Sinfonietta and the Mahler excerpts of this week's program, and the Dvořák Symphony "From the New World."

NEW NUMBERS AT SYMPHONY

Richard Burgin Directs Delightful Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Once looked upon as a sort of necessary evil, the Symphony Concerts under the direction of Richard Burgin have developed into uncommonly stimulating occasions in which programmes of great interest are most eloquently interpreted. Three of the numbers of this week's list are new to Symphony Hall and two of them new to Boston. Walter Piston's Sinfonietta, the opening piece, was played here last March by the Zighera Chamber Orchestra in Jordan Hall, while for actual novelties, Mr. Burgin is offering the Suite made from Aaron Copland's Ballet, "Billy the Kid," and the third and fourth movements of Mahler's Fourth Symphony, with Cleora Wood as the soprano soloist required by the latter. Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso" supplies the traditional brilliant ending.

When Mr. Piston's Sinfonietta was heard before, the third movement made the strongest impression and such was the case yesterday afternoon. The opening Allegro grazioso has both charm and interest and the sober and restrained lyricism of the Adagio is by no means unappealing. But the Finale shows Mr. Piston in his happiest vein. It is both rhythmically intriguing and melodiously beguiling. The composer was present to acknowledge the hearty applause.

Like his "Quiet City," recently played at Symphony Hall, Mr. Copland's music for this ballet of the wild and woolly West is written simply and directly and is therefore in the sharpest contrast to the fearsome creations by which he was first made known to us. Although it would gain, like most ballet music, by association with the action, it tells its story in the concert hall if the listener gives proper heed to the subtitles. The "Gun Battle" kept the percussion section busy and the uninformed might well have uttered the classic query, "What's all the shooting for?"

When Mahler's Fourth Symphony was broadcast from Radio City Jan. 11, as part of the complete cycle of Mahler Symphonies now being offered by Mr. Rapee, there were those who wondered why this delightful, highly individual, picturesquely fanciful and at times deeply moving score had failed to reach Boston in the 40 years that have elapsed since its Munich premiere. There is now good reason to ask why we should be granted but two of its four movements. The traditional Mahler bugaboo of undue length hardly holds in this particular case.

However, half a loaf is better than none. Mr. Burgin, who has long desired to conduct the Symphony here, led a beautifully revealing performance, an Miss Wood, besides giving us beautiful singing, entered fully into the spirit of the Finale which, to the text of an old Bavarian folk song, describes a child's naive concept of Heaven. Conductor, singer and what there was of the Symphony were enthusiastically acclaimed.

This Clipping From
THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
JAN 30 1942

The above picture was taken in 1915 at the San Francisco Cliff House, on the occasion of a luncheon tendered Dr. Karl Muck, at that time conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by the Pacific Musical Society. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was then giving a series of concerts at the Festival Hall of the Panama-Pacific Exposition.

The Pacific Musical Society continues active in the cultural and social life of San Francisco and many of those seen here are still associated with that organization and prominent in musical circles.

Reading from left to right, front row, are: *Mrs. David Hirschler, Mr. George McManus, Miss May Sinsheimer, Mr. Ashley Pettis, Mrs. Toby Schussler, Mrs. Henrietta Cowell, Miss Carolyn Nash, Mrs. Aurelius Buckingham, *Mrs. Margaret May, Mrs. William Ritter. Rear row, left to right, are: Mrs. William Banks, Mr. Fleischmann, *Mr. David Hirschler, *Mr. Elias Hecht, *Mrs. Henry Mannheim, Miss Victoria Lilienthal, *Dr. Karl Muck, Mrs. Miriam Elkus, *Madame Emilie Tojetti, *Mrs. Karl Muck, Mr. Emil Greenebaum. (*Deceased)

This Clipping From GALVESTON, TEXAS
TRIBUNE
JAN 30 1942

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, canceled his January engagements with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in grief over the sudden death of his wife. His assigned programs were taken over by Bruno Walter.

This Clipping From
OSHKOSH, WIS.
NORTHWESTERN
JAN 31 1942

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, canceled his January engagements with the New York Philharmonic - Symphony in grief over the sudden death of his wife. His assigned programs were taken over by Bruno Walter.

65

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
FEB 1 1942

Cancels Engagements

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, canceled his January engagements with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in grief over the sudden death of his wife. His assigned programs were taken over by Bruno Walter.

This Clipping From
AUSTIN, TEXAS
STATESMAN
1942

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
FEB 2 - 1942

KOUSSEVITZKY SCHEDULE

To Open Season Here With the Philharmonic on Feb. 19

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra for two weeks, starting Feb. 19, it was announced yesterday. The engagement will take the place of the one he canceled last month after his wife's death.

Fritz Busch, who took over the second week of the Russian conductor's original engagement, completed his assignment with the orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. With the exception of Brahms's first Symphony, which was substituted for the Reger Violin Concerto, his program was the same as the one played Thursday and Friday. It was made up of the Mozart-Busoni Overture to "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail," Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and two of Dvorak's Slavonic Dances.

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
FEB 1 - 1942

KOUSSEVITZKY TO RETURN THIS WEEK

Serge Koussevitzky, returning from his rest in the South, will conduct the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concerts will be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, February 6 and 7. The program will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, No. 12. It will also consist of two symphonies: the fifth of Sibelius, in E-flat major; and the Second of Brahms, in D major.

The concert to be given in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, next Thursday evening, February 5, will be conducted by Richard Burgin. The program will consist of the Sinfonietta by Walter Piston, who is on the music faculty of Harvard University; the slow movement and finale of Mahler's Fourth Symphony in G major; and the Symphony No. 5 of Dvorak, "From the New World." Cleora Wood, the noted soprano, will sing the text of the finale of Mahler's symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 2 - 1942

Koussevitzky Will Direct PhilharmonicThisMonth

Schedule Rearranged So He Can Conduct 7 Concerts

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society announced yesterday that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's two-week engagement during its centennial season has been scheduled for the second fortnight of February. Dr. Koussevitzky is now in Florida, where he went for rest and solitude after the death of his wife on Jan. 11. Through the courtesy of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the co-operation of Eugene Goossens and John Barbirolli, the Philharmonic-Symphony's schedule has been rearranged to permit Dr. Koussevitzky to direct the concerts of Feb. 19, 20, 22, 26, 27, 28 and March 1.

The program for his opening concerts, Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, Feb. 19 and 20, follows:

Concerto in D major for stringed instruments.....C. P. E. Bach
(arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg)
"Quiet City".....Aaron Copland
"Daphnis et Chloe," Suite No. 2....Ravel
Symphony No. 5.....Shostakovich

While Mr. Goossens conducts in New York on Feb. 12, 13, 14 and 15, Mr. Barbirolli will take over the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. Following is the rearranged Philharmonic-Symphony schedule of conductors for the rest of the season:

Feb. 5-8 (four concerts), Fritz Busch; Adolf Busch, soloist. Feb. 12-15 (four concerts), Eugene Goossens; Jascha Heifetz, soloist. Feb. 19-March 1 (seven concerts), Serge Koussevitzky. March 5-8 (four concerts), Eugene Goossens; Yehudi Menuhin, Reginald Stewart, soloists. March 10-22 (eight concerts), John Barbirolli; Zino Francescatti, Rudolf Serkin, John Corigliano, soloists. March 26, 27 (two concerts), Walter Damrosch; Kerstin Thorborg, soloist. March 28-April 7 (four concerts), John Barbirolli; Mishel Piastro, soloist. April 9-14 (four concerts), Bruno Walter. April 16-19 (three concerts), John Barbirolli. April 22, Arturo Toscanini, opening of post-season Beethoven Festival of six concerts.

This Clipping From
THE ART DIGEST
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 1 - 1942

Mme. Koussevitzky Dies

Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, wife of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a sculptor in her own right, died Jan. 11 at her home in Brookline, Mass. She was 61 years old.

Mme. Koussevitzky was born in northern Russia and attended Moscow University. She married her noted husband in 1905 and with him left Russia in 1920 because of his bitterness toward the Bolshevist regime. As a sculptor, Mme. Koussevitzky is known best for her heads of Dr. Koussevitzky, of Jean Sibelius, Finnish composer, and Maurice Ravel, French composer.

This Clipping From
AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
FEB 1 - 1942

HE WON'T CONDUCT

The American Federation of Musicians has decided that Carlos Chavez, the Mexican composer and conductor, will not be allowed to conduct a non-union orchestra such as the Boston Symphony. His engagements as guest conductor of that organization on Feb. 27 and 28 have been cancelled.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
FEB 2 - 1942

Koussevitzky's N. Y. Dates Set

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony at Carnegie Hall for two weeks, starting Feb. 19. This engagement takes the place of the one he cancelled last month because of his wife's death.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 2 - 1942

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct the New York Philharmonic-Symphony concerts of February 19, 20, 22, 26, 27 and 28 and March 1, it was announced today. He was to have directed the concerts of the last two weeks in January, but the death of his wife on January 11 compelled him to postpone his participation in the Philharmonic-Symphony's centennial celebration. In order to bring him here during the latter part of the current month, it has been necessary to rearrange the schedules of other conductors.

Fritz Busch, who ends his engagement next Sunday, will be followed by Eugene Goossens, who will conduct the concerts of February 12, 13, 14 and 15. Mr. Goossens will return after Dr. Koussevitzky's engagement to direct those of March 5, 6, 7 and 8. John Barbirolli, regular conductor of the orchestra, resumes his duties on March 11, and, save for the two concerts to be conducted by Dr. Walter Damrosch on March 26 and 27, will direct all concerts through April 5. Dr. Bruno Walter will conduct those of April 9, 10, 12 and 14, after which Mr. Barbirolli will end the regular subscription season with the concerts scheduled for April 16, 17 and 19. There will be a post-season Beethoven festival of six concerts under the direction of Arturo Toscanini, beginning April 22.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who has been resting in Florida since the death of his wife, returns to Boston this week in time to direct the concerts of the Boston Symphony on February 6 and 7.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 2 - 1942

Negotiations Are Being Continued

A formal vote was taken by trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival meeting in New York over the week end confirming action taken at an informal meeting held a week before in Dalton. At the Dalton meeting the trustees expressed the sentiment that the Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be continued this year and that the finance committee should continue its negotiations with the orchestra for a one-year contract.

This Clipping From
SAN RAFAEL, CALIF.
INDEPENDENT
FEB 2 1942

Jimmy Petrillo Relents

James Caesar Petrillo, big boss of the Musicians Union decided, according to report to "permit" Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the non-union Boston Symphony to conduct—just this once—the New York Philharmonic Symphony. That "great humanitarian" Marshall Field III good angel of the money-losing PM and more recently pouring some of his millions into the Chicago Sun is said to have interceded with Petrillo in Koussevitzky's behalf.

Now isn't that a pretty kettle of fish in this land of the free? Of course the First Lady didn't help the situation any when she sounded off about a picket line at a New York theater lately and—well, we had an incident right close to home it's reported a couple of weeks ago—that temporary unpleasantness at the French society's annual banquet?

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
FEB 1 1942

Cancels Engagements

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, canceled his January engagements with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in grief over the sudden death of his wife. His assigned programs were taken over by Bruno Walter.

This Clipping From
AUSTIN, TEXAS
STATESMAN
FEB 1 1942

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
FEB 2 - 1942

KOUSSEVITZKY SCHEDULE

To Open Season Here With the Philharmonic on Feb. 19

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra for two weeks, starting Feb. 19, it was announced yesterday. The engagement will take the place of the one he canceled last month after his wife's death.

Fritz Busch, who took over the second week of the Russian conductor's original engagement, completed his assignment with the orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. With the exception of Brahms's first Symphony, which was substituted for the Reger Violin Concerto, his program was the same as the one played Thursday and Friday. It was made up of the Mozart-Busoni Overture to "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail," Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and two of Dvorak's Slavonic Dances.

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
FEB 1 - 1942

KOUSSEVITZKY TO RETURN THIS WEEK

Serge Koussevitzky, returning from his rest in the South, will conduct the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concerts will be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, February 6 and 7. The program will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, No. 12. It will also consist of two symphonies: the fifth of Sibelius, in E-flat major; and the Second of Brahms, in D major.

The concert to be given in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, next Thursday evening, February 5, will be conducted by Richard Burgin. The program will consist of the Sinfonietta by Walter Piston, who is on the music faculty of Harvard University; the slow movement and finale of Mahler's Fourth Symphony in G major; and the Symphony No. 5 of Dvorak, "From the New World." Cleora Wood, the noted soprano, will sing the text of the finale of Mahler's symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 2 - 1942

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct the New York Philharmonic-Symphony concerts of February 19, 20, 22, 26, 27 and 28 and March 1, it was announced today. He was to have directed the concerts of the last two weeks in January, but the death of his wife on January 11 compelled him to postpone his participation in the Philharmonic-Symphony's centennial celebration. In order to bring him here during the latter part of the current month, it has been necessary to rearrange the schedules of other conductors.

Fritz Busch, who ends his engagement next Sunday, will be followed by Eugene Goossens, who will conduct the concerts of February 12, 13, 14 and 15. Mr. Goossens will return after Dr. Koussevitzky's engagement to direct those of March 5, 6, 7 and 8. John Barbirolli, regular conductor of the orchestra, resumes his duties on March 11, and, save for the two concerts to be conducted by Dr. Walter Damrosch on March 26 and 27, will direct all concerts through April 5. Dr. Bruno Walter will conduct those of April 9, 10, 12 and 14, after which Mr. Barbirolli will end the regular subscription season with the concerts scheduled for April 16, 17 and 19. There will be a post-season Beethoven festival of six concerts under the direction of Arturo Toscanini, beginning April 22.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who has been resting in Florida since the death of his wife, returns to Boston this week in time to direct the concerts of the Boston Symphony on February 6 and 7.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 2 - 1942

Koussevitzky Will Direct PhilharmonicThisMonth

Schedule Rearranged So He Can Conduct 7 Concerts

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society announced yesterday that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's two-week engagement during its centennial season has been scheduled for the second fortnight of February. Dr. Koussevitzky is now in Florida, where he went for rest and solitude after the death of his wife on Jan. 11. Through the courtesy of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the co-operation of Eugene Goossens and John Barbirolli, the Philharmonic-Symphony's schedule has been rearranged to permit Dr. Koussevitzky to direct the concerts of Feb. 19, 20, 22, 26, 27, 28 and March 1.

The program for his opening concerts, Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, Feb. 19 and 20, follows:

Concerto in D major for stringed instruments.....C. P. E. Bach (arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg)
"Quiet City".....Aaron Copland
"Daphnis et Chloe," Suite No. 2....Ravel
Symphony No. 5.....Shostakovich

While Mr. Goossens conducts in New York on Feb. 12, 13, 14 and 15, Mr. Barbirolli will take over the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. Following is the rearranged Philharmonic-Symphony schedule of conductors for the rest of the season:

Feb. 5-8 (four concerts), Fritz Busch; Adolf Busch, soloist. Feb. 12-15 (four concerts), Eugene Goossens; Jascha Heifetz, soloist. Feb. 19-March 1 (seven concerts), Serge Koussevitzky. March 5-8 (four concerts), Eugene Goossens; Yehudi Menuhin, Reginald Stewart, soloists. March 10-22 (eight concerts), John Barbirolli; Zino Francescatti, Rudolf Serkin, John Corigliano, soloists. March 26, 27 (two concerts), Walter Damrosch; Gerstin Thorborg, soloist. March 28-April 7 (four concerts), John Barbirolli; Mishel Piastro, soloist. April 9-14 (four concerts), Bruno Walter. April 16-19 (three concerts), John Barbirolli. April 22, Arturo Toscanini, opening of post-season Beethoven Festival of six concerts.

This Clipping From
THE ART DIGEST
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 1 - 1942

Mme. Koussevitzky Dies

Mme. Natalya Koussevitzky, wife of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a sculptor in her own right, died Jan. 11 at her home in Brookline, Mass. She was 61 years old.

Mme. Koussevitzky was born in northern Russia and attended Moscow University. She married her noted husband in 1905 and with him left Russia in 1920 because of his bitterness toward the Bolshevist regime. As a sculptor, Mme. Koussevitzky is known best for her heads of Dr. Koussevitzky, of Jean Sibelius, Finnish composer, and Maurice Ravel, French composer.

This Clipping From
AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
FEB 1 - 1942

HE WON'T CONDUCT

The American Federation of Musicians has decided that Carlos Chavez, the Mexican composer and conductor, will not be allowed to conduct a non-union orchestra such as the Boston Symphony. His engagements as guest conductor of that organization on Feb. 27 and 28 have been cancelled.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
FEB 2 - 1942

Koussevitzky's N. Y. Dates Set

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony at Carnegie Hall for two weeks, starting Feb. 19. This engagement takes the place of the one he cancelled last month because of his wife's death.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 2 - 1942

Negotiations Are Being Continued

A formal vote was taken by trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival meeting in New York over the week end confirming action taken at an informal meeting held a week before in Dalton. At the Dalton meeting the trustees expressed the sentiment that the Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be continued this year and that the finance committee should continue its negotiations with the orchestra for a one-year contract.

This Clipping From
SAN RAFAEL, CALIF.
INDEPENDENT
FEB 2 1942

Jimmy Petrillo Relents

James Caesar Petrillo, big boss of the Musicians Union decided, according to report to "permit" Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the non-union Boston Symphony to conduct—just this once—the New York Philharmonic Symphony. That "great humanitarian" Marshall Field III good angel of the money-losing PM and more recently pouring some of his millions into the Chicago Sun is said to have interceded with Petrillo in Koussevitzky's behalf.

Now isn't that a pretty kettle of fish in this land of the free? Of course the First Lady didn't help the situation any when she sounded off about a picket line at a New York theater lately and—well, we had an incident right close to home it's reported a couple of weeks ago—that temporary unpleasantness at the French society's annual banquet?

6.6

This Clipping From
CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

FEB 6 - 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN PHILA. WEDNESDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will give its annual Philadelphia concert at the Academy of Music Wednesday evening, February 11, under the auspices of The Philadelphia Forum.

Dr. Koussevitsky has returned to the orchestra after a short leave on account of the death of his wife.

Dr. Koussevitsky will conduct two symphonies; the Beethoven 6th, "The Pastoral," and the Tchaikovsky's 6th, "The Pathetique." His conducting of the latter should be one of the high spots of the musical season, for he is generally regarded as the greatest living conductor of Russian music.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

FEB 6 - 1942

Koussevitsky Not to Appear

Because of the death of Mme. Koussevitzky, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct no concerts on the current tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Although there is a feeling of loss that the noted conductor will not be here, one's grief is assuaged a bit by the fact that the orchestra will bring with them no less a luminary than Emmanuel Feuermann, cellist, as soloist. Richard Burgin, long-time concertmaster of the orchestra, will conduct.

The program will include the Schumann "Concerto for cello in A minor," Schoenberg's arrangement for orchestra of Beethoven's "Quartet for piano and string quartet, Opus 25" and "The Moldau," Smetana's great tone poem.

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

FEB 6 - 1942

CONDUCTORS OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AND YEARS OF SERVICE

According to the official records, the following is the list of conductors of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the years of their leadership:

George Henschel	1881 - 1884
Wilhelm Gericke	1884 - 1889
Arthur Nikisch	1889 - 1893
Emil Paur	1893 - 1898
Wilhelm Gericke	1898 - 1906
Karl Muck	1906 - 1908
Max Fiedler	1908 - 1912
Karl Muck	1912 - 1918
Henri Rabaud	1918 - 1919
Pierre Monteux	1919 - 1924
Serge Koussevitzky	1924 -

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 7 - 1942

Feurmann to Be Cello Soloist With Boston Symphony Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will have Emanuel Feuermann, 'cellist, as soloist for its program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Thursday evening at 8:30 o'clock. Richard Burgin, concert master, will conduct.

The program will consist of Brahms' quartet for piano and strings in G minor, arranged for orchestra by the compose, Arnold Schoenberg. Schumann's concerto for violincello and orchestra in A minor, with Mr. Feuermann as soloist, and Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
JEWISH EXAMINER

FEB 6 - 1942

Boston Conductor Engaged for Seven Concerts at Carnegie

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society announces that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will direct seven concerts at Carnegie Hall during the last two weeks in February. Through the courtesy of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the cooperation of Eugene Goossens and John Barbirolli the orchestra's schedule has been re-arranged to permit Dr. Koussevitzky to direct the concerts of Feb. 19, 20. 22, 26, 27, 28 and Mar. 1.

Fritz Busch will conduct his last concert this Sunday afternoon at Carnegie. Adolf Busch, his brother, will be the soloist. The program: Overture, "The Fairy Tale of the Lovely Melusine," Mendelssohn; Violin Concerto in D major, Beethoven; Overture to "The Old Maid and the Thief," Menotti; Symphonic Poem, "Blanik", Smetana; Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Funeral March.

Eugene Goossens will take up the baton on Thursday conducting the concerts of Thursday evening, Friday afternoon, Saturday evening and next Sunday afternoon. Jascha Heifetz will be the soloist in the Brahms Concert on Thursday and Friday. The program also includes Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio" in E major, and Weinberger's Lincoln Symphony.

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 7 - 1942

Ruth Posselt Next Symphony Soloist

The fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence will be given at the Metropolitan Theatre a week from next Tuesday evening, Feb. 17, at 8:30. The soloist will be Ruth Posselt, the celebrated violinist, and the conductor, Richard Burgin.

Miss Posselt will be heard in the violin concerto of Samuel Barber, the young American composer, whose reputation has been considerably increased by this recent composition. Mr. Burgin will introduce another work by an American composer, a suite from Aaron Copland's ballet, "Billy the Kid." "Billy the Kid" has had two separate stage productions and many performances as a stage piece. The music describing the career of the young western killer of half a century ago is melodious in character and has a distinct cowboy flavor.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
(B'klyn, Queens Sect.)

FEB 8 - 1942

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Emanuel Feuermann, 'cellist, as soloist, will give the third of its series of five Brooklyn concerts in the Academy Thursday night. The series is under the auspices of the institute, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

FEB 7 - 1942

Boston Symphony Concerts

The last visit but one to New York by the Boston Symphony will include the regular two Carnegie Hall concerts next week. However, instead of Thursday evening the Bostonians will play on Friday evening, and their conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, has scheduled the Beethoven Pastoral Symphony and the Tschaikowsky Pathetique. On Saturday afternoon the list will comprise the Handel Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12, the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius and the Second Symphony of Brahms.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

FEB 7 - 1942

Boston Symphony To Play Tuesday

Emanuel Feuermann to Be Cello Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will visit Springfield to give a concert in the Municipal Auditorium Tuesday evening. Richard Burgin will conduct this concert and Emanuel Feuermann, the famous 'cellist, will appear as soloist with orchestra. Mr. Feuermann will be heard in the "Concerto for Violoncello" of Robert Schumann. The program will open with an orchestration by Arnold Schoenberg of the famous "Quartet of Brahms in G minor for Piano and Strings." Mr. Schoenberg has set this music for an orchestra of symphonic proportions. The closing number will be "The Moldau," the symphonic poem of Friedrich Smetana, the Bohemian composer.

EMANUEL FEUERMANN

Emanuel Feuermann, a native of Galicia, was born in 1902. He has had a long and distinguished career, having made his public debut with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra at the age of 11. He was a famous virtuoso when he first came to this country in 1934, and has since made America his home and taken a brilliant part in our concert life.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

FEB 7 - 1942

Boston Symphony Here Next Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will make its last visit but one of the current season to New York next week on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, with concerts scheduled in Carnegie Hall on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon.

At the Friday evening concert Dr. Koussevitzky will lead the Beethoven "Pastoral" Symphony and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique." The Saturday afternoon program offers Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12, in B minor, Sibelius' Fifth Symphony and the Brahms Second.

Feb 8 1942

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky returned to the conductor's stand of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, after a period of rest in Florida following the death of Mme. Koussevitzky.

As he entered the stage, orchestra and audience rose in greeting, a ceremonial which, so far as the audience is concerned, is usually reserved for the opening and closing concerts of each season.

Following "The Star Spangled Banner"—which the listeners were again invited to sing—Mr. Koussevitzky presented a conservative program of tested favorites: the B-minor Concerto Grosso, No. 12, by Handel; the Fifth Symphony by Sibelius, and the Second Symphony of Brahms.

Under any other circumstances, so familiar a list would be open to the questionings of at least the section of Boston Symphony subscribers who prefer the novelty of music not so well known to them, be it old or new.

Granted that all three works of the current program is a masterpiece each in its way, the proverb about familiarity can exercise a temporary debilitating effect upon that which one hears too often.

Extraordinary Emotional Fire

As it was, Mr. Koussevitzky triumphed yet again by the extraordinary emotional fire of his Brahms and Sibelius. In fact, I am certain that his readings of Sibelius will prove to be among the most remarkable of his achievements.

Any talented conductor with a good orchestra of which he has full command can make the First and Second Sibelius sound as the marvels of color and emotional warmth that they are. But all the rest of the Finnish composer's seven symphonies require a perception beyond the actual notes, a perception that takes a conductor into the innermost substance and spirit of the music.

The style of the Sibelius Fifth is lean and the very antithesis of the outspoken First and Second. This is especially true of the dark first movement and the enigmatic third. With these a conductor will succeed or fail according to his imagination. He can follow all the directions of the score, he can see to it that the playing is correct. But unless his imagination gives him a complete esthetic picture of what the composer intended, the result will be groping and dry.

Mr. Koussevitzky possesses that imagination, and he penetrates to the heart of the music, gaging the effect and intensity of accents, tempo, phrasing and expression in general according to the picture which his imagination has given him. Of equal importance, he demands that the instruments "sing." That, in short, is re-creative conducting, and it is a good deal rarer than many may suppose.

Orchestra Goes to New York

The Brahms went equally well, and like the Sibelius, proceeded in the manner which many Kossevitzky performances have made known to the Boston public. At the end there was a tumult of applause and stamping.

Next week the orchestra goes to New York, and for the fortnight after that, Mr. Koussevitzky will be guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony.

The Boston concerts of Feb. 20 and 21 will be directed by Richard Burgin. The program will honor the New England Conservatory, whose 75th anniversary will be observed that week, with performance of George W. Chadwick's "Tam o' Shanter," and of Liszt's "Death Dance" with Ernst Levy of the Conservatory faculty as piano sololist. Gliere's "Ilia Mouroumetz" Symphony will be presented for what will undoubtedly be the first time in Boston. C. W. D.

OLD FAVORITE AT SYMPHONY

Feb 7, 1942

Dr. Koussevitzky Makes Use of Brahms Again

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Absent from the Symphony concerts for three weeks, while Richard Burgin carried on nobly in his place, Dr. Koussevitzky returned to them yesterday. In point of fact, he flew to Boston Wednesday from Florida, where he had been in retirement following the death of Mme. Koussevitzky on Jan. 11. Under the circumstances there could be but one rehearsal for this 15th pair of concerts, but the nature of the programme made further preparation unnecessary. Both Sibelius' Fifth Symphony and Brahms' Second were performed here last season and Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings in B minor, Opus 6, No. 12, is also a composition with which the orchestra is thoroughly familiar.

An expected soberness and gravity, a perfectly natural reserve and restraint characterized the conductor's outward demeanor yesterday afternoon, but the performances under his direction were as potent as ever.

This particular one of the dozen concertos that Handel composed within the space of a month in 1739 was restored to the orchestra's repertory by Dr. Koussevitzky, himself, after it had gone unheard at Symphony Hall for more than two decades. Its chief glory is the beautiful Larghetto in E major, though the Largo, which was set beside it yesterday, has a pleasingly mysterious quality. The other movements are conventional Handel.

It is beginning to be said that the proponents of Sibelius are killing their idol with kindness. In certain quarters his music has been overpraised; in others it has been overplayed. Take the Symphony of yesterday afternoon for a case in point. There have been 10 performances here since Pierre Monteux introduced it to us in December, 1922, seven of which have taken place within the past nine years. A certain spareness and rude power in the music commended it at first and for a time thereafter, but these are hardly qualities that gain on frequent repetition, though there are passionate Sibelians who will rise in their wrath to deny such an implication.

On a quite different plane stands the Second Symphony of Brahms. It will take a great deal more punishment than any symphony of Sibelius. But has not Dr. Koussevitzky, to pursue the point, been over-faithful to Brahms, as well? There may have been seasons since he came to us when this D major Symphony was not performed. No doubt a search of the records will show that there have been, yet the impression persists that it has been of yearly occurrence. Dr. Koussevitzky's way with the piece is persuasive. It is also more vigorous and, at the end, more exciting than that of certain other conductors. Whether Brahms himself ever visioned such a hair-raising conclusion is open to question. However, its effect upon an audience is bound to be irresistible.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN
FEB 8 - 1942

Burgin to Conduct Concert Tuesday

Emanuel Feurmann, Cellist, Will Be Soloist in the Schumann Concerto for Cello and Orchestra in G-Minor—Koussevitzky's Absence Due to Recent Death of His Wife

A STRIKING attribute of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will be heard at the Auditorium Tuesday evening at 8.30 in the Community Concert series, is the persistence of its individual identity. Thus while subscribers may justifiably regret the absence of Serge Koussevitzky when the orchestra appears here Tuesday, no qualms need be felt that Richard Burgin, who will conduct, will not obtain the same quality of performance that Koussevitzky does. The orchestra will have as soloist the brilliant cellist, Emanuel Feuermann. A native of Galicia, he was born in 1902. He made his public debut with the Vienna Philharmonic orchestra at the age of 11. When he arrived in this country in 1934, he was already a famous virtuoso. Since that time he has made America his home and has taken active part in concert life here.

The program for Tuesday follows:—

Quartet for piano and string in G minor. (Arranged for orchestra by Arnold Schoenberg) ..... Brahms
Concerto for cello and orchestra in A minor, Op 129 ..... Schuman
Vlrava ("The Moldau"), symphonic poem ..... Smetana

To continue a bit on the orchestra itself, it may be pointed out that one unifying force during its 60 years of existence has been the persistent emphasis of all its conductors upon high standards of virtuosity. Interpretative approaches, devotion to a particular composer has varied with leadership, but the demand for fine musicianship from all members of the orchestra has been dominant right from the start.

The late William J. Henderson was one critic qualified to compare the early Boston Symphony orchestra with the present one. He wrote of his recollections of the orchestra which he first heard in New York in 1885:—

"The early Boston orchestra under Gericke was a great one. Its strings were incomparable; its precision and unanimity unsurpassed, the sunlit clarity and perfect balance of its tone unrivaled, the elegant aristocracy of this style unchallenged. They are all gone, those artists who gave us the fresh enthusiasm of those historic days.

RICHARD BURGIN

Conducts Boston symphony Tuesday evening.

"But there is the Boston Symphony organization, still a magnificent instrument, still a company of virtuosi, still a splendid and puissant force in the musical vigor of the country, still under the artistic direction of a conductor of wide vision, Catholic taste, technical mastery, and inexhaustible ardor. Those of us who knew the orchestra in the days of its early visits cherish our memories; but we hold as more precious the living power that continues to project its energy into our musical life."

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
SUNDAY JOURNAL HERALD
FEB 8 - 1942

Berkshire Festival Will Not be Stopped

A definite indication that the Berkshire Music festival will not be stopped this summer comes from Herbert Graf, who announces that not only will the Berkshire Music Center be open but his department—the opera department—will be expanded. In addition to the regular training for opera singers of the past seasons, the department will give a course in opera production designed to serve as a working laboratory for composers, librettists, stage directors and conductors. The actual creation and performance of a modern opera are planned.

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Feb 7 1942

Symphony Concert

The 15th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Concerto Grosso for strings in B minor No. 12 ..... Handel
Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 82 ..... Sibelius
Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 73. Brahms

Mr. Koussevitzky's return to Boston and the orchestra yesterday was quite properly the signal for a prolonged and sincerely meant ovation. The audience rose to its feet as he turned the corner and walked towards his stand, and it remained standing through the customary performance of the "Star Spangled Banner." Incidentally, we are all becoming musically self-conscious about the way the national anthem is played these days. For instance, Mr. Horowitz the other day built it up almost into a show piece for piano, whereas Mr. Smeterlin played it simply and straight. Mr. Koussevitzky takes it slower than anyone else, with the not inappropriate result that it gains in solemnity.

The program was conservative and familiar. Sibelius, of course, is still alive, but nobody would consider him a modern or "difficult" composer. The 4th Symphony might be an exception to that last adjective, but the 5th is plain sailing. The manner in which he deals with his themes in this work is analagous to a shrewd card player, who exposes his hand cautionsly and bit by bit until suddenly he swoops down with all he has and takes every trick for a grand slam. The comparison may not be perfect, but it will serve to describe a salient feature of Sibelius's style.

In time we may hazard that the 5th Symphony will become even more popular than the currently more familiar 2nd. Its last movement, for one thing, is quite as thrilling when you come to know it, and it is much better built, being both less obvious and less diffuse. The isolated closing chords at the end are one of the most exciting moments in symphonic literature.

Philip Hale wrote of the 5th Symphony that it contained "not a sensuous note, not a single bid for immediate popularity." He also said that Sibelius "snaps his fingers at decorations, at sensational effects, at sugared pages sure to please." This may have been true enough at the time the 5th Symphony was first played, but time plays curious tricks with new works of art. Twenty-five years later you listen to this same work and find in it a good deal of just those characteristics which Mr. Hale declared to be non-existent. The public ought to pity critics, instead of abusing us, for our sober truth and keen preception of today are arrant nonsense tomorrow.

The Brahms 2nd Symphony is second nature to most concert-goers today and, if not, it soon will be. We positively envy anyone hearing it for the first time. This Handel Concerto Grosso has too many slow movements for our taste. We have a possibly childish fondness for Handel when he is either grand or jolly, less of a liking for his solemn and tender mood in which this particular concerto abounds.

Mr. Koussevitzky brought tremendous emotional force and inspiration to his reading of the two symphonies, and the results were good to hear. This will have to do as critical enthusiasm for fine playing. The condensed milk school of criticism, which can turn out columns of gush at a moment's notice, would be the logical process. Doubtless this concert would justify such a review, but happily there is now not enough space!

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra is in New York, and on Feb. 20 and 21 Mr. Burgin will conduct Chadwick's "Tam o' Shanter"; Liszt's Todtentanz, with Ernst Levy as the piano soloist; and Gliere's Symphony No. 3, "Ilia Mourometz."

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN
FEB 8 - 1942

Not Going to Concert?—Give Your Ticket to USO

The Community Concert association last night appealed to ticket-holders who do not plan to attend the Boston Symphony orchestra concert at the Auditorium Tuesday night to do a good turn for men in the service. That their places may be filled for the concert they were urged to call the USO information center, 7-2931, and report the numbers of their seats. The USO will issue passes to applicants among the service men so that they can hear the famous Boston musicians. Do this good deed as soon as possible, the Concert association urged.

67

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 8 - 1942

A FAMILY AFFAIR will be the Violin Concerto of Samuel Barber as performed here Feb. 17 by the Boston Symphony. Richard Burgin will conduct, with Ruth Posselt, his wife, as the soloist.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
FEB 8 - 1942

STUDIO

Hiatus in a Feud—A Berle?—The Gover

WHEN James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, recently authorized the New York Philharmonic-Symphony to play under the non-union Serge Koussevitzky, there was more in his gracious nod than might have appeared at first glance. For two of the concerts fall on a Sunday—Feb. 22 and March 1—and Sunday is the day the Philharmonic takes to the air over WABC. But as long ago as August, 1940, Mr. Petrillo banned Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony from the ether, saying tersely, "They're through. We've taken them off the air and off the records."

What, Mr. Petrillo's office was asked the other day, would be done about the broadcasting of Dr. Koussevitzky's concerts on Feb. 22 and March 1?

"We're going to let him go on," said Mr. Petrillo's office.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 8 - 1942

Posselt With Symphony

Ruth Posselt, celebrated violinist, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its fourth concert here on Feb. 17. Richard Burgin will again be the conductor Miss Posselt will be heard in the Violin Concerto of Samuel Barber, the young American composer, whose reputation has been considerably increased by this recent composition. A Suite from Aaron Copland's Ballet, "Billy the Kid," will be another American work on Burgin's program. It has been seen many times on the stage, and the music describing the young Western killer of half a century ago, has been hailed as melodious and having a distinct flavor.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
FEB 8 - 1942

Koussevitzky Lists 2 6th Symphonies

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give its annual Philadelphia concert at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, under the auspices of the Philadelphia Forum.

Dr. Koussevitzky has returned to the orchestra after a short leave on account of the death of his wife last month.

The conductor has programmed the two greatest Sixth Symphonies; the Beethoven "Pastoral" and the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique." This concert thus follows Koussevitzky's well-known predilection of programs composed exclusively of two symphonies, such as three years ago when he played works of Beethoven and Sibelius for the Forum.

It also affords the opportunity, for those fortunate enough to hear both performances, of comparing the interpretations of the "Pathetique" by two of the greatest living conductors with this country's two leading orchestras—Toscanini with the Philadelphians last Friday and last night, and Koussevitzky with the Bostonians next Wednesday.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
FEB 9 - 1942

'CELLIST IS SOLOIST FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY, SOLDIERS WANT SEATS

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert in the Municipal auditorium tomorrow night at 8.30. Richard Burgin will conduct this community concert and Emanuel Feuermann, the famous cellist, will appear as soloist.

Mr Feuermann will be heard in the Concerto for Violincello of Robert Schumann. The program will open with an orchestration by Arnold Schoenberg of the famous Quartet of Brahms in G minor for Piano and Strings. Mr Schoenberg has set this music for an orchestra of symphonic proportions. The closing number will be "The Moldau," the symphonic poem of Friedrich Smetana, the Bohemian composer.

Emanuel Feuermann, a native of Galicia, was born in 1902. He has had a long and distinguished career, having made his public debut with the Vienna Philharmonic orchestra at the age of 11. He was a famous virtuoso when he first came to this country in 1934, and has since made America his home and taken a brilliant part in our concert life. Dr Koussevitzky has not conducted since the recent death of his wife.

Those not planning to use their tickets are asked to call the USO office, so that these seats may be made available to service men who have been asking the Community Concert association for a chance to hear the program.

Dr. Koussevitzky Returns

By L. A. Sloper

Dr. Koussevitzky returned to Symphony Hall yesterday for the fifteenth Friday afternoon concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Audience and orchestra rose in welcome to him, and when the Brahms Second Symphony had brought the program to a close there was an ovation, with "bravos" and cheers. The other numbers were Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, No. 12, for string orchestra, and the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, in E flat.

Sibelius, ordinarily one of the stand-bys of the repertory, has been rather neglected this season. In fact, this is the first time his name has appeared on a symphony program. Was this because of political developments? Possibly; did not Mr. Sherwood finally withdraw "There Shall Be No Night"? And does the restoration of Sibelius mean that Dr. Koussevitzky believes Finland will soon be free of its unholy alliance? Or merely that he regards Sibelius as a natural companion to Handel and Brahms?

However that may be, the conductor secured a stirring performance of the Symphony in E flat. As I listened to it, I wondered how long the Finnish master will remain in his present high standing with English and American symphonic conductors and public. Have we perhaps been overwhelmed by the impact of his music, which depends so much upon its emotional tension and its frequent crescendos? Clearly there is a good deal of Wagner and of Tchaikovsky in Sibelius; it may be argued in fact that in Sibelius you find the essence of the Tchaikovskyan and the Wagnerian styles. How long, then, will Wagner and Tchaikovsky and Sibelius last, as compared with Bach and Haydn and Mozart? Which is more enduring, emotional tension or aesthetic form?

The Brahms was presented with extraordinary eloquence. Indeed, with the exception of a couple of rough places in the brass, the orchestra played magnificently throughout the afternoon.

Next week the orchestra will be away on its regular visit to New York. The symphony concerts of the following week will honor the seventy-fifth anniversary of the New England Conservatory of Music. Richard Burgin will conduct, and the soloist will be Ernst Lévy, of the Conservatory faculty, and formerly of Switzerland. He will be piano soloist in Liszt's "Todtentanz." The program will open with the Ballade for orchestra, "Tam o' Shanter," by the late George W. Chadwick, director of the Conservatory from 1897 to 1931. The final number will be Glière's Symphony No. 3, in B minor, "Ilia Mourometz," which will have its first performance in Boston.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
FEB 8 - 1942

Symphony Concert Thursday

Boxholders for Event Announced

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the third concert of the 1941-42 Brooklyn season in the Opera House at the Academy of Music, Thursday evening. The following box holders for this concert have been announced by Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, executive chairman of the Brooklyn committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts. Mrs. Frederick B. Pratt, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Admiral E. J. Marquart, commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, the Brooklyn Woman's Club, the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy, the Brooklyn Friends School, Packer Collegiate Institute and Poly Prep Country Day School.

Emanuel Feuermann, 'cellist, will be the soloist and the orchestra will be conducted by Richard Burgin in a program including works by Brahms, Schumann and Smetana.

Under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn Committee these concerts are presented for the 58th season in Brooklyn.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
FEB 10 1942

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ARRIVES FOR CONCERT

The Boston Symphony orchestra arrived in this city today to give a concert tonight at 8.30 in the Municipal auditorium. The program, the third in the current series of community concerts, will be directed by Richard Burgin, concertmaster.

The program will include a Schonberg arrangement of a Brahms quartet, the Schumann cello concerto with Emanuel Feuermann as soloist and "The Moldau" by Smetana.

Those not using their tickets are asked to call the USO office, so that service men may hear the program.

This Clipping From CARLISLE, PA
SENTINEL
FEB 10 1942

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, cancelled his January engagements with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in grief over the sudden death of his wife. His assigned programs were taken over by Bruno Walter.

Ruth Posselt To Play In Providence

Soloist Feb. 17 On Boston Symphony Orchestra Program

The fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence will be given at the Metropolitan Theatre next Tuesday, Feb. 17, at 8:30. The soloist will be Ruth Posselt, the celebrated violinist, and the conductor, Richard Burgin. Miss Posselt will be heard in the Violin Concerto of Samuel Barber, the young American composer, whose reputation has been considerably increased by this recent composition. Mr. Burgin will introduce another work by an American composer: A Suite from Aaron Copland's Ballet, "Billy the Kid." "Billy the Kid" has had two separate stage productions and many performances as a stage piece. The music describing the career of the young Western killer of half a century ago is melodious in character and has a distnict cowboy flavor.

Miss Posselt, (now Mrs. Richard Burgin) gave a recital in the ballroom of the New Bedford Hotel on May 24, 1935. Mrs. Andrew G. Pierce Jr. sponsored the concert and her commitee included Mrs. Arthur V. Pierce, whose late husband, Dr. A. V. Pierce, was a relative of the violinist; Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs of Boston and Marion; Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller and Mrs. Charles S. French, soprano, of Boston.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
FEB 10 1942

E. B. DANE, BROOKLINE, DEAD AT 73

Widely Known for His Philanthropies for Years

Ernest B. Dane, Brookline's leading citizen and benefactor, died at his estate in Centre Harbor, N. H., yesterday, following a short illness. He was 73.

Born and brought up in Brookline,

Continued on Page 7—Sixth Col.

[illegible] south of Moscow.

ERNEST B. DANE OF BROOKLINE DIES

Continued From First Page

where he spent his life working for the improvement of the town, his passing is mourned by rich and poor alike.

NOTED FOR PHILANTHROPY

He was known to the wealthy as the capable director of many successful private and public enterprises and poor families of Brookline remember him as the man who gave Thanksgiving dinners to the needy for the last 30 years.

As president and treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he is remembered by music lovers throughout New England as the philanthropist who many times lent financial aid to the orchestra.

Active in Brookline politics, his popularity among the voters was demonstrated by the fact that, as chairman of the tree-planting committee since 1909 and a member of the committe[illegible] since 1906, he had been [illegible] office annually by an [illegible] vote. When his nam[illegible] on the ballot in municipa[illegible] last March, voters once again [illegible] in the largest vote on the ticket.

His popularity increased during the first World war when he headed Brookline public safety and other war activities. He directed several Liberty Bond drives, setting a fine example by purchasing thousands of dollars worth of bonds with his own funds, headed several Community Fund campaigns during the last 30 years and many times directed the drives of the local Red Cross Chapter in Brookline.

Taken Ill Saturday

A graduate of Harvard in 1892, he was a director of the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company, a director of the Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Company, president of the Brookline Trust Company and for many years a director of the Merchants National Bank of Boston.

As a philanthropist, his name appears on the lists of benefactors of nearly every Brookline church and charitable institution. He was a member of the Unitarian Church of Brookline for many years.

Stricken last Saturday night, he died Sunday afternoon. Funeral services will be held at 12 o'clock noon Tuesday from the Brookline Unitarian Church. The Rev. George Parker will officiate. Burial will take place in the Walnut Hill Cemetery, Brookline, of which he was a trustee for many years.

He leaves his wife, the former Helen Pratt of Brooklyn, N. Y., and two sons, Ernest B. Dane, Jr., of Newport, R. I., and Edward Dane, a member of the Brookline selectmen.

On behalf of the Brookline selectmen, Chairman William J. Hickey, Jr., said: "He was Brookline's leading citizen and benefactor. His death is a tremendous loss to rich and poor alike."

This Clipping From CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN
FEB 11 1942

Petrillo and Tibbett Sign Union Peace

Musicians' Guild Wins Authority In Concert Field

New York, Feb. 10.—The long fight between the American Federation of Musicians and the American Guild of Musical Artists ended amicably today.

James Caesar Petrillo, former trumpet player and now president of the A. F. of M., signed the peace with Lawrence Tibbett, baritone and president of A. G. M. A. The settlement of the fight, which began in September, 1940, brought to an end a controversy which affected such virtuosos as Jascha Heifitz, Alfred Spalding, Emanuel Feurermann, and the leading symphony orchestras. Petrillo forbade members of the federation from appearing with soloists who were not in his union.

His order made it almost impossible for the virtuosos to play with the leading symphonies, all of which, with the exception of the Boston Symphony orchestra, are members of the A. F. of M.

Under the settlement, each side compromised. A. G. M. A. recognized the jurisdiction of the A. F. of M. over concert solo instrumentalists and accompanists in all fields. The federation recognized A. G. M. A.'s authority over all solo concert artists "for the purposes of their activities in the concert field only."

A lawsuit to which the A. G.-M. A. is plaintiff, now pending in the Supreme court, shall be promptly discontinued, said attorneys.

Musical Celebrities Soon to Appear on Concert Stages

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, returning from his rest in the South, will conduct the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concerts will be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 6 and 7.

The program will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, No. 12. It will also consist of two symphonies: the Fifth of Sibelius, in E flat major; and the second of Brahms, in D major.

The concert to be given in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, next Thursday evening, February 5, will be conducted by Richard Burgin. The program will consist of the Sinfonietta by Walter Piston, who is on the music faculty of Harvard University; the slow movement and finale of Mahler's Fourth Symphony in G major; and the Symphony No. 5 of Dvorak, "From the New World." Cleora Wood, the noted soprano, will sing the text of the finale of Mahler's symphony.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
FEB 11 1942

LED BY BURGIN, SYMPHONY GIVES SUPERB CONCERT

Auditorium Filled, Many of Audience Being Men in U. S. Uniforms

By Willard M. Clark

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third of the Community Concerts last night before an audience that filled the Auditorium and contained many men in uniform, as those persons not using their tickets made them available to the boys through the offices of the USO.

Remains Superb

In the absence of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra was conducted by its concertmaster, Richard Burgin, also assistant conductor. Those who had lamented the failure of Dr. Koussevitzky to conduct must have learned one thing—the Boston Symphony Orchestra remains a superb ensemble no matter who conducts. This is not meant to detract from the abilities of Mr. Burgin who gave straightforward interpretations of each number and conducted with a violence almost equal Koussevitzky at his best.

For the first time in many years the orchestra brought a soloist, Emanuel Feuermann, cellist. He was asked to play the Schumann Concerto for Cello and Orchestra in A minor. This is not one of Schumann's finest efforts. It is weak melodically and the orchestration is often heavy and muddy. However, great artist that he is, Mr. Feuermann made the work sound infinitely better than it is. His astonishing technique, his suave, round tone and his magnificent musicianship combined to bring new life to the concerto. He is admirably assisted in this by the orchestra.

The program opened with Brahm's "Quartet for piano and strings in G minor" arranged for orchestra by Arnold Schoenberg. To turn chamber music into a work of symphonic character is a difficult and dangerous undertaking. Mr. Schoenberg accomplished this feat neatly, master craftsman that he is. He has not indulged in many Schoenbergisms and has kept the outlines of the four movements well in the foreground. The third and fourth movements are quite thrilling, sung as they are with full voice. There is a bit of pedestrianism in the first two movements and the melodic content is nowhere nearly as effective as that used in the latter movements. There seems no real reason why such works should be orchestrated, except that it provides additional material and, in some cases, vehicles for virtuoso display.

The program concluded with a stunning performance of Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vltava," better known as "The Moldau." This is highly descriptive music of a river as it winds through Bohemia, encounters rapids, and then moves majestically on its way. Mr. Burgin gave a splendid reading, rich in colors and rhythms. It was through such works that Smetana strove to establish an active musical culture in his country, which should be in accord with the character and tradition of his people. He was less fortunate than Dvorak, for Dvorak was freed early from the influences of his native country, but the music of the Bohemian Smetana still remains to tell of his country quite simply, and always beautifully.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
FEB 11 1942

Boston Symphony Gives An Unusual Concert Here

Richard Burgin, Concert Master, Conducts Great Orchestra in Schumann Concerto, Schoenberg's Transcription of Brahms Quartet, and Smetana's Tone Poem, 'The Moldau'

By FRANCIS REGAL

Choice, interesting and unusual was the concert given last night at the Auditorium by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which was heartily welcomed back to the Community course after skipping one season. It was unusual in that the orchestra was led by the distinguished concert master and assistant conductor instead of by Dr Koussevitsky, and also in the collaboration of a soloist in a concerto. But the program was unusual, too, and not least in the inclusion of a masterpiece of chamber music transcribed for orchestra.

This left but one item of straight orchestral music, a fact which was unusual in itself and would have been made even more so by the choice of Smelana's "Moldau" if current events had not quickened public interest in that beautiful work by a highly gifted Czech composer. Altogether it was an admirable program for the baton of a concert master who ex officio can always be counted upon for fineness, whatever other qualities as a leader he may possess, and Richard Burgin's leadership is firstrate.

Schumann Concerto

Ordinarily the programs at these concerts have followed the main stream of orchestral music, as is wise in addressing a public which hears comparatively few concerts by a great orchestra. Yet too strict an adherence to this principle would leave no chance of hearing various kinds of interesting music, including works composed for a solo instrument and orchestra. Nor does the modern canalization of concert giving leave much room for instrumental virtuosi, and it would have been a pity to miss either the Schumann violoncello concerto or the admirable interpretation of it by Emanuel Feuermann, a fine artist as well as a virtuoso of unexcelled skill in an age of excellence.

Skill to the utmost is needed to make the Schumann concerto agreeable to the casual listener, for while it abounds in beautiful passages and is thoroughly characteristic of the composer, it does not fit the instrument as his piano concerto fits the keyboard. The lovely air of the slow movement, with its double-stopping for the solo part, is always a great favorite, and is sometimes heard detached as a solo number. But the rapid passages in those parts of the work in which tradition gives virtuoso display its chance are so little congenial that only superlative skill can make them sound anything but crabbed, or the pattern of the music as anything but crabbed.

It was as convincing a proof of Mr Feuermann's musicianship as of his virtuosity that he was able to give smooth and sonorous expression even to figures which run most against the grain and to tie the whole work together in clear and cumulative unity. High praise must also be given to the skill and discretion with which the orchestra gave the solo performer a chance without sinking into insipidity.

That Schumann loved the cello may be seen from his chamber music, but his musical expression was often thick and cloudy, so that so mellow and suave an instrumental voice is put at a disadvantage. Mr Feuermann, fortunately, is able to produce without excessive scratching a sufficiently incisive tone to make the musical intention clear, and the ensemble was excellent. Both soloist and orchestra were heartily applauded.

Of the three works presented the one which provoked most curiosity was Arnold Schoenberg's transcription for orchestra of the quartet in G minor for piano and strings by Brahms with which the program opened. This version is not specially new, having been made in 1937, but it had not been heard hereabouts and reports in regard to it were conflicting. Interest was the greater because this quartet is a work in regard to which there has always been much argument even among those who concede its greatness. Is there too much of it? Does the score overload the piano and strings? Is the first movement unclear and the Hungarian finale too noisy and orchestral? Over such questions the army of amateurs has long wrangled, and this quartet, while greatly admired, has not usually been thought so satisfactory as the one in A major.

"Age of Transcription"

This should be a sufficient justification for Schoenberg's orchestral version, and anyhow the musical world is evidently moving into an age of transcription as old favorites wear out and novelties by the great masters have to be dug up. The crucial question is the spirit in which the transformation is made, and while some of the sound effects in the Schoenberg score are distinctly of our time it may be that in this particular work Brahms would have relished their piquancy. It may fairly be said also that the score makes out a good case for the arranger, since the music, particularly in the long and elaborate first movement, comes out more clearly and in better proportion than when it is given in quartet form. It constitutes, in fact, a new and interesting orchestral work by Brahms of the same order of magnitude as his four symphonies and destined, perhaps, to share their growing popularity. Mr Burgin gave it exquisitely and with plenty of fire in the gypsy tunes of the finale.

Both the limpid beauty and the surging emotions of Smetana's tone poem were finely developed by Mr Burgin and the orchestra and this number brought an inspiring program to a satisfying close. Czechoslovakia's tragedy has stirred sympathetic interest in its rich and colorful mus[illegible] an[illegible] nowhere, not even in "Finlandia," does love of country flow more strongly than in this musical commentary on the course of a famous river, as dear to Slavs as the Rhine is to Teutons. Smetana is hardly a major composer, for his major works are few, but each of them has a special quality, partly personal and partly racial and national, which has won for his music a distinct place in the hearts of music lovers.

Perhaps a Czech, who knows intimately the Moldau in its various phases, can see in Smetana's musical interpretation at which the foreigner can only guess "old familiar far-off things and battles long ago." But no sympathetic ear in any part of the world could fail to respond to the cumulative effect of this torrential music, which loiters in the shallows only to rush on with the greater power. The music is repetitious, but so is the flow of a river, and the composer has managed to get the piling up of emotional stress without monotony. It is not surprising that this potent Slavic music is banned in Nazidom.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
FEB 11 1942

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Fine, Unusual Program

The concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra here have been as many as its years, but it is doubtful if ever the men from the Hub ever played so unusual a program for Springfield concert goers as they did last night. Yet it was not alone the surprise that made the third Community concert of the current season so memorable.

The applause that greeted each of the three selections bespoke not only the affection for "our own" orchestra, but the regard of the capacity audience at the Municipal Auditorium for the conductor, Richard Burgin and for the soloist, Emanuel Feuermann, the cellist.

Mr Feuermann gave a virtuoso performance of the Schumann cello "Concerto in A minor," while the program opened with a Schoenberg transcription of the Brahms "Quartet in G minor for piano and strings" and closed with Smetana symphonic poem "Vlatava" or, as it is more familiarly known, "The Moldau" from the river which gives it its name. Perhaps the final selection has been played in this city before, but certainly the other two were newcomers except for that portion of the concerto which is sometimes given as a solo.

Since the death of Serge Koussevitzky's wife, he has not conducted, but the orchestra was in capable hands last night when Richard Burgin stepped across the platform to the podium from the concertmaster's seat. His nervousness at the start was apparent but no hint of it cropped up during the actual performance. Granted that so fine an organization could go through the familiar orchestral repertory in moderately successful fashion without a conductor, the intricacies of the Brahms score and the problems imposed by the necessity for proper balance between orchestra and soloist made his presence not only vital, but inspiring.

He is no mere stick waver, his cues being exact and his tempos designed to keep the compositions from dragging. On the podium, he is a little reminiscent of Ormandy, except that he has a full dark thatch of hair where the Philadelphian has a golden halo.

What Schoenberg has accomplished with the Brahms score is virtually to create a fifth symphony. At times the score hints that Mr Schoenberg is going to have more to say than Mr Brahms, but it is a resonant, close knit transcription. Burgin is too canny an ensemble player not to make the most of the grateful score. Since Americans put such a premium on size, transcriptions serve to make available many a gem that might readily be overlooked because it "takes only four men to play it."

Of Mr Feuermann's performance, it can be said that Springfield itself has not heard such excellent playing in many years, though those who could hear Piatigorsky at Mount Holyoke last Friday are still singing his praises. Mr Feuermann's tone is luscious and the double stopping and other tricks which are demanded came off easily. The impression that lasts is that the soloist loves his instrument and his romantic approach was exactly what the concerto needed. The orchestral portion was deft and properly balanced.

The melodic Smetana score with its purling introduction and its cascading climaxes is good playing and good listening. One advantage of deviating from the customary formula of a symphony or even two is that works such as this get a hearing. Like Beethoven, Smetana suffered from deafness, yet the last 10 years of his life were fruitful ones, this work being among the testimonials to his creative ability. It was poetically done.

There must have been some strange ghosts flitting about the hall last night when Burgin began the national anthem, for it was Dr Muck's alleged refusal to play it a quarter of a century ago when we had just entered another war that led to his eventual arrest as an "enemy alien" even though he was a Swiss citizen. Today, we know that Muck did not refuse, but that he was the victim when Major Higginson held that "The Star Spangled Banner" had no place on a concert program. Last night we had the anthem, and the ghosts must have had a chuckle.

The next concert in the series comes March 9 when John Charles Thomas sings. At that time, there will be balloting for next year's artists.

J. D. D.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
FEB 12 1942

Boston Orchestra at Forum

Offers 'Pastoral' and 'Pathetique' Symphonies

By HENRY PLEASANTS

THE superlative Boston Symphony Orchestra visited the Academy of Music, last night, for its annual Forum concert under the direction of its justly celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

The program, devoted to the sixth symphonies of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky, was a challenge both to the resources and to the vision of the orchestra and its leader. The challenge was met in a memorable manner.

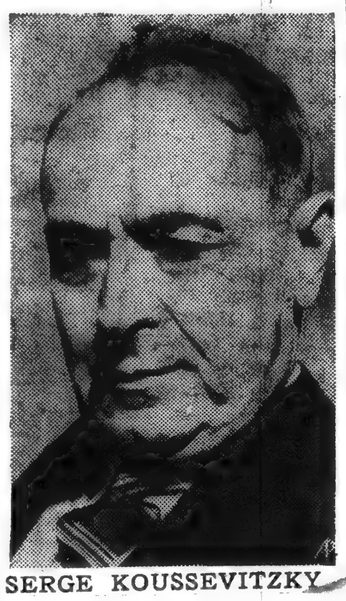
Both performances bore the imprint of Mr. Koussevitzky's forceful personality. The Boston Orchestra, in its fine integration and unity of purpose and style, is an expression of this domination by a great leader. One is hardly conscious of the individual players, brilliant and accomplished as they are. Every phrase and every shade of tone color is controlled from the podium.

Conducting of this kind is needed for the type of music played last night. It is music of great dimensions and broad vision, and the interpreter must be a man of much imagination with a grasp and control of large forms. Mr. Koussevitzky is such a conductor. Lesser music can be cleverly conducted and sound the better for it. Great music must be greatly conducted, or sound less great.

One felt, last night, how deeply Mr. Koussevitzky has seen into the creative spirits that lie behind the notes of these two very different symphonies. He felt the serenity, the joy of living and the love of nature in Beethoven's "Pastorale," and he sensed the hardly controlled hysteria, the anxiety and melancholy of the "Pathetique."

And his was the control and the repose which can project the serenity of the "Pastorale" and at the same time keep it moving and alive; and which can project the mental and emotional agonies of the "Pathetique" without succumbing to them.

It was an evening of memorable music making by a fine orchestra and a commanding and sensitive leader. And it was received with appropriate enthusiasm.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
FEB 12 1942

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Orchestra in Two '6th Symphonies'

By LINTON MARTIN

Serge Koussevitszky held just a pair of symphonic sixes in his baton hand when the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to the Academy last night for its annual Forum concert. But by the time he had finished with the sixth symphonies of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky, respectively, they were orchestral aces that won an ovation for maestro and musicians which testified eloquently to the impression produced by the electrifying performance.

Beethoven's "Pastoral" (or Disney's "Fantasia") Symphony, and the "Pathetique" of Tchaikovsky do not, on paper, sound like the most exciting and stimulating symphonic fare for an entire concert.

BRILLIANT PERFORMANCE

But performance is another matter, when that performance happens to be the kind that Koussevitzky gave—a performance that was further revelation of the distinguished conductor's powers and of the brilliance of the Boston band.

Indeed, local pride and patriotism forbid any comparisons too pointed between the "Pathetique" as it was played by the Boston Symphony last night under Koussevitzky, and the same symphony as presented on the same stage just last week by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Toscanini's baton. For Koussevitzky's "Pathetique" has an emotional eloquence that carries with it a sense of being utterly right, perhaps because this conductor brings to it the requisite Russian state of soul and spirit.

TIDE UNDER CONTROL

Koussevitzky's reading of the "Pathetique" had the effect of holding under control a surging, irresistible tide, rather than of striving to push it. His approach, in the opening adagio, was deliberate in the extreme. But it held the portent of fire and fury to come, and that portent was fulfilled.

Each movement of the "Pathetique" was given a clear-cut quality of its own, yet each was part of the complete canvas, though the symphony is anything but an artistically integrated picture. The stirring march of the third movement was followed by a spontaneous burst of applause, and the composite effect of the entire work was a fresh revelation of what has become too frayed by familiarity.

TURNS PAGES OF SCORE

The only anomalous aspect of this performance of the "Pathetique" was that Koussevitzky turned the pages of a score every note of which must be engraved on the tablets of his mind and memory.

The Beethoven "Pastoral," which opened the concert, was radiant in its spring-like freshness and its vividly pictorial quality. But it was manifestly not as close to the conductor's sympathies and understanding as the Tchaikovsky, and it was given a more objective reading.

AUDIENCE SINGS ANTHEM

But in any case, the rare visits of the Boston Symphony are richly rewarding, especially in these days, because of the superb brilliance of the orchestral tone and Koussevitzky's commanding qualities as a conductor who disdains facile, superficial effects and empty attitudinizing. William K. Huff has performed a great service in bringing this orchestra to Philadelphia for the Forum.

Before the regular concert, Koussevitzky asked the audience to sing "The Star-Spangled Banner" with the orchestra, and he conducted it in a fashion that was anything but perfunctory. The response was rousing.

ent appears to stand
e rest. The performance
ius ran true to form, listener convinced once heroic proportions and peal.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD
FEB 12 1942

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Concert for Forum

By ARTHUR BRONSON

That patrician of musical organizations, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was here last night in its annual concert for the Philadelphia Forum. And, as usual, it brought us the outstanding visiting music event of the season.

The Academy was jammed with music lovers and musicians in anticipation of such an occasion. They weren't disappointed, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and his brilliant Bostonians furnishing an evening as exquisite as the occasion was memorable.

Only Two Numbers.

There were only two numbers on the program, the Sixth Symphonies of Beethoven (the "Pastorale") and Tchaikovsky (the "Pathetique").

We never thought those two staid, overworked compositions could ever serve again for such a superb, exciting performance. They made a beautiful contrast, the "Pastorale" with its peace and serenity, the "Pathetique" for its sorrow and despair. The Bostonians pointed up this contrast vividly.

The "Pastorale," which came first, not only showed off the Bostonians in their utter precocity, but set a standard for the symphony's performance likely to remain unequaled in this city.

We can't remember when silken strings or virtuoso woodwinds were in so fine a balance, or when such beautifully shaded choirs could render Beethoven's sunny symphony so sheer and ethereal.

There was no heaviness or drag to this particular rural painting. It was not only charming; it was exquisite. Such gossamer treatment by the Bostonians gave it a golden glow we never thought it had.

Koussevitzky's performance of the "Pathetique" will of course invite comparisons with that of Toccanini and the Philadelphians last week-end. Toscanini's "Pathetique" is in the Italian style, lyric rather than lachrymose. Yet it is too refined.

In the Russian Tradition.

Koussevitzky's of course, is closer to the Russan tradition. He lets the composer weep unprestrained, without adding any tears of his own. It isn't the overpowering "weltschmerziges" "Pathetique" of a Stokowski, but it is overwhelmingly eloquent nevertheless.

Although not as well played last night as the "Pastorale," with a first movement taken somewhat at too deliberate a pace, this "Pathetique" was still a superb work, as musical as it was exciting.

The audience, for instance, isn't likely to forget soon the thrill of the third movement, taken in strict tempo, done in mounting, frenzied excitement. Nor the searching, abysmal sorrow of the finale, awesome in its sweep and power. It climaxed an evening of near-perfection.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
FEB 13 1942

Labor Notes

AFL and CIO unions pledged to buy $10,000 worth of tickets for the Navy Relief Show at Madison Square Garden on Mar. 10. . . . The AFL announced it was sweeping NLRB elections among Western Union employees throughout the country and that it expets to have the entire system unionized before 1943. . . . Joseph D. Basson, who was defeated for re-election in the Motion Picture Machine Operators Union (AFL) last December, has been appointed a special representative of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees (AFL).

The Columbia Broadcasting System is giving no publicity to Serge Koussevitsky's scheduled concerts until it obtains permission to broadcast them from James C. Petrillo, head of the American Federation of Musicians. . . . United Automobile Workers (CIO) spokesmen here announce the organization spends more on education and recreation for its members than any other union.

An increase in unemployment insurance payments in December, following a downward trend of seven months, reflected for the first time on any significant scale the effect of priorities on jobs, according to the Social Security Board. . . . The Textile Workers Union of America (CIO) appealed to the government to reopen the Sommersville Mills in Connecticut which were shut last Monday by a dispute over union recognition.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
FEB 13 1942

64

Concert Attracts Society

Boston Symphony Heard Following Dinner Parties

Music lovers gathered at the Academy of Music last evening to enjoy the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in Brooklyn. Many subscribers entertained their guests at dinner preceding the concert.

Mrs. Benjamin Prince, hostess, in Box 3, gave a dinner party at the Hotel Bossert to her guests, Mr. :Donald, Mr. rothy Scott, , Mrs. Wil- d Mrs. Karp had as her d Mrs. Sid- and Mrs. d Mr. and e gave a me on St. Mrs. Don- and Mrs. Theodore . Fawcett. e, hostess e Rev. Dr. , Mr. and t and the illiam J. Box were tock and W. Bur- ift, Mrs. s. Robert G. Car- nd Mrs. Admiral ndant of rs. Mar- Slater, s. Lloyd Adelphi on's box, Ogg, her Parker

Music in Review

By JULES WOLFFERS

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Audience and orchestra rose from their seats when Dr. Koussevitzky came on the platform, last week, to conduct the fifteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall. This spontaneous tribute expressed, at once, the sincere regret for the occurence which caused his temporary retirement, and equally sincere welcome on his return.

The program included the Handel Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12; Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 82, by Sibelius; and Brahm's Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73.

To say that conductor and orchestra were magnificent in this serious and sober program is to say the obvious. The depth and finesse of the string work, the profound simplicity of the Sibelius, the sheer musical beauty of the Brahms, all were interpreted in noble and poetic style. One was reminded again with what sureness Dr. Koussevitzky plays upon his instrument of one hundred musicians—indeed a fit instrument for such a conductor.

The presence in the audience of many men in uniform served to remind one of the vital function that music plays in time of war. It must be remembered that our armed forces are a cross section of the entire population. While some are emotionally uplifted by a Bing Crosby or a Kay Kyser, there are others whose spiritual outlet can scarcely be served in the same manner. Then our civilian population, too, must find refreshment and release. There again, while a movie may suffice for many, others make more demands upon themselves and their means of relaxation from the cares of the moment.

Whatever else we do without, and we will do without cheerfully, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one institution which we can not afford to do without. This great orchestra deserves our full support in every way open to us. The government wishes this form of effort to continue unabated. To the people of Boston, who derive the pleasure the Boston Symphony gives, is given in turn the privilege of sustaining it. In spite of all other demands, which we all must and will meet, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not be forgotten by those who take their duties as members of a civilized community seriously. Democracy carries with it responsibility as well as benefit. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the responsibility of every music-lover in New England.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
FEB 11 1942

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Fine, Unusual Program

The concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra here have been as many as its years, but it is doubtful if ever the men from the Hub ever played so unusual a program for Springfield concert goers as they did last night. Yet it was not alone the surprise that made the third Community concert of the current season so memorable.

The applause that greeted each of the three selections bespoke not only the affection for "our own" orchestra, but the regard of the capacity audience at the Municipal Auditorium for the conductor, Richard Burgin and for the soloist, Emanuel Feuermann, the cellist.

Mr Feuermann gave a virtuoso performance of the Schumann cello "Concerto in A minor," while the program opened with a Schoenberg transcription of the Brahms "Quartet in G minor for piano and strings" and closed with Smetana symphonic poem "Vlatava" or, as it is more familiarly known, "The Moldau" from the river which gives it its name. Perhaps the final selection has been played in this city before, but certainly the other two were newcomers except for that portion of the concerto which is sometimes given as a solo.

Since the death of Serge Koussevitzky's wife, he has not conducted, but the orchestra was in capable hands last night when Richard Burgin stepped across the platform to the podium from the concertmaster's seat. His nervousness at the start was apparent but no hint of it cropped up during the actual performance. Granted that so fine an organization could go through the familiar orchestral repertory in moderately successful fashion without a conductor, the intricacies of the Brahms score and the problems imposed by the necessity for proper balance between orchestra and soloist made his presence not only vital, but inspiring.

He is no mere stick waver, his cues being exact and his tempos designed to keep the compositions from dragging. On the podium, he is a little reminiscent of Ormandy, except that he has a full dark thatch of hair where the Philadelphian has a golden halo.

What Schoenberg has accomplished with the Brahms score is virtually to create a fifth symphony. At times the score hints that Mr Schoenberg is going to have more to say than Mr Brahms, but it is a resonant, close knit transcription. Burgin is too canny an ensemble player not to make the most of the grateful score. Since Americans put such a premium on size, transcriptions serve to make available many a gem that might readily be overlooked because it "takes only four men to play it."

Of Mr Feuermann's performance, it can be said that Springfield itself has not heard such excellent playing in many years, though those who could hear Piatigorsky at Mount Holyoke last Friday are still singing his praises. Mr Feuermann's tone is luscious and the double stopping and other tricks which are demanded came off easily. The impression that lasts is that the soloist loves his instrument and his romantic approach was exactly what the concerto needed. The orchestral portion was deft and properly balanced.

The melodic Smetana score with its purling introduction and its cascading climaxes is good playing and good listening. One advantage of deviating from the customary formula of a symphony or even two is that works such as this get a hearing. Like Beethoven, Smetana suffered from deafness, yet the last 10 years of his life were fruitful ones, this work being among the testimonials to his creative ability. It was poetically done.

There must have been some strange ghosts flitting about the hall last night when Burgin began the national anthem, for it was Dr Muck's alleged refusal to play it a quarter of a century ago when we had just entered another war that led to his eventual arrest as an "enemy alien" even though he was a Swiss citizen. Today, we know that Muck did not refuse, but that he was the victim when Major Higginson held that "The Star Spangled Banner" had no place on a concert program. Last night we had the anthem, and the ghosts must have had a chuckle.

The next concert in the series comes March 9 when John Charles Thomas sings. At that time, there will be balloting for next year's artists.

J. D. D.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
FEB 12 1942

Boston Orchestra at Forum

Offers 'Pastoral' and 'Pathetique' Symphonies

By HENRY PLEASANTS

THE superlative Boston Symphony Orchestra visited the Academy of Music, last night, for its annual Forum concert under the direction of its justly celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

The program, devoted to the sixth symphonies of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky, was a challenge both to the resources and to the vision of the orchestra and its leader. The challenge was met in a memorable manner.

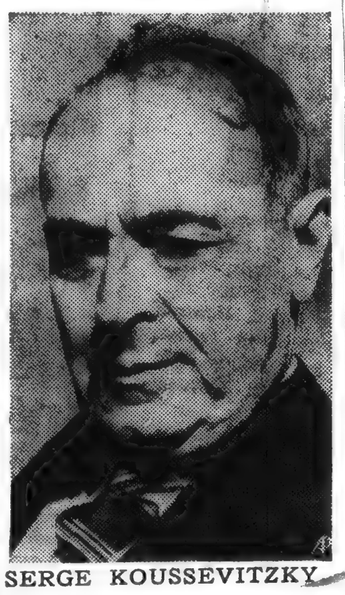
Both performances bore the imprint of Mr. Koussevitzky's forceful personality. The Boston Orchestra, in its fine integration and unity of purpose and style, is an expression of this domination by a great leader. One is hardly conscious of the individual players, brilliant and accomplished as they are. Every phrase and every shade of tone color is controlled from the podium.

Conducting of this kind is needed for the type of music played last night. It is music of great dimensions and broad vision, and the interpreter must be a man of much imagination with a grasp and control of large forms. Mr. Koussevitzky is such a conductor. Lesser music can be cleverly conducted and sound the better for it. Great music must be greatly conducted, or sound less great.

One felt, last night, how deeply Mr. Koussevitzky has seen into the creative spirits that lie behind the notes of these two very different symphonies. He felt the serenity, the joy of living and the love of nature in Beethoven's "Pastorale," and he sensed the hardly controlled hysteria, the anxiety and melancholy of the "Pathetique."

And his was the control and the repose which can project the serenity of the "Pastorale" and at the same time keep it moving and alive; and which can project the mental and emotional agonies of the "Pathetique" without succumbing to them.

It was an evening of memorable music making by a fine orchestra and a commanding and sensitive leader. And it was received with appropriate enthusiasm.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Orchestra in Two '6th Symphonies'

By LINTON MARTIN

Serge Koussevitszky held just a pair of symphonic sixes in his baton hand when the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to the Academy last night for its annual Forum concert. But by the time he had finished with the sixth symphonies of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky, respectively, they were orchestral aces that won an ovation for maestro and musicians which testified eloquently to the impression produced by the electrifying performance.

Beethoven's "Pastoral" (or Disney's "Fantasia") Symphony, and the "Pathetique" of Tchaikovsky do not, on paper, sound like the most exciting and stimulating symphonic fare for an entire concert.

BRILLIANT PERFORMANCE

But performance is another matter, when that performance happens to be the kind that Koussevitzky gave—a performance that was further revelation of the distinguished conductor's powers and of the brilliance of the Boston band.

Indeed, local pride and patriotism forbid any comparisons too pointed between the "Pathetique" as it was played by the Boston Symphony last night under Koussevitzky, and the same symphony as presented on the same stage just last week by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Toscanini's baton. For Koussevitzky's "Pathetique" has an emotional eloquence that carries with it a sense of being utterly right, perhaps because this conductor brings to it the requisite Russian state of soul and spirit.

TIDE UNDER CONTROL

Koussevitzky's reading of the "Pathetique" had the effect of holding under control a surging, irresistible tide, rather than of striving to push it. His approach, in the opening adagio, was deliberate in the extreme. But it held the portent of fire and fury to come, and that portent was fulfilled.

Each movement of the "Pathetique" was given a clear-cut quality of its own, yet each was part of the complete canvas, though the symphony is anything but an artistically integrated picture. The stirring march of the third movement was followed by a spontaneous burst of applause, and the composite effect of the entire work was a fresh revelation of what has become too frayed by familiarity.

TURNS PAGES OF SCORE

The only anomalous aspect of this performance of the "Pathetique" was that Koussevitzky turned the pages of a score every note of which must be engraved on the tablets of his mind and memory.

The Beethoven "Pastoral," which opened the concert, was radiant in its spring-like freshness and its vividly pictorial quality. But it was manifestly not as close to the conductor's sympathies and understanding as the Tchaikovsky, and it was given a more objective reading.

AUDIENCE SINGS ANTHEM

But in any case, the rare visits of the Boston Symphony are richly rewarding, especially in these days, because of the superb brilliance of the orchestral tone and Koussevitzky's commanding qualities as a conductor who disdains facile, superficial effects and empty attitudinizing. William K. Huff has performed a great service in bringing this orchestra to Philadelphia for the Forum.

Before the regular concert, Koussevitzky asked the audience to sing "The Star-Spangled Banner" with the orchestra, and he conducted it in a fashion that was anything but perfunctory. The response was rousing.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD
FEB 12 1942

could render Beethoven's sunny symphony so sheer and ethereal.

There was no heaviness or drag canal.

The fac that has decided to aban through the bill th
mean that opposit

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
FEB 13 1942

Labor Notes

AFL and CIO unions pledged to buy $10,000 worth of tickets for the Navy Relief Show at Madison Square Garden on Mar. 10. . . . The AFL announced it was sweeping NLRB elections among Western Union employees throughout the country and that it expets to have the entire system unionized before 1943. . . . Joseph D. Basson, who was defeated for re-election in the Motion Picture Machine Operators Union (AFL) last December, has been appointed a special representative of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees (AFL).

The Columbia Broadcasting System is giving no publicity to Serge Koussevitsky's scheduled concerts until it obtains permission to broadcast them from James C. Petrillo, head of the American Federation of Musicians. . . . United Automobile Workers (CIO) spokesmen here announce the organization spends more on education and recreation for its members than any other union.

An increase in unemployment insurance payments in December, following a downward trend of seven months, reflected for the first time on any significant scale the effect of priorities on jobs, according to the Social Security Board. . . . The Textile Workers Union of America (CIO) appealed to the government to reopen the Sommersville Mills in Connecticut which were shut last Monday by a dispute over union recognition.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
FEB 13 1942

64

Concert Attracts Society

Boston Symphony Heard Following Dinner Parties

Music lovers gathered at the Academy of Music last evening to enjoy the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in Brooklyn. Many subscribers entertained their guests at dinner preceding the concert.

Mrs. Benjamin Prince, hostess, in Box 3, gave a dinner party at the Hotel Bossert to her guests, Mr. and Mrs. James G. McDonald, Mr. Walter Golde, Miss Dorothy Scott, Mr. Charles R. Brewer, Mrs. William Stearns Cooney and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff.

Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt had as her guests in Box 2, Mr. and Mrs. Sidney W. Davidson, Mr. and Mrs. Laurance P. Roberts and Mr. and Mrs. Lewis W. Francis.

Mrs. Dean C. Osborne gave a dinner party at her home on St. Mark's Ave. for Mr. and Mrs. Donald G. C. Sinclair, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Fawcett, Mrs. Theodore Frohne and Mrs. James M. Fawcett.

Mrs. Thomas Lauderdale, hostess in Box 6, entertained the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Moses R. Lovell, Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius H. Tiebout and the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. William J. Thompson.

In the Woman's Club Box were Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock and her guest, Mrs. Frederick W. Burbank, Mrs. Oscar W. Swift, Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, Mrs. T. S. Vosseler and Mrs. James S. Graham.

Admiral Present

Box 8 was occupied by Admiral E. J. Marquart, Commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, Mrs. Marquart and their guests.

Mr. and Mrs. William Slater, their guests, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Johnson, were in the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association's box, as were Miss Emma Jessie Ogg, her guest, and Mrs. William B. Parker and Miss Rosalie Parker.

Music in Review

By JULES WOLFFERS

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Audience and orchestra rose from their seats when Dr. Koussevitzky came on the platform, last week, to conduct the fifteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall. This spontaneous tribute expressed, at once, the sincere regret for the occurence which caused his temporary retirement, and equally sincere welcome on his return.

The program included the Handel Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12; Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 82, by Sibelius; and Brahm's Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73.

To say that conductor and orchestra were magnificent in this serious and sober program is to say the obvious. The depth and finesse of the string work, the profound simplicity of the Sibelius, the sheer musical beauty of the Brahms, all were interpreted in noble and poetic style. One was reminded again with what surenss Dr. Koussevitzky plays upon his instrument of one hundred musicians—indeed a fit instrument for such a conductor.

The presence in the audience of many men in uniform served to remind one of the vital function that music plays in time of war. It must be remembered that our armed forces are a cross section of the entire population. While some are emotionally uplifted by a Bing Crosby or a Kay Kyser, there are others whose spiritual outlet can scarcely be served in the same manner. Then our civilian population, too, must find refreshment and release. There again, while a movie may suffice for many, others make more demands upon themselves and their means of relaxation from the cares of the moment.

Whatever else we do without, and we will do without cheerfully, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one institution which we can not afford to do without. This great orchestra deserves our full support in every way open to us. The government wishes this form of effort to continue unabated. To the people of Boston, who derive the pleasure the Boston Symphony gives, is given in turn the privilege of sustaining it. In spite of all other demands, which we all must and will meet, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not be forgotten by those who take their duties as members of a civilized community seriously. Democracy carries with it responsibility as well as benefit. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the responsibility of every music-lover in New England.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
FEB 13 1942

10.

Burgin Conducts Boston Symphony

Feuermann Is Soloist at the Academy; Traubel Sings in 'Goetterdaemmerung'

By MILES KASTENDIECK

How the Boston Symphony plays without Koussevitzky was what the Brooklyn subscribers discovered at the Academy of Music last night. It played very well, though, of course, not quite so well as with its regular conductor. Credit Richard Burgin, the concert master, with a clean-cut, firm and steady beat which carried out all his good intentions and those of the orchestra while at no time bringing the lift that raises a good performance into a memorable experience. The music was sincerely, earnestly and substantially interpreted. It remained for Emanuel Feuermann to add the touch of artistry to the evening's performance.

The noted cellist played the Schumann Concerto in A Minor, a work that is truly musical in the expression of romanticism and the beauty of its melody. Schumann wrote understandingly for the cello. Though he may never have been completely satisfied with this work, he made the instrument sing with all the deep feeling of which it is capable. Feuermann realized all this, playing beautifully and achieving a quality of performance unchallenged throughout the whole evening. The orchestral contribution was definitely subordinated into accompaniment.

The program began with Schoenberg's arrangement of Brahms' Quartet for Piano and Strings in G Minor, Opus 25. In the process of transcription the character of the music has undergone considerable change. While the Schoenberg orchestration is a highly expert accomplishment, it still leaves one listener at least wondering if Brahms has profited any from this treatment. The first movement of the Quartet never quite won the enthusiasm of Brahms' closest friends. Though some musical scholars see much to admire in its craftsmanship, the fact still remains that the friends were right. It could have been more dramatically played last night, but even then it might remain a problem. The Allegretto, however, has charm, and the final rondo, full of vivacious feeling and good spirits, has a definite appeal. Like the music itself, the performance gained with each movement, but it still left an unsatisfying impression.

There is something about Smetana's "The Moldau" from the Symphonic Poem, "Vltava," which never fails in its effect. Orchestrally it received the most expressive performance of the evening in a straightforward presentation of its rhythmic strength. The polish of a phrase here and there and more lilt in the music would have conveyed the spirit of the work more conclusively. It was just a case of an evening of good music-making without sparkle.

End of the 'Ring'

When Helen Traubel came to the "Immolation Scene" in "Goetterdaemerung" at the Metropolitan Opera House yesterday afternoon, she sang as she will undoubtedly sing the whole of the third Bruennhilde which she essayed for the first time in her career on this occasion. That she has the voice, the bearing and the spirit to carry off this role in triumphant fashion could be detected in the way in which she handled herself in this part of the opera with which she is considerably more familiar. Her performance was a progressive affair from an uncertain and somewhat unfortunate beginning through a more secure and convincing second act to an impressive finale. There is nobility in the strength and the power of her voice and at its best moments it rang true yesterday.

The performance had its lumbering qualities, derived chiefly from the pit, where Mr. Leinsdorf was workmanlike but hardly in the vein. A special word should be said for Herbert Janssen's "Gunther." Otherwise the characterizations of Melchior, List, Olitzki, Jessner and Thorborg remained familiar. The Rhine Maidens quite outshone the Norns. Some changes in stage direction were all for the best.

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
FEB 14 1942

Ruth Posselt To Play As Symphony Soloist

Ruth Posselt will be the soloist of the fourth Providence concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be given at the Metropolitan Theatre, Providence, next Tuesday evening at 8:30. Richard Burgin will conduct this concert. The program will open with Mendelssonn's "Italian" Symphony and include two notable recent works which have figured prominently in the concerts of the orchestra this season. One is the violin concerto of Samuel Barber, in which Miss Posselt is to be heard with the orchestra as soloist. Ruth Posselt, appearing with the orchestra at the Berkshire Festival last summer, made Barber's Concerto one of the features of the summer season. Miss Posselt has appeared with the principal orchestras of Europe and many times in concerts in her own country.

The concluding number will be a suite from the ballet "Billy the Kid," by Aaron Copland. The ballet, produced with great success by the Ballet Caravan, portrays the career of this outlaw of the Far West in Civil war days. It is based on tunes not borrowed, but in the cowboy style. The movements include "The Open Prairie," "Street in a Frontier Town," "Card Game at Night," "Gun Battle" and "Celebration After Billy's Capture."

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 14 1942

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Under Burgin to Feature American Music Here Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its next-to-the-last concert of the season on Tuesday night in Metropolitan Theatre. Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor, will conduct.

The program will be chiefly American music—the violin concerto by Samuel Barber and a suite from "Billy the Kid," by Aaron Copland. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony also will be played. Ruth Posselt, wife of Mr. Burgin, will be soloist in the concerto.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
(B'klyn, Queens Sect.)
FEB 13 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS IN BROOKLYN

Many Subscribers Entertain With Dinners Before Concert at Academy of Music

Brooklyn society was represented at this season's third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last night. Many subscribers entertained their guests at dinner preceding the concert.

Mrs. Benjamin Prince, hostess in Box 3, gave a dinner at the Bossert Hotel for her guests, Mr. and Mrs. James G. McDonald, Walter Golde, Miss Dorothy Scott, Charles R. Brewer, Mrs. William Stearns Cooney and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff.

Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt had as her guests in Box 2 Mr. and Mrs. Sidney W. Davidson, Mr. and Mrs. Laurance P. Roberts and Mr. and Mrs. Lewis W. Francis.

Mrs. Dean C. Osborne entertained at dinner at her home on St. Mark's Avenue for Mr. and Mrs. Donald G. C. Sinclair, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Fawcett, Mrs. Theodore Frohne and Mrs. James M. Fawcett.

Mrs. Thomas Lauderdale, hostess in Box 6, entertained the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Moses R. Lowell, Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius H. Tiebout and the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. William J. Thompson.

In the Woman's Club box were Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock and her guest, Mrs. Frederick W. Burbank, Mrs. Oscar W. Swift, Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Oliver G. Carter, Mrs. T. S. Vossler and Mrs. James S. Graham.

Box 8 was occupied by Rear Admiral E. J. Marquart, commandant of the navy yard, Mrs. Marquart and their guests.

Mr. and Mrs. William Slater and their guests, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Johnson, were in the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association's box, as were Miss Emma Jessie Ogg, her guest, and Mrs. William B. Parker and Miss Rosalie Parker. Students of the Packer Collegiate Institute, Poly Prep Country Day School and the Brooklyn Friends School occupied boxes 7, 9 and 11.

These concerts are presented in the opera house at the Academy of Music under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Committee for Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
FEB 14 1942

Hail Carnegie Concert by Koussevitzky

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony made one of its welcome journeys to the metropolis last evening and gave a concert in Carnegie Hall to the evident enjoyment of a large and distinguished audience.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted a conservative program consisting of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony and Tschaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony. Had he tried he could not have selected two works of greater contrast, and that in itself was a cause for interesting delineation.

His interpretation of the "Pastoral" was imaginative, picturesque and ingratiating, a richly colored reflection of the composer's record of a day in the country.

Tschaikovsky's B minor Symphony (which was first programmed as "Tragic" and ultimately "Pathetique" and either of which would have been fitting) received a performance vibrant with feeling and of great pathos and moving content.

* * *

Puccini's "Tosca" was repeated at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening with Grace Moore in the name part; Frederick Jagel as the persecuted Cavaradossi; Alexander Sved, as the ruthless, crafty Scarpia; Salvatore Baccaloni the Sacristan; and Arthur Kent, Angelotti.

Yesterday being Friday the 13th, an admirer of Miss Moore presented her with a live rabbit (with four good-luck feet, it was said). The trophy was effective for the noted soprano, who was ill a few days ago, had recovered entirely and was a compelling and dramatic Tosca.

Mr. Sved's Scarpia showed considerable improvement since his initial portrayal, and Mr. Jagel's characterization was praiseworthy and sincere.

The supporting roles were sung by Messrs. Engelman, De Paolis and Cehanovsky. Ettore Panizza conducted.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 14 1942

Bostonians Present Pathetique

What an opportunity was given to the lovers of the Tschaikowsky Pathetique Symphony this week. Two great conductors, leading two great orchestras, played the electrically popular work three nights apart in Carnegie Hall. On Tuesday evening it was Arturo Toscanini and the Philadelphia Orchestra and last evening Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. What an opportunity, too, for the delvers in comparisons!

However, comparing the two performances was almost out of the question, for the Bostonians were not at their best last night. This amazing body of musicians, this jewel mechanism orchestra did not respond in the accustomed manner to the music of the evening, which included also the Beethoven Pastoral Symphony.

* * *

Some Matchless Playing.

Not that there weren't many measures, or pages, in fact, of matchless playing, of smoothly timed, flowing beauty, whether in the Beethoven or the Tschaikowsky. The trouble, as it appeared to one listener—who is a confirmed Boston Symphonyite, by the way—was the over-all lisulessness. Despite the numerous fine points of the work done by the orchestra, the pieces did not come out as whole entities. It amounted to fragments, or large chunks, if you please, of superior attainments, but the long-range line was something out of the picture.

Some of the woodwind flatted fancily all through the business, and often the several choirs couldn't seem to get together for long periods of time. These things can happen to great orchestras, too, which only goes to prove that they are composed of human beings after all.

With all that, the listener who had been to both concerts could scarcely help noting some differences between the two conductors' approach to the Tschaikowsky Symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky's version, for instance, features a prolonged delivery of the melody sequences, it sacrifices certain matters of clarity for the sake of big sound, which is, as we have seen time and again, all too effective.

* * *

Detailed Reading.

Mr. Toscanini's, on the other hand, is a minutely detailed reading. In the biggest sonorities there are always evident the workings out of the slightest lines, the most inconspicuous phrases take shape and fall into allotted niches with the naturalness of mathematical equations. Yet there is anything but the feel of labored playing in it. And, of course, the important idea is progress of the work from the start to an inevitably right conclusion.

Be all this as it may, last night's hearers applauded Mr. Koussevitzky and his forces exuberantly.

R. C. B.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 14 1942

Philharmonic Led By Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky makes his first appearance as conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra next week in Carnegie Hall with two concerts on Thursday evening and Friday afternoon. He will preside also at the concerts of the following week.

The Thursday-Friday program presents the C. P. E. Bach Concerto in D Major for Stringed Intruments, as arranged for orchestra by Maxiliam Steinberg; the Aaron Copland Quiet City, which will be given its first performance by the society; the Ravel Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2, and the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovich, also a first by the society.

Tomorrow afternoon Eugene Goossens winds up his directorship of the orchestra with a repeat performance of the Weinberger Lincoln Symphony, offering, besides, the Saint-Saens Violin Concerto No. 3, with Erno Valasek as the soloist and the Gliere Marche Heroique.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
FEB 14 1942

NOTABLE CONCERT BY KOUSSEVITZKY

'Searing Eloquence' Shown by Boston Orchestra in Playing Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetique'

BEETHOVEN ON PROGRAM

The 'Pastoral' Symphony of Composer Also Offered by Conductor at Carnegie

By OLIN DOWNES

The concert given by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall will be historic in the annals of the New York appearances of the organization and its distinguished leader. And this was so in spite of the fact that two very familiar symphonies made the whole program—symphonies that Dr. Koussevitzky has repeatedly directed in this city, and which represent two of his most distinguished achievements. They were the Beethoven "Pastoral" and the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique."

It may be that the orchestra had played Beethoven's symphony as beautifully before, but it is to be questioned. In the performance of Tchaikovsky's symphony the impression was that the orchestra and leader were one and that the extraordinary intensity of the interpretation, one that gave the music a searing eloquence, was the elegy for the beloved wife who has gone and the ennobled voice of a great musician, finding in his art the supreme expression of his bereavement.

It would be superfluous to dwell upon details of the playing, if only because of the fact that these would not easily be remembered. The peerless orchestra utilized its resources for consummate ends. The episodic completely disappeared because of its absorption into an inspired interpretive plan.

Nor, although the "Pastoral" symphony is far in mood or intention from Tchaikovsky's poignant outcry, did it seem other than a balance and a complement of that song of mortality. For Beethoven, the pantheist, found his religion in nature, discovering in that communion the supreme clarification. This consciousness was in the sound of the instruments. They conveyed something more than vibrations and sonorities, something, as Whitman would have said, nearer and farther than that; and this was accomplished very simply—these meanings.

We have much for which to thank Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, but little that matches the significance of this expression. At the end of Tchaikovsky's symphony there was a pause of complete silence until the conductor left the stage.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
FEB 14 1942

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

By Edward O'Gorman

To be poetic about it, it was the opposing powers of light and darkness that were unfolded by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall last night in a program in which the sunny Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven was juxtaposed to the moody, subjective depths of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique." The performance of the Russian symphony was in the nature of a return engagement, for a superlative reading of this work served to open the Boston Symphony's Saturday afternoon series here last November.

Last night's playing of the "Pathetique," however, hardly approached the level of last fall's performance. For three of the four movements the method was the same, but the spirit and emotional essence of the symphony failed to preciptate in the way which gave the earlier performance such a remarkable feeling of co-ordination, inspiration and rightness. And the instrumental details, though they were in a sense the same, were by no means executed with their former miraculous finish. In the final movement Dr. Koussevitzky plumbed greater depths. It was extravagantly Russian, perhaps going beyond the point where Tchaikovsky himself would have called a halt. And the lacrymal depression of that movement, even to the conductor's dejected pose as the last tones died away, left the audience with no will to applaud.

For the Beethoven symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky was in one of his most quietly classical moods, with no desire to apply anything to the symphony in the matter of interpretation, or to impose his will on the orchestra in any way except in the comparatively necessary one of establishing the tempi. It was the type of conducting which by the right of long possession has come to be regarded as Dr. Koussevitzky's particular property, the kind which encourages the orchestra with a nod rather than urges it forward with energetic gestures.

The performance was in general pacific and reflective. There was a strange and attractively distant, woodland quality to the passive, disembodied playing of the important woodwind and horn solos in the second, third and last movements, detracting a little from the symphonic strength of the work, but adding a piquant touch to its pastoral character.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 14 1942

Dmitri Shostakovich, considered something of a rowdy while in musical knee pants, more and more reveals, now that he combs his hair and polishes his shoes, a kinship to Uncle Ilyitch and Uncle Jean. There are times when he still talks out of the side of his mouth like Buddy Prokofieff but strutting is no longer his way.

His Sixth Symphony comes to the Victor records under the aegis of Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra. This one is tamer even than the Fifth which Dr. Koussevitzky has had so much trouble in getting his public to accept.

Stokowski is just the man for this kind of music. He can usually be counted upon to know what the younger fellows are trying to say. And while there are no mysteries in this particular symphony, he deals with its language intelligibly.

Here again we have the Shostakovich predilection for the long, melodic line. The first movement, which is a largo, sets the style for the entire work—that is, frequent employment of unisons by virtually the whole orchestra and reliance at other times upon two contrasted voices pitted against each other. Where full-bodied harmony occurs, its structure is conventional.

The first movement is a sort of melancholy maestoso; the second, an allegro, glad but nervous and bustling; the third, a presto in the marcia vein with a good lilt. The symphony has its noisy, rebellious moments, the intervals of enrichment and broadening values being quite rare. The recording is of good quality.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 14 1942

Koussevitzky Is Acclaimed at Carnegie Hall

Directs Boston Orchestra in Sixth Symphonies of Beethoven, Tchaikovsky

By Robert Lawrence

When Serge Koussevitzky appeared on the stage of Carnegie Hall last night to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program devoted to the sixth symphonies of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky, the entire audience rose to its feet—partly as a gesture of admiration for this magnificent conductor, whose art has never remained on a static level, and even more as an expression of sympathy for the recent death of his wife. This was Dr. Koussevitzky's first New York concert since the sad event of last month.

Playing of the highest possible standard marked the evening and made it memorable. Since the achievements of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are in danger of being taken for granted, it is necessary at least once a season to set down a reminder of the organization's incomparable tone, its wonderfully adjusted balance, dynamic sensitivity, the almost supernatural ease with which the most difficult passages are taken. Last night, except for a first trumpet that was sometimes insecure, not the slightest departure from perfection could be heard throughout the evening. The orchestra was at its very best, and Dr. Koussevitzky had a supreme instrument on which to work his will.

A Triumphant "Pastoral"

At the start of the Beethoven "Pastoral" symphony, with which the program began, there could be noted a certain lack of buoyancy, attributable perhaps to the conductor's state of mind at the moment. This soon disappeared and there rose up a sustained, lyrical panorama that, for breath-taking beauty and transparency of tone, I have never heard equaled in any orchestral concert. This was not a performance to command belated description, but one to be experienced.

In the Tchaikovsky "Pathetic" symphony, played after the intermission, the orchestral tone changed of necessity from the serene timbre of the Beethoven to a dark and occasionally gritty quality that stirred the senses and worked on the emotions of the listeners. There is a great deal of valid disagreement about the "Pathetic" as an art work. While respecting the opinions of those who do not admire the symphony, I believe it in all good conscience to be a masterpiece. The music is not foolproof; the slightest exaggeration may throw the composition out of line. But taken as a canvas, the "Pathetic" ranks formidably

Tchaikovsky at His Best

Consider the development section of the first movement, superb in its thematic treatment and its swirling tonal drama. In a still larger sense, think of the dynamic and emotional unity that Tchaikovsky has achieved in the architecture of this work. The finale, with its dirge of shattered hopes and irreparable sorrow, is the pendant of the first movement and the consequence of the delirious scherzo; the "five-four" episode is the interlude that bridges the questioning Allegro and the terrifying march. As given last night, this symphony carried an overwhelming conviction. One may dislike it with reason; but its basic honesty cannot be denied.

Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting in both of the works on the program was beyond praise. It is perhaps an impertinence to suggest that his powers of communication are even now growing in directness and diminishing in theatricality, for this man has ranked, for the past decade, among the two or three greatest leaders of our time. Yet last night he bettered his own record in a concert that, by its power of truth and artistic sincerity, moved many of the listeners present to an unrestrained demonstration of tribute.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
FEB 14 1942

BOSTONIANS GIVE TWO SYMPHONIES

Koussevitzky Directs in Carnegie Hall.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

For those who listen with their hearts as well as their ears and mind, last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall was wholly remarkable. It is a matter of record that Serge Koussevitzky has recently been bereaved by the death of his wife. It was no matter of intuition, then, to regard his intensely personal conducting of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" as a panegyric—enforced, as it was, by the ceremonial finality with which Mr. Koussevitzky deposited his baton on the stand after an inordinate pause at the end of the work.

No doubt those who heard this performance would find it difficult to conceive a more eloquent exposition of the work, as those who heard the Toscanini reading, earlier in the week, would be incredulous at the thought that it was inferior to anything within the reach of mortal man. The distinction was, of course, in the catharsis of personal feeling that Mr. Koussevitzky achieved through Tchaikovsky. With all his immersion in this mood, he retained the intellectual aloofness necessary to goad fourscore musicians into a similar ordered frenzy.

Out of all these elements emerged a performance of the "Pathetic" that soared to the sky and plunged to earth with sickening authenticity. As well as personalizing the blood-warm humanity of the opening movement, Mr. Koussevitzky was capable of stating the finale on a plane of nobility. Any suspicion that the 5/4 waltz was maudlin or the "Marcia" melodramatic was evicted by the truth and sincerity of Mr. Koussevitzky's response to each section. How much the Boston musicians live with their leader was attested by the unanimity and fervor of every man's response throughout this performance. Any artist may feel as deeply as Mr. Koussevitzky did; it is the rare one who can communicate it to an audience.

The playing of Beethoven's "Pastorale" symphony that began the evening was on a more usual plane—more usual ,that is, for Mr. Koussevitzky and his superlative ensemble. There was a lovely flow of sound through the scene by the brook, and a swirling outburst in the storm that vitalized Beethoven's intention completely. To say more would be to patronize an accomplishment as imposing as it was rare.

Koussevitzky Is Acclaimed at Carnegie Hall

Directs Boston Orchestra in Sixth Symphonies of Beethoven, Tchaikovsky

By Robert Lawrence

When Serge Koussevitzky appeared on the stage of Carnegie Hall last night to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program devoted to the sixth symphonies of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky, the entire audience rose to its feet—partly as a gesture of admiration for this magnificent conductor, whose art has never remained on a static level, and even more as an expression of sympathy for the recent death of his wife. This was Dr. Koussevitzky's first New York concert since the sad event of last month.

Playing of the highest possible standard marked the evening and made it memorable. Since the achievements of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are in danger of being taken for granted, it is necessary at least once a season to set down a reminder of the organization's incomparable tone, its wonderfully adjusted balance, dynamic sensitivity, the almost supernatural ease with which the most difficult passages are taken. Last night, except for a first trumpet that was sometimes insecure, not the slightest departure from perfection could be heard throughout the evening. The orchestra was at its very best, and Dr. Koussevitzky had a supreme instrument on which to work his will.

A Triumphant "Pastoral"

At the start of the Beethoven "Pastoral" symphony, with which the program began, there could be noted a certain lack of buoyancy, attributable perhaps to the conductor's state of mind at the moment. This soon disappeared and there rose up a sustained, lyrical panorama that, for breath-taking beauty and transparency of tone, I have never heard equaled in any orchestral concert. This was not a performance to command belated description, but one to be experienced.

In the Tchaikovsky "Pathetic" symphony, played after the intermission, the orchestral tone changed of necessity from the serene timbre of the Beethoven to a dark and occasionally gritty quality that stirred the senses and worked on the emotions of the listeners. There is a great deal of valid disagreement about the "Pathetic" as an art work. While respecting the opinions of those who do not admire the symphony, I believe it in all good conscience to be a masterpiece. The music is not foolproof; the slightest exaggeration may throw the composition out of line. But taken as a canvas, the "Pathetic" ranks formidably

Tchaikovsky at His Best

Consider the development section of the first movement, superb in its thematic treatment and its swirling tonal drama. In a still larger sense, think of the dynamic and emotional unity that Tchaikovsky has achieved in the architecture of this work. The finale, with its dirge of shattered hopes and irreparable sorrow, is the pendant of the first movement and the consequence of the delirious scherzo; the "five-four" episode is the interlude that bridges the questioning Allegro and the terrifying march. As given last night, this symphony carried an overwhelming conviction. One may dislike it with reason; but its basic honesty cannot be denied.

Dr, Koussevitzky's conducting in both of the works on the program was beyond praise. It is perhaps an impertinence to suggest that his powers of communication are even now growing in directness and diminishing in theatricality, for this man has ranked, for the past decade, among the two or three greatest leaders of our time. Yet last night he bettered his own record in a concert that, by its power of truth and artistic sincerity, moved many of the listeners present to an unrestrained demonstration of tribute.

BOSTONIANS GIVE TWO SYMPHONIES

Koussevitzky Directs in Carnegie Hall.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

For those who listen with their hearts as well as their ears and mind, last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall was wholly remarkable. It is a matter of record that Serge Koussevitzky has recently been bereaved by the death of his wife. It was no matter of intuition, then, to regard his intensely personal conducting of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" as a panegyric—enforced, as it was, by the ceremonial finality with which Mr. Koussevitzky deposited his baton on the stand after an inordinate pause at the end of the work.

No doubt those who heard this performance would find it difficult to conceive a more eloquent exposition of the work, as those who heard the Toscanini reading, earlier in the week, would be incredulous at the thought that it was inferior to anything within the reach of mortal man. The distinction was, of course, in the catharsis of personal feeling that Mr. Koussevitzky achieved through Tchaikovsky. With all his immersion in this mood, he retained the intellectual aloofness necessary to goad fourscore musicians into a similar ordered frenzy.

Out of all these elements emerged a performance of the "Pathetic" that soared to the sky and plunged to earth with sickening authenticity. As well as personalizing the blood-warm humanity of the opening movement, Mr. Koussevitzky was capable of stating the finale on a plane of nobility. Any suspicion that the 5/4 waltz was maudlin or the "Marcia" melodramatic was evicted by the truth and sincerity of Mr. Koussevitzky's response to each section. How much the Boston musicians live with their leader was attested by the unanimity and fervor of every man's response throughout this performance. Any artist may feel as deeply as Mr. Koussevitzky did; it is the rare one who can communicate it to an audience.

The playing of Beethoven's "Pastorale" symphony that began the evening was on a more usual plane—more usual ,that is, for Mr. Koussevitzky and his superlative ensemble. There was a lovely flow of sound through the scene by the brook, and a swirling outburst in the storm that vitalized Beethoven's intention completely. To say more would be to patronize an accomplishment as imposing as it was rare.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 15 1942

Martha Burnham

Serge Koussevitzky, who conducts his first Philharmonic-Symphony concert Thursday night

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 15 1942

12

Burgin Will Also Conduct Barber's Violin Concerto with Ruth Posselt Soloist

American Works, Unfamiliar to Audiences Here, Will Have Performance Tuesday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By GEORGE Y. LOVERIDGE

DISTINGUISHED Americans receive substantial representation on the program announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the concert Tuesday night in Metropolitan Theatre.

Samuel Barber's violin concerto and Aaron Copland's suite from the ballet "Billy the Kid" will be played. The soloist in the concerto will be Ruth Posselt, American violinist. She is the wife of Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the orchestra, who will conduct.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony will give classic contrast.

Miss Posselt, a native of Medford, Mass., has appeared many times as soloist with leading orchestras in Europe and in this country, and has given numerous recitals. Last summer she played the Barber concerto with Boston orchestra at the Berkshire Festival, where she and Mr. Burgin had been married the previous season.

Barber is a nephew of the famous contralto Louise Homer. He was born in West Chester, Pa., in 1910. At six he began to study music, at seven to compose. When he was 13 he entered the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia, studying piano and singing with Vengerova and De Gorgoza. He gave most attention, however, to composition, which he studied with Scalero for six years. He was the first musician to receive the Pulitzer Prize for Music twice—in 1935 and 1936.

A SALZBURG "FIRST"

His "Symphony in One Movement" was the first American work played at a Salzburg Music Festival. Dr. Artur Rodzinski, who conducted the Cleveland Orchestra here last week, selected Barber's symphony and conducted it, in 1937.

The symphony, the "Overture to the School for Scandal," and "Music from a Scene from Shelley" have been performed by a number of important symphony orchestras, including those of Philadelphia, Minneapolis, Chicago and Cleveland, the New York Philharmonic, the London and BBC symphonies, the NBC and the Augusteo, of Rome. His chamber music has been heard frequently here and abroad.

Copland is 10 years older than Barber. His birthplace was Brooklyn. He attended public schools there, graduating from high school in 1918. His sister had taught him piano; he continued with Wolfsohn, Wittgenstein, and Adler, and in 1918 began to study theory with Goldmark. He was a pupil of Goldmark for four years.

In 1921 he became the first student of composition at Fontainebleau, where he studied three years with Nadia Boulanger. Meantime, he continued piano with Ricardo Vines for a period. In 1925 he was awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship, which was renewed in 1926. He received, in 1930, the RCA Victor Company award for his "Dance Symphony."

Copland had been active in promoting the interests of contemporary American music. He arranged the Copland-Sessions Concerts of American music in 1928-29-30-31 with Roger Sessions. He lectured on music in 1935 at Harvard, and lectures now at the New School for Social Research. He is a director of the United States Section of the International Society for Contemporary Music, and a member of the League of Composers' Executive Board. He was the first director of the American Festival of Contemporary Music at Yaddo. His orchestral and chamber music works have been heard here and abroad many times.

He wrote a work for the first American commission series of CBS. His "Dance" symphony was broadcast by BBC, and CBS and NBC have broadcast many of his compositions.

THE BIRTH OF "BILLY"

He wrote the following on "Billy the Kid" for the Boston Symphony program notes:

When Lincoln Kirstein, director of the American Ballet Caravan, asks you to write a ballet for him it is a foregone conclusion that you are going to tackle an American subject. Still, when he suggested Billy the Kid as a proper hero for a native ballet, I had certain misgivings. Not about Billy the Kid, of course—for where could one find a better protagonist for an American work—but about my own capabilities as a "cowboy composer." Lincoln Kirstein, however, thought differently—and since he is a very enthusiastic young man, it wasn't long before I was convinced that fate had chosen me and none other to compose this folk-ballet about a young desperado of the Wild West.

I don't know how other composers feel, but as for myself, I divide all music into two parts—that which is meant to be self-sufficient and that which is meant to serve one of the sister arts—theatre, film or ballet. I have never liked music which gets in the way of the thing it is supposedly aiding. That is why I began with one single idea in writing Billy—a firm resolve to write simply. If it is a question of expressing one's soul, you can always write a symphony. But if you are involved in a stage presentation, then the eye is the thing, and music should play a modest role, helping where help is needed, but never injecting itself as if it were the main business of the evening.

There was one other reason for being simple—namely, our hero, Billy. No matter how complex a character he may have been from the psychological standpoint, he makes a simple enough stage figure, this boy bandit who bragged that he had killed 21 men, "not counting Indians." Therefore my problem resolved itself into finding the correct musical style to express the peculiar character of Billy the Kid.

COWBOY TUNES?

To use or not to use cowboy songs as the basis for my ballet became a major issue. Mr. Kirstein said he didn't care—and quietly tucked two slim collections of Western tunes under my arm. I have never been particularly impressed with the musical beauties of the cowboy songs as such. The words are usually delightful and the manner of singing needs no praise from me. But neither the words nor the delivery are of much use in a purely orchestral ballet score, so I was left with the tunes themselves, which I repeat, are often less than exciting. As far as I was concerned, this ballet could be written without benefit of the poverty-stricken tunes Billy himself must have known.

Nevertheless, in order to humor Mr. Kirstein, who said he didn't care whether I used actual cowboy material or not, I decided to take his two little collections with me when I left for Paris in the summer of 1938. It was there that I began working on the scenario as it had been outlined for me.

Perhaps there is something different about a cowboy song in Paris. But whatever the reason may have been, it wasn't long before I found myself hopelessly involved in expanding, contracting, rearranging and superimposing cowboy tunes on the rue de Rennes in Paris.

If you listen closely you can hear in full or in part (in the order of their appearance) "Great Granddad," "Whoopee Ti Yi Yo, Git Along, Little Dogies," "The Old Chisholm Trail," "Old Paint," "The Dying Cowboy," "Trouble for the Range Cook," and so forth. I can guarantee that I did not use "Home on the Range." (You see I had decided to draw the line someplace.)

"In rounding up this bunch of western songs from the plains and hills, we aren't aiming to educate you any." That's the way the editors of one of my source books introduce their collection. "We have only one subject, they continue, "to be entertaining, and we hope that our efforts will be considered from that angle."

That is just about the way I would have put it myself. Except that I had the added difficulty of harmonizing these simple tunes without benefit of the usual accompanying chords. It is a rather delicate operation—to put fresh and unconventional harmonies to well-known melodies without spoiling their naturalness. It is a moment for the composer to throw caution aside and to depend wholly on his instinct for knowing what to do. Courage and instinct are the only things that can be of help at that point.

Before leaving New York, I had seen Jared French's lovely costume designs. The story around which the choreography was to be assigned had been supplied to me after discussions with our choreographer, Eugene Loring. In the finished script, the action begins and closes on the open prairies. The events which take place between the introduction and coda are merely typical of many such episodes on the long trek to the Pacific.

PRAIRIE SCENARIO

The central portion of the ballet concerns itself with significant moments in the life of Billy the Kid. The first scene is a street in a frontier town. Familiar figures amble by. Cowboys saunter into town, some on horseback, others with their lassoes. Some Mexican women do a Jarabe, which is interrupted by a fight between two drunks. Attracted by the gathering crowd, Billy is seen for the first time, as a boy of 12, with his mother. The brawl turns ugly, guns are drawn, and in some unaccountable way, Billy's mother is killed. Without an instant's hesitation, in cold fury, Billy draws a knife from a cow-hand's sheath and stabs his mother's slayers. His short but famous career begins.

In swift succession we see episodes in Billy's later life. At night, under the stars, in a quiet card game with his outlaw friends. Hunted by a posse led by his former friend, Pat Garrett, Billy is pursued. A running gun battle ensues. Billy is captured. A drunken celebration takes place. Billy in prison is, of course, followed by one of Billy's legendary escapes. Tired and worn in the desert, Billy rests with his girl. (Pas de deux.) Starting from a deep sleep, he senses movement in the shadows. The posse has finally caught up with him. It is the end.

If we are ever to have a fully developed ballet company in America—the ballet company in the tradition of the Russians—it will come by way of just such companies as the American Ballet Caravan, and just such subject matter as Billy the Kid. Speaking of the work of the American Ballet Caravan in the pages of "Modern Music," Edwin Denby has this to say: "....they show that an American kind of ballet is growing up, different from the nervous Franco-Russian style....Our own ballet has an easier, simpler character, a kind of American straightforwardness, that is thoroughly agreeable....I think this is the highest kind of praise, because it shows the ballet has taken root and is from now on a part of our life."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
FEB 15 1942

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS SIBELIUS 5TH

Composition and Brahms 2d Are Features of Program Yesterday at Carnegie

LEADER WINS APPLAUSE

Ovation for Koussevitzky Is Voiced by Audience—Handel Evokes String Virtuosity

By OLIN DOWNES

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, was devoted to two major symphonies and, as a preliminary, a concerto grosso of Handel which served to display again the quality of the Boston Symphony strings and the art of first desk players. The symphonies were Sibelius's Fifth and Brahms's Second.

We are informed that the playing of the Brahms symphony, which cannot be described here, brought an ovation at the end from the audience, which, in view of previous readings of the work by this conductor and orchestra, could have been foreseen. Less familiar, though it is now firmly established in the repertory, is the Fifth symphony of Sibelius, given a most stirring and illuminating exposition.

So performed, the symphony, from the pastoral opening to the crashing power of the conclusion, held the audience engrossed. It reveals a beauty peculiar to Sibelius and a symphonic continuity of thought in which he is equaled by no other living composer. This was impressed upon us anew yesterday—testimony which becomes always more inescapable of the composer's independence, inspiration and freedom of the sterile conventions of the Europe of his day, from which Sibelius fought free.

Each of the symphonies of his later period starts from a different standpoint of structure and idea, attacks new creative problems and brings forth fresh discoveries of art, and this, ironical to relate, according to the very principles of the "neo-classicism" concerning which others than Sibelius have said so much and so seldom achieved.

Here is the strength which rests upon a genuine economy and concentration of workmanship, and a noble logic of form, and the conception of pure music as distinguished from that of a superficial romanticism. Sibelius has accomplished this quietly, without propaganda or self-interest, without inspired publicity or resort to the fashionable tricks of the "dernier cri," in his own great and simple way. He is an unfortunately solitary figure in the music of today.

N.Y. Herald Trib
Feb 15

Koussevitzky Is Acclaimed at Carnegie Hall

Directs Boston Orchestra in Sixth Symphonies of Beethoven, Tchaikovsky

By Robert Lawrence

When Serge Koussevitzky appeared on the stage of Carnegie Hall Friday night to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program devoted to the sixth symphonies of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky, the entire audience rose to its feet—partly as a gesture of admiration for this magnificent conductor, whose art has never remained on a static level, and even more as an expression of sympathy for the recent death of his wife. This was Dr. Koussevitzky's first New York concert since the sad event of last month.

Playing of the highest possible standard marked the evening and made it memorable. Since the achievements of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are in danger of being taken for granted, it is necessary at least once a season to set down a reminder of the organization's incomparable tone, its wonderfully adjusted balance, dynamic sensitivity, the almost supernatural ease with which the most difficult passages are taken. Friday night, except for a first trumpet that was sometimes insecure, not the slightest departure from perfection could be heard throughout the evening. The orchestra was at its very best, and Dr. Koussevitzky had a supreme instrument on which to work his will.

A Triumphant "Pastoral"

At the start of the Beethoven "Pastoral" symphony, with which the program began, there could be noted a certain lack of buoyancy, attributable perhaps to the conductor's state of mind at the moment. This soon disappeared and there rose up a sustained, lyrical panorama that, for breath-taking beauty and transparency of tone, I have never heard equaled in any orchestral concert. This was not a performance to command belated description, but one to be experienced.

In the Tchaikovsky "Pathetic" symphony, played after the intermission, the orchestral tone changed of necessity from the serene timbre of the Beethoven to a dark and occasionally gritty quality that stirred the senses and worked on the emotions of the listeners. There is a great deal of valid disagreement about the "Pathetic" as an art work. While respecting the opinions of those who do not admire the symphony, I believe it in all good conscience to be a masterpiece. The music is not foolproof; the slightest exaggeration may throw the composition out of line. But, taken as a canvas, the "Pathetic" ranks formidably achieved work. The finale, with its dirge of shattered hopes and irreparable sorrow, is the pendant of the first movement and the consequence of the delirious scherzo; the "five-four" episode is the interlude that bridges the questioning Allegro and the terrifying march. As given Friday night, this symphony carried an overwhelming conviction. One may dislike it with reason; but its basic honesty cannot be denied.

Tchaikovsky at His Best

Consider the development section of the first movement, superb in its thematic treatment and its swirling tonal drama. In a still larger sense, think of the dynamic and emotional unity that Tchaikovsky has

Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting in both of the works on the program was beyond praise. It is perhaps an impertinence to suggest that his powers of communication are even now growing in directness and diminishing in theatricality, for this man has ranked, for the past decade, among the two or three greatest leaders of our time. Yet Friday night he bettered his own record in a concert that, by its power of truth and artistic sincerity, moved many of the listeners present to an unrestrained demonstration of tribute.

Rey de la Torre Gives Recital

Rey de la Torre, Cuban guitarist, made his New York debut yesterday afternoon at Town Hall under auspices of the Asociacion Cultural Inter-Americana, Inc. Playing transcriptions of music by Luis de Milan, Miguel de Fuenllana, Robert de Visee, Sanz, Bach, Sor, Falla, Broqua, Villa-Lobos, Torroba, Granados and Albeniz, he brought an accurate, tasteful approach to all of the works that he offered. There might have been much more color and spontaneity, but Mr. de la Torre showed good basic musicianship. His tone, although limited in dynamic range, was also to be praised.

R. L.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 15 1942

2 Symphonies Are Offered by Koussevitzky

Boston Orchestra Concert Includes Sibelius's Fifth and Second of Brahms

By Francis D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky, who is about to take charge of the Philharmonic-Symphony for a fortnight's guest conductorship, directed his own Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in the third concert of its afternoon series at Carnegie Hall. A program marked by variety, if not by novelty, included Handel's concerto grosso for strings, in B minor, No. 12; the fifth symphony of Jean Sibelius, and the second symphony of Johannes Brahms. There was also "The Star-Spangled Banner," in which Dr. Koussevitzky faced the audience to urge it to song. His tempo for the anthem was the broadest which the anthem has received in one of this season's major musical events, while Sir Thomas Beecham's was undoubtedly the briskest.

All three works in the Bostonian program have had performances this season by the Philharmonic, although not in the same concert, and thus do not need extensive commentary on their own account. This does not mean that their presentation yesterday gave any sense of satiation or of overfamiliarity; this orchestra and its conductor have a way of playing standard works in a manner which stimulates and holds attention to an exceptional degree.

This was particularly the case in the concerto grosso and the Sibelius symphony, owing both to superlative playing and to emotional persuasiveness. Both performances marked the work of the Boston Symphony at its best, which means as high a standard as one is likely to encounter anywhere. The Handelian interpretation offered a notable combination of dignity and spaciousness with expressive delicacy; delectability of string tone with clarity of detail. Such qualities gave full value to one of the most treasurable sections of the concerto, in which a long-breathed melody is restated and intensified over an imposingly waxing and surging bass.

Dr. Koussevitzky's musicians set forth the Sibelius work with finesse of shading and a generously wide palette of instrumental color; the orchestral hues were all the more vivid for not being laid on thickly. The interpretation was essentially lucid, finely wrought and phrased and revealing rather than rugged, but it had a fundamental momentum and imposing, culminative climaxes. The character of the scoring required a careful and discerning apportionment of the various orchestral sonorities, and this stipulation was admirably fulfilled. In the Brahms symphony a few passages lacked the sense of expressive concentration which was provided by the performance as a whole; occasional points of phrasing or tempo, as in the hurrying of an episode late in the second movement, seemed open to debate, but the general interpretation was convincing. A capacity audience applauded with fervor.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 15 1942

Burgin Will Also Conduct Barber's Violin Concerto with Ruth Posselt Soloist

American Works, Unfamiliar to Audiences Here, Will Have Performance Tuesday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By GEORGE Y. LOVERIDGE

DISTINGUISHED Americans receive substantial representation on the program announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the concert Tuesday night in Metropolitan Theatre.

Samuel Barber's violin concerto and Aaron Copland's suite from the ballet "Billy the Kid" will be played. The soloist in the concerto will be Ruth Posselt, American violinist. She is the wife of Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the orchestra, who will conduct.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony will give classic contrast.

Miss Posselt, a native of Medford, Mass., has appeared many times as soloist with leading orchestras in Europe and in this country, and has given numerous recitals. Last summer she played the Barber concerto with Boston orchestra at the Berkshire Festival, where she and Mr. Burgin had been married the previous season.

Barber is a nephew of the famous contralto Louise Homer. He was born in West Chester, Pa., in 1910. At six he began to study music, at seven to compose. When he was 13 he entered the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia, studying piano and singing with Vengerova and De Gorgoza. He gave most attention, however, to composition, which he studied with Scalero for six years. He was the first musician to receive the Pulitzer Prize for Music twice—in 1935 and 1936.

A SALZBURG "FIRST"

His "Symphony in One Movement" was the first American work played at a Salzburg Music Festival. Dr. Artur Rodzinski, who conducted the Cleveland Orchestra here last week, selected Barber's symphony and conducted it, in 1937.

The symphony, the "Overture to the School for Scandal," and "Music from a Scene from Shelley" have been performed by a number of important symphony orchestras, including those of Philadelphia, Minneapolis, Chicago and Cleveland, the New York Philharmonic, the London and BBC symphonies, the NBC and the Augusteo, of Rome. His chamber music has been heard frequently here and abroad.

Copland is 10 years older than Barber. His birthplace was Brooklyn. He attended public schools there, graduating from high school in 1918. His sister had taught him piano; he continued with Wolfsohn, Wittgenstein, and Adler, and in 1918 began to study theory with Goldmark. He was a pupil of Goldmark for four years.

In 1921 he became the first student of composition at Fontainebleau, where he studied three years with Nadia Boulanger. Meantime, he continued piano with Ricardo Vines for a period. In 1925 he was awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship, which was renewed in 1926. He received, in 1930, the RCA Victor Company award for his "Dance Symphony."

Copland had been active in promoting the interests of contemporary American music. He arranged the Copland-Sessions Concerts of American music in 1928-29-30-31 with Roger Sessions. He lectured on music in 1935 at Harvard, and lectures now at the New School for Social Research. He is a director of the United States Section of the International Society for Contemporary Music, and a member of the League of Composers' Executive Board. He was the first director of the American Festival of Contemporary Music at Yaddo. His orchestral and chamber music works have been heard here and abroad many times.

He wrote a work for the first American commission series of CBS. His "Dance" symphony was broadcast by BBC, and CBS and NBC have broadcast many of his compositions.

THE BIRTH OF "BILLY"

He wrote the following on "Billy the Kid" for the Boston Symphony program notes:

When Lincoln Kirstein, director of the American Ballet Caravan, asks you to write a ballet for him it is a foregone conclusion that you are going to tackle an American subject. Still, when he suggested Billy the Kid as a proper hero for a native ballet, I had certain misgivings. Not about Billy the Kid, of course—for where could one find a better protagonist for an American work—but about my own capabilities as a "cowboy composer." Lincoln Kirstein, however, thought differently—and since he is a very enthusiastic young man, it wasn't long before I was convinced that fate had chosen me and none other to compose this folk-ballet about a young desperado of the Wild West.

I don't know how other composers feel, but as for myself, I divide all music into two parts—that which is meant to be self-sufficient and that which is meant to serve one of the sister arts—theatre, film or ballet. I have never liked music which gets in the way of the thing it is supposedly aiding. That is why I began with one single idea in writing Billy—a firm resolve to write simply. If it is a question of expressing one's soul, you can always write a symphony. But if you are involved in a stage presentation, then the eye is the thing, and music should play a modest role, helping where help is needed, but never injecting itself as if it were the main business of the evening.

There was one other reason for being simple—namely, our hero, Billy. No matter how complex a character he may have been from the psychological standpoint, he makes a simple enough stage figure, this boy bandit who bragged that he had killed 21 men, "not counting Indians." Therefore my problem resolved itself into finding the correct musical style to express the peculiar character of Billy the Kid.

COWBOY TUNES?

To use or not to use cowboy songs as the basis for my ballet became a major issue. Mr. Kirstein said he didn't care—and quietly tucked two slim collections of Western tunes under my arm. I have never been particularly impressed with the musical beauties of the cowboy songs as such. The words are usually delightful and the manner of singing needs no praise from me. But neither the words nor the delivery are of much use in a purely orchestral ballet score, so I was left with the tunes themselves, which I repeat, are often less than exciting. As far as I was concerned, this ballet could be written without benefit of the poverty-stricken tunes Billy himself must have known.

Nevertheless, in order to humor Mr. Kirstein, who said he didn't care whether I used actual cowboy material or not, I decided to take his two little collections with me when I left for Paris in the summer of 1938. It was there that I began working on the scenario as it had been outlined for me.

Perhaps there is something different about a cowboy song in Paris. But whatever the reason may have been, it wasn't long before I found myself hopelessly involved in expanding, contracting, rearranging and superimposing cowboy tunes on the rue de Rennes in Paris.

If you listen closely you can hear in full or in part (in the order of their appearance) "Great Granddad," "Whoopee Ti Yi Yo, Git Along, Little Dogies," "The Old Chisholm Trail," "Old Paint," "The Dying Cowboy," "Trouble for the Range Cook," and so forth. I can guarantee that I did not use "Home on the Range." (You see I had decided to draw the line someplace.)

"In rounding up this bunch of western songs from the plains and hills, we aren't aiming to educate you any." That's the way the editors of one of my source books introduce their collection. "We have only one subject, they continue, "to be entertaining, and we hope that our efforts will be considered from that angle."

That is just about the way I would have put it myself. Except that I had the added difficulty of harmonizing these simple tunes without benefit of the usual accompanying chords. It is a rather delicate operation—to put fresh and unconventional harmonies to well-known melodies without spoiling their naturalness. It is a moment for the composer to throw caution aside and to depend wholly on his instinct for knowing what to do. Courage and instinct are the only things that can be of help at that point.

Before leaving New York, I had seen Jared French's lovely costume designs. The story around which the choreography was to be assigned had been supplied to me after discussions with our choreographer, Eugene Loring. In the finished script, the action begins and closes on the open prairies. The events which take place between the introduction and coda are merely typical of many such episodes on the long trek to the Pacific.

PRAIRIE SCENARIO

The central portion of the ballet concerns itself with significant moments in the life of Billy the Kid. The first scene is a street in a frontier town. Familiar figures amble by. Cowboys saunter into town, some on horseback, others with their lassoes. Some Mexican women do a Jarabe, which is interrupted by a fight between two drunks. Attracted by the gathering crowd, Billy is seen for the first time, as a boy of 12, with his mother. The brawl turns ugly, guns are drawn, and in some unaccountable way, Billy's mother is killed. Without an instant's hesitation, in cold fury, Billy draws a knife from a cow-hand's sheath and stabs his mother's slayers. His short but famous career begins.

In swift succession we see episodes in Billy's later life. At night, under the stars, in a quiet card game with his outlaw friends. Hunted by a posse led by his former friend, Pat Garrett, Billy is pursued. A running gun battle ensues. Billy is captured. A drunken celebration takes place. Billy in prison is, of course, followed by one of Billy's legendary escapes. Tired and worn in the desert, Billy rests with his girl. (Pas de deux.) Starting from a deep sleep, he senses movement in the shadows. The posse has finally caught up with him. It is the end.

If we are ever to have a fully developed ballet company in America—the ballet company in the tradition of the Russians—it will come by way of just such companies as the American Ballet Caravan, and just such subject matter as Billy the Kid. Speaking of the work of the American Ballet Caravan in the pages of "Modern Music," Edwin Denby has this to say: "....they show that an American kind of ballet is growing up, different from the nervous Franco-Russian style....Our own ballet has an easier, simpler character, a kind of American straightforwardness, that is thoroughly agreeable....I think this is the highest kind of praise, because it shows the ballet has taken root and is from now on a part of our life."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
FEB 15 1942

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS SIBELIUS 5TH

Composition and Brahms 2d Are Features of Program Yesterday at Carnegie

LEADER WINS APPLAUSE

Ovation for Koussevitzky Is Voiced by Audience—Handel Evokes String Virtuosity

By OLIN DOWNES

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, was devoted to two major symphonies and, as a preliminary, a concerto grosso of Handel which served to display again the quality of the Boston Symphony strings and the art of first desk players. The symphonies were Sibelius's Fifth and Brahms's Second.

We are informed that the playing of the Brahms symphony, which cannot be described here, brought an ovation at the end from the audience, which, in view of previous readings of the work by this conductor and orchestra, could have been foreseen. Less familiar, though it is now firmly established in the repertory, is the Fifth symphony of Sibelius, given a most stirring and illuminating exposition.

So performed, the symphony, from the pastoral opening to the crashing power of the conclusion, held the audience engrossed. It reveals a beauty peculiar to Sibelius and a symphonic continuity of thought in which he is equaled by no other living composer. This was impressed upon us anew yesterday—testimony which becomes always more inescapable of the composer's independence, inspiration and freedom of the sterile conventions of the Europe of his day, from which Sibelius fought free.

Each of the symphonies of his later period starts from a different standpoint of structure and idea, attacks new creative problems and brings forth fresh discoveries of art, and this, ironical to relate, according to the very principles of the "neo-classicism" concerning which others than Sibelius have said so much and so seldom achieved.

Here is the strength which rests upon a genuine economy and concentration of workmanship, and a noble logic of form, and the conception of pure music as distinguished from that of a superficial romanticism. Sibelius has accomplished this quietly, without propaganda or self-interest, without inspired publicity or resort to the fashionable tricks of the "dernier cri," in his own great and simple way. He is an unfortunately solitary figure in the music of today.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 15 1942

2 Symphonies Are Offered by Koussevitzky

Boston Orchestra Concert Includes Sibelius's Fifth and Second of Brahms

By Francis D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky, who is about to take charge of the Philharmonic-Symphony for a fortnight's guest conductorship, directed his own Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in the third concert of its afternoon series at Carnegie Hall. A program marked by variety, if not by novelty, included Handel's concerto grosso for strings, in B minor, No. 12; the fifth symphony of Jean Sibelius, and the second symphony of Johannes Brahms. There was also "The Star-Spangled Banner," in which Dr. Koussevitzky faced the audience to urge it to song. His tempo for the anthem was the broadest which the anthem has received in one of this season's major musical events, while Sir Thomas Beecham's was undoubtedly the briskest.

All three works in the Bostonian program have had performances this season by the Philharmonic, although not in the same concert, and thus do not need extensive commentary on their own account. This does not mean that their presentation yesterday gave any sense of satiation or of overfamiliarity; this orchestra and its conductor have a way of playing standard works in a manner which stimulates and holds attention to an exceptional degree.

This was particularly the case in the concerto grosso and the Sibelius symphony, owing both to superlative playing and to emotional persuasiveness. Both performances marked the work of the Boston Symphony at its best, which means as high a standard as one is likely to encounter anywhere. The Handelian interpretation offered a notable combination of dignity and spaciousness with expressive delicacy; delectability of string tone with clarity of detail. Such qualities gave full value to one of the most treasurable sections of the concerto, in which a long-breathed melody is restated and intensified over an imposingly waxing and surging bass.

Dr. Koussevitzky's musicians set forth the Sibelius work with finesse of shading and a generously wide palette of instrumental color; the orchestral hues were all the more vivid for not being laid on thickly. The interpretation was essentially lucid, finely wrought and phrased and revealing rather than rugged, but it had a fundamental momentum and imposing, culminative climaxes. The character of the scoring required a careful and discerning apportionment of the various orchestral sonorities, and this stipulation was admirably fulfilled. In the Brahms symphony a few passages lacked the sense of expressive concentration which was provided by the performance as a whole; occasional points of phrasing or tempo, as in the hurrying of an

385 Madison

Koussevitzky Is Acclaimed at Carnegie Hall

Directs Boston Orchestra in Sixth Symphonies of Beethoven, Tchaikovsky

By Robert Lawrence

When Serge Koussevitzky appeared on the stage of Carnegie Hall Friday night to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program devoted to the sixth symphonies of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky, the entire audience rose to its feet—partly as a gesture of admiration for this magnificent conductor, whose art has never remained on a static level, and even more as an expression of sympathy for the recent death of his wife. This was Dr. Koussevitzky's first New York concert since the sad event of last month.

Playing of the highest possible standard marked the evening and made it memorable. Since the achievements of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are in danger of being taken for granted, it is necessary at least once a season to set down a reminder of the organization's incomparable tone, its wonderfully adjusted balance, dynamic sensitivity, the almost supernatural ease with which the most difficult passages are taken. Friday night, except for a first trumpet that was sometimes insecure, not the slightest departure from perfection could be heard throughout the evening. The orchestra was at its very best, and Dr. Koussevitzky had a supreme instrument on which to work his will.

A Triumphant "Pastoral"

At the start of the Beethoven "Pastoral" symphony, with which the program began, there could be noted a certain lack of buoyancy, attributable perhaps to the conductor's state of mind at the moment. This soon disappeared and there rose up a sustained, lyrical panorama that, for breath-taking beauty and transparency of tone, I have never heard equaled in any orchestral concert. This was not a performance to command belated description, but one to be experienced.

In the Tchaikovsky "Pathetic" symphony, played after the intermission, the orchestral tone changed of necessity from the serene timbre of the Beethoven to a dark and occasionally gritty quality that stirred the senses and worked on the emotions of the listeners. There is a great deal of valid disagreement about the "Pathetic" as an art work. While respecting the opinions of those who do not admire the symphony, I believe it in all good conscience to be a masterpiece. The music is not foolproof; the slightest exaggeration may throw the composition out of line. But, taken as a canvas, the "Pathetic" ranks formidably

Tchaikovsky at His Best

Consider the development section of the first movement, superb in its thematic treatment and its swirling tonal drama. In a still larger sense, think of the dynamic and emotional unity that Tchaikovsky has achieved in the architecture of this work. The finale, with its dirge of shattered hopes and irreparable sorrow, is the pendant of the first movement and the consequence of the delirious scherzo; the "five-four" episode is the interlude that bridges the questioning Allegro and the terrifying march. As given Friday night, this symphony carried an overwhelming conviction. One may dislike it with reason; but its basic honesty cannot be denied.

Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting in both of the works on the program was beyond praise. It is perhaps an impertinence to suggest that his powers of communication are even now growing in directness and diminishing in theatricality, for this man has ranked, for the past decade, among the two or three greatest leaders of our time. Yet Friday night he bettered his own record in a concert that, by its power of truth and artistic sincerity, moved many of the listeners present to an unrestrained demonstration of tribute.

Rey de la Torre Gives Recital

Rey de la Torre, Cuban guitarist, made his New York debut yesterday afternoon at Town Hall under auspices of the Asociacion Cultural Inter-Americana, Inc. Playing transcriptions of music by Luis de Milan, Miguel de Fuenllana, Robert de Visee, Sanz, Bach, Sor, Falla, Broqua, Villa-Lobos, Torroba, Granados and Albeniz, he brought an accurate, tasteful approach to all of the works that he offered. There might have been much more color and spontaneity, but Mr. de la Torre showed good basic musicianship. His tone, although limited in dynamic range, was also to be praised.

R. L.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
FEB 15 1942

Koussevitzky Will Conduct Philharmonic This Week

Eugene Gossens is conductor and Erno Valasek, the Leventritt Award winner, is violin soloist at this afternoon's Philharmonic-Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall. The program consists of a repetition of Jaromir Weinberger's "Lincoln Symphony," the Saint-Saens Violin Concerto No. 3 in B minor with Mr. Valasek, and the Gliere Marche Heroique. Mr. Goossens will return to direct the concerts of March 5, 6, 7, 8.

When Serge Koussevitzky appears with the Philharmonic this Thursday night it will be the first time Dr. Koussevitsky has ever conducted an orchestra besides his own Boston Symphony in this country. His opening program, which will be repeated Friday afternoon, will consist of C. P. E. Bach's Concerto in D major for Stringed Instruments, arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg; Aaron Copland's 'Quiet City," Revel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2, and the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony. The Ravel and Shostakovich works will be repeated next Sunday, preceded by the Corelli Suite for Strings.

Andre Mathieu, winner of the Young Composers Award, will be the soloist at the Young People's Concert next Saturday morning under Rudolph Ganz, playing the piano part of his prize Concertino for Piano and Orchestra. The Canadian boy, whose musical gifts have attracted wide spread attention, will be thirteen years old on Feb. 18.

The Saturday morning program will be devoted to North American music and will include, in addition to the Mathieu Concertino, Hadley's Overture "In Bohemia," Herbert Haufrecht's "The Story of ert Haufrechat's "The Story of Ferdinand," with the composer conducting and Mr. Ganz as narrator; an Allegretto for Strings by Henry Holden Huss, "Forest Spirits" from Edward MacDowell's Suite in A minor, and Ernest Schelling's "A Victory Ball."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 16 1942

Pensis on City Podium

Luxemburg Maestro Gives Two B's Program

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

The conductors' league of nations, operating from the New York City Symphony podium, brought Henri Pensis of Luxemburg, the late pocket kingdom, into the fold in Carnegie Hall last night. The Luxemburg radio director's American debut occurred recently in Newark.

Conducting a two Bs program consisting of Beethoven's Coriolan overture and Emperor Concerto and Brahms' Fourth Symphony, Mr. Pensis fully confirmed advance notices and rumors of an energetic pacesetter with a scholarly classic bent.

In dealing out time and dynamics he kept two main principles steadily in mind, clear precision of detail and adjustment of detail to larger patterns and unities. Mr. Pensis tried no prima donna tactics of imposing any sensational slant on the listed classics. He let Brahms and Beethoven speak their piece without superior prompting from the conductor's stand.

* * *

He Needs a Skullcap.

Not that the guesting batonist didn't put in a minor workout in arm and body movements. Mr. Pensis can swoop, dip and twist in accepted calisthenic style. And he ought to wear a skullcap to keep his heaving hair out of the first violinist's bowing reach. He got artistic results, though, which is what counts.

Gyorgy Sandor soloed brilliantly through the Beethoven concerto. The grand manner inheres in the work through an epic surge of early romanticism. Mr. Sandor was in the vein, flaunting tone and technic like bright-hued banners.

Apart from the mechanical and tonal aspects, the reading ranged poetically through the concerto's deeper connotations, accompanied by a clarifying sense of detail and outline. Conductor, soloist and orchestra joined in a snugly interlocked rendering all around.

* * *

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky, who joins the Philharmonic-Symphony's centennial array of conductors Thursday night, wound up the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third visit to town in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon.

On the program were Handel's B minor Concerto Grosso, Sibelius' Fifth Symphony and Brahms' Second, all fixed seasonal entries in the orchestra's repertory.

Mr. Koussevitzky's Brahms was slightly personal in rhythmic trend and melodic line, though the instrumental texture of whole strings of episodes had the gilt-edge finesse so long the Bostonians' hallmark. For pure virtuosity, though, the Sibelius number ranked first.

All choirs were intent on decking out the Finn's Fifth Symphony in holiday dress. Tone was polished to a sunbeam glint and melodic sequences spooled out in silk bands. Mr. Koussevitzky's massed brasses sounded in one firm impact. Conductor and orchestra could do no more. And still the work sounded second rate. For all the lightning flashes and terse bursts of power, Sibelius' symphonic greatness is elsewhere

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
FEB 16 1942

Koussevitzky Gives Concert of Weekend

Boston Symphony Performance Tops Music Events—Bach at the Academy

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitzky may not have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn last Thursday, for some unexplained reason, but he did direct it for the Carnegie Hall concerts of Friday evening and Saturday afternoon. Both programs contained what might well be termed Koussevitzky war horses. Brooklyn audiences are thoroughly versed in his interpretations of the Beethoven Sixth and the Tchaikowsky Sixth, played on Friday night; they are also familiar with the Handel Concerto Grosso in B Minor, No. 12, and the Brahms Second Symphony, on the Saturday program. The other item, Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, is not so frequently played that it might be called an old friend as in the case of these others. And the Sibelius made that concert memorable.

From its pastoral beginning to its heroic ending, the Sibelius Symphony is worthy of inclusion among the elite Fifth symphonies in the history of music. Koussevitzky helps accentuate that conviction each time he sets it forth. The precision and clarity of this performance served to reveal still further beauties in the work; the dramatic thrust of the interpretation to build up tremendous intensity. To have it followed by the Brahms was to subject it to invidious comparisons, but these could not disparage the newer work; differences in appeal and effect could be attributed only to the matter of familiarity.

Mostly About Bach

Except for four motets composed by his forerunners, the music performed at the Sunday afternoon concert sponsored by the Institute at the Academy of Music was that of Johann Sebastian Bach. The program was slightly unbalanced in favor of the composer's piano music, whereas the vocal portions received more praiseworthy performances.

The Lehman Engel Singers sat around a table to sing their numbers by Victoria, Depres, Lassus and Sweelinck, all motets from that golden age of polyphony too often neglected. Later in the program they gave Bach's "Jesu, meine Freude" (in 11 parts). Theirs was singing to be enjoyed.

Harry Cumpson accounted for the rest of the concert, playing the C Sharp and E Major Preludes and Fugues from Book I of the "Well-Tempered Clavichord," the Partita in C Minor, and the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue. His conception of Bach was rather heavy-handed, somewhat characterless, and not altogether steady.

On Saturday evening The Muscovites had entertained with a program of Russian music, gypsy and dancing songs in a somewhat popular manner.

Friends of Music

Returning to the chamber music of Mozart, Mendelssohn and Dvorak, the New Friends of Music presented the Budapest String Quartet again at Town Hall yesterday in the late afternoon. Mozart's Quartet in D (K 499). Mendelssohn's Andante and Scherzo, Opus 31 from an "unfinished" quartet, and Dvorak's colorful Quartet in E Flat, Opus 51, made up the program. The players were in good form and their performances grew more absorbing as the concert advanced. There are some who might look down upon the Dvorak music, but it proved to be thoroughly worthwhile. At times it may sound as though it belonged in restaurants and theaters, but as played yesterday, it asserted its right to be heard more often than it is in concerts.

Leaflets in the program books announced the fact that the music of Bach will comprise the cornerstone of the programs of the New Friends of Music for its seventh season at Town Hall in 1942-43. Chamber music and lieder by Robert Schumann and Josef Haydn's quartets will also be included in next year's concerts. A feature of the series will be violin sonatas played by Adolf Busch and Rudolf Serkin and solo sonatas rendered by Bronislaw Huberman and Joseph Szigeti. For the first time the New Friends of Music will present choral works in its chamber music series and will offer Bach cantatas for small orchestra, chorus and soloists.

A number of string ensembles will be heard, including the Budapest, Kolisch, Primrose, Gordon, Musical Art and Galimir Quartets, as well as the Curtis and the Coolidge Quartets to be heard for the first time on this series. Among the artists who will appear in the series will be Lotte Lehmann and Dusolina Giannini, sopranos; Mack Harrell, baritone; Frances Blaisdell, flutist; Luboschutz and Nemenoff, Hortense Monath, Josepha Rosanska, Beveridge Webster, pianist; Carroll Glenn, violinist; Ralph Kirkpatrick, harpsichordist; Emanuel Feuermann, Gregor Piatigorsky, cellists.

This Clipping From OMAHA, NEB.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD
FEB 15 1942

Music Rules by Petrillo

Tells Us What We Can Hear

By Martin B. Bush

It is only by reason of the fact that music journals often carry news of interest and importance to a vast musical laity which seldom has access to their columns, that the following is offered for dissemination.

It has to do with power in the music world—extraordinary power vested in one man—power which enables that man to decide not only what orchestra conductors the Boston, New York and other metropolitan symphonic concert patrons may hear, but also what conductors you and I are to hear or not hear on the many symphonic broadcasts coming into our homes.

The story, which ran in Musical America, the New York Sun and, doubtless, others, deals with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra's centennial celebration this winter.

When this season, of such importance not only to the orchestra itself but the entire music world, loomed on the horizon, elaborate plans were laid to distinguish the significant birthday of the country's oldest symphonic body. Plans included distribution of conducting honors among a considerable number of the most noted luminaries of the baton, each to come in as guest for a certain number of concerts during the season. Among those engaged was Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony.

Petrillo Steps In

Now neither Mr. Koussevitzky nor the members of his Boston orchestra belong to the American Federation of Musicians. The players of the New York orchestra are all union members. Therefore James C. Petrillo, president of the federation, promptly forbade the New York orchestra having Koussevitzky and Koussevitzky conducting that orchestra.

At about the same time plans were set for the distinguished German conductor, Bruno Walter, to be guest of the Boston orchestra. But, Mr. Walter being an affiliate of the federation, Mr. Petrillo again refused to permit that combination.

Revoked One Ban

Then came a personal appeal to Petrillo by the president of the New York's board of directors, Marshall Field, 3d, and the upshot being that Petrillo "out of consideration and respect to Mr. Field, the orchestra and its board" finally revoked the ban on Mr. Koussevitzky but warned that "in no event is it to be considered a precedent or a departure from the position which the federation has taken."

The Walter ban still holds.

That's the story. Armchair readers may proceed with their own editorializing.

Though beside the point, as a matter of fact, Mr. Koussevitzky himself later had to indefinitely postpone his New York engagement because of the recent death of his wife.

* * *

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 17 1942

WILL GIVE CONCERT

Boston Symphony to Play in Capital For Russian War Relief.

Boston, Feb. 16.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today that it would make its first appearance in several years in Washington, D. C., on March 31 when it gives a concert in Constitution Hall for the benefit of Russian war relief.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born chairman of the Massachusetts Committee for Russian War Relief, will conduct the concert, and Mrs. Joseph E. Davies, wife of the former United States Ambassador to the Soviet Union, will be chairman of the committee in charge of arrangements in Washington.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
FEB 17 1942

Boston Symphony to Play in Washingto

BOSTON, Feb. 17 (AP)—In a Russian war relief benefit, the Bosto Symphony Orchestra will play i Washington for the first time in se eral years. Scheduling of the concer for March 31 in Constitution Hal was announced yesterday. The cor ductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is a na tive of Russia and chairman of th Massachusetts Committee for Russia War Relief.

Hub Symphony to Play in Washington

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to appear for the first time in several years in the nation's capital for the benefit of Russian war relief, March 31. The orchestra will play at Constitution Hall.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

FEB 17 1942

Boston Symphony to Play In Washington March 31

Boston, Feb. 16—(AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra announced today that it would make its first appearance in several years in Washington, D. C., on March 31 when it gives a concert in Constitution hall for the benefit of Russian war relief.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born chairman of the Massachusetts committee for Russian war relief, will conduct the concert, and Mrs Joseph E. Davies, wife of the former United States embassador to the Soviet Union, will be chairman of the committee in charge of arrangements in Washington.

This Clipping From BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

FEB 17 1942

Boston Symphony to Give Russian Benefit

BOSTON, (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced yesterday that it would make its first appearance in several years in Washington, D. C., on March 31 when it gives a concert in Constitution Hall for the benefit of Russian war relief.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born chairman of the Massachusetts Committee for Russian War Relief, will conduct the concert, and Mrs. Joseph E. Davies, wife of the former United States ambassador to the Soviet Union, will be chairman of the committee in charge of arrangements in Washington.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

FEB 17 1942

HUB SYMPHONY TO PLAY IN CAPITAL

BOSTON, Feb. 16 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today that it would make its first appearance in several years in Washington, D. C., on March 31 when it gives a concert in Constitution Hall for the benefit of Russian war relief.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born chairman of the Massachusetts Committee for Russian War Relief, will conduct the concert, and Mrs. Joseph E. Davies, wife of the former United States Ambassador to the Soviet Union, will be chairman of the committee in charge in Washington.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

FEB 17 1942

Boston Symphony to Play March 31 in Washington

BOSTON, Feb. 16 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today that it would make its first appearance in several years in Washington, D. C., on March 31 when it gives a concert in Constitution Hall for the benefit of Russian war relief.

Boston Symphony Going to Washington for Russian Benefit

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, chairman of the Massachusetts Committee for Russian War Relief, will make its first appearance in the nation's capital in many years on March 31, when it will give a concert in Constitution Hall for the benefit of the Russian War Relief.

Mrs. Joseph E. Davies, wife of the former United States Ambassador to the Soviet Union, will be chairman of the committee in charge of arrangements in Washington, the orchestra announced yesterday.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES

FEB 18 1942

Ruth Posselt In Concerto

Providence Hears New Barber Work

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth Providence concert of the season last evening in the Metropolitan Theater. It was a well-made program for these anxious times—finely conducted by Richard Burgin, assistant under Dr. Koussevitzky, and appearing on the podium almost exclusively these last few weeks. The audience was very large. We cannot recall a better patronage for these Boston visits and service men were tucked into every available seat.

Mr. Burgin presented his gifted wife, Ruth Posselt, in the charming concerto for violin and orchestra by young Samuel Barber, a nephew of Louise Homer. He preceded the concerto by Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony in a bright, rhythmic performance and concluded with Aaron Copland's Suite from the Ballet, "Billy the Kid."

Mendelssohn on Holiday

Here was the youthful Mendelssohn setting down in rather independent departure from strictly classical vein some of the high spirits he had brought home from his sojourn in Italy. The allegro broke forth like a festival overture but soon, the fantastic craftsmanship of the incidental music to "Midsummer Night's Dream" assured questioners in the Paderewskian shades of entirely lowered lights that here was Felix on a holiday. The Andante movement has variety and life in its unusual theme that merges into minor and grows more marchlike and staccato as it progresses. As remembered, the Saltarello which makes the final movement has been heard more excitingly from this orchestra, but the whole impression was pleasant.

Miss Posselt was favorably heard at the Berkshire Festival last Summer in the Barber concerto. It deserves to live far more than many of its contemporaries, for it speaks sincerely and warmly from the heart of nature. How fair it and the soloist must have appeared in the Tanglewood setting! The violin part is beautifully integrated with the orchestra and Miss Posselt's playing seemed alight with mellow, golden sunshine. The concerto showed care in rehearsal. Subtle effects were shrewdly planned; integrity rather than showmanship came foremost. The Moto perpetuo, a cadenza-like bit of virtuoso playing, had to satisfy admirers of this outstanding woman violinist, known better possibly to Europe than to her own New England. The oboe solo of the Andante, the revealed nobility of violin tone marked each after its own gift some perfect moment of a Summer day.

Billy the Kid Crackles

Those seriously attentive men from Camp Edwards, put up at the armory overnight, they said, how did "Billy the Kid" affect them, out on a musical excursion? Gay it was; vibrant with spirit and derring do. Copland, disciple of Mlle. Boulanger and the French school, is plunging enthusiastically into the American scene. He is justified by his fresh approach, by his transparent instrumentation and we appreciate his use of the trumpet—for in Mager, the Boston Symphony has an expert brass man. What bothered us was how the gatling guns chattering away would be taken by the men in khaki. It was a clever and not too noisy use of percussion and most of the audience laughed merrily. Billy, like the Dutch navy, got his man a year.

A.C.R.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES

FEB 18 1942

Ruth Posselt In Concerto

Providence Hears New Barber Work

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth Providence concert of the season last evening in the Metropolitan Theater. It was a well-made program for these anxious times—finely conducted by Richard Burgin, assistant under Dr. Koussevitzky, and appearing on the podium almost exclusively these last few weeks. The audience was very large. We cannot recall a better patronage for these Boston visits and service men were tucked into every available seat.

Mr. Burgin presented his gifted wife, Ruth Posselt, in the charming concerto for violin and orchestra by young Samuel Barber, a nephew of Louise Homer. He preceded the concerto by Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony in a bright, rhythmic performance and concluded with Aaron Copland's Suite from the Ballet, "Billy the Kid."

Mendelssohn on Holiday

Here was the youthful Mendelssohn setting down in rather independent departure from strictly classical vein some of the high spirits he had brought home from his sojourn in Italy. The allegro broke forth like a festival overture but soon, the fantastic craftsmanship of the incidental music to "Midsummer Night's Dream" assured questioners in the Paderewskian shades of entirely lowered lights that here was Felix on a holiday. The Andante movement has variety and life in its unusual theme that merges into minor and grows more marchlike and staccato as it progresses. As remembered, the Saltarello which makes the final movement has been heard more excitingly from this orchestra, but the whole impression was pleasant.

Miss Posselt was favorably heard at the Berkshire Festival last Summer in the Barber concerto. It deserves to live far more than many of its contemporaries, for it speaks sincerely and warmly from the heart of nature. How fair it and the soloist must have appeared in the Tanglewood setting! The violin part is beautifully integrated with the orchestra and Miss Posselt's playing seemed alight with mellow, golden sunshine. The concerto showed care in rehearsal. Subtle effects were shrewdly planned; integrity rather than showmanship came foremost. The Moto perpetuo, a cadenza-like bit of virtuoso playing, had to satisfy admirers of this outstanding woman violinist, known better possibly to Europe than to her own New England. The oboe solo of the Andante, the revealed nobility of violin tone marked each after its own gift some perfect moment of a Summer day.

Billy the Kid Crackles

Those seriously attentive men from Camp Edwards, put up at the armory overnight, they said, how did "Billy the Kid" affect them, out on a musical excursion? Gay it was; vibrant with spirit and derring do. Copland, disciple of Mlle. Boulanger and the French school, is plunging enthusiastically into the American scene. He is justified by his fresh approach, by his transparent instrumentation and we appreciate his use of the trumpet—for in Mager, the Boston Symphony has an expert brass man. What bothered us was how the gatling guns chattering away would be taken by the men in khaki. It was a clever and not too noisy use of percussion and most of the audience laughed merrily. Billy, like the Dutch navy, got his man a year.

A.C.R.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 18 1942

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Under Burgin Features American Composers.

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing last night in Metropolitan Theatre, produced a program more interesting than any it has hazarded here for a considerable time. Two substantial works by living Americans were performed; in one of them an American young lady was solo violinist.

Richard Burgin conducted for the second time this season, substituting for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The soloist was Ruth Posselt, Mr. Burgin's wife.

The violin concerto by Samuel Barber provided a centre of gravity for the program. It is in three movements, allegro molto moderato, andante sostenuto, and presto, in moto perpetuo.

The second movement seemed to us the finest. It is contemplative in its themes and in the handling of them, the instrumentation is restrained and effective, there is richness and intensity to a degree that separates it rather decidedly from what goes before and comes after. Also it is exquisitely suited to display the singing tone and eloquent phrasing of Miss Posselt's best work. Although the technical difficulties were often redoubtable, Miss Posselt was quite at ease. She could not always bid forth a big tone, capable of opposing the full orchestra, but she had command of lyric qualities that are far rarer. The audience recalled her several times, and the orchestra contributed to the applause.

Aaron Copland's suite from the ballet "Billy the Kid" was the other home-grown contender. The difficulty with ballet music on a concert program is that, if it is good, there seems to be something missing, to wit, the ballet. However, Copland's music is so skillful, so evocative of action and color, that it tends to make every listener his own choreographer; it conveys the roaring, antic, murderous West with genuine horse-opera guesto and sentimentality. Throughout the suite one has the impression of a composer who knows just what he is trying to do and just how to do it. Mr. Burgin and the orchestra adjusted themselves to the unconventional moods with admirable facility and sincerity.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony brightly prepared the way for the modern works. Mr. Burgin bounced the first and last movements around rather freely; the two in the middle were sauve and polished, in the orchestra's flawless manner.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 18 1942

MUSIC

Richard Burgin Conducts Boston Symphony Here; His Wife, Soloist

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing last night in Metropolitan Theatre, produced a program more interesting than any it has hazarded here for a considerable time. Two substantial works by living Americans were performed; in one of them an American young lady was solo violinist.

Richard Burgin conducted for the second time this season, substituting for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The soloist was Ruth Posselt, Mr. Burgin's wife.

The violin concerto by Samuel Barber provided a centre of gravity for the program. It is in three movements, allegro molto moderato, andante sostenuto, and presto, in moto perpetuo.

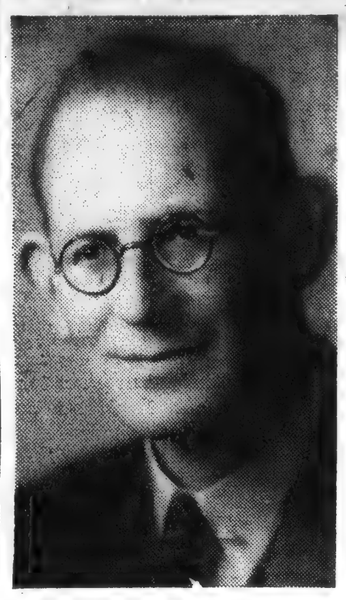
The second movement seemed to us the finest. It is contemplative in its themes and in the handling of them, the instrumentation is restrained and effective, there is richness and intensity to a degree that separates it rather decidedly from what goes before and comes after. Also it is exquisitely suited to display the singing tone and eloquent phrasing of Miss Posselt's best work. Although the technical difficulties were often redoubtable, Miss Posselt was quite at ease. She could not always bid forth a big tone, capable of opposing the full orchestra, but she had command of lyric qualities that are far rarer. The audience recalled her several times, and the orchestra contributed to the applause.

Aaron Copland's suite from the ballet "Billy the Kid" was the other home-grown contender. The difficulty with ballet music on a concert program is that, if it is good, there seems to be something missing, to wit, the ballet. However, Copland's music is so skillful, so evocative of action and color, that it tends to make every listener his own choreographer; it conveys the roaring, antic, murderous West with genuine horse-opera guesto and sentimentality. Throughout the suite one has the impression of a composer who knows just what he is trying to do and just how to do it. Mr. Burgin and the orchestra adjusted themselves to the unconventional moods with admirable facility and sincerity.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony brightly prepared the way for the modern works. Mr. Burgin bounced the first and last movements around rather freely; the two in the middle were sauve and polished, in the orchestra's flawless manner.

Ernst Levy's Talents Find Expression in Many Subjects

Virtuoso Pianist Will Be Symphony Soloist Friday and Saturday



Warren Kay Vantine

ERNST LEVY, piano soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Prodigious is the word that comes to mind during a chat with Ernst Levy, the Swiss musician now a member of the New England Conservatory faculty. The range of his interests is as big as the man himself, his hearty bass laugh and the huge 10-year-old pipe he smokes. He will talk, simply and in good English, on subjects from music to movies to esthetics of sound and color and the relationship between emotion and the mathematics of sound.

Next Friday afternon and Saturday evening the public may see and hear him at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing the piano solo of Liszt's "Death Dance." Richard Burgin will conduct. These will be Mr. Levy's first appearances with the Boston Symphony. He has already given a recital under Conservatory auspices and has played with the Conservatory Orchestra.

Mr. Leavy arrived in this country last September to take up his teaching post. It took him a month to go from Geneva in his native Switzerland, to New York. In June of 1940 he had left Paris, where he had lived for 20 years, just a day or two ahead of the invading Nazi army. There was no time to take much in the way of baggage. Mr. Levy mounted a bicycle and was off for Switzerland by way of Southern or unoccupied France. His extensive musical library had to be abandoned.

For a year he remained in Switzerland. Leaving Geneva last August, this time by train and not bicycle, he went directly across Southern France, over the Pyrenees and into Spain. Having received from Lisbon no answer to his request for a Portuguese visa, Mr. Levy was fortunate enough to obtain passage on a reasonably comfortable ship that sailed from Bilbao.

He was born in Basle, Switzerland, No. 18, 1895. He studied music with Huber at the Basle Conservatory and with Pugno in Paris. From 1916 to 1921 he was professor of piano at Basle Conservatory. Then he removed to Paris.

Versatility extends into Mr. Levy's musical pursuits. He is a virtuoso pianist; he has composed much, and he has done a good deal of theoretical work, including a book on harmony that is now being published in Switzerland. For 12 years he conducted in Paris the Philharmonic Chorus, of about 150 voices, which he founded. This was a difficult and an astonishing work in a city proverbially aloof to choral music. With the chorus he performed many scores, especially religious compositions of Liszt, unknown in the French capital.

In his Boston apartment stands an odd-looking rectangular instrument with 13 strings, kept in a portable case. This is a Sonometer, not a musical instrument but a physicist's gadget used for experiments with tone. Mr. Levy is working on the ancient Pythagorean system.

About once a year Mr. Levy goes to the movies for relaxation, almost always when there is a Walt Disney film available. Ordinary movies, with their literal photography of realism, Mr. Levy dislikes, but Walt Disney, in his opinion, is a great artist. "Snow White," "Pinocchio" and now "Dumbo" have given the musician much pleasure. So far, he hasn't ventured to attend "Fantasia."

Mr. Levy's usual relaxation is his machine shop. One room of his apartment is neatly fitted with wood and metal lathes, a bandsaw and other apparatus. Pipe in mouth, covered over with dungarees, he works away of an evening making all sorts of articles which he likes to give to his friends. C. W. D.

Ruth Posselt In Concerto

Providence Hears New Barber Work

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth Providence concert of the season last evening in the Metropolitan Theater. It was a well-made program for these anxious times—finely conducted by Richard Burgin, assistant under Dr. Koussevitzky, and appearing on the podium almost exclusively these last few weeks. The audience was very large. We cannot recall a better patronage for these Boston visits and service men were tucked into every available seat.

Mr. Burgin presented his gifted wife, Ruth Posselt, in the charming concerto for violin and orchestra by young Samuel Barber, a nephew of Louise Homer. He preceded the concerto by Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony in a bright, rhythmic performance and concluded with Aaron Copland's Suite from the Ballet, "Billy the Kid."

Mendelssohn on Holiday

Here was the youthful Mendelssohn setting down in rather independent departure from strictly classical vein some of the high spirits he had brought home from his sojourn in Italy. The allegro broke forth like a festival overture but soon, the fantastic craftsmanship of the incidental music to "Midsummer Night's Dream" assured questioners in the Paderewskian shades of entirely lowered lights that here was Felix on a holiday. The Andante movement has variety and life in its unusual theme that merges into minor and grows more marchlike and staccato as it progresses. As remembered, the Saltarello which makes the final movement has been heard more excitingly from this orchestra, but the whole impression was pleasant.

Miss Posselt was favorably heard at the Berkshire Festival last Summer in the Barber concerto. It deserves to live far more than many of its contemporaries, for it speaks sincerely and warmly from the heart of nature. How fair it and the soloist must have appeared in the Tanglewood setting! The violin part is beautifully integrated with the orchestra and Miss Posselt's playing seemed alight with mellow, golden sunshine. The concerto showed care in rehearsal. Subtle effects were shrewdly planned; integrity rather than showmanship came foremost. The Moto perpetuo, a cadenza-like bit of virtuoso playing, had to satisfy admirers of this outstanding woman violinist, known better possibly to Europe than to her own New England. The oboe solo of the Andante, the revealed nobility of violin tone marked each after its own gift some perfect moment of a Summer day.

Billy the Kid Crackles

Those seriously attentive men from Camp Edwards, put up at the armory overnight, they said, how did "Billy the Kid" affect them, out on a musical excursion? Gay it was; vibrant with spirit and derring do. Copland, disciple of Mlle. Boulanger and the French school, is plunging enthusiastically into the American scene. He is justified by his fresh approach, by his transparent instrumentation and we appreciate his use of the trumpet—for in Mager, the Boston Symphony has an expert brass man. What bothered us was how the gatling guns chattering away would be taken by the men in khaki. It was a clever and not too noisy use of percussion and most of the audience laughed merrily. Billy, like the Dutch navy, got his man a year.

A.C.R.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 18 1942

Boston Symphony To Play at Benefit In Washington

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, is to make its first appearance for several years in the nation's capital in a notable concert at Constitution Hall, Tuesday evening, Mar. 31, for Russian War Relief.

The announcement was made by Mrs. Edward M. Watson, vice-chairman of the Washington committee for this event. The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have offered the services of the famous organization.

Mrs. Joseph E. Davies, wife of the former United States ambassador to Russia, has accepted the chairmanship of this committee and, with Mrs. Watson's assistance, is forming a full committee and list of patrons for this brilliant event. Mrs. Emory Land is seriving with Mrs. Watson as a vice chairman.

Dr. Koussevitsky has embraced the opportunity to assist in the relief of the country of his birth, which, by its heroic part in the war, now holds the attention of the world.

American Organization

Russian War Relief, Inc. is an American organization, recognized by the President's Committee on War Relief Agencies as an entirely unofficial agency through which the personal gifts of the American people can be channeled to the brave civilians and soldiers in the Soviet Union. It has been sending principally medical supplies, surgical instruments and new clothes to Russia.

Its president, Edward C. Carter, explains that Russian War Relief, Inc. was not organized because of any appeal for aid from the Soviet Union, but grew out of a spontaneous expression on the part of Americans in every part of the United States. These people who had recognized the invaluable aid which British War Relief and United China Relief had given felt that in addition to official government aid, Americans must express their own deep indebtedness to the peoples of the Soviet Union by a generous outpouring of private help.

Directors

The board of directors of Russian War Relief, Inc. includes Allen Wardwell, who accompanied W. Averell Harriman on his recent mission to Moscow; Clark H. Minor, president of the International General Electric; Reeve Schley, vicepresident of the Chase National Bank. Pierre Jay, chairman of the board of the Fiduciary Trust Company of New York, is the national treasurer. William L. Batt is the honorary chairman of the Philadelphia Committee.

C. C. Cappel will be local manager for the concert. Reservations can be made now at his concert bureau in Ballard's, 1340 G. St., N. W.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 18 1942

Ruth Posselt Combines Career with Home Duties

Violinist Cooks Husband's Dinner After Performance

She and Richard Burgin, However, Maintain Separate Studios for Practice.

BY EDITH A. NICHOLS

RUTH POSSELT: She fiddles while her husband conducts.

If prizes had been passed out last night for the proudest husband in Providence we gamble the guess Richard Burgin would have captured the blue ribbon.

Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted in place of his chief, Serge Koussevitzky. Which, in itself, was a matter of pride for the dimunitive, pompadoured violinist.

His Wife Acclaimed

But the high moment for Burgin came when the audience, the members of the orchestra and the people backstage (including the electrician) acclaimed Burgin's wife, Ruth Posselt, for her fine performance as soloist in Samuel Barber's modern concerto for violin and orchestra.

Off stage, as the usual Providence assembly of music lovers continued to applaud Miss Posselt's rendition of the concerto, they were hearing for the first time here, the husband of the young artist was beside himself with joy. He kissed her hand, gave her a gentle push toward the stage and finally reluctantly went on with her to share in acknowledging the plaudits.

Started at Age of Nine

For several hours we had waited to see Miss Posselt. We had heard that she was an exceptional musician who had started her career at the age of nine in Boston and had gone on from that early debut to recitals with the principal orchestras in Europe and this country. We knew that she had appeared last summer with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, when she played the same concerto. We knew that she must be good to have been invited to play in a winter concert with the orchestra.

But it wasn't until we followed her up the tortuous iron stairway, after her performance, to her cramped dressing room that we realized fully that here was another of that vast army of women in the country today who are successfully combining two jobs—their own careers and managing a home.

Likes Pressure Cooking

So it was about her home and her musician-husband that we interviewed Miss Posselt. She had by that time parked her career away in her violin case. But you could tell that the sound of her triumph down there on the stage a few minutes before were still ringing in her ears and she was proud for herself and her conductor-husband.

She admitted that Burgin likes her cooking, that he bought her recently a pressure cooker and after concerts they go home and concoct a meal.

"Do you know you can cook a whole dinner in one of those things in a half hour?" she said. "Yes, my husband likes to eat. And he likes what I make. You see my father was manager of the Boston Theatre years ago. He would come home late and we would have a good supper ready for him. I think I've always known how to cook and I love it.

Practise Apart

"No mere apartment can house two musicians, both of whom play the same instrument. We have to have our own studios where we practise independently. But naturally, Richard brings his musical problems home to me and I bring mine home to him, so there are hours when we play and play. Apartment house neighbors might not like that. So we have a house and we can play, entertain or rehearse as late as we want to. It's fun."

"Isn't it difficult for two artists with the temperaments that are supposed to go with musicianship to live normal everyday lives?" we asked.

"Not at all. My husband hasn't a bit of temperament as you mean. Nervous, yes. But not temperamental."

Praises Conductor

The couple were married about two years ago. Miss Posselt said last night that for years she had attended concerts by the Boston Symphony and was crazy about Burgin's playing. They met formally three years ago.

As a conductor, her husband is tops, she believes. "I had rather play under his baton than anyone's else. You feel such complete confidence that you and he and the orchestra are together."

We knew what Miss Posselt meant. We had watched the performance from a crack in the door backstage. We could see how her masterful playing was augmented and sustained by his direction. We could see, too, how proud he was in the golden-haired, velvet-clad young woman who was a fellow artist and his wife.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
NEWS
FEB 19 1942

Russian Relief

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitsky conducting, will give its first concert in Washington, D. C. in seven years on March 31. Proceeds will go to the Russian War Relief for purchase of medicines and surgical supplies.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
FEB 20 1942

PHILHARMONIC LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Conductor Takes Baton as 'Guest.'

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

With double basses up front at the left, where just one orchestra's double basses are expected to be found, it was a typical Boston Symphony program that Serge Koussevitzky conducted in Carnegie Hall last night. Moreover, it evoked just such demonstrations of enthusiasm as have been customary at Boston Symphony concerts in New York. But whatever the eyes had to report about the look of things, the ears were not deceived. This was the New York Philharmonic-Symphony that did the playing and these were Philharmonic-Symphony subscribers who did the applauding. Mr. Koussevitzky's participation was that of a "guest"—number eight in the series of ten conductors for the resident orchestra's centennial season.

Four compositions were performed, all of them identified in the past with Boston Symphony concerts, though two were listed as "First time by the Society." These two were Copland's evocative "Quiet City," which, however, had figured in the Philharmonic's summer concerts at the Lewisohn Stadium, and the brilliant, if circusy, Fifth Symphony of Shostakovich. The other music of the evening was the Steinberg arrangement of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach's enchanting D major Concerto and Ravel's dazzling second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite.

There was no lack of virtuosity, individual or collective, in the playing. Considered as an orchestra that was being "guested"; and one that was being obligated, after limited rehearsal, to adjust its perspective to the requirements of an unfamiliar musical personality, the ensemble rose magnificently to the occasion. But it did not suddenly change its basic sound so as to become in effect the Boston Symphony rather than the Philharmonic. There was not the same gloss on the strings, but a deeper and perhaps a thicker tone. Woodwinds and brass also remained distinguishable from those of the Boston ensemble by something of timbre as well as style. Dr. Koussevitzky summoned the musicians to their feet repeatedly to show his approval of their playing and waved on a special tribute to Harry Glantz and Mishel Nazzi, the trumpet and English horn of "Quiet City." They deserved it.

But it could not be expected that there would be the same perfection of detail, the same smoothness and unity of performance, the same complete identification of the players with the conductor's individual way of doing things, as has been experienced at concerts by the Boston band. If the Philharmonic-Symphony has played the Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite on a dozen or more occasions under various conductors, the Boston Symphony has played it many scores of times under the same conductor. But isn't it possible that only the reviewers and a few others among the very fastidious bother to split hairs over such distinctions as may be drawn when one brilliant performance is pitted against another? The atmosphere last night was that of unstinted enthusiasm for conductor and orchestra. Mr. Copland, too, was heartily applauded when he emerged for his "Quiet City" bows.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
FEB 20 1942

Koussevitzky Appears As Guest Conductor

Leads Philharmonic-Symphony in Peak Performance of Shostakovich Symphony

By MILES KASTENDIECK

All that was needed to prove the greatness of Koussevitzky as a conductor was to have him lead an orchestra other than the Boston Symphony. Since he has never been a guest conductor in over the quarter century he has built up the Boston Symphony to its enviable position, his appearance with the Philharmonic-Symphony at Carnegie Hall last night was a major event. Not that the proof of greatness was needed, but his assumption of this new assignment was definitely a test.

Suffice it to say that the Philharmonic-Symphony came into its own musically and artistically as it has rarely done this season. In playing the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony, it attained the highest peak of performance in its centennial season to date. It only goes to show how fastidious care can bring out a splendid group of musicians. Last night there were to be heard all the subtleties of orchestral color though it was obvious that the orchestra had not attained complete freedom of expression under its new leadership. But it responded admirably to the refining influence which is the hallmark of Koussevitzky's conducting. Intensity was the keynote of the evening in the conducting, in the playing, and in the listening.

It was to be expected that Koussevitzky would turn to contemporary music. There were two first times for the society in the performances of Copland's "Quiet City" and the Shostakovich Symphony. In both cases there was every indication that Koussevitzky has the power to make one believe in contemporary music. Would that more like him were available to bring Philharmonic audiences to the consciousness of the newer music.

The program began with C. P. E. Bach's Concerto for Stringed Instruments in D Major which tested the mettle and the sonority of the strings. There followed the Copland work which never fails of its effect with its haunting strain "most musical, most melancholy." Special praise went to Harry Glantz for the perfection and sympathetic quality of his playing of the solo trumpet around which Copland has built his score.

The familiar Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 2, completed the first half of the program. Koussevitzky realized some of the detail of the score but this was the least satisfactory performance of the evening. Part of this was due to the conductor's penchant for slow, broad tempos which are not always the best for music like this.

Of the Shostakovich Fifth, let it be said that it holds its own after repeated hearings, that of its four movements only the second ruffles the sensibilities, though it may not be for us to judge too stringently of its commonplace quality. The first and third are the most musical, while the last, with all its heroic bravura, sounds typically and convincingly Russian. It was in this work that Koussevitzky showed how vital a thing interpretation is and how consistently dramatic his finales are. This was a presentation to stir the blood and bring cheers for the performers.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
CITIZEN
FEB 20 1942

Koussevitzky Conducts Philharmonic Orchestra

The long awaited appearance of Serge Koussevitzky as pro-tem conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra came to pass last night at Carnegie Hall. It was a great success. The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives five concerts in Brooklyn each year, was making his first effort at conducting an orchestra, other than the Boston, since he arrived in this country many years ago. His appearance was in accordance with the plan of having all prominent conductors in this country during this, the Philharmonic's centennial year, take the podium for a brief period.

The program last night was more a Koussevitzky program than a Philharmonic. Only one of the works was of the far past; that was the concerto for stringed instruments by Philipp Emanuel Bach. The other works were of this century. They were Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite, Aaron Copland's "Quiet City" music, written for the Irwin Shaw play of that name, and the Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony. The co-ordination of conductor and orchestra, considering his not having conducted another orchestra and considering the choice of program, much different from those usually heard at Carnegie Hall, was most commendable. The visiting conductor was loudly applauded by a large audience.

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
FEB 20 1942

Polyna Stoska and Jean Bedetti With Boston Symphony Orchestra

Polyna Stoska, soprano, will be the soloist at the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 27-28, and at the concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, next Thursday evening, Feb. 26. Richard Burgin will conduct, and the programs will be the same for the three concerts. The program will include Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 104, the last of the London series and the last which he composed; and the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor. Polyna Stoska will be heard in the aria of the Contessa in "The Marriage of Figaro," "Dove Sono," and the aria "Leise, Leise" from Weber's "Der Freischutz." Miss Stoska was born in Worcester, Mass., of Lithuanian parents. After appearances in this country, she went to Europe in 1935 and began her operatic career in 1938, singing in the opera houses of Berlin, Hanover, Breslau, and Leipzig. Miss Stoska gave a recital in Jordan Hall on Feb. 8 last.

Jean Bedetti, 'cellist, will be the soloist at the next pair of concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series, March 2 and 3. Richard Burgin will conduct and will introduce two pieces by Oscar Levant: an Overture, and a "Dirge" which Mr. Levant wrote in memory of his friend, George Gershwin. Jean Bedetti will appear with the orchestra in the Concerto of Lalo. The symphony will be the First of Jean Sibelius in E minor.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 20 1942

Koussevitzky Appears With Philharmonic

Concert Includes Copland's 'QuietCity' and Works of Ravel and Shostakovitch

By Francis D. Perkins

Last night's concert, if the commentator's memory has not strayed, was the second time that Serge Koussevitzky has appeared at Carnegie Hall without the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first time, over fifteen years ago, was when he appeared without any orchestra to give a double-bass recital; yesterday's Philharmonic - Symphony concert was his first in this country with a non-Bostonian major orchestra. The memorably performed program with which he began his fort night's Philharmonic guest conductorship consisted of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach's concerto in D major for strings, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg; Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite and Dmitri Shostakovitch's fifth symphony.

Despite Dr. Koussevitzky's eminence in his field, the concert was a subject of some advance speculation about how he would fare with an orchestra which was new to him and as to how quickly the Philharmonic musicians—who, indeed, have been called upon for much adaptability this season—would be able to give him a complete fulfillment of his interpretative intentions. The result implied that the musicians and the conductor had established a thorough mutual understanding during the last four days of rehearsals and that Dr. Koussevitzky's talents did not depend for their manifestation upon a particular set of conditions.

This was apparent in the imposing performance of the C. P. E. Bach concerto, which followed an unusually broad-paced and solemn playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner." At first the orchestral tone, while rich and sonorous, did not have the fine definition of outline which is associated with Bostonians' strings, but this impression was transitory. The strings sang delectably in the andante, and the concert as a whole represented an orchestra in fine form under communicative and inspiring leadership. Mr. Copland's music was presented with admirable clarity of detail and subtlety of dynamics and instrumental hues, and encomiums were deserved by the solo trumpeter and English horn player—presumably Messrs. Glantz and Nazzi. The work is new to the regular Philharmonic repertoire, but it has been played here by the Saidenberg Sinfonietta and at the Stadium. It is a remarkably effective piece of scoring, and also serves its expressive purpose well, although, on rehearing, it seemed to be spun out a little too long to maintain an unflagging interest. Mr. Copland was called to the stage to share the applause.

The Ravel suite had a vivid interpretation, with remarkable mass of tone as well as headlong momentum for the closing general dance, and the orchestra, in its first indoor performance of the Shostakovitch symphony, did its best to substantiate the conductor's belief that this work is one of the most outstanding productions of the last decade or two. It has been played here under other conductors—Stokowski, Rodzinski and Mitropoulos, but yet, thus far, it has been particularly associated with Dr. Koussevitzky, who has spared no efforts toward making it well known. The performance itself, in its memorable range of color, its technical finish and its convincing emotional force, was one of the orchestra's best achievements of the season, and thus spoke persuasively for the music. There was still room for wondering how the symphony would weather the test of a series of average performances; it has its reminiscent moments, some recalling Mahler and some harking back to Tchaikovsky; the musical ideas are not of equal distinction. But it has vitality and emotional force, as well as notable skill of orchestral craftsmanship; it lingered in the ears of the departing reviewer as Dr. Koussevitzky bowed his acknowledgment of the audience's closing ovation.

Copland, Shostakovich and Bach

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

With Sergei Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony batonist, bowing into the Philharmonic-Symphony's centennial season, Dmitri Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony and Aaron Copland's Quiet City made a joint entry into the society's repertory in Carnegie Hall last night.

Mr. Koussevitzky's first guest encounter with the local unit ran a mounting course, topped off by a gripping reading of the gifted Soviet composer's best symphony to date. There conductor and orchestra fell into superb working rapport making for compact integration and dynamic zip.

* * *

Inventive Power Bristles.

The symphony ranks high in modern music, possibly rating peak status in symphonic classing. Anyway, authentic genius rings out along its whole epic web. Inventive power fairly bristles in all four movements

Though the rendering of the Shostakovich work scaled the night's dizziest virtuoso heights, Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2 wasn't far behind in the climb to power.

* * *

Copland's Urban Fantasy.

Mr. Copland's canny urban fantasy for trumpet, English horn and string orchestra—already rendered by some 40 orchestras the world over—stems from Irwin Shaw's defunct play and is something of a Koussevitzky pet.

Mr. Koussevitzky read sombre symphonic poetry out of the Copland number, and Harry Glantz, first trumpet, and Michel Nazzi, English horn, deserved the ovation they shared with the composer.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 20 1942

Copland, Shostakovich and Bach

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

With Sergei Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony batonist, bowing into the Philharmonic-Symphony's centennial season, Dmitri Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony and Aaron Copland's Quiet City made a joint entry into the society's repertory in Carnegie Hall last night.

Mr. Koussevitzky's first guest encounter with the local unit ran a mounting course, topped off by a gripping reading of the gifted Soviet composer's best symphony to date. There conductor and orchestra fell into superb working rapport making for compact integration and dynamic zip.

* * *

Inventive Power Bristles.

The symphony ranks high in modern music, possibly rating peak status in symphonic classing. Anyway, authentic genius rings out along its whole epic web. Inventive power fairly bristles in all four movements

Though the rendering of the Shostakovich work scaled the night's dizziest virtuoso heights, Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2 wasn't far behind in the climb to power.

* * *

Copland's Urban Fantasy.

Mr. Copland's canny urban fantasy for trumpet, English horn and string orchestra—already rendered by some 40 orchestras the world over—stems from Irwin Shaw's defunct play and is something of a Koussevitzky pet.

Mr. Koussevitzky read sombre symphonic poetry out of the Copland number, and Harry Glantz, first trumpet, and Michel Nazzi, English horn, deserved the ovation they shared with the composer.

We'd Like Him, But We Won't Get Him

By HENRY SIMON

Judging from their behavior at last night's Carnegie Hall concert, there isn't much question whom the Philharmonic-Symphony's subscribers would like to have as permanent conductor. Serge Koussevitzky.

They won't get him, of course, as he has long been wedded to the Boston Symphony. In fact, last night was the first time that he has conducted a major U. S. orchestra other than his own. He only did it then by special permission of the copyright owner—James C. Petrillo of the AFM, who alone can graciously grant the right of a non-union man's conducting a union orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky is non-union.

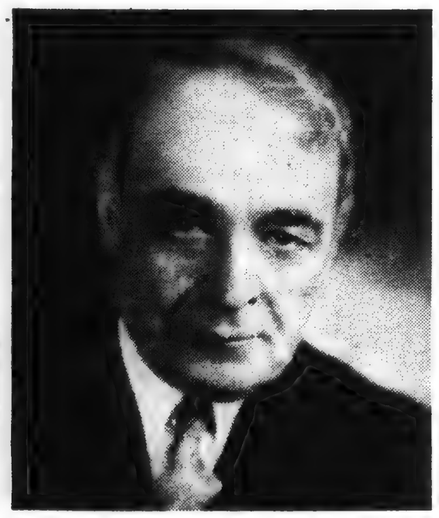
He arrived here later than originally announced as the untimely death of Mrs. Koussevitzky had caused a postponement of the first date. When he came to the podium, the sold-out house gave him a long, warm, respectful greeting. When he left it was cheers. He'll be here a fortnight.

Our leading local orchestra has had marked ups and downs this year, playing all the way from fine to third-rate. Last night it was fine. It sounded, particularly in the string section, remarkably much like the Boston Symphony. Man for man and choir for choir, I don't believe that there is a better orchestra in the country than the Philharmonic-Symphony; but under the kaleidoscopic change of conductors it has suffered this year, it cannot be expected to maintain the standard of the Bostonians, who play only under Dr. Koussevitzky and his assistants. It is a tribute to the skill and adaptability of the men and to the forceful musical personality of the leader that they should play as they did last night.

That striking personality caught every item on the program, ready or not. A concerto for strings by K. P. E. Bach (arranged for winds and strings by Maximilian Steinberg) came forth with wide, clean-cut gradations of sound never dreamed of by the 18th century composer. Aaron Copland's modest and deeply affecting Quiet City also suffered from a dressing somewhat too rich. I have heard it played by smaller bands sounding less smooth—maybe even less well in tune—but more appropriately spare.

But Dr. Koussevitzky is one of the few maestri who can make an orchestra shimmer and still sound perfectly clear. He did it with Ravel's second Daphnis and Chloe Suite. He is also one of the few who can elicit sounds both ear-splitting and musical. He did that with the Fifth Symphony by Shostakovich. A tremendous performance.

Drama, power, richness, skill everywhere. No wonder our subscribers liked him.



Serge Koussevitzky

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
FEB 20 1942

PHILHARMONIC IS CONDUCTED BY SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

By Edward O'Gorman

It was conductor's night on-stage, off-stage, and probably back-stage, at the Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last evening.

For those who regard orchestra concerts from a conductorial angle, as most do, it was a red-letter event inasmuch as it marked the first appearance with the Philharmonic of Serge Koussevitzky, the regular leader of the Boston Symphony, and except on rare occasions a one-orchestra conductor. The house, as a result, was dotted with a small army of conductors whose curiosity was probably whetted by the first public collaboration of a sophisticated, virtuoso orchestra and a conductor whose technical art, according to the best authorities, is notoriously idiosyncratic.

Interest for the large and music-loving audience, however, was centered in two things: in the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony, one of this century's masterpieces and a work in which Dr. Koussevitzky, as an interpreter, has no peer; and in the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," an instrumental fabric in which the Philharmonic, regardless of conductors, has always shone resplendently.

In these particular respects, both major works came up to high expectations; but although the orchestra rose to the very ceiling of Dr. Koussevitzky's lofty inspiration in the Shostakovich symphony, it seemed at times that the conductor could have done better by the amazing virtuoso resources of the orchestra and the heady sensuousness woven between the lines of the Ravel music.

The orchestra shimmered beautifully and distantly in the Daybreak" section of "Daphnis," and whipped itself into the proper orgiastic frenzy in the culminating Bacchanale, thereby bringing down the house; but the delicate, voluptuous contours of Pantomime, with its celebrated flute solo (which purely in the matter of execution can be the highpoint of a performance), were unhappily metrical, and it often seemed that the conductor was thrusting his baton everywhere but where the sinuous, undulating essence of the music was plainly visible.

In the Shostakovich symphony, however, conductor and orchestra were in perfect accord. If I say that the only criticism that can be levelled at the performance is that in the measures preliminary to a few of the mightier climaxes Dr. Koussevitzky over-reached himself, drawing the orchestra out until more could hardly be expected of it, you may have some idea of its excellence.

In addition to these compositions there was a concerto by C. P. E. Bach, scored for a few winds and string orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, in which the string section in particular covered itself with honors; also Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," which exhibited first of all the rare virtuosity of Mr. Glantz, the orchestra's first trumpeter, and finally Mr. Copland, who came out for a well-earned curtain call.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 21 1942

MUSICAL

Conductors in Fact and

A DOUBLE high was registered last week for performances of Tchaikovsky's sixth symphony when it was played in Carnegie Hall by the Philadelphia Orchestra, conducted by Arturo Toscanini, and three nights later by the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The two treatments of the music had little in common, and yet both sounded entirely convincing. Mr. Toscanini offered a beautifully fresh, brilliant, lyrical, and tonally charming presentation of a composition that often has been torn to tatters. It was an evening of grand playing, topped off by a magnificent showing of Debussy's "La Mer." Between Tchaikovsky and Debussy, the Philadelphia first fiddles went to town in Vieuxtemps's Ballade and Polonaise, a soloist's showpiece that didn't become sixteen times as interesting when sixteen violinists strutted with spectacular unanimity. There also was the "Queen Mab" scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," something of a Toscanini specialty that was touched off with immense delicacy—if delicacy can be immense.

Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of the Tchaikovsky sixth was, in the last movement, a personal expression of grief. The first three movements were played dramatically and sensitively, but the finale had a note of great sorrow, never overstressed and always deeply felt. It was a restrained and moving threnody.

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES
[Boston Herald-N. Y. Times Dispatch]

NEW YORK, Feb. 19—The difference that a conductor makes in the performance of an orchestra has seldom been more strikingly demonstrated than it was tonight, when Serge Koussevitzky made his first appearance as guest leader of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society in Carnegie Hall.

In 18 seasons of his career in America he had been heard here only as conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is the head. The excellence of that orchestra, the beauty and finish of the performances that Dr. Koussevitzky elicits from it as a result of his art and his long and careful training need no citation here. But what would be the result when he appeared with a new body of players, unaccustomed to his particular methods, and playing under him, after three rehearsals, for the first time in public?

REMARKABLE RESULTS

Among the things that happened were these: the orchestra played with a sensibility and style; with a range of dynamics, from a silken thread of a pianissimo to a triple fortissimo achieved without tightness or forcing; and with standards of intonation that we had not heard for seasons.

That the orchestra could not, at a first concert with the new leader, as fully realize his wishes as another body of players long accustomed to his ways goes without saying. The impressive thing was the degree of sensibility and responsiveness so quickly attained, and this with a minimum of effort on the leader's part.

On the whole the concert was a lesson in conducting and performance; a joy to ear and understanding in tonal balances and fineness of texture, and in the homogeneity of tone and style obtained when the same phrases, or phrases closely related, were passed from solo player to solo player, whether he were a woodwind, a brass or a string. In these ways the leader had obviously and quickly impressed his musical personality upon the players.

The program also was of uncommon interest. It included the 18th century concerto for stringed instruments of Philip Emmanuel Bach; an excerpt, played for the first time at these concerts, from the music that Aaron Copeland composed for Irwin Shaw's "Quiet City"; the electrical virtuoso piece from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," and Shostakovitch's fifth symphony.

Perhaps, considering the comparative novelty of the work, the Shostakovitch symphony, magnificently played, was the climax of the evening. It is a work with pages of great power; not a composition of even contents, or music free of derivations, imitativeness and false clamor. But the composer, still young, who can write the first and the third movements of this symphony would on this evidence alone be a man to reckon with.

Performance of Symphony

Bach's concerto has two movements well qualified to emphasize the muscular sonority and brilliance of the Philharmonic-Symphony strings, and the slow movement, which is bathed in the tender dawn of the romantic period, was sung with a beauty and delicacy of its melodic strands which remain in the memory.

Mr. Copland's music, somewhat thin in invention, is deeply poetic in mood and coloring, particularly in the tone of the solo trumpet against the strings and in the rejoinders of the English horn and other instruments. During the applause both Mr. Copland, who bowed from the stage, and Dr. Koussevitzky signified their deserved appreciation of the performances of the solo instrumentalists. In another concert the performance of the "Daphnis et Chloë" would have put much else in the shade. As it was, it constituted a brilliant ending of the first half of the program, and a further tribute to the temperament and mastery of Dr. Koussevitzky.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
FEB 20 1942

PHILHARMONIC LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Conductor Makes First Appearance as Guest Leader of New York Group

BACH CONCERTO IS HEARD

Copland Excerpt From 'Quiet City' and Shostakovich 5th Symphony on Program

By OLIN DOWNES

The difference that a conductor makes in the performance of an orchestra has seldom been more strikingly demonstrated than it was last night, when Sergei Koussevitzky made his first appearance as guest leader of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society in Carnegie Hall.

In eighteen seasons of his career in America he had been heard here only as conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is the head. The excellence of that orchestra, the beauty and finish of the performances that Dr. Koussevitzky elicits from it as a result of his art and his long and careful training need no citation here. But what would be the result when he appeared with a new body of players, unaccustomed to his particular methods, and playing under him, after probably three rehearsals, for the first time in public?

Among the things that happened were these: the orchestra played with sensibility and style, with a range of dynamics, from a silken thread of a pianissimo to a triple fortissimo achieved without tightness or forcing, and with standards of intonation that we had not heard for seasons.

Sensibility Quickly Attained

That the orchestra could not, at a first concert with the new leader, as fully realize his wishes as another body of players long accustomed to his ways goes without saying. The impressive thing was the degree of sensibility and responsiveness so quickly attained, and this with an authority that brought results in inverse proportion to the economy of effort on the leader's part.

The conductor, on his part, had grasped with the understanding of an experienced and intuitive leader what the practical situation was, and received a willing and effective response to his efforts. The concert was a lesson in conducting and performance; a joy to ear and understanding in tonal balances and fineness of texture, and in the homogeneity of tone and style obtained when the same phrases, or phrases closely related, were passed from solo player to solo player, and in other characteristics of fine orchestral style.

18th Century Concerto Given

The program also was of uncommon interest. It included the eighteenth-century concerto for stringed instruments of Philipp Emanuel Bach; an excerpt, played for the first time at these concerts, from the music that Aaron Copland composed for Irwin Shaw's "Quiet City"; the electrical virtuoso piece from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloë," and Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony.

Perhaps, considering the comparative novelty of the work, the Shostakovich symphony, magnificently played, was the climax of the evening. It is a work with pages of great power; not a composition of even contents, or music free of derivations, imitativeness and false clamor. But the composer, still young, who can write the first and the third movements of this symphony on this evidence alone would be a man to reckon with.

The third movement is of a spaciousness, a feeling and, on more than one page, a noble flight which has not been equaled before by Shostakovich or in many scores since the turn of the century. The first movement is powerful, rugged in its initial ideas, fertile and dramatic in their development. The scherzo harks to Prokofieff and Mahler. The finale is dramatic, triumphant, also blatant and windy.

P.M. Feb. 20

We'd Like Him, But We Won't Get Him

By Henry Simon

Judging from their behavior at last night's Carnegie Hall concert, there isn't much question whom the Philharmonic-Symphony's subscribers would like to have as permanent conductor. Serge Koussevitzky.

They won't get him, of course, as he has long been wedded to the Boston Symphony. In fact, last night was the first time that he has conducted a major U. S. orchestra other than his own. He only did it then by special permission of the copyright owner—James C. Petrillo of the AFM, who alone can graciously grant the right of a non-union man's conducting a union orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky is non-union.

He arrived here later than originally announced as the untimely death of Mrs. Koussevitzky had caused a postponement of the first date. When he came to the podium, the sold-out house gave him a long, warm, respectful greeting. When he left it was cheers. He'll be here a fortnight.

Our leading local orchestra has had marked ups and downs this year, playing all the way from fine to third-rate. Last night it was fine. It sounded, particularly in the string section, remarkably much like the Boston Symphony. Man for man and choir for choir, I don't believe that there is a better orchestra in the country than the Philharmonic-Symphony; but under the kaleidoscopic change of conductors it has suffered this year, it cannot be expected to maintain the standard of the Bostonians, who play only under Dr. Koussevitzky and his assistants. It is a tribute to the skill and adaptability of the men and to the forceful musical personality of the leader that they should play as they did last night.

That striking personality caught every item on the program, ready or not. A concerto for strings by K. P. E. Bach (arranged for winds and strings by Maximilian Steinberg) came forth with wide, clean-cut gradations of sound never dreamed of by the 18th century composer. Aaron Copland's modest and deeply affecting Quiet City also suffered from a dressing somewhat too rich. I have heard it played by smaller bands sounding less smooth—maybe even less well in tune—but more appropriately spare.

But Dr. Koussevitzky is one of the few maestri who can make an orchestra shimmer and still sound perfectly clear. He did it with Ravel's second Daphnis and Chloe Suite. He is also one of the few who can elicit sounds both ear-splitting and musical. He did that with the Fifth Symphony by Shostakovich. A tremendous performance.

Drama, power, richness, skill everywhere. No wonder our subscribers liked him.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
FEB 20 1942

PHILHARMONIC IS CONDUCTED BY SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

By Edward O'Gorman

It was conductor's night on stage, off-stage, and probably back-stage, at the Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last evening.

For those who regard orchestra concerts from a conductorial angle, as most do, it was a red-letter event inasmuch as it marked the first appearance with the Philharmonic of Serge Koussevitzky, the regular leader of the Boston Symphony, and except on rare occasions a one-orchestra conductor. The house, as a result, was dotted with a small army of conductors whose curiosity was probably whetted by the first public collaboration of a sophisticated, virtuoso orchestra and a conductor whose technical art, according to the best authorities, is notoriously idiosyncratic.

Interest for the large and music-loving audience, however, was centered in two things: in the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony, one of this century's masterpieces and a work in which Dr. Koussevitzky, as an interpreter, has no peer; and in the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," an instrumental fabric in which the Philharmonic, regardless of conductors, has always shone resplendently.

In these particular respects, both major works came up to high expectations; but although the orchestra rose to the very ceiling of Dr. Koussevitzky's lofty inspiration in the Shostakovich symphony, it seemed at times that the conductor could have done better by the amazing virtuoso resources of the orchestra and the heady sensuousness woven between the lines of the Ravel music.

The orchestra shimmered beautifully and distantly in the Daybreak" section of "Daphnis," and whipped itself into the proper orgiastic frenzy in the culminating Bacchanale, thereby bringing down the house; but the delicate, voluptuous contours of Pantomime, with its celebrated flute solo (which purely in the matter of execution can be the highpoint of a performance), were unhappily metrical, and it often seemed that the conductor was thrusting his baton everywhere but where the sinuous, undulating essence of the music was plainly visible.

In the Shostakovich symphony, however, conductor and orchestra were in perfect accord. If I say that the only criticism that can be levelled at the performance is that in the measures preliminary to a few of the mightier climaxes Dr. Koussevitzky over-reached himself, drawing the orchestra out until more could hardly be expected of it, you may have some idea of its excellence.

In addition to these compositions there was a concerto by C. P. E. Bach, scored for a few winds and string orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, in which the string section in particular covered itself with honors; also Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," which exhibited first of all the rare virtuosity of Mr. Glantz, the orchestra's first trumpeter, and finally Mr. Copland, who came out for a well-earned curtain call.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 21 1942

MUSICAL

Conductors in Fact and

A DOUBLE high was registered last week for performances of Tchaikovsky's sixth symphony when it was played in Carnegie Hall by the Philadelphia Orchestra, conducted by Arturo Toscanini, and three nights later by the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The two treatments of the music had little in common, and yet both sounded entirely convincing. Mr. Toscanini offered a beautifully fresh, brilliant, lyrical, and tonally charming presentation of a composition that often has been torn to tatters. It was an evening of grand playing, topped off by a magnificent showing of Debussy's "La Mer." Between Tchaikovsky and Debussy, the Philadelphia first fiddles went to town in Vieuxtemps's Ballade and Polonaise, a soloist's showpiece that didn't become sixteen times as interesting when sixteen violinists strutted with spectacular unanimity. There also was the "Queen Mab" scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," something of a Toscanini specialty that was touched off with immense delicacy—if delicacy can be immense.

Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of the Tchaikovsky sixth was, in the last movement, a personal expression of grief. The first three movements were played dramatically and sensitively, but the finale had a note of great sorrow, never overstressed and always deeply felt. It was a restrained and moving threnody.

Serge Koussevitzky

Herald Feb. 20

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES
[Boston Herald-N. Y. Times Dispatch]

NEW YORK, Feb. 19—The difference that a conductor makes in the performance of an orchestra, has seldom been more strikingly demonstrated than it was tonight, when Serge Koussevitzky made his first appearance as guest leadar of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society in Carnegie Hall.

In 18 seasons of his career in America he had been heard here only as conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is the head. The excellence of that orchestra, the beauty and finish of the performances that Dr. Koussevitzky elicits from it as a result of his art and his long and careful training need no citation here. But what would be the result when he appeared with a new body of players, unaccustomed to his particular methods, and playing under him, after three rehearsals, for the first time in public?

REMARKABLE RESULTS

Among the things that happened were these: the orchestra played with a sensibility and style; with a range of dynamics, from a silken thread of a pianissimo to a triple fortissimo achieved without tightness or forcing; and with standards of intonation that we had not heard for seasons.

That the orchestra could not, at a first concert with the new leader, as fully realize his wishes as another body of players long accustomed to his ways goes without saying. The impressive thing was the degree of sensibility and responsiveness so quickly attained, and this with a minimum of effort on the leader's part.

On the whole the concert was a lesson in conducting and performance; a joy to ear and understanding in tonal balances and fineness of texture, and in the homogeneity of tone and style obtained when the same phrases, or phrases closely related, were passed from solo player to solo player, whether he were a woodwind, a brass or a string. In these ways the leader had obviously and quickly impressed his musical personality upon the players.

The program also was of uncommon interest. It included the 18th century concerto for stringed instruments of Philip Emmanuel Bach; an excerpt, played for the first time at these concerts, from the music that Aaron Copeland composed for Irwin Shaw's "Quiet City"; the electrical virtuoso piece from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," and Shostakovitch's fifth symphony.

Perhaps, considering the comparative novelty of the work, the Shostakovitch symphony, magnificently played, was the climax of the evening. It is a work with pages of great power; not a composition of even contents, or music free of derivations, imitativeness and false clamor. But the composer, still young, who can write the first and the third movements of this symphony on this evidence alone be a man to reckon with.

Performance of Symphony

Bach's concerto has two movements well qualified to emphasize the muscular sonority and brilliance of the Philharmonic-Symphony strings, and the slow movement, which is bathed in the tender dawn of the romantic period, was sung with a beauty and delicacy of its melodic strands which remain in the memory.

Mr. Copland's music, somewhat thin in invention, is deeply poetic in mood and coloring, particularly in the tone of the solo trumpet against the strings and in the rejoinders of the English horn and other instruments. During the applause both Mr. Copland, who bowed from the stage, and Dr. Koussevitzky signified their deserved appreciation of the performances of the solo instrumentalists. In another concert the performance of the "Daphnis et Chloë" would have put much else in the shade. As it was, it constituted a brilliant ending of the first half of the program, and a further tribute to the temperament and mastery of Dr. Koussevitzky.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
FEB 20 1942

PHILHARMONIC LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Conductor Makes First Appearance as Guest Leader of New York Group

BACH CONCERTO IS HEARD

Copland Excerpt From 'Quiet City' and Shostakovich 5th Symphony on Program

By OLIN DOWNES

The difference that a conductor makes in the performance of an orchestra has seldom been more strikingly demonstrated than it was last night, when Sergei Koussevitzky made his first appearance as guest leader of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society in Carnegie Hall.

In eighteen seasons of his career in America he had been heard here only as conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is the head. The excellence of that orchestra, the beauty and finish of the performances that Dr. Koussevitzky elicits from it as a result of his art and his long and careful training need no citation here. But what would be the result when he appeared with a new body of players, unaccustomed to his particular methods, and playing under him, after probably three rehearsals, for the first time in public?

Among the things that happened were these: the orchestra played with sensibility and style, with a range of dynamics, from a silken thread of a pianissimo to a triple fortissimo achieved without tightness or forcing, and with standards of intonation that we had not heard for seasons.

Sensibility Quickly Attained

That the orchestra could not, at a first concert with the new leader, as fully realize his wishes as another body of players long accustomed to his ways goes without saying. The impressive thing was the degree of sensibility and responsiveness so quickly attained, and this with an authority that brought results in inverse proportion to the economy of effort on the leader's part.

The conductor, on his part, had grasped with the understanding of an experienced and intuitive leader what the practical situation was, and received a willing and effective response to his efforts. The concert was a lesson in conducting and performance; a joy to ear and understanding in tonal balances and fineness of texture, and in the homogeneity of tone and style obtained when the same phrases, or phrases closely related, were passed from solo player to solo player, and in other characteristics of fine orchestral style.

18th Century Concerto Given

The program also was of uncommon interest. It included the eighteenth-century concerto for stringed instruments of Philipp Emanuel Bach; an excerpt, played for the first time at these concerts, from the music that Aaron Copland composed for Irwin Shaw's "Quiet City"; the electrical virtuoso piece from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloë," and Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony.

Perhaps, considering the comparative novelty of the work, the Shostakovich symphony, magnificently played, was the climax of the evening. It is a work with pages of great power; not a composition of even contents, or music free of derivations, imitativeness and false clamor. But the composer, still young, who can write the first and the third movements of this symphony on this evidence alone would be a man to reckon with.

The third movement is of a spaciousness, a feeling and, on more than one page, a noble flight which has not been equaled before by Shostakovich or in many scores since the turn of the century. The first movement is powerful, rugged in its initial ideas, fertile and dramatic in their development. The scherzo harks to Prokofieff and Mahler. The finale is dramatic, triumphant, also blatant and windy.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 21 1942

Koussevitzky Appears With Philharmonic

Concert Includes Copland's 'QuietCity' and Works of Ravel and Shostakovitch

By Francis D. Perkins

Thursday night's concert, if the commentator's memory has not strayed, was the second time that Serge Koussevitzky has appeared at Carnegie Hall without the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first time, over fifteen years ago, was when he appeared without any orchestra to give a double-bass recital; Thursday's Philharmonic-Symphony concert was his first in this country with a non-Bostonian major orchestra. The memorably performed program with which he began his fortnight's Philharmonic guest conductorship consisted of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach's concerto in D major for strings, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg; Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite and Dmitri Shostakovitch's fifth symphony.

Despite Dr. Koussevitzky's eminence in his field, the concert was a subject of some advance speculation about how he would fare with an orchestra which was new to him, and as to how quickly the Philharmonic musicians—who, indeed, have been called upon for much adaptability this season—would be able to give him a complete fulfillment of his interpretative intentions. The result implied that the musicians and the conductor had established a thorough mutual understanding during the last four days of rehearsals and that Dr. Koussevitzky's talents did not depend for their manifestation upon a particular set of conditions.

This was apparent in the imposing performance of the C. P. E. Bach concerto, which followed an unusually broad-paced and solemn playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner." At first the orchestral tone, while rich and sonorous, did not have the fine definition of outline which is associated with Bostonians' strings, but this impression was transitory. The strings sang delectably in the andante, and the concert as a whole represented an orchestra in fine form under communicative and inspiring leadership. Mr. Copland's music was presented with admirable clarity of detail and subtlety of dynamics and instrumental hues, and encomiums were deserved by the solo trumpeter and English horn player—presumably Messrs. Glantz and Nazzi. The work is new to the regular Philharmonic repertoire, but it has been played here by the Saidenberg Sinfonietta and at the Stadium. It is a remarkably effective piece of scoring, and also serves its expressive purpose well, although, on rehearing, it seemed to be spun out a little too long to maintain an unflagging interest. Mr. Copland was called to the stage to share the applause.

The Ravel suite had a vivid interpretation, with remarkable mass of tone as well as headlong momentum for the closing general dance, and the orchestra, in its first indoor performance of the Shostakovitch symphony, did its best to substantiate the conductor's belief that this work is one of the most outstanding productions of the last decade or two. It has been played here under other conductors—Stokowski, Rodzinski and Mitropoulos, but yet, thus far, it has been particularly associated with Dr. Koussevitzky, who has spared no efforts toward making it well known. The performance itself, in its memorable range of color, its technical finish and its convincing emotional force, was one of the orchestra's best achievements of the season, and thus spoke persuasively for the music. There was still room for wondering how the symphony would weather the test of a series of average performances; it has its reminiscent moments, some recalling Mahler and some harking back to Tchaikovsky; the musical ideas are not of equal distinction. But it has vitality and emotional force, as well as notable skill of orchestral craftsmanship; it lingered in the ears of the departing reviewer as Dr. Koussevitzky bowed his acknowledgment of the audience's closing ovation.

Koussevitzky Appears With Philharmonic

Concert Includes Copland's 'QuietCity' and Works of Ravel and Shostakovitch

By Francis D. Perkins

Thursday night's concert, if the commentator's memory has not strayed, was the second time that Serge Koussevitzky has appeared at Carnegie Hall without the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first time, over fifteen years ago, was when he appeared without any orchestra to give a double-bass recital; Thursday's Philharmonic-Symphony concert was his first in this country with a non-Bostonian major orchestra. The memorably performed program with which he began his fortnight's Philharmonic guest conductorship consisted of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach's concerto in D major for strings, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg; Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite and Dmitri Shostakovitch's fifth symphony.

Despite Dr. Koussevitzky's eminence in his field, the concert was a subject of some advance speculation about how he would fare with an orchestra which was new to him, and as to how quickly the Philharmonic musicians—who, indeed, have been called upon for much adaptability this season—would be able to give him a complete fulfillment of his interpretative intentions. The result implied that the musicians and the conductor had established a thorough mutual understanding during the last four days of rehearsals and that Dr. Koussevitzky's talents did not depend for their manifestation upon a particular set of conditions.

This was apparent in the imposing performance of the C. P. E. Bach concerto, which followed an unusually broad-paced and solemn playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner." At first the orchestral tone, while rich and sonorous, did not have the fine definition of outline which is associated with Bostonians' strings, but this impression was transitory. The strings sang delectably in the andante, and the concert as a whole represented an orchestra in fine form under communicative and inspiring leadership. Mr. Copland's music was presented with admirable clarity of detail and subtlety of dynamics and instrumental hues, and encomiums were deserved by the solo trumpeter and English horn player—presumably Messrs. Glantz and Nazzi. The work is new to the regular Philharmonic repertoire, but it has been played here by the Saidenberg Sinfonietta and at the Stadium. It is a remarkably effective piece of scoring, and also serves its expressive purpose well, although, on rehearing, it seemed to be spun out a little too long to maintain an unflagging interest. Mr. Copland was called to the stage to share the applause.

The Ravel suite had a vivid interpretation, with remarkable mass of tone as well as headlong momentum for the closing general dance, and the orchestra, in its first indoor performance of the Shostakovitch symphony, did its best to substantiate the conductor's belief that this work is one of the most outstanding productions of the last decade or two. It has been played here under other conductors—Stokowski, Rodzinski and Mitropoulos, but yet, thus far, it has been particularly associated with Dr. Koussevitzky, who has spared no efforts toward making it well known. The performance itself, in its memorable range of color, its technical finish and its convincing emotional force, was one of the orchestra's best achievements of the season, and thus spoke persuasively for the music. There was still room for wondering how the symphony would weather the test of a series of average performances; it has its reminiscent moments, some recalling Mahler and some harking back to Tchaikovsky; the musical ideas are not of equal distinction. But it has vitality and emotional force, as well as notable skill of orchestral craftsmanship; it lingered in the ears of the departing reviewer as Dr. Koussevitzky bowed his acknowledgment of the audience's closing ovation.

[From Late Edition of Yesterday's TIMES.]

PHILHARMONIC LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Conductor Makes First Appearance as Guest Leader of New York Group

BACH CONCERTO IS HEARD

Copland Excerpt From 'Quiet City' and Shostakovich 5th Symphony on Program

By OLIN DOWNES

The difference that a conductor makes in the performance of an orchestra has seldom been more strikingly demonstrated than it was last night, when Sergei Koussevitzky made his first appearance as guest leader of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society in Carnegie Hall.

In eighteen seasons of his career in America he had been heard here only as conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is the head. The excellence of that orchestra, the beauty and finish of the performances that Dr. Koussevitzky elicits from it as a result of his art and his long and careful training need no citation here. But what would be the result when he appeared with a new body of players, unaccustomed to his particular methods, and playing under him, after probably three rehearsals, for the first time in public?

Among the things that happened were these: the orchestra played with sensibility and style, with a range of dynamics, from a silken thread of a pianissimo to a triple fortissimo achieved without tightness or forcing, and with standards of intonation that we had not heard for seasons.

Sensibility Quickly Attained

That the orchestra could not, at a first concert with the new leader, as fully realize his wishes as another body of players long accustomed to his ways goes without saying. The impressive thing was the degree of sensibility and responsiveness so quickly attained, and this with an authority that brought results in inverse proportion to the economy of effort on the leader's part.

The conductor, on his part, had grasped with the understanding of an experienced and intuitive leader what the practical situation was, and received a willing and effective response to his efforts. The concert was a lesson in conducting and performance; a joy to ear and understanding in tonal balances and fineness of texture, and in the homogeneity of tone and style obtained when the same phrases, or phrases closely related, were passed from solo player to solo player, and in other characteristics of fine orchestral style.

18th Century Concerto Given

The program also was of uncommon interest. It included the eighteenth-century concerto for stringed instruments of Philipp Emanuel Bach; an excerpt, played for the first time at these concerts, from the music that Aaron Copland composed for Irwin Shaw's "Quiet City"; the electrical virtuoso piece from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloë," and Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony.

Perhaps, considering the comparative novelty of the work, the Shostakovich symphony, magnificently played, was the climax of the evening. It is a work with pages of great power; not a composition of even contents, or music free of derivations, imitativeness and false clamor. But the composer, still young, who can write the first and the third movements of this symphony on this evidence alone would be a man to reckon with.

The third movement is of a spaciousness, a feeling and, on more than one page, a noble flight which has not been equaled before by Shostakovich or in many scores since the turn of the century. The first movement is powerful, rugged in its initial ideas, fertile and dramatic in their development. The scherzo harks to Prokofieff and Mahler. The finale is dramatic, triumphant, also blatant and windy.

Performance of Symphony

Bach's concerto has two movements well qualified to emphasize the muscular sonority and brilliance of the Philharmonic-Symphony strings, and the slow movement, which is bathed in the tender dawn of the romantic period, was sung with a beauty and delicacy of its melodic strands which remain in the memory.

Mr. Copland's music, somewhat thin in invention, is deeply poetic in mood and coloring, particularly in the tone of the solo trumpet against the strings and in the rejoinders of the English horn and other instruments. During the applause both Mr. Copland, who bowed from the stage, and Dr. Koussevitzky signified their deserved appreciation of the performances of the solo instrumentalists. In another concert the performance of the "Daphnis et Chloë" would have put much else in the shade. As it was, it constituted a brilliant ending of the first half of the program, and a further tribute to the temperament and mastery of Dr. Koussevitzky.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER
FEB 21 1942

Shostakovich Music Played by Koussevitsky At Carnegie Hall

Symphonies of Shostakovich, Tchaikovsky and Roy Harris are featured on the programs Serge Koussevitzky is preparing for his second and final week as conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra.

The program for this Sunday afternoon at Carnegie Hall consists of the Corelli Suite for Strings, Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 2 and Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony.

Thursday evening and Friday afternoon brings the Roy Harris Symphony No. 3, Debussy's "La Mer," and the Tchaikovsky Fourth.

Next Saturday night the Shostakovich Symphony is repeated, preceded by the Corelli Suite, Copland's "Quiet City," and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," Suite No. 2.

For Dr. Koussevitzky's final program next Sunday afternoon he will do Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" Overture, Debussy's "La Mer" and the Tchaikovsky Fourth.

Washington

Koussevitzky Program Here Disappointing

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

Serge Koussevitzky has announced the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play here March 31, for the benefit of Russian War Relief. It is disappointing; for all the compositions listed, with one exception, have had four or more performances here by Washington and Philadelphia orchestras this season.

The program is scheduled to open with Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony which Kindler, Ormandy, Brendler and Santelmann have played within the month. Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture had four recent performances. The Fifth Symphony, by Shostakovich, with which Koussevitzky plans to close, has been heard four times this season and was played as often last season.

One Unfamiliar Work

The only unfamiliar work chosen by Koussevitzky for this important event is Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovanstchina." Moussorgsky died before completing this opera and the score was finished by Rimsky-Korsakow.

It is unnecessary to point out to the alert Koussevitzky that with the exception of the Moussorgsky prelude his entire program is comprised of works constantly reiterated on the air.

Coming from the conservative city of Boston, the eminent Russian conductor doubtless has observed that his public likes best that music which it knows best. Weekly visits to New York and occasional tours into the hinterland may have persuaded him that other communities are equally reluctant to adventure into the musical unknown.

Everyone will admit the desirability of a more detailed knowledge of Shostakovich and his Fifth Symphony. His is a commanding figure in the world of Russian art and this is a work of noble and varied beauty. No one will make a similar claim for Prokofieff's ironic "Classical" Symphony. It is witty and beguiling; yet it belongs with the music of entertainment rather than with the music of great art.

As for Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet," it is great, but it owes its immediate popularity to some pilfering swingster who lifted the second theme in part. The musically ignorant found it good and now want to hear the work as a whole, though how they identified the source is not clear.

For Good Cause

Koussevitzky returns here after many years through the generosity of his orchestra's trustees. They are deeply interested in Russian war relief; and though the proud Russians have pointedly refrained from soliciting this kind of help, asking instead for arms, the music lovers of the city are glad to contribute.

It doubtless is unnecessary to point out to the courtly Koussevitzky that the event, apart from its Russian significance, might be celebrated graciously by including the work of a native composer in this program. He plans to open with Aaron Copland's setting of the Russian National Anthem, but that hardly seems enough.

Many of the better-informed music lovers have been interested in Koussevitzky's long and fruitful propaganda for native music. They recognize the patriotic impulse that prompts a great Russian conductor, living profitably and honorably in this country, to stimulate the art that belongs especially to it. To stress this phase of his activity just now would be good publicity.

Were he to substitute for Prokofieff or Tschaikowsky an overture by Sowerby or DeLamarter, or a suite by Taylor or Carpenter, everybody would be gratified.

79

Ernst Levy Pianist Soloist with Symphony Orchestra

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 16th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Ernst Levy, pianist. The program was as follows:

Gliere...Symphony No. 3 in B minor Op. 42, "Ilia Mourometz"
Chadwick..."Melpomene," Dramatic Overture
Liszt....."Todtentanz" Paraphrase on the Dies Irae for piano and orchestra

We have felt curiosity about Gliere's massive symphony for some time. The Chicago Orchestra's program book comes to this office, and we have observed that at regular intervals every few years Gliere's "Ilia Mourometz" has put in an appearance and is presumably, from tha evidence, received out there with wild acclaim. Yet it has never been given in Boston, though it has been available at least since 1917, until Mr. Burgin brought it forward yesterday.

Now that he has nobly done his duty by the work we trust and fervently hope that the Boston Symphony authorities will allow it to go back where it came from and, indeed, never mention the subject again. The Symphony is a colossal bore, to which is best fitted that lovely line from "Great Expectations," which Mr. Hale was fond of quoting, "massive and concrete." In another view it is a regular suet pudding of a symphony, huge and indigestible.

It is common knowledge that Mr. Burgin exercised his privilege as conductor in making a large number of judicious cuts, but the score is not helped much by pruning, since it lasts nearly an hour even under that treatment. Many could note the influence of Wagner in several places, but actually the whole work is imitative and laborious. In point of fact it dates badly.

Doubtless in its day its sonorities were exciting and its elaborate program, with the balderdash about bogatyrs and all the rest of it, seemed fascinating. But works like Prokofieff's Scythian Suite came along shortly after and knocked the spots out of the former, and the latter just does not appeal to contemporary taste. Gliere was also no Rimsky-Korsakov; in fact on the basis of this Symphony it seems doubtful if he could approach Glazounov or Taneiev. Why the Chicago public takes "Ilia Mourometz" to its bosom is a mystery. Perhaps if you took a couple of aspirins beforehand and then sat through it in a kind of dreamy haze, you might develop some affection for its soporific qualities.

After the interval Mr. Burgin proceeded to honor the New England Conservatory's 75th anniversary by playing the Dramatic Overture, "Melpomene," by the late George W. Chadwick, for so long that institution's director. It is good straightforward music—again a whiff of Wagner, though—and makes a ready enough appeal today. No one, probably, would go so far as to call it great, but reasonably effective and likable music it certainly is.

The concert really came to life, finally, with Mr. Ernst Levy's vigorous and exciting performance of the Liszt "Todtentanz." The music as such is hardly the finest product of the creative intellect, but it is a dramatic, at times poetic and at times brilliant, exhibition piece. Mr. Levy had a thorough command over both its technical and its artistic problems and gave an astonishing sympathetic account of it. The afternoon's success was his, and he assuredly deserved it.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Burgin will offer Haydn's Symphony No. 104; two arias, with Polyna Stoska, soprano, being Porgi amor from Mozart's "Figaro" (not Dove sono as announced), and Leise, Leise from Weber's "Der Freischuetz"; Sibelius's Symphony No. 1.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
FEB 27 1942

DEBUSSY IS PLAYED BY PHILHARMONIC

Koussevitzky Leads Orchestra in Composer's 'La Mer' at 2d Concert as Guest

FOOTE WORK PRESENTED

Suite for Strings in E Major and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony on Program

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Koussevitzky's second Thursday night concert with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall found the hall packed as it had not been at his first appearance. The occasion made it clear that in the week of his incumbency as guest leader he had reached a more intimate understanding with the players and that he had further clarified and sensitized the orchestral tone.

In point of technical finish, nuance and subtlety of coloring the performance of Debussy's "La mer" was something to conjure with. Not often in late seasons have the ears of Philharmonic-Symphony audiences been so ravished by sheer beauty of sound.

There were, however, certain interpretive consequences of these virtues. For it was as if the conductor had become so intend upon refinement of tone and stylistic finish that detail had preoccupied him. These details had a particular interest or sometimes a novel fascination, but the tendency was to a loss of line, to the episodic, and to a weakening of the elemental sweep of Debussy's finale, with its consummative developments of motives announced in earlier pages. Debussy of "La mer" is certainly an impressionist and an introspect, and not a tone-painter of exteriors; nevertheless there is wind and spume as well as revery in this remarkable music.

Foote Composition Heard

The other compositions were Arthur Foote's Suite for strings in E major, a piece that holds its own remarkably well, for it has not a strong creative profile, and certainly does not escape indebtedness to Schumann of the string quartets, and, in the second movement, to Tchaikovsky of the pizzicato movement of the Fourth symphony. The which nothwithstanding, and in spite of these obvious characteristics, the three movements make honest, pleasant music.

They also served to play up the brilliancy and luminousness of the strings of the orchestra. A work by a younger American, some one of the number of our rising composers whom Dr. Koussevitzky has so zealously aided and advanced, might have had more interest. But it is fair, as it proved interesting, to hearken now and again to the composers who laid the foundation of American orchestral composition. Of these Foote was one, and a gifted musician, and in his taste, as his life, a gentleman.

Now Tchaikovsky was not such a gentleman, and there are in his Fifth symphony coarse banalities and weeping sentimentalities sufficient to embarrass a nervous person. Dr. Koussevitzky did not conceal these places, or attempt to palliate them. If Tchaikovsky was sentimental, he sounded that way. If he ran amok the orchestra laid on and spared not. Tchaikovsky himself does not seem to have rated his Fifth symphony as highly as the Fourth and the Sixth, which is undoubtedly the greatest of the three. But the Fifth symphony has its frenetic power, its passionately romantic andante, with its horn solo and its moonlight.

Sets Audience Cheering

And it has finally the wildly triumphant finale, the one movement in his representative symphonic compositions when Tchaikovsky is victorious. As this movement swept to the climax that set the audience cheering, one could think of other victories than those of the artist and the neurasthenic who produced this curiously uneven score.

There is a splendor and power back of the movement which is more racial than individual, which, if you like, is mass music, but not insignificant on that account, or, let us say, absent today in news from Russia. It need hardly be said that the performance made the most of the effects for which Dr. Koussevitzky is well known in this city. The demonstration at the end of the concert included many recalls for conductor and orchestra.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
FEB 27 1942

'LA MER' IS GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Symphony of Tchaikovsky Also Heard.

It was hardly remarkable that one veteran observer of the musical scene went almost automatically last night to the seats in Carnegie Hall assigned to him for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts. Serge Koussevitzky was the conductor, and he had arranged a program almost as characteristic of his adopted city as the Commons—a suite for strings by Arthur Foote, Debussy's "La Mer" and the Tchaikovsky fifth symphony. However, it was the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra which did the playing . . . and for the most part impressively well.

To say that Mr. Koussevitzky has, during his visit, played so many specialities of his repertory simply to point the differences of the two orchestras would be to accuse him of motives hardly in his character. But he has, while playing the music he feels the most strongly, done something of the sort. Thus for all the excellence of the overall response of the Philharmonic's men to Mr. Koussevitzky's exacting demands in "La Mer," there was rarely the intimate blend of texture, the melting unity of vibratos to make his conception wholly effective.

Whether that estimate has weaknesses and flaws is, for the moment, another matter. But it is assuredly a fact that the superlative shimmer and glow of the conductor's own woodwinds, brasses and strings suit his conception of the music better than the sounds he drew from the Philharmonic last night. There was much to admire in the devotion and effort of the players; but the lack of that cohesion served to enforce the longeurs in Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of the score, his stress on matters that are details rather than main lines of its construction. Those lines, also, tend to diffuse and weaken the more one hears the piece.

In all, the orchestra and the conductor had a greater mutuality of feeling in the Tchaikovsky symphony, which was played with all-round gusto, superlative management of the orchestra's sonorous resources, and a steady, impelling energy that animated the work from beginning to end. The string section distinguished itself in the first movement and also in the Valse, and young Rudolph Pulitz phrased the horn solo with warm understanding and a rich flow of sound, after one slight deviation at the outset. The strings performed sonorously in the cantabile sections of the Foote suite, raspingly in the faster passages.

I. K.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 27 1942

Koussevitzky Conducts Exciting Concert

Musicians Give Him Everything He Asks for in Musical Entente

By ROBERT BAGAR.

One of those exciting performances of the Tschaikowsky Fifth brought the Philharmonic-Symphony's program to a rousing finish in Carnegie Hall last night. Sergei Koussevitzky conducted an orchestra of orchestras in that work, a body of musicians as firmly bound together in common purpose as we have had the pleasure to hear all season.

Mr. Koussevitzky's idea of this symphony, of course, takes the measure of life's tingling breath itself and he whips it into a gale of heaving moods and passions. For contrast there are those moments of lull before the whirlwind, the tenderly poignant entr-'actes between great surges of emotion.

Some observers have envisioned the Fifth as another Fate Symphony. If it is, then those harsh, rough passages that bristle through the Koussevitzky reading exemplify Fate straining at its moorings, finally shaking itself loose to live out its own destiny.

* * *

Musical Entente Cordiale.

Whatever the conductor wanted the musicians gave him. The entente Cordiale ran its unswerving course from the first note to the last. At the end the audience cheered mightily, calling the director out for many bows. Graciously, he asked the orchestra to stand up and receive the plaudits with him.

The opening item had been the Arthur Foote Suite for String Orchestra in E Major, Op. 63. This is an interestingly contrived work in a romantic vein, agreeably melodious and elegant in style. Actually it didn't get the performance it deserved, for there was laxity in the playing.

* * *

Debussy's La Mer.

Debussy's La Mer also suffered from now-and-then-ism, teamwork vying with rugged individualism—which doesn't always make for a true portrait of the French composer's sea. When the orchestra really played, it played beautifully, turning out those fancy-laden phrases like so many related art panels. When it didn't—gratifyingly, not a frequent fault—it just didn't. Besides, Mr. Koussevitzky's version of La Mer—as far as we could gather—conjures up the wet, the sounds, the tumult and the playfulness of the sea. It is a realistic sea, not the fantastic dream that Debussy painted.

Special praise goes to Harry Glantz for his fine trumpet solo in La Mer and also to Rudolph Puletz, Jr., for his skillful playing of the French horn part in the Tschaikowsky. All in all, it was a highly entertaining evening.

Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall

By JOHN BRIGGS

Historians of the future, chronicling the life span of our city's oldest and most distinguished musical body, may well pigeonhole the current season as The Year of the Great Philharmonic Permutation. Thus far in music's fiscal year we have witnessed a cavalcade of conductorial talent, with concomitant variations: we have observed the orchestra resent over-stringent handling with shrill fiddles and strident brass; we have heard it purr with lush tone in response to a more sympathetic handling; and last evening in Carnegie Hall we were again treated to the spectacle of the Philharmonic shooting sparks of Slavic brilliance under the mesmerism of Serge Koussevitzky.

Last evening most of the fireworks came at the close of the program, which had the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky as its finale. This was hardly an unexpected discovery; in a piece such as "La Mer," which came before intermission, one compares Koussevitzky to other conductors; whereas in the Tchaikovsky one compares other conductors to Koussevitzky. Not that that "La Mer" was not performed successfully; but the difference between Debussy and Tchaikovsky last evening was the difference between a successful performance and an overpowering one. Last summer we heard Dr. Koussevitzky conduct the work in the Berkshires, and fervently wished never to hear a performance which would efface the memory of that one. Last evening we felt the same way, and presumably if Dr. Koussevitzky does the Fifth a year from now, it will evoke a similar reaction.

On the physical side, there was little to report last evening. The second week of Dr. Koussevitzky's Philharmonic tenure being not so violent a novelty as his debut last Thursday, we were unable to spot as thick a crowd of colleagues as were present on that occasion. Outward manifestation at the concert limited itself to an extremely full house—hardly newsworthy, no matter how cheering to the managerial soul.

The business of the evening got under way with the Suite for String Orchestra in E major of the Boston composer, Arthur Foote.

PM - Feb 27

Koussevitzky Must Do It With Mirrors

By Henry Simon

Serge Koussevitzky, who started his second and last week end of concerts with the Philharmonic-Symphony at Carnegie Hall last night, must be a source of open-mouthed wonder to young students of conducting. With consistent inconsistency he violates the elementary rules of the handbooks. His beat is seldom clean let alone conventional; he gives entry cues sometimes casually, sometimes inexactly, sometimes dramatically, sometimes not at all; often he fails to give any visible sign that he wants more sound or less.

Yet the orchestra never seems to fail him. With his own Boston Symphony, that doesn't seem too miraculous after all these years. With the Philharmonic-Symphony, which never played under him before last week, it looks like a small piece of black magic. Well, gray, anyway.

The answer lies, I think, in the fact that Serge Koussevitzky on a podium is the living, dramatic personification of his own ideas about music. Details have probably been carefully worked out in rehearsal. Comes the public concert, and he can leave it to his band of veterans to carry out that slight stress here, that crescendo there. He devotes himself to making the boys feel the composition all over again, and he fairly shakes the music from his sleeves no matter what that does to the beat. A superb musical showman—and the audiences appreciate it too.

That may be why he is at his very best in the most dramatic Russian music, as in the finale of last night's Tchaikowsky Fifth Symphony. The first three movements had been—for Koussevitzky—on the lethargic side, but with the last he made the audience cheer and nice old ladies go out muttering, "Wonderful, wonderful, damn wonderful." That's what it was.

He also played Arthur Foote's Suite in E-major, which showed that in 1907 we had competent American composers whose inspiration might come from Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony or a good German conservatory.

And then there was that Koussevitzky specialty, Debussy's La Mer. Do you remember the story about the nice young thing who came on deck the second day out and was overwhelmed by the expanse of water? "Such a lot of ocean," she said, "and to think we're seeing only the top of it."

I feel a little that way about Debussy's symphonic sketches on the subject. They are certainly the most poetic impressions of the sea in all music, but there is a great deal of them. Mr. Koussevitzky brought out all the wind and the wet in the score—and he got below the top, too.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
FEB 27 1942

Koussevitzky Must Do It With Mirrors

By Henry Simon

Serge Koussevitzky, who started his second and last week end of concerts with the Philharmonic-Symphony at Carnegie Hall last night, must be a source of open-mouthed wonder to young students of conducting. With consistent inconsistency he violates the elementary rules of the handbooks. His beat is seldom clean let alone conventional; he gives entry cues sometimes casually, sometimes inexactly, sometimes dramatically, sometimes not at all; often he fails to give any visible sign that he wants more sound or less.

Yet the orchestra never seems to fail him. With his own Boston Symphony, that doesn't seem too miraculous after all these years. With the Philharmonic-Symphony, which never played under him before last week, it looks like a small piece of black magic. Well, gray, anyway.

The answer lies, I think, in the fact that Serge Koussevitzky on a podium is the living, dramatic personification of his own ideas about music. Details have probably been carefully worked out in rehearsal. Comes the public concert, and he can leave it to his band of veterans to carry out that slight stress here, that crescendo there. He devotes himself to making the boys feel the composition all over again, and he fairly shakes the music from his sleeves no matter what that does to the beat. A superb musical showman—and the audiences appreciate it too.

That may be why he is at his very best in the most dramatic Russian music, as in the finale of last night's Tchaikowsky Fifth Symphony. The first three movements had been—for Koussevitzky—on the lethargic side, but with the last he made the audience cheer and nice old ladies go out muttering, "Wonderful, wonderful, damn wonderful." That's what it was.

He also played Arthur Foote's Suite in E-major, which showed that in 1907 we had competent American composers whose inspiration might come from Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony or a good German conservatory.

And then there was that Koussevitzky specialty, Debussy's La Mer. Do you remember the story about the nice young thing who came on deck the second day out and was overwhelmed by the expanse of water? "Such a lot of ocean," she said, "and to think we're seeing only the top of it."

I feel a little that way about Debussy's symphonic sketches on the subject. They are certainly the most poetic impressions of the sea in all music, but there is a great deal of them. Mr. Koussevitzky brought out all the wind and the wet in the score—and he got below the top, too.

Koussevitzky Conducts Exciting Concert

Musicians Give Him Everything He Asks for in Musical Entente

World-Telegram

By ROBERT BAGAR.

One of those exciting performances of the Tschaikowsky Fifth brought the Philharmonic-Symphony's program to a rousing finish in Carnegie Hall last night. Sergei Koussevitzky conducted an orchestra of orchestras in that work, a body of musicians as firmly bound together in common purpose as we have had the pleasure to hear all season.

Mr. Koussevitzky's idea of this symphony, of course, takes the measure of life's tingling breath itself and he whips it into a gale of heaving moods and passions. For contrast there are those moments of lull before the whirlwind, the tenderly poignant entr'actes between great surges of emotion.

Some observers have envisioned the Fifth as another Fate Symphony. If it is, then those harsh, rough passages that bristle through the Koussevitzky reading exemplify Fate straining at its moorings, finally shaking itself loose to live out its own destiny.

* * *

Musical Entente Cordiale.

Whatever the conductor wanted the musicians gave him. The entente Cordiale ran its unswerving course from the first note to the last. At the end the audience cheered mightily, calling the director out for many bows. Graciously, he asked the orchestra to stand up and receive the plaudits with him.

The opening item had been the Arthur Foote Suite for String Orchestra in E Major, Op. 63. This is an interestingly contrived work in a romantic vein, agreeably melodious and elegant in style. Actually it didn't get the performance it deserved, for there was laxity in the playing.

* * *

Debussy's La Mer.

Debussy's La Mer also suffered from now-and-then-ism, teamwork vying with rugged individualism—which doesn't always make for a true portrait of the French composer's sea. When the orchestra really played, it played beautifully, turning out those fancy-laden phrases like so many related art panels. When it didn't—gratifyingly, not a frequent fault—it just didn't. Besides, Mr. Koussevitzky's version of La Mer—as far as we could gather—conjures up the wet, the sounds, the tumult and the playfulness of the sea. It is a realistic sea, not the fantastic dream that Debussy painted.

Special praise goes to Harry

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, guest conductor, concert last night at Carnegie Hall with the following program:

Suite in E major for strings, Op. 63 ..... Arthur Foote
La Mer ..... Debussy
Symphony No. 5, in E Minor ..... Tchaikovsky

Boston Doctor Improves Philharmonic Temporarily

AS DULL a program as could well be imagined; and a glorious concert, all the same. That is how I should describe Koussevitzky's Philharmonic show last night, if I were asked to put the matter briefly. Unfortunately, such brevity is not appropriate notice for the achievement; and so I shall amplify my statement a bit, though there isn't much to be said that isn't known already.

* * *

The late Arthur Foote's Suite for String Orchestra has always been a charming and well written piece. Its style is gracious and its substance honest. It is not profound, but it is perfectly real music. No fake about it. I was delighted, in fact, to rehear this favorite Bostonian number after some years, although I regret that Roy Harris's Third Symphony, previously billed in its place, was omitted.

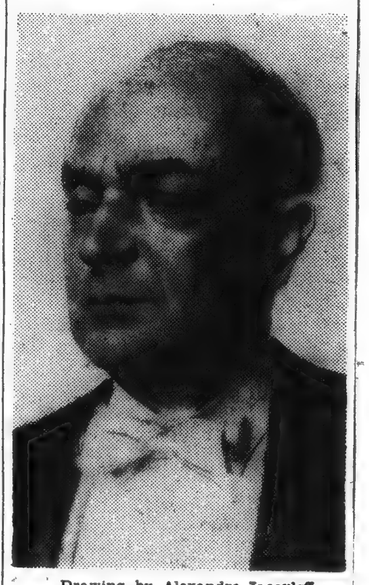
Debussy's "La Mer" is not very good Debussy, in my judgment, though its reputation as a conductor's warhorse is impressive. Its tunes are vague; its sequence vaguer. It is a compendium of Debussyan mannerisms, a sample-case of Debussyan orchestral style. It sounds fine; means, to me, little. Satie once wrote to the composer, referring to the first movement, "From Dawn to Midday at Sea," thanking him for an agreeable outing and adding that there had been a particularly nice moment between half-past ten and a quarter of eleven. He referred, I take it, to the passage for divided cellos and to the beginning of the section that follows this.

Tchaikovsky's Fifth, like everybody else's Fifth, is a famous work and very popular in the United States. I have always thought it a great bore. I must admit that Koussevitzky's execution last night was at no point boring. This had little to do with the excellence of the work, everything to do with the excellence of his workmanship. Also, he loves the piece, and that helps. Furthermore, though the meditative passages of it are lacking in rhythmic life, the heroic and declamatory ones have an interior vigor, a buoyancy that is real and the sweep of a whirlwind.

* * *

It is well known that Koussevitzky is a fine conductor and a fine musician. It is well known that the Philharmonic plays awfully well sometimes, too. Last night both did a good job. I have not heard in two years of reviewing such all round good work out of the local boys. They have sometimes played as exactly, but never so musically with exactitude. They don't sound like the Boston boys, and how could they? They don't have the same rehearsal conditions, and they don't have anything like that kind of conducting most of the time. Considering that they have been working for Koussevitzky only two weeks, I think they sounded mighty fine. I also think it absurd that they should not have a first-class leader of their own to conduct them all the time.

Serge Koussevitzky



Drawing by Alexandre Iacovleff

Who conducted last night's concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The program for the Boston Symphony concerts this week consists of music of proven worth and comfortable familiarity. Richard Burgin, who is again conducting in the absence of Mr. Koussevitzky, begins with Haydn's D major Symphony, No. 104, and ends with the First Symphony by Sibelius. In between come two great arias, the Countess Almaviva's "Porgi amor" out of "The Marriage of Figaro," by Mozart, and Agathe's "Leise, leise" from "Der Freischutz," by Weber. The soloist is Polyna Stoska, American-born soprano of Lithuanian ancestry, who makes her first appearances with the Boston Symphony.

While Miss Stoska made a most favorable impression upon the Friday subscribers yesterday, her appearance was relatively brief and the prevailing interest of the afternoon was orchestral. Of the two symphonies it can be said that their readings would have done credit to a conductor of wider celebrity than Mr. Burgin.

The orchestra sounded well, they played with accustomed virtuosity. Mr. Burgin's interpretation of the dissimilar works of Haydn and Sibelius were of the style appropriate to each composer and showed, moreover, a personal distinction that emanated from the conductor. His Haydn was at once light and full-bodied, becoming the last Symphony which the composer turned out for the impresario Salomon during his second stay in London. The performance also was ebullient in the fast movements and songful in the andante.

Even to one who has been a constant admirer of Mr. Burgin's growing interpretative and technical powers as conductor, the Sibelius First was a surprise. The music was intense, romantic, Northern and bardic, but it also was of architectural clearness and strength. For the most part there was little of the tonal opacity which an enthusiastic conductor is likely to obtain when his enthusiasm is not balanced by unrelaxing control of his forces.

Time and again, on the other hand, one noted the precision and the firmness of the Burgin reading, against which the few perceptible shortcomings of crisp attack and less than perfect ensemble were of minor importance. And there were many fine but subtle bits of instrumental detail that bespeak careful preparation and panoramic conception of a work as a whole.

Miss Stoska is a remarkably fine singer. This reviewer unfortunately could not attend her Boston debut recital of a few weeks ago, and therefore made first acquaintance with her art yesterday. She has been well trained technically, and also in style. Her Mozart was real Mozart, and her Weber genuine Weber.

Performance of two arias is not enough on which to base an estimate of a voice, but it is obvious that Miss Stoska has a responsive, pure, agile and flexible voice. It is something between lyric and dramatic; she could probably sing anything lyric and do it well, and could probably give a good account of herself in the heaviest examples of dramatic music. There was not much warmth or color in her tones yesterday, and she would occasionally—and rather oddly—let herself be submerged by the modest orchestra of Mozart and Weber. Could she have had a cold? At any rate, Miss Stoska is very promising, and would no doubt be a welcome addition to the Metropolitan Opera.

Mr. Koussevitzky returns to Symphony Hall next week, when he will conduct the "Scythian" Suite of Prokofieff, the Violin Concerto of Samuel Barber, with Ruth Posselt as soloist, and the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven. C. W. D.

DEBUSSY IS PLAYED BY PHILHARMONIC

Feb 27

Koussevitzky Leads Orchestra in Composer's 'La Mer' at 2d Concert as Guest

FOOTE WORK PRESENTED

Suite for Strings in E Major and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony on Program

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Koussevitzky's second Thursday night concert with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall found the hall packed as it had not been at his first appearance. The occasion made it clear that in the week of his incumbency as guest leader he had reached a more intimate understanding with the players and that he had further clarified and sensitized the orchestral tone.

In point of technical finish, nuance and subtlety of coloring the performance of Debussy's "La mer" was something to conjure with. Not often in late seasons have the ears of Philharmonic-Symphony audiences been so ravished by sheer beauty of sound.

There were, however, certain interpretive consequences of these virtues. For it was as if the conductor had become so intend upon refinement of tone and stylistic finish that detail had preoccupied him. These details had a particular interest or sometimes a novel fascination, but the tendency was to a loss of line, to the episodic, and to a weakening of the elemental sweep of Debussy's finale, with its consummative developments of motives announced in earlier pages. Debussy of "La mer" is certainly an impressionist and an introspect, and not a tone-painter of exteriors; nevertheless there is wind and spume as well as revery in this remarkable music.

Foote Composition Heard

The other compositions were Arthur Foote's Suite for strings in E major, a piece that holds its own remarkably well, for it has not a strong creative profile, and certainly does not escape indebtedness to Schumann of the string quartets, and, in the second movement, to Tchaikovsky of the pizzicato movement of the Fourth symphony. The which nothwithstanding, and in spite of these obvious characteristics, the three movements make honest, pleasant music.

They also served to play up the brilliancy and luminousness of the strings of the orchestra. A work by a younger American, some one of the number of our rising composers whom Dr. Koussevitzky has so zealously aided and advanced, might have had more interest. But it is fair, as it proved interesting, to hearken now and again to the composers who laid the foundation of American orchestral composition. Of these Foote was one, and a gifted musician, and in his taste, as his life, a gentleman.

Now Tchaikovsky was not such a gentleman, and there are in his Fifth symphony coarse banalities and weeping sentimentalities sufficient to embarrass a nervous person. Dr. Koussevitzky did not conceal these places, or attempt to palliate them. If Tchaikovsky was sentimental, he sounded that way. If he ran amok the orchestra laid on and spared not. Tchaikovsky himself does not seem to have rated his Fifth symphony as highly as the Fourth and the Sixth, which is undoubtedly the greatest of the three. But the Fifth symphony has its frenetic power, its passionately romantic andante, with its horn solo and its moonlight.

Sets Audience Cheering

And it has finally the wildly triumphant finale, the one movement in his representative symphonic compositions when Tchaikovsky is victorious. As this movement swept to the climax that set the audience cheering, one could think of other victories than those of the artist and the neurasthenic who produced this curiously uneven score.

There is a splendor and power back of the movement which is more racial than individual, which, if you like, is mass music, but not insignificant on that account, or, let us say, absent today in news from Russia. It need hardly be said that the performance made the most of the effects for which Dr. Koussevitzky is well known in this city. The demonstration at the end of the concert included many recalls for conductor and orchestra.

Polyna Stoska With Symphony

Feb 28 Monitor

By L. A. Sloper

The appearance of Polyna Stoska, soprano, as soloist was the event of yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the seventeenth of the Friday afternoon series in Symphony Hall. Richard Burgin conducted again, since Dr. Koussevitzky is still directing, as guest, the Philharmonic-Symphony in New York. Miss Stoska sang the Cavatina, "Porgi Amor," from "Figaro," and "Leise, leise," from Weber's "Der Freischütz." The program opened with Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 104, and closed with the First of Sibelius.

The rise of Miss Stoska's star has been as sudden and as startling as was that of Dusolina Giannini's in New York nearly 20 years ago. Born in Worcester of Lithuanian parents, she won a contest sponsored by the Massachusetts Federation of Women's Clubs. She has been heard at the Worcester Music Festival, and has sung in opera in Germany; yet her name was not widely known when she gave a recital in Jordan Hall three weeks ago. At that time she made a strong impression, which was confirmed by her singing yesterday.

Miss Stoska has admirable présence and poise on the platform. Her voice is clear and well rounded, though apparently not wide in range, since the production of her high notes tended to be edgy, and her lower register was not too well sustained. Nevertheless, hers is a useful while not a big voice, and, what is even more important, she displayed musical intelligence and taste in the handling of the familiar airs she had chosen to sing. She seems to be well prepared to fill some of the lighter dramatic soprano roles of the German repertory. She received warm applause yesterday.

Mr. Burgin secured an excellent accompaniment for both her numbers. He was less fortunate in his rendition of the two symphonies. The performances were accurate but not eloquent. The Haydn lacked the necessary polish and deftness, and the Sibelius was wanting in clarity of outline and in rhythmic definition. It is fair to add that Mr. Burgin has had a heavy burden imposed upon him this winter, and that he has borne it with dignity and efficiency.

Next week Dr. Koussevitzky will return to conduct a program made up of Prokofieff's Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli"; Samuel Barber's Violin Concerto, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Ruth Posselt will play the solo part in the concerto, which will have its first performance in Boston.

SYMPHONY HAS FINE CONCERT

Feb 28 Post

Audience Much Pleased at Programme

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is a disquieting thought, but Richard Burgin fared considerably better at yesterday's Symphony concert with his stock programme, drawn from Haydn, Mozart, Weber, and Sibelius, than with his more daring excursion a week ago into Gliere, Chadwick and the lesser Liszt. Aside from the conventional programme, for Sibelius' First Symphony, introduced here 35 years ago, is by now an old story at Symphony Hall, yesterday's concert had a distinct flavor of days gone by. The performances were excellent, but one listened to the music and the composer, rather than to the conductor, and there was a vocal soloist, Polyna Stoska, soprano, singing operatic airs, from "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Der Freischuetz." If you think such embellishings have been common of last years, you have only to consult the records to find that you are wrong.

What is more, the audience liked it, meaning Miss Stoska. It was also plainly happy with everything else. On Feb. 8 last, Miss Stoska appeared in recital at Jordan Hall and was commended not only for her fine singing but for her good looks. It would be a pleasure to hear her in opera, and there by token of her singing of Agathe's "Leise, Leise" yesterday is where she belongs.

Born in Worcester of Lithuanian parents, Miss Stoska made a few appearances in this part of the world before she emerged as an opera singer in various German theatres. This training has stood her in good stead, if her performance of yesterday is any criterion. With Mozart's "Porgi Amor" she was less at ease, but this was only natural. It is something to face a Boston Symphony audience for the first time and Mozart's music is cruelly exacting at all times. Nor can Miss Stoska complain of any lack of warmth in her reception.

Ten years ago, Dr. Koussevitzky was marking the 200th anniversary of the birth of Haydn with a programme of three of his symphonies, of which one was the last of them, No. 104 in D major. That masterpiece, which here and there foreshadows Beethoven, was conducted here four years ago by Mr. Enesco and was not heard again at Symphony Hall until Mr. Burgin turned to it yesterday. It is a pity that we cannot hear more of Haydn's symphonies than we do. By rights, no one of them should be repeated until several others have been performed. Anyway, No. 104 was welcome yesterday.

In some respects Sibelius' First Symphony wears better than the later ones, yet it is outmoded in a sense that its successors are not. If most of the first movement speaks with its old authority, many pages in the others are now old. Some of us would be glad to see all of the symphonies shelved for a time to see if their former freshness might then return. But quite obviously that is not the will of the majority.

'LA MER' IS GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

N.Y. Times Feb 27

Symphony of Tchaikovsky Also Heard.

It was hardly remarkable that one veteran observer of the musical scene went almost automatically last night to the seats in Carnegie Hall assigned to him for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts. Serge Koussevitzky was the conductor, and he had arranged a program almost as characteristic of his adopted city as the Commons—a suite for strings by Arthur Foote, Debussy's "La Mer" and the Tchaikovsky fifth symphony. However, it was the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra which did the playing . . . and for the most part impressively well.

To say that Mr. Koussevitzky has, during his visit, played so many specialities of his repertory simply to point the differences of the two orchestras would be to accuse him of motives hardly in his character. But he has, while playing the music he feels the most strongly, done something of the sort. Thus for all the excellence of the overall response of the Philharmonic's men to Mr. Koussevitzky's exacting demands in "La Mer," there was rarely the intimate blend of texture, the melting unity of vibratos to make his conception wholly effective.

Whether that estimate has weaknesses and flaws is, for the moment, another matter. But it is assuredly a fact that the superlative shimmer and glow of the conductor's own woodwinds, brasses and strings suit his conception of the music better than the sounds he drew from the Philharmonic last night. There was much to admire in the devotion and effort of the players; but the lack of that cohesion served to enforce the longeurs in Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of the score, his stress on matters that are details rather than main lines of its construction. Those lines, also, tend to diffuse and weaken the more one hears the piece.

In all, the orchestra and the conductor had a greater mutuality of feeling in the Tchaikovsky symphony, which was played with all-round gusto, superlative management of the orchestra's sonorous resources, and a steady, impelling energy that animated the work from beginning to end. The string section distinguished itself in the first movement and also in the Valse, and young Rudolph Pulitz phrased the horn solo with warm understanding and a rich flow of sound, after one slight deviation at the outset. The strings performed sonorously in the cantabile sections of the Foote suite, raspingly in the faster passages. I. K.

MUSIC

Feb 28 Herald

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 17th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Polyna Stoska, soprano. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D major, No. 104.....Haydn
Cavatina, "Porgi Amor," from "Le Nozze di Figaro".....Mozart
Recitative and Aria, "Leise, leise," from "Der Freischuetz".....Weber
Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39 Sibelius

Yesterday's concert was notable for the introduction to symphony audiences of a remarkably fine singer. Miss Polyna Stoska has evidently, on the basis of these two exacting arias, learned her art thoroughly. For three years she sang in opera in Germany, and there is no reason to suppose that the war has relaxed the standards of opera in that country. Indeed one wonders why they ever let Miss Stoska get out.

It is a curious thing with really good singers that you can tell that they are above average by the way they stand and deliver the very first notes. Miss Stoska chose the limpidly perfect "Porgi Amor" from Mozart's "Figaro," to which there is a long orchestral introduction; and the opening of this aria was just about perfection. The famous aria of Weber runs the gamut in more ways than one and plunges the singer into about as many problems as one aria can well provide. Miss Stoska surmounted them all with ease. Her voice, additionally, has a lovely fresh quality throughout its considerable range.

Ordinarily nowadays the custom of having a singer do a couple of arias on a symphony program has wisely fallen into abeyance. But there was good reason for it this time in order to introduce such a new talent to a large public. Depend upon it, we shall all be hearing more of Miss Stoska in the future. In the second place the American public knows little of the music of Weber, and this is one way for them to get a taste of it.

Mr. Burgin, who was in capital conducting form throughout the concert, began yesterday with one of those superb late symphonies of Haydn. It's a big work, large and original in form, daring in the exploitation of its ideas. In his later works Haydn is a very surprising composer indeed. It is dangerous mentally to predict what he is going to do next, for half the time he fools you.

For example, it is some years since we heard this particular symphony and yet we had settled back before the finale with a hazy notion of how it was going to sound. But the actual sounds abruptly pulled us out of this mental nap. It is never safe to guess what the trios of Haydn's minuets are going to turn out to be; and the man who thinks he knows the so-called sonata form backwards will be fooled, too. Perhaps it is foolish to dwell too much on Haydn's originality, but it is well that the public should get out of their heads the business about "Papa" Haydn and wigs and snuff-boxes that the music appreciation people have fostered in the past. Mozart has not suffered nearly as much in this respect, and it is consequently only sensible to recall that Haydn too was one of the great composers. Performances such as this are the best means of proving that fact.

We have always clung to the theory that the First Symphony of Sibelius was fully as good as the Second, since at any rate the finales of both are the weakest and most pretentious movements. But now we are beginning to fall into the "Box and Cox" school of thought about them. You know how it is with Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" and "Lohengrin"? Whichever you hear last, you immediately go home with a decided preference for the other.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky returns to lead the following program (slightly altered from that printed in the program book): Beethoven's 7th Symphony; Samuel Barber's Violin Concerto, with Ruth Posselt; Prokofieff's Scythian Suite.

MUSIC

Tribune Feb 27

By VIRGIL THOMSON

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, guest conductor, concert Thursday night at Carnegie Hall with the following program:

Suite in E major for strings, Op. 63 Arthur Foote
La Mer.....Debussy
Symphony No. 5, in E Minor..Tchaikovsky

Boston Doctor Improves Philharmonic Temporarily

AS DULL a program as could well be imagined; and a glorious concert, all the same. That is how I should describe Koussevitzky's Philharmonic show Thursday night, if I were asked to put the matter briefly. Unfortunately, such brevity is not appropriate notice for the achievement; and so I shall amplify my statement a bit, though there isn't much to be said that isn't known already.

* * *

The late Arthur Foote's Suite for String Orchestra has always been a charming and well written piece. Its style is gracious and its substance honest. It is not profound, but it is perfectly real music. No fake about it. I was delighted, in fact, to rehear this favorite Bostonian number after some years, although I regret that Roy Harris's Third Symphony, previously billed in its place, was omitted.

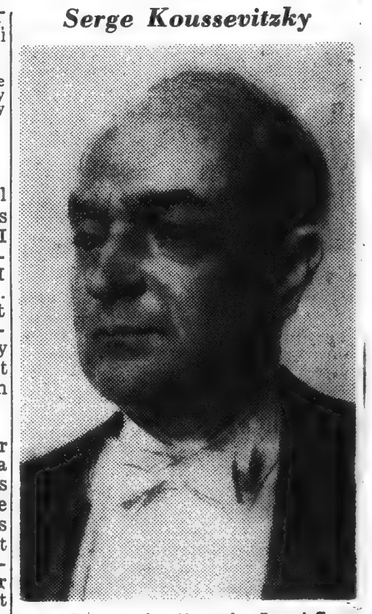
Debussy's "La Mer" is not very good Debussy, in my judgment, though its reputation as a conductor's warhorse is impressive. Its tunes are vague; its sequence vaguer. It is a compendium of Debussyan mannerisms, a sample-case of Debussyan orchestral style. It sounds fine; means, to me, little. Satie once wrote to the composer, referring to the first movement, "From Dawn to Midday at Sea," thanking him for an agreeable outing and adding that there had been a particularly nice moment between half-past ten and a quarter of eleven. He referred, I take it, to the passage for divided cellos and to the beginning of the section that follows this.

Tchaikovsky's Fifth, like everybody else's Fifth, is a famous work and very popular in the United States. I have always thought it a great bore. I must admit that Koussevitzky's execution Thursday night was at no point boring. This had little to do with the excellence of the work, everything to do with the excellence of his workmanship. Also, he loves the piece, and that helps. Furthermore, though the meditative passages of it are lacking in rhythmic life, the heroic and declamatory ones have an interior vigor, a buoyancy that is real and the sweep of a whirlwind.

* * *

It is well known that Koussevitzky is a fine conductor and a fine musician. It is well known that the Philharmonic plays awfully well sometimes, too. Thursday night both did a good job. I have not heard in two years of reviewing such all round good work out of the local boys. They have sometimes played as exactly, but never so musically with exactitude. They don't sound like the Boston boys, and how could they? They don't have the same rehearsal conditions, and they don't have anything like that kind of conducting most of the time. Considering that they have been working for Koussevitzky only two weeks, I think they sounded mighty fine. I also think it absurd that they should not have a first-class leader of their own to conduct them all the time.

Serge Koussevitzky

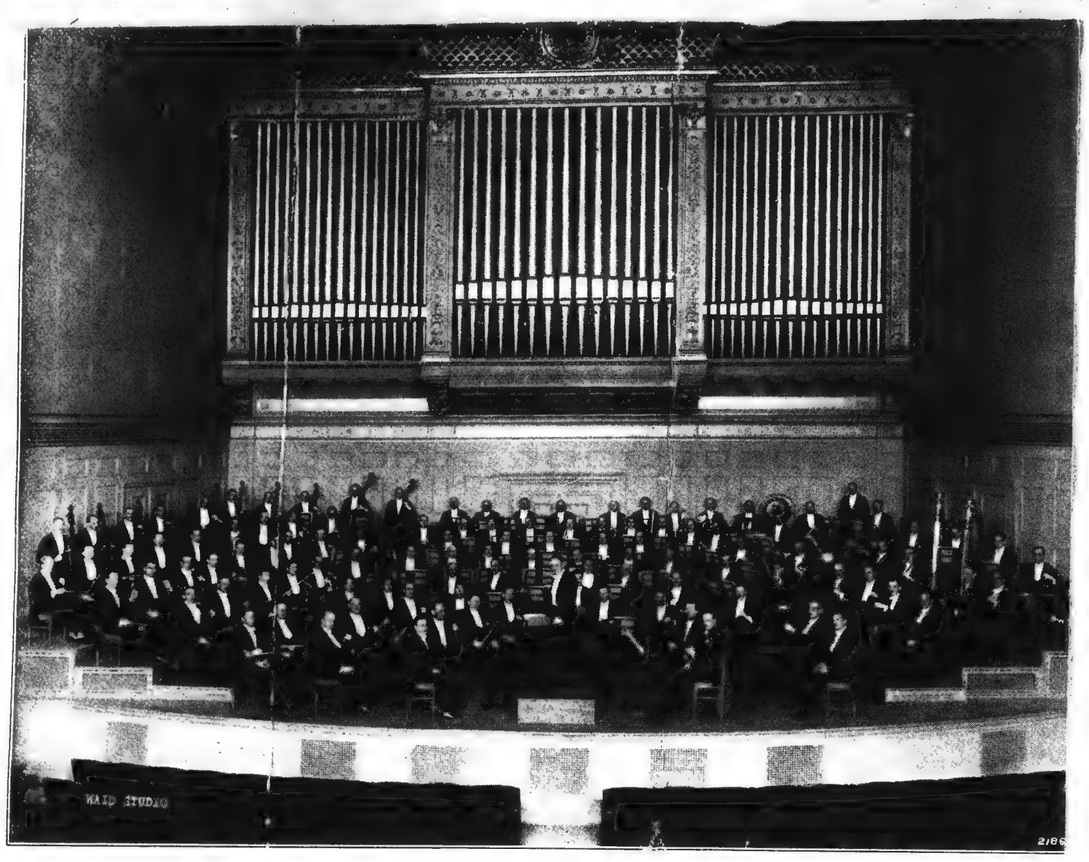


Drawing by Alexandre Iacovleff

Who conducted Thursday night's concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra

PHILA. FORUM MAG.
PHILA., PA.
FEB. 1942

82



THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A FEW weeks ago Virgil Thomson, composer and critic of The New York Herald Tribune, headed his review "A Grand Evening" and went on to say: "There is no question about it, the work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra surpasses that of any other musical aggregation we ever hear in this part of the world. For beauty of sound, clarity of balance, style and distinction in all instrumental utterance, Thursday's concert at Carnegie Hall was a model of what skill, sincere musicianship and plenty of rehearsal can produce." Nor is Mr. Thomson alone in this opinion, for numerous other leading writers on musical matters have been saying the same thing for many years.

Copyright Bachrach Studios

The Boston Symphony, which is now in its sixtieth season, returns to the Forum on Wednesday evening February 11, for its annual concert, which has become one of the very highest peaks of each musical season.

While a student in Vienna Henry Lee Higginson, later to become Boston's Major Higginson as Thomas Wentworth was its Colonel Higginson, was vividly impressed with the beauty of the masterpieces of music as performed by a highly expert orchestra. Such an opportunity did not then exist in America, and his impressions of what Boston should have were so persistent that twenty years later, in 1881, when business success had brought him sufficient means he organized and established the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He engaged the best musicians he could find and induced Georg (later Sir George) Henschel to cross from England and be their leader. Mr. Henschel was only the first of a succession of famous conductors, including Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux and, since 1924, Serge Koussevitzky.

The Conservatory

This week the New England Conservatory of Music is celebrating its 75th anniversary with appropriate exercises and a number of concerts. It may come as a slight shock to many to realize that this particular guardian of our musical culture is thus fourteen years older than the Boston Symphony, which it has done so much through the years to stock with fresh instrumental talent. Together with Harvard, then, the Conservatory has an honorable place in the history of music in New England.

Many scholars have recently devoted a good deal of effort to this subject; and, like most beginnings, the cultivation of music was at first rather groping and naive. Indeed, the early accounts of the Harvard Glee Club prove that the festive aspects far outweighed the artistic. The founding of the New England Conservatory in 1867 would seem, thus, to have injected a sorely needed professional note into this history.

The subsequent story of the Conservatory and its educational eminence in the community show how an institution founded on sound principles can survive and progress through almost any vicissitudes. Like most other schools the Conservatory is, doubtless, again facing grievous problems. But as long as the public continues to want music kept on a high standard of performance rest assured that we shall need the Conservatory's services. And consequently we should all wish it well on its 75th birthday.

Koussevitzky Appears With Philharmonic

Concert Includes Copland's 'QuietCity' and Works of Ravel and Shostakovitch

By Francis D. Perkins

Thursday night's concert, if the commentator's memory has not strayed, was the second time that Serge Koussevitzky has appeared at Carnegie Hall without the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first time, over fifteen years ago, was when he appeared without any orchestra to give a double-bass recital; Thursday's Philharmonic-Symphony concert was his first in this country with a non-Bostonian major orchestra. The memorably performed program with which he began his fortnight's Philharmonic guest conductorship consisted of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach's concerto in D major for strings, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg; Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite and Dmitri Shostakovitch's fifth symphony.

Despite Dr. Koussevitzky's eminence in his field, the concert was a subject of some advance speculation about how he would fare with an orchestra which was new to him, and as to how quickly the Philharmonic musicians—who, indeed, have been called upon for much adaptability this season—would be able to give him a complete fulfillment of his interpretative intentions. The result implied that the musicians and the conductor had established a thorough mutual understanding during the last four days of rehearsals and that Dr. Koussevitzky's talents did not depend for their manifestation upon a particular set of conditions.

This was apparent in the imposing performance of the C. P. E. Bach concerto, which followed an unusually broad-paced and solemn playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner." At first the orchestral tone, while rich and sonorous, did not have the fine definition of outline which is associated with Bostonians' strings, but this impression was transitory. The strings sang delectably in the andante, and the concert as a whole represented an orchestra in fine form under communicative and inspiring leadership. Mr. Copland's music was presented with admirable clarity of detail and subtlety of dynamics and instrumental hues, and encomiums were deserved by the solo trumpeter and English horn player—presumably Messrs. Glantz and Nazzi. The work is new to the regular Philharmonic repertoire, but it has been played here by the Saidenberg Sinfonietta and at the Stadium. It is a remarkably effective piece of scoring, and also serves its expressive purpose well, although, on rehearing, it seemed to be spun out a little too long to maintain an unflagging interest. Mr. Copland was called to the stage to share the applause.

The Ravel suite had a vivid interpretation, with remarkable mass of tone as well as headlong momentum for the closing general dance, and the orchestra, in its first indoor performance of the Shostakovitch symphony, did its best to substantiate the conductor's belief that this work is one of the most outstanding productions of the last decade or two. It has been played here under other conductors—Stokowski, Rodzinski and Mitropoulos, but yet, thus far, it has been particularly associated with Dr. Koussevitzky, who has spared no efforts toward making it well known. The performance itself, in its memorable range of color, its technical finish and its convincing emotional force, was one of the orchestra's best achievements of the season, and thus spoke persuasively for the music. There was still room for wondering how the symphony would weather the test of a series of average performances; it has its reminiscent moments, some recalling Mahler and some harking back to Tchaikovsky; the musical ideas are not of equal distinction. But it has vitality and emotional force, as well as notable skill of orchestral craftsmanship; it lingered in the ears of the departing reviewer as Dr. Koussevitzky bowed his acknowledgment of the audience's closing ovation.

PHILA. FORUM MAG.
PHILA., PA.
FEB. 1942

82

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A FEW weeks ago Virgil Thomson, composer and critic of The New York Herald Tribune, headed his review "A Grand Evening" and went on to say: "There is no question about it, the work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra surpasses that of any other musical aggregation we ever hear in this part of the world. For beauty of sound, clarity of balance, style and distinction in all instrumental utterance, Thursday's concert at Carnegie Hall was a model of what skill, sincere musicianship and plenty of rehearsal can produce." Nor is Mr. Thomson alone in this opinion, for numerous other leading writers on musical matters have been saying the same thing for many years.

Copyright Bachrach Studios

The Boston Symphony, which is now in its sixtieth season, returns to the Forum on Wednesday evening February 11, for its annual concert, which has become one of the very highest peaks of each musical season.

While a student in Vienna Henry Lee Higginson, later to become Boston's Major Higginson as Thomas Wentworth was its Colonel Higginson, was vividly impressed with the beauty of the masterpieces of music as performed by a highly expert orchestra. Such an opportunity did not then exist in America, and his impressions of what Boston should have were so persistent that twenty years later, in 1881, when business success had brought him sufficient means he organized and established the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He engaged the best musicians he could find and induced Georg (later Sir George) Henschel to cross from England and be their leader. Mr. Henschel was only the first of a succession of famous conductors, including Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux and, since 1924, Serge Koussevitzky.

The Conservatory

This week the New England Conservatory of Music is celebrating its 75th anniversary with appropriate exercises and a number of concerts. It may come as a slight shock to many to realize that this particular guardian of our musical culture is thus fourteen years older than the Boston Symphony, which it has done so much through the years to stock with fresh instrumental talent. Together with Harvard, then, the Conservatory has an honorable place in the history of music in New England.

Many scholars have recently devoted a good deal of effort to this subject; and, like most beginnings, the cultivation of music was at first rather groping and naive. Indeed, the early accounts of the Harvard Glee Club prove that the festive aspects far outweighed the artistic. The founding of the New England Conservatory in 1867 would seem, thus, to have injected a sorely needed professional note into this history.

The subsequent story of the Conservatory and its educational eminence in the community show how an institution founded on sound principles can survive and progress through almost any vicissitudes. Like most other schools the Conservatory is, doubtless, again facing grievous problems. But as long as the public continues to want music kept on a high standard of performance rest assured that we shall need the Conservatory's services. And consequently we should all wish it well on its 75th birthday.

Koussevitzky Appears With Philharmonic

Concert Includes Copland's 'QuietCity' and Works of Ravel and Shostakovitch

By Francis D. Perkins

Thursday night's concert, if the commentator's memory has not strayed, was the second time that Serge Koussevitzky has appeared at Carnegie Hall without the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first time, over fifteen years ago, was when he appeared without any orchestra to give a double-bass recital; Thursday's Philharmonic-Symphony concert was his first in this country with a non-Bostonian major orchestra. The memorably performed program with which he began his fortnight's Philharmonic guest conductorship consisted of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach's concerto in D major for strings, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg; Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite and Dmitri Shostakovitch's fifth symphony.

Despite Dr. Koussevitzky's eminence in his field, the concert was a subject of some advance speculation about how he would fare with an orchestra which was new to him, and as to how quickly the Philharmonic musicians—who, indeed, have been called upon for much adaptability this season—would be able to give him a complete fulfillment of his interpretative intentions. The result implied that the musicians and the conductor had established a thorough mutual understanding during the last four days of rehearsals and that Dr. Koussevitzky's talents did not depend for their manifestation upon a particular set of conditions.

This was apparent in the imposing performance of the C. P. E. Bach concerto, which followed an unusually broad-paced and solemn playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner." At first the orchestral tone, while rich and sonorous, did not have the fine definition of outline which is associated with Bostonians' strings, but this impression was transitory. The strings sang delectably in the andante, and the concert as a whole represented an orchestra in fine form under communicative and inspiring leadership. Mr. Copland's music was presented with admirable clarity of detail and subtlety of dynamics and instrumental hues, and encomiums were deserved by the solo trumpeter and English horn player—presumably Messrs. Glantz and Nazzi. The work is new to the regular Philharmonic repertoire, but it has been played here by the Saidenberg Sinfonietta and at the Stadium. It is a remarkably effective piece of scoring, and also serves its expressive purpose well, although, on rehearing, it seemed to be spun out a little too long to maintain an unflagging interest. Mr. Copland was called to the stage to share the applause.

The Ravel suite had a vivid interpretation, with remarkable mass of tone as well as headlong momentum for the closing general dance, and the orchestra, in its first indoor performance of the Shostakovitch symphony, did its best to substantiate the conductor's belief that this work is one of the most outstanding productions of the last decade or two. It has been played here under other conductors—Stokowski, Rodzinski and Mitropoulos, but yet, thus far, it has been particularly associated with Dr. Koussevitzky, who has spared no efforts toward making it well known. The performance itself, in its memorable range of color, its technical finish and its convincing emotional force, was one of the orchestra's best achievements of the season, and thus spoke persuasively for the music. There was still room for wondering how the symphony would weather the test of a series of average performances; it has its reminiscent moments, some recalling Mahler and some harking back to Tchaikovsky; the musical ideas are not of equal distinction. But it has vitality and emotional force, as well as notable skill of orchestral craftsmanship; it lingered in the ears of the departing reviewer as Dr. Koussevitzky bowed his acknowledgment of the audience's closing ovation.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

This week Richard Burgin is again conducting the "regular" Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in the absence of Serge Koussevitzky, who is acting as guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Mr. Burgin's program does honor to the 75th anniversary of the New England Conservatory of Music with the performances of G. W. Chadwick's dramatic overture, "Melpomene," and Franz Liszt's "Dance of Death" in which Ernst Levy of the conservatory faculty, is the piano soloist. The program begins with the first Boston performance of Reinhold Gliere's Third Symphony in B minor, "Ilia Mourometz," Op. 42.

George Whitefield Chadwick, director of the conservatory from 1893 to 1930, was a potent force in American music and his dramatic overture, "Melpomene" is an isolated example of the large number and variety of first-rate scores which he composed. Mr. Burgin gave the overture a ruddy, intense reading.

Liszt's paraphrase of the "Dies Irae" was once considered fantastically horrific and forbidding. But today it seems less macabre than fustian, while its pyrotechnics are simply brilliant fun. But it is a stupendously difficult work which needs the prodigious technique and musicianship which Mr. Levy brought to it. He performed with extraordinary dexterity, speed and rhythmic force, but he was not given the precisely integrated support which usually characterizes the Boston orchestra's accompaniments. Mr. Levy had played the "Dance of Death" with the conservatory orchestra last month.

Symphony in Grand Style

Reinhold Gliere's Third Symphony, a huge tone poem based upon the epic legends of the Russian peasant hero, "Ilia Mourometz," has been a long time coming to Boston. The work was completed in 1911 and was first performed in this country in 1918 by the Chicago Symphony. Philadelphia first heard it in December, 1933. The following March the Philadelphia Orchestra gave New York its first hearing.

The ramifications of the legends of "Ilia Mourometz," as they appear in the mythologies of several lands, are too far-flung to encompass here. In the Russian tales, Ilia of Mourom was the son of a peasant, and a giant who sat motionless for 30 years until bidden by two wandering pilgrims to go out and perform mightily heroic works. Finally, in a battle with the Tartar hordes, Ilia was turned to stone.

There are moments of vast utterance in "Ilia Mourometz" and there is much really imaginative use of themes of folksong genre. The total effect—the terrific piling of climaxes, the masterful, brilliant scoring—is one of an extravagant, gorgeously bejeweled barbarism.

There is thematic material which sticks in the memory: notably the dramatic theme (and its variants) of the opening movement, first heard from the bassoon and lower strings, and the lovely broad melody played by horns and celli in the third movement.

But drama, big, intense and ferocious, separated by the sometimes rather tiring repetition of new dramatic motives, is the ultimate character of each of the four movements. The bombast seems not a little old-fashioned.

On the evidence, Gliere might be termed a Post-Romantic. He learned much from the French Impressionists, but his Third Symphony, without being in any wise derivative, reflects the Russian Nationalist School.

Mr. Burgin, conducting without baton (which he later used in the Chadwick and Liszt), and the orchestra performed the Gliere work superlatively, and with exhausting emotional fervor. It is a tribute to the interpreters that in a performance which took over an hour, one's interest never flagged.

At next week's concerts, Polyna Stoska, soprano, will be the soloist in the arias "Porgi Amor" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and "Leise, leise" from Weber's "Der Freischutz." The purely orchestral numbers will be Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 104, and the First Symphony of Sibelius. Richard Burgin will again conduct.

J. W. R.

FINE CONCERT AT SYMPHONY

General Affect, However, Is Disappointing

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With Dr. Koussevitzky conducting the New York Philharmonic-Symphony for two weeks, Richard Burgin once more carries on at Symphony Hall. The programme of this week's concerts is by no means without interest, yet the general effect yesterday afternoon was somewhat disappointing. The assistant conductor changed the original course of events, distinctly to the benefit of Gliere's long and derivative Symphony, "Ilia Mourometz," which was heard for the first time in Boston, and greatly to the disadvantage of Chadwick's "Melpomene" Overture and Liszt's "Todtentanz," with Ernst Levy, of the Conservatory faculty, as pianist, both of which were performed in honor of that institution's 75th anniversary. Had it remained at the end, the Symphony would have been much harder to take, and had the Overture and Liszt's curious paraphrase on the "Dies Irae" come at the beginning, as first planned, they would have made a much better effect.

As it was, Chadwick's Overture, by no means one of his best works, since it leans heavily on the German romanticists, did not get enough applause to follow Mr. Burgin to the back of the stage, and Mr. Levy's virtuoso performance found the audience in its customary rush to leave. Tonight, with a less complicated traffic problem outside, Mr. Levy will probably receive his due, though he might have chosen a more engrossing piece in which to make his debut with the orchestra.

At that, Liszt had considerably more to say than either Chadwick or Gliere. If the Overture, composed in 1886, is full of echoes of Schumann, Mendelssohn and Brahms, the Russian's Symphony, written between 1908 and 1911, recalls Rimsky-Korsakov and Scriabin on the one hand and Debussy and Dukas on the other. In the case of a virtual quotation from Stravinsky's "Fire Bird," it would be difficult to say at this distance who had the idea first.

It was probably on the theory that 50,000 Chicagoans can't be wrong that Mr. Burgin decided to let Boston hear a symphony that has proved tremendously popular in the Windy City since Mr. Stock introduced it there in the season of 1917-18. It has also enjoyed favor in Philadelphia and it has recently been recorded. Definitely pictorial, following a programme of extravagant Russian legend and orchestrated with great skill, the Symphony is well put together and agreeable enough to listen to, were it only shorter.

The work ran a full hour and it is supposed to take even longer. Granted that we should have new or unfamiliar music along with our classics, the fact remains that there are many more important pieces than Gliere's Third Symphony which we have yet to hear and many more which have not been played here within long memory. Incidentally, the whole programme was eloquently performed.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
MAR 1 - 1942

KOUSSEVITZKY IS HAILED

Wins Ovations at Carnegie Hall Program With Philharmonic

Serge Koussevitzky scored another triumph as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. There were prolonged ovations after all of the offerings on a program composed of works previously presented here by the director during his current engagement with the organization.

The list contained a Corelli suite for strings; Aaron Copland's "Quiet City"; the "Daphnis and Chloe" suite, No. 2, of Ravel, and Shostakovich's Fifth symphony. After the "Quiet City" Mr. Copland appeared on the stage with the director for many bows.

ENCORE!

In an old farmhouse near Farmington, Maine, is a singular museum for such a spot. It contains operatic scores and the costumes of a prima donna. She was an ambitious country girl named Lillian Norton who came down to Boston in 1876 at the age of seventeen to study voice in the New England Conservatory of Music which this week celebrates the 75th anniversary of its founding. Though the girl's voice was golden she was a slow student, but, having the genuine Maine pluck, she pegged away until she sang, when she was thirty-five, her first Wagnerian role. She was better known as Mme. Lillian Nordica.

When the value of a musical conservatory is totaled, spectacular careers may be the least of it. The most of it may be to fill households, as our conservatory has done, with forty or fifty thousand amateur performers of good music, to improve taste by the training of competent teachers for private classes and public schools, to replenish the ranks of choral societies, and to keep first-rate players flowing into symphony orchestras, as twenty-four present members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra once played in the Conservatory orchestra. You cannot sustain a great university without a wide spread of learning in common life, nor a high estate of musical taste without a highly literate musical public. The growth of such a public may take two or three generations. That we of today can step in off Huntington av. and hear (often for no charge at all) in the two beautiful concert halls of the New England Conservatory excellent performances of the best music, is because the Conservatory has in such large part created that public by which it is sustained.

If you will thumb the pages of yellowed program books from the 1870's and '80's, you will be amused and a little horrified at what quite reputable artists still played. Yes, they began with Bach and Beethoven, but ended their performances by playing pieces of the most appalling tripe. Well, they had to, poor lambs, in order to sell the seats. Even our sainted Boston Symphony Orchestra which we now revere as the ultimate repository of austere classicism and at the same time the front-line listening post of daring innovation, used three decades ago to play on its regular programs pieces which are now tumbling overboard even from the programs of the Pops. What has caused these differences? It is all in what the public can understand and enjoy. That our public is now indignant if given anything short of the best is due to such institutions as the New England Conservatory which for three quarters of a century has poured into the bloodstream of this city's intellectual life, and New England's, and the Nation's, the red corpuscles of perpetual artistic enrichment.

Virtuoso performers? The Conservatory has trained them, from Mmes. Nordica and Louise Homer on the operatic stage to Messrs. Meier, Pattison, and San Roma on the concert platform. Or composers? Then George Chadwick, Arthur Foote, Horatio Parker, Henry Hadley, Frederick Converse, E. B. Hill, Mabel Daniels and many more, who have taught or studied, or done both, at the Conservatory.

This city—any city—is a little too prone to take its blessings for granted. That we are able, people of the smaller as well as of the larger income brackets, to enjoy year after year such banquets of the mind is something which did not just happen. To prepare such feasts and to keep them replenished takes the devoted labors of a smallish army of first-rate artists through generation after generation. Nor will their utmost devotion suffice unless they are supported by a public keenly alert to its own grubstake in the cuisine. During the years just ahead, if such institutions are to be kept going, it may take sacrifice. Or is "sacrifice" quite the word? For such bread upon the waters is returned a thousand-fold.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

Dr. Koussevitzky Returns

By L. A. Sloper

Back from his triumphs with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky resumes direction of the Boston Symphony with the concerts of this week. Yesterday's audience rose to welcome him, and throughout the afternoon made evident its pleasure at having him once more on the stand of Symphony Hall.

All reports from New York indicate that the Boston conductor obtained astonishing results with the New York instrumentalists, who, it is agreed, have been suffering from want of a unified command. Oscar Thompson's comment on the New York visit will be found on another page of this issue.

It seemed yesterday that the change in the Philharmonic during the last fortnight could hardly have been greater than that in the Boston band at this concert. A week ago the orchestra was far below its proper form; yesterday it was at the top of it. The transformation reminded me of that which I observed in the Philharmonic when Toscanini took it over, some years ago, after an assortment of guest conductors had been leading it.

The Boston tone was back in all its glory yesterday. There was again the old clarity, the old rhythmic vitality, the old flexibility and eloquence. Strauss may not have been strictly accurate when he said that there are no great orchestras, only great conductors; but certainly a great orchestra needs a great conductor.

This week's program consists of Prokofieff's Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli"; Samuel Barber's Violin Concerto, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Ruth Posselt, heard once before this season, was welcomed again as the soloist.

This was a rather odd lot of compositions. Beethoven's Seventh would make the second half of any program, but to follow Prokofieff with Barber was not the happiest of thoughts for a program maker. The Scythian Suite is characteristic of the early Prokofieff. It has by no means lost its effectiveness, though we are naturally much less startled by it now than we were 18 years ago when it was first played here. When it was last performed, five years ago, I complained of its rhythmic monotony. That complaint, I believe, is still good for the greater part of the work, but I wondered yesterday what I was doing when the second section was being played in 1937. Nodding, apparently because on this occasion I was fascinated by the rhythmic patterns of that movement. The first movement, I'm afraid, is more notable for its sound than for anything else, the third is a not very evocative picture of night; but the last movement still is capable of thrilling us with its instrumental timbres and its harmonic acidities.

Mr. Barber's concerto is frankly romantic, unashamedly of the nineteenth century, in its first two movements; in the third movement the composer suddenly starts up and writes a moto perpetuo full of exciting rhythms which prove that he is a man of the twentieth century after all. It is possible that Mr. Barber, who is only 32 years old, wrote his Violin Concerto too soon. The performance was excellent, and soloist and composer took several bows.

1942 Concerts In Tanglewood

Continuance Despite War Is Agreed to

Overriding the interference of war, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., have agreed to continue their summertime concerts at Tanglewood this year, Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the Festival, announced yesterday.

Nine concerts will be presented under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, beginning July 30 and continuing through Aug. 16. The agreement is for one year, a five-year contract between the two organizations having expired last year.

In a joint statement made by Miss Smith and Ernest B. Dane, president of the Boston orchestra, it was said:

"The question of advisability of holding the festival in 1942 has received much consideration by the members of the boards.

"It is their hope that in spite of war conditions as they are or may develop, it will be possible to hold these concerts the usual way at Tanglewood. Established in 1934 and with the Boston Symphony Orchestra participating since 1936, the festival has attracted music lovers from every state in the union as well as from Europe, Latin America, Canada and Mexico. The attendance in 1941 was 106,000."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
MAR 1 - 1942

84

ORCHESTRA FUTURE

Lessons of This Season Point to Needs of The Philharmonic-Symphony

By OLIN DOWNES

THE talk of the town, musically speaking, is what happened to the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, some ten nights ago, when a conductor of the highest rank officiated as guest leader of the famous organization. The results of his engagement, which terminates this afternoon, are significant, not only as they reflected the qualities of the man with the baton, but also the capacities, which, in late years, have not often been revealed, of a great and battered orchestra.

At few of the concerts of the present season, by consensus of the press and the informed public, had the orchestra approached the standards then attained, which should obtain when an organization of its reputation and quality performs. It may be said that certain standards should be maintained anyhow, as a matter of pride with the players. But perhaps this is asking overmuch. Perhaps the heavy routine of a long season, of four and five rehearsals and three concerts a week, will get on musicians' nerves, so that only a leader of exceptional technique and authority can make the players keep their chins up. Of course, the situation is aggravated by the fact that most of the Philharmonic-Symphony players fill many engagements outside of the orchestra. That makes impossible the best efforts of the men at all the concerts. They are tired out. Excellent performers as most of them are, they cannot bring their best to their Philharmonic-Symphony engagements, and several things might be said here as to whether a wider distribution of jobs among the orchestral players of New York City could not be achieved and would not be a good thing. It might bring less money into the pockets of the top few, it might also give employment to more players and encourage a fresher and better level of performance. Acknowledging that the majority of the musicians of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra are overworked, either from choice or because of conditions they cannot control, the fact remains that the best orchestra in the world, in the last analysis, is not better than its leader.

In Recent Seasons

The management and the board of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society are now in a position, if they are frank with themselves, to acknowledge extremely tangible proof of these assertions.

For reasons for which there has never been a satisfactory explanation, New York's famous orchestra was put for seasons into the hands of a conductor of insufficient experience. Why he was given such an engagement, on the basis of his modest though creditable record, must remain one of those mysteries. That a miracle did not intervene to save the situation was not his fault. He did all that he could under the circumstances. He was not equal to the demands of the Philharmonic-Symphony position.

That he would not and probably could not be equal to them was foreseen in advance of the event by music-lovers cognizant of the orchestral situation on both sides of the water, who predicted unsatisfactory results from this engagement. There was the hope that the new arrival might be the exception that proves the rule. That hope did not materialize. The quality of the orchestral performances, despite occasional flashes of better omen, deteriorated. And it may be reiterated this was not the conductor's fault, nor the fault of the players of the Philharmonic-Symphony. It was the fault of those who engaged him. These things are said in hope that after one disastrous experience of this kind, accompanied by growing public apathy and indifference to the orchestra's offerings, the same procedure will not be repeated, at least for a while. It is clear that a first-class conductor is really essential to an orchestra's performance, and even essential to the Philharmonic-Symphony's reputation, which had fallen far since the departure of Toscanini. The conductors of this season, variously, and some of them have shown how instantaneously an orchestra responds, for good or ill, to its leadership, and Dr. Koussevitzky's appearances have clinched the matter.

Change in Performance

That it was a special kind of a triumph for him is an acknowledgment due, but that, for New York, is not a question of fundamental importance. The important and revealing fact is the way in which the orchestra reacted to his art and took on a different character in so doing.

Certain things missing for months at a time at Philharmonic-Symphony concerts were restored to the performances. We speak in the first place of technical matters and secondly of higher questions of interpretation. Suddenly the Philharmonic-Symphony was playing consistently and persistently in tune. Suddenly the men were neither scraping nor forcing tone, or botching their attacks, whether they were string players or those of wind instruments. The sonority of the whole orchestra was clarified and balanced, and there was homogeneity and finish, not only in matters of tone but matters of style.

Orchestra at Its Best

The Philharmonic-Symphony, be it added, was playing in this manner not because of the presence of a leader with authority to hire and fire, but because certain qualities possessed by an orchestra which insufficient leadership had often misrepresented were promptly manifested in willing response to a conductor who thoroughly knew his business.

The men were not being commanded to play, they were being released to play, which is a different matter. As a result the Philharmonic-Symphony was again sounding like the superb orchestra which manifestly it is—words which can be said the more freely, since Dr. Koussevitzky is not eligible for its leadership, even if such a change were remotely contemplated, which it is not. We are speaking impersonally, not of a conductor and an orchestra, but of conductors and orchestras, and the kind of orchestral performance that we should have, week in and week out, in New York City, from one of the greatest instrumental bodies in the world.

To secure the conductor or conductors, if one cannot shoulder the work of the New York season, needed for this result is a problem before the management of the Philharmonic-Symphony, and it is not the business of musical columnists to suggest or recommend who that conductor should be. Such a conductor will be hard to find, for the plain reason that in this generation there are few conductors of the first rank available. It may well be that New York's orchestra, circumstances being what they are, will have to resort to a second season of guest leaders, the best securable for the time being, and take a longer time to choose a permanent leader, or two leaders if as many are necessary. But at least, after the experiences of the last five years, the Philharmonic-Symphony Society ought to know what it needs and go after it.

This Clipping From MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD
MAR 1 - 1942

Ruth Posselt To Play Concerto By Barber

By DORIS RENO
Herald Music Editor

THE last of the season's parade of violin prodigies comes to Miami Monday in the person of Ruth Posselt, 27-year-old virtuoso who appears with the University of Miami Symphony Orchestra at 8:30 p. m. in Miami Senior High school. This will be the fourth of the six subscription concerts scheduled by the orchestra this year.

John Bitter, the symphony's experimental young conductor, quickly tendered Ruth a contract after hearing her play Samuel Barber's concerto for violin and orchestra before 9,000 people at the Berkshire festival last summer.

Tales of Ruth's prodigy prowess were told us by her elder sister, Marjorie Posselt, who for the past two years has been conducting a violin studio in Fort Lauderdale. Marjorie began teaching her baby sister when the child was 3, and from the beginning, she says, Ruth cuddled her violin as other little girls cuddle their dolls.

"But it didn't occur to me for a long time that I was dealing with genius," said Marjorie, with pride in her voice. "You just don't think of genius in terms of your own family, you know!"

BUT even the family was impressed when Ruth was signed up for a Steinert Hall concert in Boston at the age of 6, and the local press waxed lyrical in its praise of her tone and technique. When she was 10 she added to her triumphs a Carnegie Hall recital and an appearance with Walter Damrosch's Philharmonic Symphony.

Besides Sister Marjorit, Ruth has studied with Emanuel Ondricek in Boston and Jacques Thibaud in Paris. In 1932 she made her European debut, playing thereafter with all the major orchestras of the continent and giving hundreds of recitals. Since 1936 she has appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky, the Chicago Symphony under Stock, and the Detroit Symphony.

She is scheduling with our orchestra the same Barber concerto she played at Tanglewood last summer. In addition, Mr. Bitter is offering eight Russian folk songs arranged by Anton Liadoff (including religious chants, a lament, a lullably and dances); Wagner's "Prelude and Love-Death" from "Trinstan and Isolde;" "On Hearing the First Cuckoo In Spring," by Frederick Delius; and "Guaracho" from the "Latin-American Symphonette" of Morton Gould.

RUTH POSSELT

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
MAR 2 - 1942

Levant's Compositions On Symphony Program

BOSTON, March 2 (UP)—For the first time in its 61-year history, Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight will open its program with two works of an American composer.

The opening numbers will be "Overture, 1912" and "Dirge," both composed by Oscar Levant.

Explaining the rare tribute, Acting Conductor Richard Burgin said he considered Levant's "One of the finest talents in the country in orchestral composition." Burgin added that he felt that Levant was handicapped by the public's conception of him merely as a "know-it-all" on quiz programs.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
MAR 2 - 1942

KOUSSEVITZKY'S ADIEU

2,600 Persons Give Ovation to Conductor at Final Concert

Serge Koussevitzky completed his two-week engagement with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. There was an audience of 2,600 and the program consisted of two works that he had played at previous concerts, Debussy's "La Mer," and Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony.

The audience gave him a prolonged ovation at the close. He was recalled to the stage many times. The men of the orchestra joined in the applause and once refused to stand when he asked them to share the plaudits with him.

This Clipping From
WINSTED, CONN.
CITIZEN
MAR 2 - 1942

Will Play Levant Numbers

Boston, March 2—For the first time in its 61-year history, the Boston Symphony orchestra tonight will open its program with two works of an American composer. The opening numbers will be "Overture 1912" and "Dirge," both composed by Oscar Levant.

KOUSSEVITZKY MAGIC STIRS HUB CRITIC AT NEW YORK CONCERT

Boston Post March 1 1942

THE NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE New York Philharmonic-Symphony is a great orchestra with only two serious rivals in this country and hence, as matters now stand, in the world. Nevertheless, its collective personality is less clearly defined than that of the Boston Symphony or that of the Philadelphia Orchestra, particularly when the latter is led by Leopold Stokowski. The reason for this is plain enough. Since Mr. Toscanini resigned, the Philharmonic has had for its regular conductor one whose own individuality is not pronounced and it is the most guest-conducted of any of the first-rate American orchestras. Like that of the Metropolitan Opera Company it has learned to be all things to all directors.

In this, its centennial season, the New York band is being led by many guests, themselves of varying stature. Just now it is under the spell of Serge Koussevitzky (this engagement ends today) and it has been quickly transformed into something amazingly like the Boston Symphony which, in its present estate, is Dr. Koussevitzky's creation.

Carnegie Hall is not Symphony Hall and no two groups of 100 men could possibly sound exactly the same, no matter who led them. But the old trick of shutting your eyes works pretty well. This reviewer tried it in New York's great auditorium last Sunday, though he found it was a lot more fun to keep them open and see as well as hear the familiar magic in operation. The programme was a typical Koussevitzky list, the chief items on which were the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" and the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch, both of which had been played twice in the preceding concerts. The only new number was the suite of string pieces by Corelli, in Pinelli's arrangement.

* * * *

Ravel, himself, once testified that no one made so much of the "Daphnis" music as Koussevitzky and it is safe to predict that Shostakovitch would be equally enchanted with what that persuasive maestro accomplishes with his No. 5, a work that has risen quickly into genuine popular favor. There was a great demonstration at its conclusion Sunday and afterwards, in the green room, the conductor was literally speechless, quite content to beam his satisfaction when congratulations were offered. That kind of conducting takes it out of you.

Globe Mar 3

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

In the fifth program of the shorter series of Boston Symphony concerts, Richard Burgin presents first performances in Boston of "Overture 1912" and "Dirge," by Oscar Levant. The remainder of the program consists of Lalo's Cello Concerto in D minor with Jean Bedetti, first cellist of the orchestra, as soloist, and the First Symphony of Sibelius.

In the field of entertainment Oscar Levant has spread his activities far and wide. He is sometime composer for the films and the Broadway stage, a writer of popular songs, an admirer of George Girshwin, a Broadway habitue, and wit of the radio quiz program, "Information Please." Certainly he is best known in the latter capacity. His "Dirge" is vigorous and healthily dissonant music.

Except for a few redeeming pages, the Lalo Cello Concerto (written in 1877) is a bore. Its saccharine sweetness quickly becomes tiring. And yet, it does contain some lovely melodies—the Intermezzo which begins the second movement and the short andante introduction to the third and final movement. But one's first impressions can be amended, for this Concerto is admirably written to display the essentially warm, lyric qualities of the instrument. Mr. Bedetti played with his familiar ravishing, luscious tone, while his nimble technique produced only an occasional faulty note. After a rather unsteady beginning, the orchestra and Mr. Burgin supplied a firm accompaniment.

Mr. Burgin worked marvels with the First Symphony of Sibelius. It lacked not a thing of the romantic spirit. Yet that was nowhere excessive. The giant, elemental forces of nature, the traditional strength and honest health of the North, simple grandeur and pure beauty—these are the things to be experienced in Mr. Burgin's interpretation. The orchestra responded with its customary precision, for Mr. Burgin has perfectly coordinated the intricate instrumental detail of the Symphony.

The program will be repeated at 3 this afternoon. The final concerts in the series will be given Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, April 13 and 14.—J. W. R.

LEVANT'S OVERTURE

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Oscar Levant, musical oracle of Information Please, was on hand at last evening's Symphony concert to hear the first local performance of his Overture 1912 and Dirge. Incidentally, no other music from Mr. Levant's hand had previously been played here. The title Overture 1912, or at least the 1912 part of it, doesn't mean a thing. Mr. Levant admits it. In that year of grace he was 5 years old and, as he says, "Wore a William Howard Taft button."

Mr. Levant's musical idiom reflects his upbringing and may be briefly summarized as a grafting of Schoenberg on Tin Pan Alley. The overture is impertinent; hardly important. The Dirge, written in memory of the composer's friend, George Gershwin, has considerably more substance but is so unlike any other orchestral threnody that it is difficult to hear in these measures the deep personal grief which inspired them. Richard Burgin, the conductor of the evening, presented both compositions with his customary earnestness and care for detail.

The programme began alliteratively. After Levant came Lalo, in the shape of the Concerto for Violoncello with Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, as soloist. The piece does not wear its 65 years too lightly. The second movement retains a measure of its original freshness. The other two have sadly faded. However, it made a serviceable vehicle for Mr. Bedetti, whose performance was received with great enthusiasm. Sibelius' First Symphony, carried over from last week's concert, brought the end. The programme will be repeated this afternoon.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 4 - 1942

ABOUT REHEARSALS

Koussevitzky Had One More Than Usual Number.

"For the sake of the record," this department has been requested to call attention to the facts pertaining to the rehearsals granted Serge Koussevitzky as guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. Ordinarily the orchestra plays three or four concerts a week and contracts call for five rehearsals of two and one-half hours each. Dr. Koussevitzky had six rehearsals, with overtime on the string section, for the three concerts of his first week with the Philharmonic-Symphony, and five rehearsals for the second week, totaling one more than customary for the fortnight.

Burgin Plays Novelties By Oscar Levant

Christian S. Thornton
March 2, 1942

Without gloves, if without baton is the same thing, Richard Burgin directed performance of the Sibelius Symphony No. 1 in E minor at Symphony Hall last evening. A stick certainly confines the hand of a conductor; or at any rate, by plain outcome of Mr. Burgin's governing the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Sibelius work, freedom from the stick allows ease and suppleness of phrasing of an unusual sort. It makes the difference between precise division of the measures of the music into two, three, or four segments, as the call may chance to be, and a fluid run of sound through all the strokes. For Mr. Burgin, too, it makes the difference between routine time-beating and inventive interpretation.

Not that he ought to do the thing this way in the case of every composition he takes up, and not that every conductor ought to adopt the batonless method. But here was an instance of the idea faring well. It made a study of a repertory piece that might have been merely good and conventional into something excellent and individual.

* * *

Strange if the Boston Symphony should not develop a conductor out of its own ranks, and strange if the man in the first chair of the violins should not on occasion stand up to the desk on which the full score lies and cut a praiseworthy figure there. Twice strange, again, if the man in the first chair of the violoncellos could not take his place at the front of the platform and distinguish himself in a solo part; which is what Jean Bedetti did at this meeting of the Monday subscribers, appearing as soloist in the Lalo Concerto for Violoncello in D minor. Mr. Bedetti presented the composition like a show piece for his instrument, and at the same time like a symphonic work wherein he had a leading role. It is interesting, everybody acknowledges, to have a visiting artist come and display his gifts. The contrast of his style, formed from experience with many orchestras, and the style of the home organization is always something of a charm and a thrill. But the homogeneity of the style of a Boston artist with the Boston ensemble can be agreeable, too, and even exciting. The conversational exchange between Mr. Bedetti and the supporting executants had a liveliness and a familiarity that caught and held the attention of listeners and helped give the night's proceedings a special air of success.

* * *

Not to be passed over as insignificant or inconsequential were a couple of pieces of American music new to the town: "Overture 1912" and "Dirge," by Oscar Levant who was present and took applause. Of course we ask what the composer can be thinking about, stirring up so much strange sound amongst the choirs of a classic orchestra, introducing harmonies that are anything but harmonious and reiterating endlessly themes that are all angles and corners, and no curves or sweeps. Still, we become convinced, as the action goes on, that things are not illogical, even if they are irregular. The good old artistic qualities of proportion and of light and shade stand in evidence; and it is to be noticed that the players seem quite at ease. As for originality, a captious listener does not pick out strains that he has heard before somewhere; though can that be all there is to originality? W. P. T.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
MAR 7 - 1942

TWO ANTHEMS FOR RUSSIA

Two anthems will open the Russian War Relief benefit concert to be given in Constitution Hall March 31 by the Boston Symphony conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. Following "The Star Spangled Banner," the orchestra will play "Internationale," then go into an all-Russian program, not yet announced. Mr. Koussevitzky was born in central Russia in 1874, won a double-bass scholarship at Moscow, where he later organized his own orchestra. Tickets for this concert are handled by C. C. Cappel at 1340 G-st nw.

Herald Mar 3

MUSIC

Monday Symphony

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 5th concert of the Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Levant—Overture 1912.
Levant—Dirge.
Lalo—Cello Concerto in D minor.
Sibelius—Symphony No. 1 in E minor Op. 39

This was an odd program that did not, as it turned out, have any very startling results. The Sibelius First Symphony is, of course, not news, as it was the chief item on the program last week and is well known anyway. Therefore, it need not detain us just now. But the first part of the program was unfamiliar, Mr. Levant's pieces being heard here for the first time and the Lalo Cello Concerto not having been played since 1927.

Mr. Oscar Levant, the mercurial star of "Information Please," was the soloist in Gershwin's Piano Concerto with the Pops not long ago and was also in the audience last night to receive the applause awarded him as a composer. In this latter capacity, we regret to say, he left us quite cold. Undoubtedly, he has some talent and in the Dirge for his friend, George Gershwin, he had honest depth of feeling, so much so that he spun the material in it out to unreasonable length.

These two pieces have musically a good deal of pretention, for all the self-denegation of the composer's program notes. The Overture gives the impression of having been rather crossly put together in a "Well, it will have to do" spirit. The Dirge is, as we have said, sincere and dull. It is tempting to write Mr. Levant down as a stage personality, one who needs the direct approach of radio or piano or what you please to make his talents apparent. But there is probably no pinning him down, and he may well surprise everybody by turning out to be the white hope of American composers after all.

Lalo's Concerto, which Mr. Bedetti played last night with such lovely tone and expert assurance, is at least as good as most 'cello concertos. It has, for one thing, a charming second movement. The first is repetitious and the last nothing remarkable. But there are few good works in this field; and Lalo was sensible enough to give the solo instrument a romp and let it go at that. The limelight in it is so much the soloist's that Mr. Burgin was at first inclined to leave it all in the capable hands of Mr. Bedetti and to allow the orchestra to sound a bit ragged.

The concert will be repeated this afternoon. The next and last pair in the series will be given April 13 and 14.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAR 7 - 1942

Ruth Posselt, appearing with the Boston Symphony next Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, will play the solo part in Samuel Barber's violin concerto.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
MAR 5 - 1942

An event that probably wouldn't have happened here a year ago will take place March 31 when the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays "The Internationale" at the Russian Relief benefit concert. It will be interesting to see the reaction of some of Washington's capitalistic dowagers as they stand to listen to the rousing hymn of the Communists. Perhaps some will join in and sing but probably few yet know the words of that famous song.

85

Koussevitzky Fortnight

By Oscar Thompson

New York

Of the guest conductors who have come and gone in the progress of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony's centennial season, none has been more warmly welcomed than Serge Koussevitzky. The tribute paid him at the conclusion of the final concert of his two-weeks engagement on March 1 was of that exceptional order which justifies the use of the much-abused word "ovation." His seven concerts—three in the first week, four in the second—were productive of much discussion, which, retrospectively considered, pursued a line of comment and speculation not at all like that which ordinarily attends the arrival and the departure of just one more Philharmonic-Symphony guest.

With the others—and the Philharmonic has now presented eight of the 10 conductors announced for its centenary—there has been at least an undercurrent of speculation as to how they might fit into the orchestra's future plans, beginning perhaps with next season. In season and out, there is talk about "restoring" the orchestra, as one of the greatest in the world, to that settled place of pre-eminence that it unquestionably has held through much of its history. The feeling widely entertained is that loose ends developed with the departure of Arturo Toscanini six years ago, and that the time has come to do something about it. Hence the particular scrutiny of those who have held the baton since the opening of the orchestra's season in October.

* * *

But there can be no serious thought of detaching Dr. Koussevitzky from the Boston Symphony and bringing him to Manhattan as one of the Philharmonic-Symphony's permanent conductors. Consequently, the question most aired in connection with his concerts has not been one as to how he would do as a prestige restorer for the grand old Philharmonic, but one as to the extent in which he was succeeding in making the Philharmonic sound like the Boston Symphony. Pointing out real or imaginary differences of personality between the three major orchestras ministering to the city's symphonic needs—the resident Philharmonic-Symphony and the visiting Boston Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestra—has long been a favorite sport with the city's concert habitues, so that it was taken for granted there was something more involved in the guest relation than good conducting and good playing.

The notion that Dr. Koussevitzky's goal and problem was to make the Philharmonic-Symphony sound like the Boston Symphony no doubt was furthered by his choice of programs that New Yorkers ordinarily would think of as Boston Symphony programs. To be sure, in only two instances were compositions listed as "first time by the Society"—and one of these, Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," had, in fact, been played by the Philharmonic at one of its summer concerts in the Lewisohn Stadium. But the grouping of such names as C. P. E. Bach, Copland, Ravel, and Shostakovich in one instance, and Foote, Debussy, and Tchaikovsky in another, was a Boston Symphony grouping, not a Philharmonic-Symphony grouping, for the audiences that heard these programs.

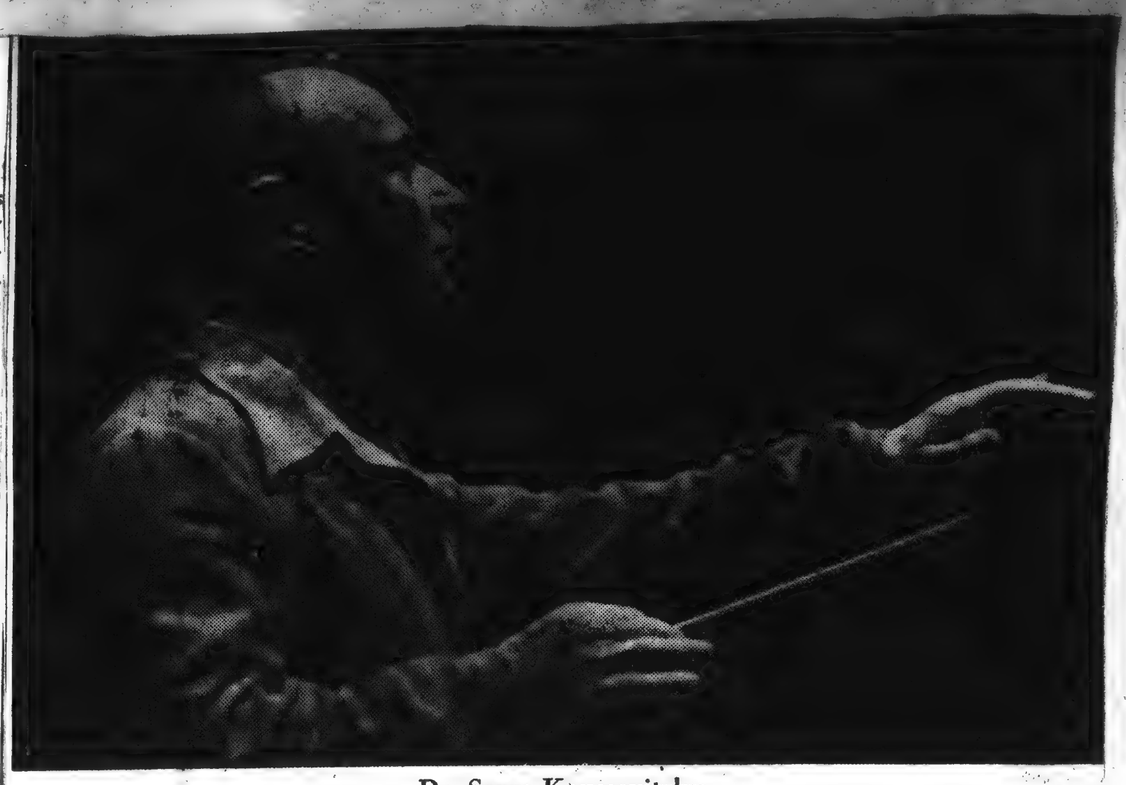
* * *

Ravel's second "Daphnis and Chloë" Suite, Debussy's "La Mer," and the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony, though by no means the exclusive property of Dr. Koussevitzky, had been strikingly identified with his past programs in New York. Every conductor indulges in Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. But bracket that symphony with Foote's Suite for Strings and Debussy's "La Mer" and the experienced listener will expect to find the Boston conductor before him.

What Dr. Koussevitzky accomplished with six rehearsals in the first week and five in the second (a total of one more than is provided for in the orchestra's contracts) was a partial realization of the task attributed to him, irrespective of whether the conductor himself thought of it in that light. There was no lack of individual or collective virtuosity—that has been true of the playing of the ensemble under other guest conductors, as well as under Dr. Koussevitzky. But such change as was noticeable in the style and tonal body was toward a brightening and lightening, a smarter, more incisive way of playing, by no means to be confused with the ethereal, almost disembodied effects that Toscanini often achieved with this orchestra.

It remained, however, only partial realization. The strings were heavier, more essentially emotional in sound than the famous strings of the Bostonians. Though persuasively lyrical, the woodwinds missed in some way the airiness of those from Symphony Hall. "La Mer" sounded a little tentative and sentimental, if not actually thin, having neither the exquisite polish of a typical Koussevitzky performance nor the ruggedness of the unforgettable Toscanini performances of this work in other years. In "Daphnis and Chloë" one sensed that the conductor and the musicians had not quite the same vision, if indeed the technique of some of the solo winds was all that was being asked.

Still, there were many who felt that the best playing of the Philharmonic this season was that which Dr. Koussevitzky drew from the ensemble and that perhaps he—more than any other conductor—had shown where there was need of new blood. Whether there will be reason to alter some of these conclusions after Arturo Toscanini has conducted the same ensemble a little later remains to be seen. Only one other conductor, the veteran Walter Damrosch, who will preside over two Berlioz programs, has yet to join the parade, though there are return weeks for one or two who have already appeared.



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

AN OCCASION AT SYMPHONY

Composer Given Plaudits of Audience

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Koussevitzky was back on the job again at yesterday's Symphony Concert. Very much so, in fact! The orchestra has not worked so hard or produced so many decibels of sound in quite some time. Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," which began the concert is, through most of its course, one of the loudest pieces in the repertory and Dr. Koussevitzky can extract more sonority from the Finale of Beethoven's Seventh, the last number on the programme, than most conductors could get from the "Alpine Symphony" of Strauss.

Between the violences of Prokofieff and the dityramps of Beethoven came as innocent a novelty as we have heard in years, the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Samuel Barber, which the Symphony Orchestra had played at last summer's Berkshire Festival, and with Ruth Posselt as soloist. To be sure, the third and last movement, marked "Presto, in Moto Perpetua," engenders a certain mild excitement, though the soloist is worked pretty hard in relation to the effect produced. But the first and second movements are of a Victorian blandness; hard to account for in this day and generation.

Mr. Barber, who has previously been represented at Symphony Hall by two other highly agreeable pieces: his overture, "The School for Scandal" and the "Essay for Orchestra," was present yesterday and much applause was showered upon him; upon Miss Posselt, who played with her customary skill, and on Dr. Koussevitzky. It is plain that the audience was thoroughly pleased with this portion of the programme. It always enjoys such an occasion, and this was one.

Once one of the most stirring and exhilarating of all pieces, the "Scythian Suite" seems suddenly to have dated. It is now as much a symbol and symptom of its particular period, a period inaugurated with Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," as Liszt's "Mazeppa" was of its day and generation. And, old-fashioned as it is, Liszt's score has more of actual musical substance than Prokofieff's. The performance, as suggested above, was an extremely brilliant one, yet the enthusiasm of the audience was not pronounced.

Beethoven is not always Dr. Koussevitzky's dish. He does better with some symphonies than with others, and with certain movements than with other movements. There were fine moments in the Seventh, yesterday, such as the introductory Poco sostenuto, the Trio of the Allegretto and the Scherzo. However, the main body of the first movement might have had more elasticity and bounce, and the Finale was over-driven, both as to tempo and dynamics.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Violin Concerto by Samuel Barber, given first performance in Boston yesterday afternoon by Ruth Posselt and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made a definitely favorable impression. The work stood midway in the program, following the "Scythian Suite" by Prokofieff, and preceding the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

Mr. Barber is a young man who knows his own mind. He has the courage of his convictions. He will write long melodies to be played con espressivo, and harmony with mild and subtle dissonance, in a period when young composers are expected to plunge into the choppy seas of unrelieved dissonance and complicated rhythmic effects.

His Violin Concerto is above all—at least in its first two movements—a lyrical Concerto. The solo violin starts off at the very beginning with a melody that is almost a tune. Through the whole course of these movements the instrument is mainly concerned with melody of a frank sensuousness rare in contemporary music. The orchestra, meanwhile, carries on in the same vein, supporting and setting off the violin, but never submerging it. Barber has orchestrated with a light hand, without reducing the instrumental collaboration to a mere "accompaniment."

To all that has gone before, the third movement, a short "perpetual motion" that goes very fast, is complete antithesis. Here the solo violin skirls along upon unexpressive but lively and rhythmically fascinating figuration, and the orchestra takes on, suddenly, unaccustomed acidity. Where the music has been romantic to the point of idyllic in the first two movements, it develops unexpected wit and sophistication in the third.

Miss Posselt played with a tone of extraordinary loveliness and her usual fleet technic and sound musicianship. There were two conspicuous entrances where she seemed to be almost a little late, but what of it? She and Mr. Barber, who appeared upon the stage, were cordially applauded, together with Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

That the "Scythian Suite" is, after 28 years, a score of intense color, rhythmically compelling to the point of hypnotic power, and gloriously savage and imaginative, is a tribute to the genius of Serge Prokofieff. Music a good deal wilder than the "Scythian Suite" has been written since 1914, but this semi-programmatic work, evoking images of prehistoric tribes engaged in sensual pagan rites, has not lost any of its pristine vitality. Only a masterpiece lasts that well. None but a pedant will be concerned with the occasional echoes of Stravinsky, and a suggestion or two, in the fourth movement, of Strauss' orgiastic "Salome." The music otherwise is essentially Prokofieff. Mr. Koussevitzky drew from the Boston Symphony a performance whose power was irresistible.

Beethoven's A major symphony fared as well, though it was cloudy and a bit too fast and loud in the finale. Mr. Koussevitzky, back from his two weeks as guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, bowed to an orchestra and audience which rose spontaneously as he first entered the stage.

The orchestra goes to New York next week. At the concerts of March 20 and 21, the Sixth Symphony by Dimitri Shostakovitch will be heard for the first time in Boston. Yehudi Menuhin will be soloist in the Beethoven Violin Concerto.

C. W. D.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 18th [illegible] Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Ruth Posselt, violinist. The program was as follows:

Prokofieff,
Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli," Op. 20
Barber,
Concerto for violin and orchestra
Beethoven,
Symphony No. 7 in A major Op. 92

We have seldom felt sorrier for a composer than we did yesterday afternoon for Mr. Barber. His Violin Concerto hardly had a chance, for its pale and rather well-bred virtues followed immediately on Prokofieff's stupendous Scythian Suite, one of the most remarkable scores of the 20th century. The order of the program may have been inevitable, though why it could not have been literally reversed we cannot for the life of us see. At any rate the present order is disastrous for Mr. Barber, though he came out serenely enough onto the platform to acknowledge the applause with Miss Posselt. Nevertheless, our heart bled for him.

After this interlude of sympathy, however, we began to reflect that the Concerto is, after all, no masterpiece. Indeed, in view of the talent evident in Mr. Barber's other music, this Concerto is actually disappointing. The finale is technically brilliant and is by far the best of the three. There is some pleasant melodic invention in the first movement, and the andante proceeds rather in the manner of Elgar.

Now, if nobody had written successful violin concertos in recent years, Mr. Barber might deserve warm praise for his creation. But it is only necessary to think of the latest works in this field by Hindemith, Prokofieff, Walton and Piston, to name only four, to realize that Mr. Barber has not achieved a great deal. His Concerto is not an inept or pretentious composition, but also it is only moderately interesting. Miss Posselt played it with great skill and fine tone, tossing off the difficulties of the finale with gusto.

Prokofieff's Scythian Suite was written about the same time as Stravinsky's Sacre du Printemps, that is just before the last war, and is inspired by more or less the same external idea. Early as it was in Prokofieff's career the Scythian Suite shows the composer as a complete master of the orchestra and possessed of an artistic individuality of his own, which owed little or nothing to his contemporary.

Much as we hate to revive a sore topic we should like to call the attention of the admirers of Shostakovitch's 5th Symphony to the section of the Scythian Suite, called "Night." If the young Russian did not drink at that well for the inspiration of the best parts in the first movement of his [illegible], he is an original [illegible] are misguided and [illegible].

The Scythian Suite is a dazzling work, one of the greatest of the century. Prokofieff has written much since that is valuable, remarkable and often highly entertaining, but in a sense he never surpassed himself in this youthful work. Like most artists he has changed direction, and very likely the tumultuous beauty of the Scythian Suite no longer interests him. But the rest of us can afford to be more objective, more aloof, and revel in the glories of this music.

It would seem that a fortnight's guest conducting has done Mr. Koussevitzky good. His interpretations yesterday were astonishing even to his Boston public who know the intensity of his conducting and the capacity of the orchestra. Yet we were forcibly reminded of them yesterday. The Scythian Suite was a miracle of power and drive. Beethoven's 7th Symphony was recreated with magnificent clarity and dynamic energy.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra goes on tour. The program for March 20-21 will offer Shostakovitch's 6th Symphony and Beethoven's Violin Concerto, with Yehudi Menuhin.

Left: Ruth Posselt, violinist, sole[illegible] Saturday afternoon at Carnegie [illegible] ducting the New Friends of Musi[illegible]

Music

Further auditions for the orchestra and opera departments of the Berkshire Music Center will be held here from March 12 to 14. Richard Burgin and other faculty members will hear string players on Thursday, March 12, at 10 a. m. and wind players on Friday, March 13, at the same hour. Dr. Herbert Graf will hear candidates for the opera department on Saturday afternoon, March 14, at 5 o'clock in Steinway Hall. Applications should be addressed to Margaret Grant, Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall Boston, Mass.

CONDUCTOR'S EXPERIENCE IN TWO WARS

Gregor Fitelberg, Who Has Seen Europe In Agony

IN time of peace the deeds and the international concerns of Gregor Fitelberg, the conductor, carried him far. The war pursued him from country to country and finally brought him to America. In Warsaw he conducted the radio orchestra which he had developed from a small band to the celebrated symphonic organization which represented Poland at the International Exposition in Paris of 1937. He remained at that post until the Germans bombarded the city. His wife, walking in the street beside him, was killed by a bomb.

Arrested in Vienna

At Vienna he was arrested by the Gestapo but released after a week's imprisonment. At the Italian frontier he was refused admission until he was identified as the recipient from the Italian King of the order of Commandant of the Crown of Italy. But there were few places of refuge in Europe. In 1940 he conducted in The Hague. From there he went to France, where he conducted at Rennes in May, 1940, when the Germans again approached. He went from Portugal to Buenos Aires, conducting there for the sixth time for the season of 1940-41. He is now in New York City.

This was not Mr. Fitelberg's first experience of warfare nor has he failed to champion musical wars of his own, especially hot fights in favor of young composers and new music. But in 1914 Mr. Fitelberg's contract with the Vienna Opera was terminated on the outbreak of World War I. Between that year and 1918 he made guest appearances, at the invitation of Koussevitzky, in Moscow in 1920, and he succeeded Koussevitzky, on the latter's departure, as conductor of the former Imperial Orchestra.

It seems that at that time patriotism interfered as much with internationalism where music was concerned as it did in other countries than Russia. Nevertheless, Fitelberg was the first to conduct Wagner in Russia in 1916 and after the concert Miliukoff, who became prominent in Kerensky's cabinet, rushed upon the stage and embraced the conductor. At the time, Mr. Bellison, the present clarinetist of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, was in Fitelberg's orchestra.

"Oh," said Mr. Fitelberg, "these are incidents of wartime, and usually, if an appeal is made to be reasonable, concertgoers will respond. There were some who resented Wagner, but not the multitude. And I think the world has advanced in this respect since the last war. I certainly get this impression in America, where I observe that repertory, both in opera and in symphonic music, is international."

In Soviet Russia

In Russia after World War I, the members of the orchestra joined the army and played for several regiments, since from each regiment they received bread. Fitelberg discharged the handful of orchestra members, whose numbers had dwindled from 110 to 20, and gave performances of "Carmen" and "Faust", with four pianos in order that the singers and chorus should not starve. He then joined a regiment to get some bread himself. Two of the musicians he had discharged denounced him. He was arrested at a rehearsal and forced to conduct the regiment's band for a whole day without cessation!

Fitelberg took Misha Mischakoff and Piatigorsky with him from Russia to Warsaw, where they became first desk players for his radio orchestra. From 1921 to 1923 Fitelberg conducted for the Russian Ballet in London, Paris, Monte Carlo, Brussels, and in 1922 conducted the première of Stravinsky's little opera "Mavra." He conducted the Russian repertory of the Opéra Privé de Paris in that city and later in Cuba, Mexico, South America.

Worked for Moderns

Educated in music in a period that in our perspective seems conservative, Fitelberg has worked zealously with composers of the modern school. He served in different seasons on the jury of the International Society for Contemporary Music, and conducted several of their concerts. He has produced works of young composers of many nations, including such Americans as Roger Sessions, Aaron Copland, Frederick Jacobi, Louis Gruenberg. Among his principal activities have been those which promoted the interests of his late distinguished countryman, the composer Szymanowski.

"I find him," he said, "not only profoundly individual but national at the roots. I do not mean by this that Szymanowski was a proponent of folksong in its original forms. But the essential qualities of Polish folk music, sublimated, individualized, permeate Szymanowski's music. I do not refer only to such works as the brilliant 'Harasie' ballet, but the whole texture of his music. His death was enormously tragic for Polish music and for modern music in general, to which he had contributed so much."

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 8 - 1942

Boston Symphony Closes Woolsey Concert Series

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 musicians, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will make its second local appearance of the season in Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening. The concert will bring to a close the Woolsey Hall Series of 1941-42, and as a fitting climax to a brilliant musical season a notable program will be performed by what many consider the world's greatest orchestra.

A composition by Benjamin Britten, the young English composer, titled "Sinfonia da Requiem," will open the evening of fine music. The piece, written in memory of his parents, is in three movements: Lacrymosa, Dies Irae and Requiem Aeternam. The second number will be the Scythian Suite of Serge Prokofieff. This descriptive music takes for its subject the gods of a legendary barbaric race of the earliest Russians. Its movements are entitled: The Adoration of Veles and Ala, The Enemy God and the Dance of the Black Spirits, Night, The Glorious Departure of Lolli and the Procession of the Sun. The third and concluding work will be the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, which will make the seasons finale a particularly impressive one.

Contrary to the custom of many years, the 1942-43 schedule of the Woolsey Hall Series will not be announced at this concert. Plans are going forward towards this end, however, and a series equal to any in the past will be made known in the near future.

Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are always a vital center of musical performance, but conditions now surrounding them are far different than they were in its earliest days, when an orchestra of any sort was a rarity in this country, and a permanently established orchestra doing full justice to a symphony of Mozart or Beethoven was almost unknown. For a performance of the quality which great music exacts there was little alternative, but to turn to Boston, where an orchestra comparable to the best in Europe was nurtured and prized.

This lone kind of grandeur is no longer possible in the America of the present, where every city has its fine orchestra, where symphonic music is heard and known in every community. It falls to the Boston Symphony Orchestra more than ever before to set the ideal of transcendent performance for the richest heritage which the art of music has given us.

No effort has been made to attain this end. It is the general opinion wherever the orchestra plays that the 110 musicians of its personnel, individually or as a drilled ensemble, are scarcely to be matched in any city of the world.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
MAR 8 - 1942

Boston Symphony Will Play Here March 31

That great sauve-toned organization know as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has not been heard here for several years, will be brought to Constitution Hall for a concert on Tuesday night, March 31. Both the famous conductor, Sergei Koussevitzki, and his musicians are donating their services for this event, inasmuch as it will be a benefit for Russian Relief. C. C. Cappel is managing the concert and reservations can be made at his bureau in Ballard's 1340 G Street.

More than 2000 of the 3844 seats in the hall have already been reserved. The program has not yet been decided upon in detail, but it has been intimated that only Russian music will be played.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
MAR 8 - 1942

87

Doussevitzky Programs Two Modern Works for Bostonians

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will present its fourth concert of the season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Friday evening, March 13, at 8:30 o'clock.

The program will be devoted to two major works by the distinguished contemporary English and Russian composers, Benjamin Britten and Serge Prokofieff, and to Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony." Britten will be represented by his "Sinfonia da Requiem." It had its first performance with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony last March. Nineteen minutes in length, it is in three linked movements, called "Lacrymosa," "Dies Irae," and "Requiem Aeternam" and employs all the resources of a full modern orchestra.

The work is intended as an act of devotion to the memory of Britten's father and mother. The score was completed in Amityville, L. I., in the Spring of 1940. The Latin titles, indicating the mood and scheme of the work, derive from the Catholic Requiem Mass, though the relation of the Sinfonia to the Catholic ceremony, avowedly, is emotional rather than liturgical. Mr. Britten has remarked that though "short for a symphony," his composition was "conceived on festival proportions," and the scoring —for large orchestra, including triple woodwind, saxophone, six horns, piano, and a vast battery of percussion—bears him out.

The Scythian Suite "Ala and Lolli" of Prokofieff completes the first half of the program. The work is divided into four movements: "The Adoration of Vales and Ala," "The Enemy God and the Dance of the Black Spirits," "Night," and "The Glorious Departure of Lolli and the Procession of the Sun." The second half is devoted to the Beethoven "Seventh Symphony."

The Orchestral series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music is under the general auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Committee.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 10 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN WOOLSEY HALL TOMORROW NIGHT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 musicians, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will make its second New Haven appearance of the season tomorrow evening in Woolsey Hall. The concert will begin at 8:30 and mark the seventh and concluding event of one of the finest series in the long history of these presentations that annually highlight the cultural and social activities of this vicinity.

The program will open with the "Sinfonia da Requiem" of Benjamin Britten, the young English composer. This piece, written in memory of his parents, is in three movements: Lacrymosa, Dies Irae, and Requiem Aeternam.

The second number will be the Scythian Suits of Serge Prokofieff. This descriptive music takes for its subject the gods of a legendary barbaric race of the earliest Russians. Its movements are entitled: The Adoration of Veles and Ala, the Enemy God and the Dance of the Black Spirits, Night, the Glorious Departure of Lolli and the Procession of the Sun.

The second portion of the program will be given over to the great Seventh Symphony in A major by Beethoven. This famous work, one of the most popular of the master composer, should prove a fitting climax to a brilliant musical season.

Deviating from the plan of recent years, the 1942-43 Woolsey Hall Series will not be announced at this concert. Plans for next season's concerts are going rapidly forward, however, and announcements will be made in the near future.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
MAR 8 - 1942

Orchestra in All-Russian Program

Boston Symphony Returns Here After Extended Absence

That great musical group known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has not been heard in Washington for several years, will be brought to the National Capital for a single concert Tuesday, March 31, at Constitution Hall at 8:30 p.m. Both conductor, the famous Russian, Serge Koussevitzky, and his orchestra are donating their services for this event, which will be a benefit for Russian relief. At this time, too, local music lovers will have an opportunity to hear the much-discussed Soviet anthem—"The Internationale"—for Mr. Koussevitzky has said he will follow the traditional playing of our own "Star Spangled Banner" with the Russian air before opening the program proper.

Already so much keen interest has been shown in this extraordinary concert and its worthy cause that more than 2,000 of the 3,844 seats in the hall already have been reserved. The event is being managed locally by C. C. Cappell.

Mr. Koussevitzky has not announced the full program, but it has been intimated that it will be all-Russian. Certainly no country has a broader palette of many toned, colorful masterpieces for symphonic orchestra from which to make a program.

Many of Mr. Koussevitzky's ardent admirers do not realize that he was born in a tiny, central Russian province so small there was no music for him to hear in his boyhood, and so he ran away from home to Moscow, where he was given a scholarship to study the double bass as his solo instrument. The reason he chose this rather unusual and unwieldly instrument was because it was the only one for which a scholarship was available at the time he, a pennyless lad with obvious talent, applied to be taken into the conservatory.

Later he was to be so happily situated financially that he could organize his own orchestra and even charter a steamer to carry that orchestra the entire length of the Volga to give first symphony concerts in many other tiny provincial towns like the one in which he was born. It is thoroughly fitting that it is Koussevitzky who, although not originally sympathetic to the Soviet regime, should be making this generous gesture toward the practical relief of the people of his native land at this time.

This concert is having the sponsorship and patronage of social as well as musical leaders in Washington.

This Clipping From ALEXANDRIA, VA.
GAZETTE
MAR 10 1942

Koussevitzky Plans Concert For Russians

The announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is to present a single concert in Washington on Tuesday, March 31, has a special significance for Alexandria. Dr. Koussevitzky who leads the Berkshire Music Festival each summer in Massachusetts has long been interested in the work of the young Alexandria musician, Mr. Richard Horner Bales of West Maple Street.

Two years ago he chose "Dick" Bales as one of five young conductors in a national selection to study under him at the music center. The summer course was repeated and during his second period of study with the symphony director, Mr. Bales gave lectures at a teachers' college in Massachusetts.

When the famous Russian conductor brings the great suave-toned musical group to Washington for its first appearance in the capital in several years the concert will be a benefit for Russian relief. The program is scheduled at Constitution Hall at 8:30.

Music lovers will have an opportunity to hear the much discussed Soviet anthem, "The Internationale," as Mr. Koussevitzky plans to follow the "Star-Spangled Banner" with the Russian air before opening the program proper. For the all Russian program more than 2,000 of the 3,844 seats in the hall have been reserved and additional bookings are being made by the C. C. Cappel concert bureau in Washington.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
MAR 11 1942

Boston Orchestra Plays at Smith

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented its annual concert at Smith College in Northampton last night. Because of a cold, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was unable to conduct and Richard Burgin substituted. The program included Mozart's symphony in C major, Prokofieff's Scythian suite and symphony No. 1 by Sibelius. The orchestra plays in New York and Brooklyn over the week end.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
MAR 13 1942

Koussevitzky Grows Better and Better

In the good, lush days before the first World War had taught composers along with everyone else something about economy, Serge Prokofieff shot the works in the Scythian Suite Ala and Lolli. It called for no less than 16 wood-wind instruments, together with enough brasses to fit out a regimental band and more kinds of drums and other percussion than Paul Whiteman uses.

Just to make sure of his effects, Serge Koussevitzky last night doubled up on some of these instruments when he played the composition with the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall. It was stunning. The young Prokofieff knew just how to handle his big sounds so that they weren't noises, and Dr. Koussevitzky has developed to perfection the corresponding virtue as a conductor.

The concert opened with Mozart's Jupiter Symphony. It was a careful performance, remarkably clear in the wonderful closing fugue considering the numbers involved, but sagging in spirit earlier.

After the intermission came the Sibelius Fifth Symphony, its quiet, almost mystical opening developing slowly to the pulsing, triumphant finale.—HENRY SIMON.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 11 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT SMITH COLLEGE

Richard Burgin, Concert Master, Conducts in Absence, Because of Illness, of Dr Koussevitzky

By FRANCIS REGAL

Northampton, March 10—The Boston Symphony orchestra was heard tonight at the John M. Greene hall, at a concert in the Smith college course, under the baton of its concert master and assistant conductor, Richard Burgin, who took charge at short notice because of the illness of Dr Koussevitzky. The only change made, however, in the announced program was the substitution for the fifth symphony by Sibelius of the first symphony by the same composer.

The fine quality of Mr Burgin as a conductor was recently revealed to Springfield music lovers in a program at the Auditorium, with Emananuel Feuermann as assisting soloist, which may have been more to his taste than the one which happened to devolve upon him tonight. A violinist addicted to chamber music can hardly be expected to enjoy the noise that annoys an oyster, and the toughest of mollusks might have found some of the sound effects trying.

Jupiter Symphony

In the opening number Mozart's famous "Jupiter" symphony, the marvelous beauty of the tone, individual and collective, which distinguishes the Boston Symphony orchestra was heard in its full perfection, and the interpretation was noble and inspiring. But this genial and melodious music gave no preparation for the strident clangor of the Scythian suite "Ala and Zolli" by Prokofieff, an outrageously clever Russian composer whose career seems to be one long musical joke.

This time the joke consists in imagining what wild and savage music must have delighted the ancient Scythians who flourished in pagan times not far from the part of southern Russia where Prokofieff lived as a youth. This work was planned at the age of 22 as ballet music, but Diaghiler did not find the scenario feasible, and the music was given the form of an orchestral suite. It helped to give Prokofieff early fame, and is a brilliant flight of acoustic imagination, but despite Diaghilev it belongs to the ballet rather than the concert hall. It stood to the Mozart symphony much as machine-gun fire with incidental bombs stands to a violin. Good sport but not exactly indoor sport.

It was not easy, either, to follow it with another symphony, but probably the first by Sibelius served as well as any, for this beginning by the great Finnish symphonist is both bold and simple in the outlines, and owes its success less to the intricately contrived climaxes of emotion, which he has cultivated with such originality and power in his later works than to a crude vigor in some of the material, notably in the last two movements to which the orchestra tonight gave thrilling force. Nevertheless, it was a Koussevitzky program even though it once more showed the admirable skill of Mr Burgin as a conductor.

The attractions for next season's course were announced tonight and comprise Ethel Bartlett and Ray Robertson in a two-piano recital, the Rochestra Philharmonic orchestra, Elsie Houston, soprano, the Cleveland orchestra, Jascha Heifetz, violinist, and the Boston Symphony orchestra, which as always is the climax of the season.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
+Evening Union
MAR 11 1942

KOUSSEVITZKY ILL, BURGIN HAS BATON AT SMITH

Sibelius Work Presented in Last of Concerts in College Series

By Willard M. Clark

NORTHAMPTON, March 10—Because of illness, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was unable to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its concert tonight in John M. Greene Hall, the final concert of the series at Smith College. An exceptionally large audience was obviously disappointed when Prof. Solon B. Robinson of the Music Department made the announcement, but they greeted Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor, very cordially.

Change in Program

Mr. Burgin made a change in the program, substituting the first symphony of Sibelius for his fifth symphony. The program was made up of as red-blooded music as has been heard hereabouts for a long time. It opened with a vigorous performance of the Mozart "Jupiter" symphony, crashed through Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" and closed with a monumental performance of the first symphony of Sibelius.

For sheer tonal magnificence it would be difficult to exceed tonight's performance. Mr. Burgin has the confidence and respect of his colleagues and they gave him whatever he desired. The "Jupiter" was given a forthright, rather heavy-handed performance, although the andante was charmingly treated, providing one of the few moments of lightness during the evening. This G minor symphony closed Mozart's career as a symphonist, and, in many ways, it is the greatest of all his symphonies, a perfect blending of technical skill and utter simplicity.

Prokofieff wrote his "Scythian Suite" in 1914 but during the last quarter of a century his music has undergone many changes, most of them for the better. If this music is a true portrayal of the Scythians, they must have been a tough lot, for there is little else than vehement utterance throughout the four movements which tell the story of Ala and Lolli, pre-Christian figures of legendary Scythia.

Dance of Monsters

The first movement describes an invocation to the sun, followed by the sacrifice to Ala. The second movement portrays the Evil-God and dance of the pagan monsters, while the third movement, depicts the night with moon maidens consoling Ala. The final movement, quite the most impressive of the four, depicts Lolli's pursuit of the Evil-God and the sunrise. In the uneven battle between the Evil-God and Lolli, the latter would have perished, but the sun-god rises with the passing of night and smites the evil deity.

It is in such music that Prokofieff excels and he provides a highly imaginative and vital musical depiction of the legend. He uses dissonance to advantage, and explores the entire resources of the orchestra with exciting results.

Against the Prokofieff work, the first symphony of Jan Sibelius attains the dignity and wisdom of those peaks from which Sibelius has never descended. Here, indeed, is a work that beggars description, so mighty is its conception. Sibelius is not as sparing of his material in this symphony as he is in his second and subsequent symphonies yet he attains no more impressive results than in his seventh symphony. The Boston players have been the first to make known many of the Finnish composer's works and they played this first symphony with tremendous power and breadth, winning a well-deserved ovation.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
MAR 12 1942

Last Night's Concert

Richard Burgin Leads Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Woolsey hall last night under the leadership of the assistant conductor Mr. Richard Burgin, due to the illness of Mr. Koussevitzky. The hall was overflowing and Mr. Burgin quickly enraptured an enthusiastic audience.

In every concert of the Bostonians we are wont to expect an unusual program and a great performance. We were not disappointed. The Sinfonia da Requiem by Benjamin Britten is certainly an unusual composition. Especially the second movement is interesting in its rhythm and the last movement in it serene calm. It would not be fair to judge this work after one hearing but we feel that it is definitely worth further study.

Prokofielf's Scythian Suite is weird, even for this composer. It has all the qualities that make his works great — clear convincing themes, very marked rhythm and original counterpoint. But there is also the tendency toward screaming disharmonies.

We take this occasion to applaud Mr. Burgin for his mastery of two scores that appeared inordinately difficult. There is no better proof of whole-hearted musicianship than this ability and willingness to deal with unusual musical problems at a moment's notice.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony has been called the symphony of dance. Mr. Burgin's interpretation in justice to this title. In fact, we felt that more stress has been laid upon the rythmic features of this work than upon the thematic beauty of this score. However, it was a performance that compares well with the greatest.

The audience, though disappointed by the conductor's absence, was happy to meet Mr. Burgin and to be given the opportunity to get acquainted with an unusually gifted younger conductor.

Dr. Koussevitzky's Illness

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared in Woolsey Hall last evening it marked the second time in a little over a month that one of the country's major orchestras appeared in New Haven under the direction of the assistant conductor. Last night it was Richard Burgin who took the place of Serge Koussevitzky, while last month Saul Caston acted as substitute for Eugene Ormandy when the Philadelphia played.

Dr. Koussevitsky was stricken with a hard cold on Monday and was unable to conduct the Boston Symphony when it played at Smith College in Northampton, Mass., Tuesday night. He intended to come to New Haven yesterday but his condition was such in the afternoon that his physicians decided otherwise.

Last night's concert was the twenty-third that Mr. Burgin has directed the Bostonians this season. It is customary for him to conduct twelve concerts in Boston each season, but his work has been further extended this year with appearances in Providence, Cambridge and Brooklyn.

Mr. Burgin is both concert master and assistant conductor of the Bostonians. He has held those posts for the past twenty-two years, first seeing service when twenty-four years old under the then conductor Pierre Monteaux. His wife is the well known violinist Ruth Posselt, who will play here with the New Haven Symphony Orchestra next month.

No word was received by the Boston Symphony management up to late last night as to whether Dr. Koussevitsky will conduct the orchestra in Carnegie Hall, New York, this evening.

BOSTONIANS PLAY 'SCYTHIAN' SUITE

Jan — Jan 13

Prokofieff Work Is Given by Koussevitzky.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Though completed a year later than "Le Sacre du Printemps," Prokofieff's "Scythian" suite reached the American public some years ahead of the Stravinsky shocker. For a time it gave promise of becoming a reigning favorite with those who then were opening their hearts to new extremes of dissonance as an expression of the primitive and the barbaric. But when "Le Sacre" came along, with its much more frenetic bludgeonings, the outdone Scythians were all but crowded into limbo. Of the conductors of major orchestras on the Eastern seaboard only Serge Koussevitzky seems to have returned at intervals to performances of the suite. Last night he brought it back to Carnegie Hall in the first of the two concerts of the Boston Symphony's penultimate visit of the season.

If it indisputably had tamed with the passing of the two decades or so since it was introduced here, the Prokofieff work still had its fair share of really stirring moments in last night's performance. These were the more violent episodes—the highly acidulous opening, the dance of the pagan monsters, the piercing final pages with their stunning blare of trumpets above a hammer-and-tongs ecstasy of sound. Those quieter sections that might be likened to the "Pagan Night" of "Le Sacre" had in some way paled and become conventional. Still, it seems rather a pity that Diaghileff did not go ahead with the original plan for a ballet of "Ala and Lolli," for which this music was written. The suite might yet serve the stage well, even though it would be unlikely to achieve in the theater any such scintillant and technically flawless projections as made of it the most striking feature of this concert.

Otherwise, Dr. Koussevitzky led his players in a highly polished but kid-glove performance of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony and a full-bodied, warm, and yet routine one of the Sibelius Fifth. The orchestra was just its brilliantly accomplished self.

Koussevitzky And Bostonians In Concert Here

Program in Evening Series Offers Works by Mozart, Prokofieff and Sibelius

By Francis D. Perkins

Twelve days after his last appearance as guest leader of the Philharmonic-Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky returned to Carnegie Hall Thursday night in his more familiar office of regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and opened the fourth program of its New York evening series with Mozart's symphony in C major, No. 41 (K. 551), which is usually and more briefly known as the "Jupiter" symphony. The two other works on the well contrasted list, both composed in this century, were Serge Prokofieff's Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli," and Jean Sibelius's fifth symphony, which the Bostonians presented in an afternoon program last month.

Thursday's performance of the Prokofieff suite fell exactly on the fifth anniversary of the last previous New York presentation of this work, by the same orchestra under the same conductor, who introduced it to us on Nov. 29, 1924, and brought it forward again in 1928 and 1930. The Philadelphians played it at Carnegie Hall in 1926, and the Philharmonic-Symphony in 1929, but its local associations are mainly with the admirable orchestra and director who gave its tenth local hearing Thursday night.

Prokofieff was only twenty-three when he wrote the suite, but it includes some of the most striking and impressive pages which he has composed thus far; their pungency and vividness of dissonant color are as fresh now as they were seventeen seasons ago. The fierce, barbaric splendor of the opening invocation to the sun has no parallel which the reviewer can readily remember, and the closing depiction of the sunrise is also virtually in a class by itself for its projection of an imaginative mood as well as for its remarkable use of savorous harmonics and orchestral hues and timbres; its suggestion of waxing light as well as actual waxing sonority. In between these unforgettable episodes, however, there is some music which stands the test of time less successfully. In the invocation to Ala, the scene is effectively set, but little takes place on it, and interest also varies in the later sections; one can, here and there, detect influences made upon the then youthful Prokofieff by earlier Russian composers. There is one engaging foretaste of his later "Peter and the Wolf." The third movement shows an ability to suggest something persasively evil, an ability which was more strikingly illustrated by Prokofieff in his choral "Sept, ils sont sept," which Dr. Koussevitzky conducted here in 1927.

The performance was memorable in its execution and its expressive power, and fervent applause followed the superb proclamation of the closing chords.

The playing of the Mozart symphony was admirable for its spirit and proportion, although in the finale some of the woodwinds' contribution to the polyphonic structure of the movement was occasionally lost behind the outspoken strings. But in the general interpretation the hearer could particularly relish its combination of vigor and delicacy, its prevailing clarity and entire absence of weightiness, the zest and momentum of the two end movements. The andante had a leisurely, but not too deliberate pace in its delectably lyric performance; the minuet had an unhurried rhythmic swing.

Much, were it not for considerations of time and space, could also be said about the performance of the Sibelius symphony; of the remarkable range and richness of the orchestral color and the thorough lucidity of the playing, of the expressive communicativeness of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpertation. It was great playing by a great orchestra. The conductor preface the program with his usual broa and stately reading of "The Star Spangled Banner."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAR 13 1942

Koussevitsky Surveys 3 Musical Schools

Leads Boston Symphony in Mozart, Prokofieff, Sibelius

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Three schools, ideologies, if you like, of music were represented in the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall program last night. Serge Koussevitzky's canny selection practically surveyed the varieties, inasmuch as he put before a large audience the Mozart Jupiter Symphony, the Prokofieff Scythian Suite and the Sibelius Fifth Symphony.

The Mozart of the Jupiter, of course, is super Mozart. When a musical authority like Eric Blom calls this symphony "the most 'classical' of the final group of three that is the apotheosis of Mozart's symphonic writing," he isn't mincing words, you can be sure. Geniuses can even outdo themselves, as their Boswells and sundry admirers learn day after day.

The Boston players did fabulous things with this wonderful work, whose Jupiter pseudonym is as much a mystery as you'll find in the annals of musical nomenclature. It takes one thing to put its message across, granted a finely co-operating body of musicians, that thing is the true Mozartean spirit, which is practically everything.

* * *

A Deserved Ovation.

Mr. Koussevitzky was in that frame last night. He reeled off a whole galaxy of colors and expressions in a grand mosaic of artistic import. He chose to play the music "unadorned," following the lead with a warming faith. Deservedly he and his men received an ovation at the conclusion of the piece.

Prokofieff, at the age of 23, was a modernist composer who threatened to make the musical world his oyster. He hasn't done badly since. As a matter of fact, he didn't do badly at all with this Suite, written in 1914, which shows a rich and daring imagination and a feeling for orchestral effects second to no other composer's of the same years.

* * *

Foreshadowing Goodman.

The first movement of this composition is startling in its sonorities, which hang on to awkward harmonic intervals for dear life. The sonority is one thing, the harmonic intervals another, but Prokofieff, with a fine blending of the two, achieves a thoroughly exciting section. And the rhythms that come teeming through the second movement! There is one whole stretch of oddly accented phrases that foreshadow, ironically enough, the swingiest riffs of Benny Goodman himself, as if they needed foreshadowing!

The third and fourth movements don't make half the effect of the previous two, though they have a place in the contrasting nature of things.

Sibelius, in the Boston manner, needs no describing at this date. The Fifth Symphony breaks away from the urge to create descriptive music. Here the composer is most majestically abstract, technically speaking. In any case, the work was given a splendid performance.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
MAR 13 1942

BOSTONIANS PLAY 'SCYTHIAN' SUITE

Prokofieff Work Is Given by Koussevitzky.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Though completed a year later than "Le Sacre du Printemps," Prokofieff's "Scythian" suite reached the American public some years ahead of the Stravinsky shocker. For a time it gave promise of becoming a reigning favorite with those who then were opening their hearts to new extremes of dissonance as an expression of the primitive and the barbaric. But when "Le Sacre" came along, with its much more frenetic bludgeonings, the outdone Scythians were all but crowded into limbo. Of the conductors of major orchestras on the Eastern seaboard only Serge Koussevitzky seems to have returned at intervals to performances of the suite. Last night he brought it back to Carnegie Hall in the first of the two concerts of the Boston Symphony's penultimate visit of the season.

If it indisputably had tamed with the passing of the two decades or so since it was introduced here, the Prokofieff work still had its fair share of really stirring moments in last night's performance. These were the more violent episodes—the highly acidulous opening, the dance of the pagan monsters, the piercing final pages with their stunning blare of trumpets above a hammer-and-tongs ecstasy of sound. Those quieter sections that might be likened to the "Pagan Night" of "Le Sacre" had in some way paled and become conventional. Still, it seems rather a pity that Diaghileff did not go ahead with the original plan for a ballet of "Ala and Lolli," for which this music was written. The suite might yet serve the stage well, even though it would be unlikely to achieve in the theater any such scintillant and technically flawless projections as made of it the most striking feature of this concert.

Otherwise, Dr. Koussevitzky led his players in a highly polished but kid-glove performance of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony and a full-bodied, warm, and yet routine one of the Sibelius Fifth. The orchestra was just its brilliantly accomplished self.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 13 1942

Koussevitzky And Bostonians In Concert Here

Program in Evening Series Offers Works by Mozart, Prokofieff and Sibelius

By Francis D. Perkins

Twelve days after his last appearance as guest leader of the Philharmonic-Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky returned to Carnegie Hall last night in his more familiar office of regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and opened the fourth program of its New York evening series with Mozart's symphony in C major, No. 41 (K. 551), which is usually and more briefly known as the "Jupiter" symphony. The two other works on the well contrasted list, both composed in this century, were Serge Prokofieff's Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli," and Jean Sibelius's fifth symphony, which the Bostonians presented in an afternoon program last month.

Yesterday's performance of the Prokofieff suite fell exactly on the fifth anniversary of the last previous New York presentation of this work, by the same orchestra under the same conductor, who introduced it to us on Nov. 29, 1924, and brought it forward again in 1928 and 1930. The Philadelphians played it at Carnegie Hall in 1926, and the Philharmonic-Symphony in 1929, but its local associations are mainly with the admirable orchestra and director who gave it its tenth local hearing last night.

Prokofieff was only twenty-three when he wrote the suite, but it includes some of the most striking and impressive pages which he has composed thus far; their pungency and vividness of dissonant color are as fresh now as they were seventeen seasons ago. The fierce, barbaric splendor of the opening invocation to the sun has no parallel which the reviewer can readily remember, and the closing depiction of the sunrise is also virtually in a class by itself for its projection of an imaginative mood as well as for its remarkable use of savorous harmonics and orchestral hues and timbres; its suggestion of waxing light as well as actual waxing sonority. In between these unforgettable episodes, however, there is some music which stands the test of time less successfully. In the invocation to Ala, the scene is effectively set, but little takes place on it, and interest also varies in the later sections; one can, here and there, detect influences made upon the then youthful Prokofieff by earlier Russian composers. There is one engaging foretaste of his later "Peter and the Wolf." The third movement shows an ability to suggest something persasively evil, an ability which was more strikingly illustrated by Prokofieff in his choral "Sept, ils sont sept," which Dr. Koussevitzky conducted here in 1927.

The performance was memorable in its execution and its expressive power, and fervent applause followed the superb proclamation of the closing chords.

The playing of the Mozart symphony was admirable for its spirit and proportion, although in the finale some of the woodwinds' contribution to the polyphonic structure of the movement was occasionally lost behind the outspoken strings. But in the general interpretation the hearer could particularly relish its combination of vigor and delicacy, its prevailing clarity and entire absence of weightiness, the zest and momentum of the two end movements. The andante had a leisurely, but not too deliberate pace in its delectably lyric performance; the minuet had an unhurried rhythmic swing.

Much, were it not for considerations of time and space, could also be said about the performance of the Sibelius symphony; of the remarkable range and richness of the orchestral color and the thorough lucidity of the playing, of the expressive communicativeness of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpertation. It was great playing by a great orchestra. The conductor prefaced the program with his usual broad and stately reading of "The Star-Spangled Banner."

89

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
MAR 13 1942

Koussevitzky Plays Suite By Prokofieff

By GRENA BENNETT

An interesting program of contrasts was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening under the expert guidance of Serge Koussevitzky.

The list comprised Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, a representative example of the eighteenth century idiom; Prokofieff's Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli," illustrating the modern Russian school, and Sibelius' Fifth Symphony of Finland's contemporaneous style.

Much ink has been used in describing the incomparable performances by the Boston band according to Mr. Koussevitzky's deft handling and the reading of the Mozart work was one of those absorbing, well-balanced and tonally alluring presentations that bring the thrill of pleasure to the listeners.

Each phrase of the four movements was modelled with faultless outline; the rhythms of metronomic precision; the incorporation of nuance and gradations of tone were apt and appropriate, and all of the resources of a great organization were brought to bear in a presentation that left no artistic detail undone.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
MAR 13 1942

Boston Symphony In Carnegie Hall

By MILES KASTENDIECK

What made the greatest impression on the listener at the concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night was the clarity, the tonal sheen, and the finish of the playing. It served as a reminder that under Koussevitzky's direction there is no other orchestra that sounds as superb. But though this is an old story the re-telling never becomes hackneyed.

There were three works on the program, two of them probably designated as contemporary though fully a quarter century old. The concert began with Mozart's Symphony in C (K551), misnamed the "Jupiter." Its 18th century perfection was rudely contrasted by Prokofieff's 20th century conception of the Scythian Suite "Ala and Lolli." The final number was the Sibelius' Fifth Symphony. To say that each performance bore the Koussevitzky stamp would summarize the concert in a sentence.

Played more or less as a straightforward piece of music the Mozart lacked some of the gaiety and bouyancy inherent in the music, but the polished elegance of the interpretation set it off in striking fashion. It is unfortunate that Koussevitzky has to broaden his andantes to the point of their being adagios. But he has always been inclined toward deliberate pacing. Of the Prokofieff more extensive comment can be made after its performance at the Academy of Music tonight. As out and out pagan music it makes its point effectively. In spite of the amazing finale, the first moven out above th of the Sibe leaving the again of its universal ap

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
MAR 13 1942

3 MASTERS PLAYED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Conducted in Works of Prokofieff, Mozart and Sibelius

EVENING CALLED BRILLIANT

Russian's 'Scythian' Suite and Finn's Fifth Symphony Are Features of Concert

By OLIN DOWNES

With a single exception the performances given by Sergei Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall must be ranked among their most brilliant accomplishments of late seasons in this city. The exception was the reading of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony that opened the concert. It was singularly tame in the first three movements. The opening movement is surely lustier and more virile in its sweep than Dr. Koussevitzky chose to make it.

The interpreting of a slow movement by Mozart may be one of the profoundest problems that an artist has to solve. For this writer the movement did not have all its poignancy; it was too polite. The whole symphony was polite until the orchestra reached the finale, which glowed and soared like an eagle's flight into the sun. For that is what happens when the so-called —and misnamed—"fugue-finale" of the "Jupiter" symphony is played in such magnificent fashion.

Two Welcome Features

The other scores of the evening were Prokofieff's "Scythian" suite, which had not been heard here for a number of years, and Sibelius's familiar, justly popular Fifth symphony. If the interpretations had done no more than reveal to the full the versatility of the conductor's style and the tonal resources of the orchestra they would have been very significant. But we are speaking of the music itself, and the expression, so vivid, so intuitive, and characteristic of the innermost thought of each composer, with which it was projected.

Perhaps it is not so difficult to decipher Prokofieff's extremely effective suite, for the work does not equal in profundity or originality either the bite of its harmonic scheme or the astonishing precision and effectiveness of its virtuoso instrumentation. And this, too, is to be remembered: the "Scythian" suite, written by an outrageously clever and assured young man of 23, was composed the year after Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps" had made its sensation in Paris.

It is not easy to believe, in view of the conscious barbarisms of Prokofieff's piece, with its magnificent utilization of polytonality, and its special method of orchestration, that it was put down without Stravinsky's sensation in mind. This does not imply a necessarily unworthy motive. Beethoven wrote symphonies, doubtless with Haydn and Mozart in mind. The restless-minded and extremely receptive Prokofieff could hardly have failed to be impressed by the "Sacre" or to escape its influence.

A Gorgeous Effect

Only, whatever the inspiration or motive of the work, it remains a trick, precocious and exciting, but palpably a trick. It is no longer as astonishing as it was. We can see its inner works, watch it ticking. But in point of sheer sound it has superb pages. The conclusion, with the flashing tones of the trumpets and the red and gold of other tone-colors and dissonances which clash about it, is as sheerly gorgeous an effect as modern music knows. And how it was played!

Sibelius's Fifth symphony was composed in its first version the same year as the "Scythian" suite, and Sibelius's score received its final revision in 1916, which was the year of the first public performance of Prokofieff's music. But at that time Sibelius was 51, and Prokofieff 25. By the side of the style of the young and up-to-snuff Prokofieff, Sibelius is innocent, pastoral; and not only pastoral—bucolic. His harmony is by comparison orthodox, and his methods those of a great simplicity. Why is it, then, that Prokofieff's music has already aged and betrayed that secret, while the Sibelius work means, if anything, more to us than the day it was written?

The first answer is the bafflingly simple one that it is great music. The loftiness of its spirit, the originality and integrity of its expression are unmistakable. The ideas are neither those of the academy or of the self-conscious stylist seeking an effect. The manner of their organic development becomes always more impressive. The composer dwells in a glorious solitude of his own. What he creates from that fastness is independent of change of fashion or momentary public approval. Within the traditions of the classic symphony he achieves enduring beauty, singularly suggestive of the vibrations and sonorities of the natural world. It may be added that it would be hard to imagine his conception realized with more eloquence and power than Koussevitzky brought to the task.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

By John Briggs

When the collaboration of a famous composer, a famous conductor and a famous orchestra takes place in no less famous Carnegie Hall, it is a rash man who dares to cast the first stone without subjecting himself to a severe inward scrutiny to make sure that he is, musically speaking, without sin.

About the latter we cannot be positive; and it is with a great deal of diffidence that we venture the former; but the truth is, we found the "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart a not unmixed pleasure as played by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Bostonians last evening. We took our accustomed seat in Carnegie Hall and waited for the sign from the heavens that usually comes with well-played Mozart; but the symphony seemed earthbound.

By their andantes shall ye know conductors; and last night the andante was such a leaden-footed affair that one could only exclaim with whoever it is one exclaims with: "Would 'twere done!" It was not until the final allegro that the piece began to take on the true Mozartean sparkle — though even then there were moments when the orchestra might have been accused of a want of delicacy and refinement.

It is only fair to add that the audience as a whole, judging from the warm reception it accorded Dr. Koussevitzky, by no means shared this pessimistic opinion. Reluctantly we are forced to the conclusion that your reviewer is either a person of extraordinary discernment, or a monster of musical obtuseness —which latter, you are no doubt thinking, might well be the case.

We liked Dr. Koussevitzky much better in the Prokofieff Scythian Suite which followed, and which gave the Boston conductor an excellent opportunity to demonstrate his unique genius in what is called, for lack of a better term, creating a mood. The Mozart, for all its ravishing beauty, is rather impersonal stuff. The Prokofieff, on the other hand, calls for just that subjective approach, coupled with a sure command of dazzling orchestral color, in which Dr. Koussevitzky has few dangerous rivals.

The evening's music came to a close with the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius. Dr. Koussevitzky's affinity for Sibelius, and his skill at interpreting that master's works, are well known. He makes Sibelius, as the saying goes, "accessible." What is more, he makes Sibelius uncommonly good listening.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

By John Briggs

When the collaboration of a famous composer, a famous conductor and a famous orchestra takes place in no less famous Carnegie Hall, it is a rash man who dares to cast the first stone without subjecting himself to a severe inward scrutiny to make sure that he is, musically speaking, without sin.

About the latter we cannot be positive; and it is with a great deal of diffidence that we venture the former; but the truth is, we found the "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart a not unmixed pleasure as played by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Bostonians last evening. We took our accustomed seat in Carnegie Hall and waited for the sign from the heavens that usually comes with well-played Mozart; but the symphony seemed earthbound.

By their andantes shall ye know conductors; and last night the andante was such a leaden-footed affair that one could only exclaim with whoever it is one exclaims with: "Would 'twere done!" It was not until the final allegro that the piece began to take on the true Mozartean sparkle — though even then there were moments when the orchestra might have been accused of a want of delicacy and refinement.

It is only fair to add that the audience as a whole, judging from the warm reception it accorded Dr. Koussevitzky, by no means shared this pessimistic opinion. Reluctantly we are forced to the conclusion that your reviewer is either a person of extraordinary discernment, or a monster of musical obtuseness —which latter, you are no doubt thinking, might well be the case.

We liked Dr. Koussevitzky much better in the Prokofieff Scythian Suite which followed, and which gave the Boston conductor an excellent opportunity to demonstrate his unique genius in what is called, for lack of a better term, creating a mood. The Mozart, for all its ravishing beauty, is rather impersonal stuff. The Prokofieff, on the other hand, calls for just that subjective approach, coupled with a sure command of dazzling orchestral color, in which Dr. Koussevitzky has few dangerous rivals.

The evening's music came to a close with the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius. Dr. Koussevitzky's affinity for Sibelius, and his skill at interpreting that master's works, are well known. He makes Sibelius, as the saying goes, "accessible." What is more, he makes Sibelius uncommonly good listening.

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
MAR 14 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY APPEARS APRIL 1

Serge Koussevitzky to Lead During Performance in Rutgers Gym

Serge Koussevitzky, world-famous conductor, will appear in the Rutgers University gymnasium Wednesday evening, April 1, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert, which marks the eighth visit of Dr. Koussevitzky to Rutgers, will climax this season's concert series.

To American music lovers, Dr. Koussevitzky's position is unique. He has been acclaimed as the dean of American conductors, but his reputation was well founded before his debut in this country.

Born in Russa in 1874, his genius became apparent early in life. At the age of 11, he was conducting the orchestra in his native town. Encouraged by the early acclaim which greeted his work, he continued his studies in both Moscow and Berlin, and by the turn of the century was recognized as one of the greatest stimulating forces in Russian music.

In 1908, Dr. Koussevitzky became conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, following great successes in Paris and Barcelona. After that season, the maestro returned to Russia, but the revolution ended, for a time, the conductor's career.

He soon emerged in a state capacity, and in 1924, he left Russia for the United States to serve as conductor of the Boston Symphony, a position that he has held to this day.

Dr. Koussevitzky has received great honors in both Europe and Russia, and in 1924 was made a Knight in the French Legion of Honor. He received an honorary doctor's degree in music from Yale University in 1938, and has also been awarded honorary degrees from Harvard and Brown Universities, as well as an honorary doctorate in music from Rutgers in 1937.

The program for Dr. Koussevitzky's appearance has not been announced as yet. — E. J. F.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 14 1942

Koussevitzky And Bostonians In Concert Here

Program in Evening Series Offers Works by Mozart, Prokofieff and Sibelius

By Francis D. Perkins

Twelve days after his last appearance as guest leader of the Philharmonic-Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky returned to Carnegie Hall Thursday night in his more familiar office of regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and opened the fourth program of its New York evening series with Mozart's symphony in C major, No. 41 (K. 551), which is usually and more briefly known as the "Jupiter" symphony. The two other works on the well contrasted list, both composed in this century, were Serge Prokofieff's Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli," and Jean Sibelius's fifth symphony, which the Bostonians presented in an afternoon program last month.

Thursday's performance of the Prokofieff suite fell exactly on the fifth anniversary of the last previous New York presentation of this work, by the same orchestra under the same conductor, who introduced it to us on Nov. 29, 1924, and brought it forward again in 1928 and 1930. The Philadelphians played it at Carnegie Hall in 1926, and the Philharmonic-Symphony in 1929, but its local associations are mainly with the admirable orchestra and director who gave its tenth local hearing Thursday night.

Prokofieff was only twenty-three when he wrote the suite, but it includes some of the most striking and impressive pages which he has composed thus far; their pungency and vividness of dissonant color are as fresh now as they were seventeen seasons ago. The fierce, barbaric splendor of the opening invocation to the sun has no parallel which the reviewer can readily remember, and the closing depiction of the sunrise is also virtually in a class by itself for its projection of an imaginative mood as well as for its remarkable use of savorous harmonics and orchestral hues and timbres; its suggestion of waxing light as well as actual waxing sonority. In between these unforgettable episodes, however, there is some music which stands the test of time less successfully. In the invocation to Ala, the scene is effectively set, but little takes place on it, and interest also varies in the later sections; one can, here and there, detect influences made upon the then youthful Prokofieff by earlier Russian composers. There is one engaging foretaste of his later "Peter and the Wolf." The third movement shows an ability to suggest something persasively evil, an ability which was more strikingly illustrated by Prokofieff in his choral "Sept, ils sont sept," which Dr. Koussevitzky conducted here in 1927.

The performance was memorable in its execution and its expressive power, and fervent applause followed the superb proclamation of the closing chords.

The playing of the Mozart symphony was admirable for its spirit and proportion, although in the finale some of the woodwinds' contribution to the polyphonic structure of the movement was occasionally lost behind the outspoken strings. But in the general interpretation the hearer could particularly relish its combination of vigor and delicacy, its prevailing clarity and entire absence of weightiness, the zest and momentum of the two end movements. The andante had a leisurely, but not too deliberate pace in its delectably lyric performance; the minuet had an unhurried rhythmic swing.

Much, were it not for considerations of time and space, could also be said about the performance of the Sibelius symphony; of the remarkable range and richness of the orchestral color and the thorough lucidity of the playing, of the expressive communicativeness of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpertation. It was great playing by a great orchestra. The conductor prefaced the program with his usual broad and stately reading of "The Star-Spangled Banner."

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
MAR 14 1942

Koussevitzky Turns To Modern Works

Balances Contemporary Composers With Beethoven in Academy Concert

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Contemporary music served to show off the tonal splendor of the modern orchestra far more than Beethoven's Seventh Symphony at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night. While Dr. Koussevitzky's choice of Britten's Sinfonia da Requiem and Prokofieff's Scythian Suite "Ala and Lolli' may not have presented the best of these composers' works, the contrast between the new and the old made for a well-balanced program. It seems incongruous that there was once a time when a Beethoven symphony sounded ungrateful to the ear.

There was a good deal that was ungrateful about the Sinfonia da Requiem, a work intended by its composer as an act of devotion in memory of his parents. Not that there was no suggestion of that intention in the music, but it all sounded wholly objective and rather empty of any deeply felt emotion. The composer conveys the impression of weeping and wailing along with a certain amount of gnashing of teeth with little more than aural effect, unless it be that he is intent on depicting the ugliness of grief. He has written with apparent facility and a degree of cleverness in orchestrating, but the work lacks character, leaving the listener dissatisfied with what he has heard.

On the contrary the Scythian Suite had real substance to it. If one were ever a sun worshiper, this music would carry a wealth of meaning, for its picture of pagan custom and worship is set forth with barbaric splendor. It makes all manner of difference if the listener knows what this music is about before he hears it, otherwise the sheer savage aspect of dissonance may fall harshly on the ear. But knowing that the music at the beginning is an invocation to the sun and at the very end is a description of a sunrise, changes the whole concept. It is almost literal music, for one can see the rays of the sun, anticipating the dazzling brilliance as the sun makes its radiant way above the horizon. An understanding of all this brings meaning to an otherwise raucous torrent of sound. One matter of detail is worth noting—namely, that Prokofieff has used the repetition of similar sounds to a point of a monotony both fascinating and pleasant. The treatment serves to glorify the rhythmic basis on which the whole work is built, and in which its throbbing intensity realizes its own consummation.

Undoubtedly Koussevitzky did all in his power for the Britten work as he did for the Prokofieff. That meant fastidious attention to detail and full realization of dramatic content as is his want. Certainly no orchestra could have played them more conclusively, for the virtuosity of this ensemble is really without a peer.

To sit back and listen to the Beethoven was to indulge in simplicity, serenity and satisfaction. Some of the very qualities that made the performances of the other music notable, lessened some of the effectiveness of the first half of the symphony. However, orchestra and conductor responded in full measure in the finale, achieving the stirring intensity that the pulsating nature of this music makes eternally alive.

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD
MAR 15 1942

9

FUNCTIONAL FASHION

TRY WAVING YOUR ARMS FOR AN HOUR AND KEEPING YOUR SHIRT-TAILS IN! YOU'LL SEE WHY CONDUCTOR SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY WEARS THAT BOHEMIAN-LOOKING RUSSIAN BLOUSE WHEN HE'S REHEARSING THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 14 1942

Boston Symphony Heard at Academy In Fourth Concert

Beethoven's Seventh Hit of the Program—Koussevitzky Conducts

By PAUL J. BROWN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Kaussevitzky, gave its fourth concert of the season last night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Mr. Kossevitzky who was unable to be present to conduct the previous borough concert, presented a program that was stimulating and well-balanced. The concert was attended by a large audience, including many who stood and was rewarded by enthusiastic applause.

Benjamin Britten's Sinfonia da Requiem, which had its borough debut last night, was one of the Koussevitzky offerings. One must wonder how it could be described as derived from the Catholic Requiem Mass," but at the same time appreciate the fine conclusion to the English composer's work, a conclusion that partially compensated for the earlier parts. Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" from "Ala and Lolli" was replete with the brilliance of which the composer is capable and with the primitive music that fits the scene of mythological action.

However, the beautiful and familiar patterns that Beethoven composed in his Seventh Symphony were the greatness of the evening. The Seventh was excellently played and therefore invitably dwarfed the remainder of the program.

Contemporary Music Is Led by Koussevitzky

Boston Orchestra Performs Britten 'Sinfonia' and Barber Violin Concerto

By Jerome D. Bohn

Although Serge Koussevitzky devoted his program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to three "B's," only Beethoven, who was represented by his Seventh Symphony, was a member of the trio which usually also includes Bach and Brahms. However, flouting the conventions, Mr. Koussevitzky chose to perform music by living composers, and gave us the English Benjamin Britten's "Sinfonia da Requiem" and the American Samuel Barber's Violin Concerto, in which the solo part was set forth by Ruth Posselt. Neither work was new to New York audiences, but I had not heard them before.

In his "Sinfonia da Requiem" Mr. Britten again reveals himself as a remarkably gifted composer who, despite his relative youth, discloses considerable ideational originality. His most individual music is to be found in the "Lacrymosa" and "Dies Irae" movements, both which, the former with its plangent harmonics, the latter with its rhythmic intensity and arresting instrumentation, are definitely the products of a man with something to say. The final, "Requiem Aeternam," too, is sincerely felt, but it owes much to the Mahler of the Ninth Symphony and the song "Ich bin der Welt abhanden gekommen." The performance was a magnificent one and the augmented brasses which play so important a part in this composition exhibited extraordinary virtuosity.

Mr. Barber's Violin Concerto is considerably less impressive than his British confrere's creation. It is not only because of its eclecticism, its overexpansion of balladlike melodies of the Ethelbert Nevin type that it disappoints, but because of its hybrid style as well. The first two movements are frankly of lollipop sweetness; the finale bears little stylistic relation to what has gone before either from the melodic or harmonic aspects. The relative modernity of some of the harmonies in this closing "perpetua l motion" strike one as forced after the early nineteenth-century atmosphere of the remainder of the concerto. Miss Posselt played well, with vibrant tone and technical security, only an occasional slip in intonation marring the impressiveness of her interpretation. Mr. Koussevitzky provided an admirable accompaniment. Both Mr. Britten and Mr. Barber appeared on the platform to acknowledge the warm applause with whi their efforts were received.

The Seventh Symphony of Be thoven was unfolded with consis ently glowing tonal investiture, a Mr. Koussevitzky's conception w finely integrated and illuminatin

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
MAR 15 1942

NEW WORK IS GIVEN BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Britten's 'Sinfonia da Requiem,' Rejected by Japanese in 1940 as 'Too Christian,' Heard

By OLIN DOWNES

An amusing footnote in the Boston Symphony program book of the concert given by that organization yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, read to the effect that Benjamin Britten's "Sinfonia da Requiem," which Dr. Koussevitzky gave its opening performance, originally was commissioned from the composer, by the Japanese Government, through the British Council for Cultural Relations. This was "for the celebration of the 2,600th anniversary of the Japanese dynasty in 1940."

But Mr. Britten was informed a year ago last November "that the Japanese Government did not consider the work a suitable one for this particular festival, partly because of its Christian nature." What were they thinking of? Pearl Harbor?

In Memory of Parents

Mr. Burke, program annotator for Boston's orchestra, states that the "Sinfonia da Requiem" "was intended by its composer as an act of devotion to the memory of his father and mother." The Latin titles of the work are derived from the Catholic requiem mass, although "the relation of the Sinfonia to the Catholic ceremony, avowedly, is emotional rather than liturgical."

The work is in three movements, the first two closely connected. The last movement seems the most inspired of the three, through the lyrical nature of the ideas and its introspective conclusion.

It is due Mr. Britten to record the fact that the audience heartily approved his composition, rewarding it with clamorous and insistent applause until he appeared on the stage, first alone, then with Dr. Koussevitzky, after the performance.

Called Weak in Invention

We take care to state this, because for us it is very weak music, weak in invention, unconvincing in the expression of feeling, and strongly reminiscent, especially in the second part, of Stravinsky of the "Sacre"—that "Sacre" which has haunted more than one modern composer to his ruin.

The melodic and ingratiating character of Samuel Barber's invention is rapidly becoming known, and this quality showed to the best advantage yesterday in the slow movement of his violin concerto, which Ruth Posselt, who also played the work last Summer at the Berkshire Festival, is doing her utmost to introduce and make appreciated.

The preceding movement lacks any very definite physiognomy, although the music gets farther in certain pages of its development than it does in the actual exposition of the ideas. Of this concerto Miss Posselt gives a highly creditable performance. The concert ended with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 15 1942

92

Contemporary Music Is Led by Koussevitzky

Boston Orchestra Performs Britten 'Sinfonia' and Barber Violin Concerto

By Jerome D. Bohn

Although Serge Koussevitzky devoted his program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to three "B's," only Beethoven, who was represented by his Seventh Symphony, was a member of the trio which usually also includes Bach and Brahms. However, flouting the conventions, Mr. Koussevitzky chose to perform music by living composers, and gave us the English Benjamin Britten's "Sinfonia da Requiem" and the American Samuel Barber's Violin Concerto, in which the solo part was set forth by Ruth Posselt. Neither work was new to New York audiences, but I had not heard them before.

In his "Sinfonia da Requiem" Mr. Britten again reveals himself as a remarkably gifted composer who, despite his relative youth, discloses considerable ideational originality. His most individual music is to be found in the "Lacrymosa" and "Dies Irae" movements, both of which, the former with its plangent harmonics, the latter with its rhythmic intensity and arresting instrumentation, are definitely the products of a man with something to say. The final "Requiem Aeternam," too, is sincerely felt, but it owes much to the Mahler of the Ninth Symphony and the song "Ich bin der Welt abhanden gekommen." The performance was a magnificent one and the augmented brasses which play so important a part in this composition exhibited extraordinary virtuosity.

Mr. Barber's Violin Concerto is considerably less impressive than his British confrere's creation. It is not only because of its eclecticism, its over-expansion of ballad-like melodies of the Ethelbert Nevin type, that it disappoints, but because of its hybrid style as well. The first two movements are frankly of lollipop sweetness; the finale bears little stylistic relation to what has gone before either from the melodic or harmonic aspects. The relative modernity of some of the harmonies in this closing "perpetual motion" strike one as forced after the early nineteenth-century atmosphere of the remainder of the concerto. Miss Posselt played well, with vibrant tone and technical security, only an occasional slip in intonation marring the impressiveness of her interpretation. Mr. Koussevitzky provided an admirable accompaniment. Both Mr. Britten and Mr. Barber appeared on the platform to acknowledge the warm applause with which their efforts were received.

The Seventh Symphony of Beethoven was unfolded with consistently glowing tonal investiture, and Mr. Koussevitzky's conception was finely integrated and illuminating.

Workmanship Is Deft.

The workmanship is deft and fairly compact, and the 32-year-old composer musters his material with plausible power. Possibly Mr. Barber's style, a bit overreminiscent of past practice both here and in previous works, will deepen in original impact.

The point is, an American violin concerto shows every sign of holding its own in the repertory.

The crowd liked it, to judge by the results, and, what's more, it gave soloist and band repeated leeway for distilling expressive poetry. Mr. Barber writes affectionately for strings. Maybe the cantilena waxes over-lush in places, but it never winds along wearily in academic stodginess.

Mr. Britten's Sinfonia da Requiem, written as an act of devotion to the memory of his parents and emotionally rather than liturgically related to the Catholic ritual, confirmed earlier impressions of its blunt authentic power.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAR 16 1942

Bostonians Feature Beethoven

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

The Boston Symphony's shuffling of musical B's brought Beethoven into a programmatic huddle with the American Samuel Barber and the British Benjamin Britten at Saturday's matinee in Carnegie Hall. Bach and Brahms —the Bonn master's bosom pals —hovered about solely by implication.

Mr. Barber's Violin Concerto, premiered last season by the Philadelphia Orchestra, returned to New York for a second reading by Ruth Posselt. Britten's Sinfonia da Requiem, a Philharmonic novelty of last March and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony completed the list.

Violinists and public alike owe Serge Koussevitzky and Miss Posselt a vote of thanks for the rehearing of the Barber concerto.

* * *

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
MAR 16 1942

Posselt Plays Concerto.

There was something symbolic of Serge Koussevitzky's importance to the younger generation of composers in the appearance, successively, on the stage of Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, of Benjamin Britten and Samuel Barber. A work of each had just been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played, moreover, in a way that neither is likely to be duplicated soon. Considering the disparity in the styles of the two works, Mr. Koussevitzky's delineation of them won equal response from the large audience was further evidence of his greatness.

Whether one considers the grief in Britten's "Sinfonia da Requiem" sincere or shoddy, it is a remarkable piece of writing. The thematic material is meager and there is no significant elaboration of it in the symphonic sense, but Britten's sense of procedure is surety itself, his direction of each section to a definite climax masterful for a man of his years. Certainly the brilliantly variegated performance of Mr. Koussevitzky made a much more impressive thing of the score than it seemed when it was introduced here.

To this taste, the Barber concerto was absorbing principally for the superbly facile performance by Ruth Posselt. The work is splendidly conceived for the solo violin (excepting a little too much legato writing) and especially for a violinist with Miss Posselt's resources of luscious tone. Beauty there is in certain aspects of Barber's creative thought, for he has a feeling for melodic statement. But it is self-negating through lack of contrasting vigor in its determination to be contemplative even if the impulse is only one of will. The brisk finale is stylistically at variance with the two preceding ones, as if Barber had suddenly remembered the need to be "modern." The Beethoven seventh symphony completed the program.

I. K.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAR 20 1942

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN & CITIZEN-LEADER
MAR 20 1942

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Devens

BOSTON, March 20 (INS)—Armed with musical instruments, 66 members of the Boston symphony orchestra invade Fort Devens Sunday night under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler, conductor, for a concert, it was announced today.

Soloists are Jean Bedetti, 'cellist, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist.

NEW CONCERT AT SYMPHONY

Audience Cheers Premiere of Shostakovitch 6

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

One top-flight artist who does not come under the jurisdiction of the Musicians' Union is that violinistic exprodigy, Yehudi Menuhin. Accordingly, Mr. Menuhin is able to appear as soloist at this week's pair of Symphony Concerts. Since President Petrillo got on his high horse we have been contenting ourselves with second-string soloists, many of whom, nevertheless, have proved eminently worth hearing.

Besides offering such a stellar attraction as Mr. Menuhin, yesterday's concert was also eventful as the occasion of the local premiere of the Sixth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovitch. Since the Fifth Symphony of the Russian composer has become so popular hereabouts, comparisons between it and its successor are almost inevitable. In point of fact, they are quite different. Whereas No. 5 follows the conventional four-movement plan, No. 6 consists of only three, which might be described as a slow movement and two scherzos. This opening Largo is grave, brooding, at times almost profound, at times somewhat attenuated; and in this alternation of solidity and thinness of texture it reminds one of the finale of Mahler's Ninth. Unlike that movement, and unlike the slow movement of the Shostakovitch Fifth, it does not rise to an ecstatic climax.

The first of the two rapid movements is brilliant and entertaining, the second even more so. Yesterday it brought down the house. Stamping, whistling and even a bit of cheering accompanied the hearty and long-continued handclapping. Shostakovitch has "arrived" at Symphony Hall. We now eagerly await the recently-completed Seventh Symphony. And is it not time that we received the promised revival of the First?

The performance of Beethoven's Violin Concerto, which completed the programme, disclosed Mr. Menuhin in his best estate. His playing was poised, assured and sensitive. He seemed sensible of the music's greatness without being oppressed by it, as he might have been a few years ago. Fine as it was, however, this particular performance is not likely to become legendary, like that once given here by Mr. Kreisler when Dr. Muck was conductor.

MUSIC THRILLS DEVENS BOYS

Record Crowd Greets Hub Symphony Group

FORT DEVENS, March 22—Arthur Fiedler and 66 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra thrilled the largest audience ever assembled in threatre 6 tonight in a programme of standard and modern classics. "Standing room only" signs greeted scores of late comers, as high ranking army officers and formally gowned wives rubbed elbows with music loving buck privates.

Expenses for transporting the musicians and their equipment was borne by the orchestra itself, Mr. Fiedler said, although the programme was sponsored by the Boston soldiers' and sailors' committee.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Sixth Symphony by Dmitri Shostakovitch, it is happy to emphasize, is better than his Fifth. A work of skill and charm it received first performance in this city by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon. The only other piece on the program was the Beethoven Violin Concerto, in which Yehudi Menuhin was soloist.

The Shostakovitch Sixth is of unusual design. The largo, first of the three movements, must be longer than the scherzo-like allegro and the concluding presto rolled together. Where the slow movement is orchestrated sparingly, the full mass of Shostakovitch's instruments work feverishly in the two fast movements. Rhythm in the slow movement is almost negligible, in the other two it is an indispensable quality, especially in the last, which sounds like a wild dance with amusing little echoes of Offenbach and Rossini.

When you come right down to it, Shopstakovitch is still an eclectic composer, though over a period of years he has assimilated what he has selected. But it is true that his style, like the God Janus, faces two ways at once: toward the past of lush harmony and lavish orchestral color, toward contemporary rhythmic patterns and the use of more than one key at a time. In the opening long phrase for low strings, ending in a trill, you can find a touch of Hindemith; allegro and presto are probably indebted to Prokofieff.

The material of the largo is frankly rather thin. Over and over the instruments work a motive based on the intervals of minor and major thirds. There are solos in which individual, rather than mixed colors, are contrasted: piccolo against violins, a particularly lovely solo for English horn against subdued violas, and one for flute high above combined viclas and cellos. Shostakovitch's command of the orchestra has become prodigious.

One remarkable advance of the Sixth Symphony over the Fifth is the unity of mood in each of the movements. Another is the absence of any such banal march as you find in the Fifth, even though the last pages of the Sixth present just a suggestion of a triple-quick march.

The allegro, which sounds like a scherzo but is not so marked in the score, is a perfect gem of a movement, bright, witty, with a touch of grotesquerie. Trying to locate a comparison for the frenzied dance that is the third movement, one can think at the moment only of the "General Dance" in the second of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suites, and of the "Scythian Suite" by Prokofieff. There are differences, of course, but in all three are similar terrific din and orgiastic energy.

Yesterday's performance was of a tonal magnificence and a technical virtuosity to defy the written word. Mr. Koussevitzky had prepared it with great care, and the result showed in an astonishing performance. From the conservative Friday audience the Symphony got a cordial hand, as surprising as it was merited, including a couple of whistles from the balconies.

From out front, Yehudi Menuhin still looks like a youth. Boston has heard him so many times that it is a little hard to realize that he is now a young man of 25, and a mature artist. Not the maturity of middle-age, to be sure, but the confident mastery and the strength and poise of gifted young people.

Lyrical is the word for an overall description of the way he played the glorious Beethoven Concerto. Other violinists give it an occasional angularity or hard outline. For Mr. Menuhin the music is a long and graceful song, even to the bravura stunts of the cadenzas. These, by the way, were taken with utmost smoothness and accurate pitch. Mr. Menuhin's tone has become more lush, while retaining its extraordinary clearness and that quality to be found in the word luminous. He, too, was recalled to the stage numerous times.

The program for next week: Bach: Fourth Brandenburg Concerto; Debussy: "Iberia," from the "Images"; Brahms: First Symphony.

C. W. D.

1400 Soldiers Hear Boston Symphony Play at Fort Devens

FORT DEVENS, March 22—Arthur Fiedler conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Play House tonight before 1400 soldiers, the largest gathering ever assembled at the fort theatres.

Members of the celebrated orchestra, taking the entire expense of transportation and incidentals upon themselves, found an appreciative and responsive audience in the soldier group.

Soloist was Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist.

on Operatic Debut—Art Exhibitions—Stage News

Monitor March 26 '42

From the Shostakovitch Album

Assorted pictures of the composer whose Sixth Symphony will be repeated at the week-end symphony concerts. In the group (top center) Shostakovitch is at the upper left and his American solfeggio pupil of 1924, Raphael Hillyer, who is now a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra is at the lower right corner of the photograph.

Again the Shostakovitch Sixth

Monitor - March 27

By L. A. Sloper

Last season Dr. Koussevitzky gave Boston his interpretation of the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch, which had been introduced by Mr. Burgin in 1939. It was not generally much liked. So he played it again. In fact, he was reported as saying that he would play it until it was liked. He repeated it this season. By now he seems to have won over most of the opposition.

Last week he introduced the Sixth Symphony of the same composer. It had a big success. So this week he is playing it again. Perhaps the subscribers had decided that if they were going to hear Shostakovitch until they like him, they might as well like him in the first place. And perhaps the conductor has his eye on New York and Washington.

As it happened, yesterday's was my first hearing of the Shostakovitch Sixth. I had read a great deal about it, including the words of Mr. Stokowski quoted in the program book: "In his Fifth Symphony Shostakovitch has composed music in the usual sequence of a symphonic form, but in his Sixth Symphony he has become more individualistic. It is in three parts, instead of four, and the first part is the slow movement, the second the scherzo, the third is based on dance rhythms and later has themes inspired by the popular folklore of Russia."

The distinguished Philadelphia conductor here seems to imply an odd definition of individualism in music. If we are to take him at his word, the composer has proved his individualism by leaving out the first movement. Following up the argument, it would appear that if he had omitted also the second, third, and fourth movements, he would have achieved the acme of individualism, which is nihilism.

This does not seem very constructive, and I deplore the prospect. I find that a symphony without a first movement sounds truncated. In this instance the difficulty is aggravated by the length of the slow movement, which is excessive.

There have been symphonies in two, three, five, six, seven, and eight movements, but so far as I recall there has never been anything called a symphony that lacked an opening Allegro. That does not mean that there never can be such a symphony; but if there is, I think it will have to begin with something other than a protracted Largo.

It's really too bad that Shostakovitch left off that first movement, because here are many charming pages in the Largo, which would sound much better, I'm sure, if preceded by a vigorous opening section. The last two movements are lively and amusing, but the work as a whole is obviously ill balanced and in need of rebuilding.

It was a clever piece of program making to precede Shostakovitch with the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff, since the finale of the younger work patently owes so much to the earlier one. The Prokofieff, which had not been played at these concerts for four and a half years, was played with that amazing virtuosity which we take too much for granted with this orchestra.

The last number listed on the program was the First Symphony of Brahms. Here is an innovation, playing the Brahms First in March. As Mr. Sarnoff would ask, how in the world are we going to close the season?

Symphony Hall Exhibition

Through concert time of this week at Symphony Hall there will be on view an exhibition of work by a group of painters who are associated with the Stained Glass Studio of Charles Connick; Henryk Twardzik, Clare Twardzik, K. O. Svendsen, and Sigurd Svendsen.

The water colors of Clare Twardzik at their best sparkle in lively pattern. She paints thoughtfully and forcefully. Her husband, Henryk Twardzik, works in a wider range in oils, and embarks upon difficult compositions. When he paints people he employs certain sophisticated mannerisms in common currency; when he paints interiors he shows a zest for textures, and for the significance of calculated color indications. His most compelling undertaking is an expressionistic "portrait" of an old house in Rockport the modest bulk of which is disguised behind a mesh of pediments. K. O. Svendsen works in two styles, decorative and impressionistic. He seems to find his happiest stride in the former. Sigurd Svendsen shows some landscapes and views of boat landings. Noteworthy are "Belmont Hills" and "After the Storm." D. A.

6TH SYMPHONY REPEATED HERE

Shostakovitch Again Wins Audience

Post Mar 28

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There is much to be said for the immediate repetition of an important orchestral novelty or even of a novelty from the hand of a composer of importance. At yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, Dr. Koussevitzky gave such a reperformance of the Sixth Symphony of Shostakovitch, which had its local premiere here a week ago. As a matter of fact a second hearing of the work proved less profitable than a first and greatly strengthened the impression that the Soviet composer's Sixth is markedly inferior to his Fifth, which is plainly a contemporary masterpiece.

The best movement of the Sixth is the third, and last, an exciting if by no means an original production, and this makes much of its effect in its final moments. It is certain to prove irresistible with an audience, and it has now brought down the house twice in succession. The first movement is impressive in spots, but it is overlong, and much of the time seems to be getting nowhere. The middle movement makes no strong impression one way or the other, though after the languors of the first its liveliness is refreshing.

Yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky followed his pet programme scheme of three symphonies in a row. The first of these was the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff and the last the Brahms C minor. The apparent slightness of the "Classical" Symphony was for a time misleading. It now stands forth as one of the works of our time which is likely to prove imperishable. To it, as to the Shostakovitch, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave a superlatively fine performance. Yesterday's programme was altered four times and only the Brahms' First survived all the changes. We generally hear this annual visitant in the final concert of the season. Apparently Dr. Koussevitzky has something else up his sleeve for the ultimate big noise, possibly something Muscovite, since this is a predominantly Russian season.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

After twice changing his program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week, Serge Koussevitzky decided to change it again, and to repeat the Sixth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovitch. That he did, putting before the Shostakovitch, Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, and after it the First Symphony of Brahms.

Never before in the history of the orchestra, it is said, has a work newly introduced to the local public been repeated just a week later. Bearing in mind the admirable nature of the Shostakovitch Sixth and the warm reception following its first performance here, one still does not understand why it was desirable to let us hear it again so soon. To be sure, one heard no protests from the Friday subscribers, and again there was cordial applause. But the fact remains that new music is best repeated after a little more time has passed, to allow for esthetic digestion.

Mr. Koussevitzky lavished all his interpretive sorcery upon the Shostakovitch, and while yesterday's performance was not better than that of a week ago (after all, you can't improve upon anything superlative) it was indeed colorful and absorbing. About the work itself, nothing can be added, at the moment, that was not written last Saturday morning. Except one thing: the finale, boisterous and speedy, seems more satirical than at first, as if Shostakovitch were making a joke of one of his own march tunes.

The first movement of Prokofieff's adventures at putting 20th century music into an 18th century form was, unaccountably, rough and perfunctory, without that sophisticated sheen which Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony usually put into the "Classical" Symphony. As the performance went on, however, it improved, and the finale was first rate.

When, as rarely happens, a season goes by without Brahms' First Symphony at these concerts, one has a strange feeling of frustration and incompleteness. Now all can breathe easily; such will not happen this year. Yesterday the C minor Symphony seemed young and fresh again, majestic in its first movement and finale, the essence of lyrical romanticism in the andante and allegretto.

Mr. Koussevitzky is not one to conduct even the most familiar music carelessly. Anything that comes under his baton is subjected to the dramatizing powers of his imagination, no matter how standard an item of the standard repertory it may be. Yesterday, therefore, Brahms had a reading of cumulative intensity. Its peak was a fourth movement of utmost power and speed.

Next week the orchestra will go on their last tour of the season. On Tuesday they will give the much-heralded Russian War Relief benefit in Washington, D. C. For the Symphony Hall concerts of April 10 and 11, Mr. Koussevitzky has chosen this program: Stravinsky: ballet music, "Apollon Musagete," "Symphony of Psalms"; Villa-Lobos: Choros No. 10, "Rasga o coracao; Scriabin: "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire." The Cecilia Society chorus will assist in the three scores last-named, and the pianist for "Prometheus" will be Jesus Maria Sanroma.

C. W. D.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 20th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Classical Symphony Op. 25.....Prokofieff
Symphony No. 6.....Shostakovitch
Symphony No. 1 in C minor Op. 68.....Brahms

Were the 6th Symphony of Shostakovitch a less attractive work than it is, there might have been more grumbling in the audience at the unprecedented act of repeating it immediately after its first performance last week. Mr. Koussevitzky undoubtedly regards it as a highly important modern score, but he can be under no delusion that it is difficult to listen to or that it urgently needed another performance to clarify its virtues. The 6th Symphony is not a complex work and can readily be grasped at a first hearing.

Rather do we suspect that Mr. Koussevitzky wants to keep it on ice, as it were, and to have the orchestra in full fig for that exciting Russian concert in Washington next Tuesday. That is a harmless indulgence, and the public here can certainly put up with it. The finale is just as boisterous and jolly a run for the money as ever it was, and the orchestra's performance of it is nothing short of a miracle. The wit of the scherzo too remains fresh and invigorating.

The opening largo, however, grows somewhat less impressive with each hearing. It so happens that we have heard it four times within the last six weeks, twice at the concerts, once in rehearsal and once on the Philadelphia Orchestra's recorded version. That should be enough for anyone to make up his mind for the time being; and we can only say that the movement becomes spotty, that some of it is eloquent and moving musical speech, other parts of it are hardly more than padding. Shostakovitch must have had a reason for writing so long an opening largo; and it may be granted him that this is a much finer slow movement than that of the 5th Symphony. But we can only say that, whatever the reason is, it becomes more obscure and less reasonable on further acquaintance.

Mr. Koussevitzky began the concert—after his customary slow and stately interpretation of "The Star Spangled Banner"—with Prokofieff's entrancing Classical Symphony. It is a work that is both subtle in its imitation of Mozart and utterly delightful in its own right. At first the music seems merely the cleverest kind of pastiche, but eventually you come to see that Prokofieff has put much of himself into it as well. The second movement, for example, is more Russian than it is rococo. The Symphony had a sparkling performance and established the cordial mood that the audience appeared to feel throughout the concert.

By the way, in Mr. Koussevitzky's current enthusiasm for the works of Shostakovitch, we may be pardoned if we express hope that he does not forget that Prokofieff is still head and shoulders the greater composer. It is easy for anyone to be carried away by the brand new or the old. But the fine things of yesterday sometimes get unjustly shelved in the process. Prokofieff does not deserve such a fate, especially at the hands of Shostakovitch.

The Brahms First Symphony had a surpassingly eloquent performance yesterday under Mr. Koussevitzky. At least that was the somewhat vague impression we received, for we must admit to not having listened to it very acutely. When you have heard a work as often as that it is either the small things that you concentrate on or other things only remotely connected with the music. We have no intention of passing on to you our thoughts during the Symphony, though that occasionally does duty for criticism. It is sufficient that, like everyone else, we revelled in it, though not, perhaps, in the most intelligent fashion.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra is out of town. At the concerts of April 10 and 11, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the following program: Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" and Symphony of Psalms; Villa-Lobos's Choros No. 10; Scriabin's "Prometheus, A Poem of Fire." No changes in that list have as yet been announced.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
(New Jersey Sect.)
MAR 29 1942

RUTGERS CONCERTS TO END WEDNESDAY

Boston Symphony to Be Heard in Last Program of the School's 26th Series

OPERETTA AT MILLBURN

Church Group to Offer Gilbert and Sullivan Work—Forts to Hear Singers

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 28—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will conclude the twenty-sixth annual Rutgers University concert series here on Wednesday night with a concert in the Rutgers gymnasium. The program will mark the eighth consecutive year that the orchestra has appeared in this city.

Highlighting the concert, which will include works by Mozart and Tchaikovsky, will be the Symphony No. 6 composed by the young Russian contemporary Shostakovich only a year ago. The Mozart work will be Symphony in C major, while Tchaikovsky will be represented by the overture-fantasia "Romeo and Juliet."

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
MAR 29 1942

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its season's final program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Friday evening.

Boston Symphony Comes April 7

Three symphonies, Prokofieff's "Classical;" Shostakovitch's Sixth (first time here), and Brahms's First, will provide the fifth and final Providence program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tuesday night, April 7, in the Metropolitan Theatre. Following two concerts here under guest conductors, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will return to lead his men.

Shostakovitch has witten seven symphonies but the script of the Sixth is the last one to reach this country from Russia. The symphony was played first in America in Philadelphia in November, 1940. The Boston Symphony introduced it to Boston as recently as March 20 and repeated it twice last week. This is the first time in the orchestra's 61 years that a new symphony has been repeated within a week. The Boston critics liked it, giving the new work a different reception than they accorded the Fifth.

Koussevitzky, a great admirer of the Fifth, vowed he would keep on playing it until they shared his admiration. He played it twice more at scattered intervals, gaining one reformed critic but leaving the others battered but unwilling to surrender. In the case of the Sixth Koussevitzky had them from the start so, in appreciation, he gave it some more, too.

Shostakovitch is said to have reached new depths in his Sixth, especially in the first part. "Here," as the description goes, "are harmonic sequences, and several melodies sounding at the same time, making modern counterpoint, which are of great originality and intensity of expression. At the first hearing they sound strange and even obscure, as if the meaning was concealed and hidden. But after hearing this music three or four times it suddenly becomes clear and has great depth of expression."

Providence Sunday Journal
March 29/42

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
(B'klyn, Queens Sect.)
MAR 29 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY FRIDAY

Koussevitzky to Direct Its Last Brooklyn Concert of This Season

PUBLIC PICKS OPERA LIST

Salmaggi Will Give Audience Its Own Choices at the Academy Next Week

Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday night in the Academy of Music in its final concert of the Brooklyn season. The program will include compositions by Mozart, Tchaikovsky and Brahms. The series of concerts is under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
MAR 29 1942

Position of Glière

To the Music Editor:

IN a letter to THE TIMES recently, Paul Henry Láng may have closed one "controversy," but he has definitely opened another. Referring to Reinhold Glière, whose "Marche Héroïque" was performed by the New York Philharmonic under Eugene Goossens, Mr. Láng stated that the work in question was "a salon piece by an amateur (Glière)."

I should like to point out to Mr. Láng that this "amateur" was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory in 1900. His teachers were Hrimaly, Arensky, Conus, Tanieff, and Ippolitoff-Ivanoff. From 1905 to 1907, Glière studied conducting with Oscar Fried in Berlin. It was here, in 1907, that his Second Symphony, dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky, was performed for the first time.

In 1914 this "amateur" was invited by the Czarist government of Russia to become director of the Kiev Conservatory, where he remained until 1920. Then the Soviet Government invited him to the Moscow Conservatory as professor of composition. Among Glière's pupils are Prokofieff, Miaskovsky, Khatchaturian, Mossoloff, and others.

For his valuable work in musical research he has been decorated many times by the Soviet Government. Since 1939 he has been president of the Composers' Association of the U.S.S.R.

His writings comprise 74 works, among which are three symphonies, six symphonic tone poems, three ballets, two operas, seven chamber music works for quartet, sextet and octet; six dramatic scores, two cinema scores, 140 songs, a harp concerto, etc.

Is it possible that outstanding conductors like Stokowski, Mengelberg, Koussevitzky and others would be interested in performing works by an "amateur"? What is it that prompts Mr. Láng to make such a preposterous assertion?

JACOB TONN.

New York, March 23, 1942.

Boston Symphony In Final Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzy, will present its last concert of the season at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, April 3, at 8:30. Dr. Koussevitzy announces the following program:

Symphony in C major, "Jupiter" (K. 551) ——— Mozart
Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikovsky
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68, Brahms

The series by the Boston Symphon Orchestra at the Academy of Music is under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn Committe.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

MAR 31 1942

Shostakovich In Moscow For Rehearsals

(By Wireless to Inter-Continent News)

MOSCOW, March 30. — The Stalin prize winner Shostakovich has arrived in Moscow to attend the rehearsal of his new symphony. After the rehearsal, Shostakovich gave an interview to representatives of the press.

"My latest composition is the 7th symphony," he said. "I began to write it at the end of July and finished December 27th. It was first performed in Kuibyshev on March on March 5.

"Our country, our entire people have been waging the most just war ever known to the world. We are fighting for a bright future for mankind, for the loftiest ideals of humanity.

"Indeed, the muses cannot be silent in these stern days! On the contrary, art must help the Red Army and the Soviet people in the fight against the fascist invaders. Frankly speaking, I did not think that the 7th Symphony, which is a difficult piece and requires a big orchestra — would be performed in wartime. Nevertheless with unprecedented enthusiasm, the splendid orchestra of the Moscow Bolshoi theatre, which is now in Kuibyshev, was able to render it in record time. Scores of the symphony are being sent to Novosibirsk, Frunze, Tashkent, Sverdlovsky, and other cities. In Novosibirsk it will be performed by the Orchestra of the Leningrad Philharmonic Society. Scores have also been sent to the United States and England. I was informed that immediately upon receipt of the scores outstanding conductors in America — Toscanini, Koussevitzky and others, expect to begin work on it.

"On March 29th, the 7th Symphony will be performed in the Hall of Columns in the House of the Trade Unions of Moscow by the combined orchestra of the bolshoi Theatre and the All Union Radio Committee.

"In the immediate future I expect to write songs, setting to music the satirical verse by Marshak."

This Clipping From VIRGINIA, MINN.
ENTERPRISE

MAR 31 1942

RIGHT IN THE GROOVE

Two Negro soldiers were discussing the relative merits of their company buglers.

Said one, "Fellah, when dat boy of ouahs plays pay call, it sounds 'zactly like de Boston Symphony playin' de Rosary."

The second colored boy snorted. "Brothah, you ain't got no bugler a-tall. When Snowball Jones wraps his lips aroun' dat bugle of his, an plays mess call, I look down at mah beans, an' I sez; 'Strawberries, behave! You is kickin' de whipped cream out of de plate'."

REDS' SONG PLAYED IN G. A. R. HALL

Hub Symphony Takes Part in Relief for Russia

Post April

BY RUTH COWAN

WASHINGTON, March 31 (AP) —A strange, almost unbelievable event, a bit hard on ghosts, took place tonight on the banks of the Potomac.

SELL-OUT AUDIENCE

The Internationale, the Soviet national anthem, was played in Constitution Hall, which is owned by the Daughters of the American Revolution, who many times have denounced the Communist philosophy the rallying song commemorates.

The occasion was the Boston Symphony concert for the benefit of the Russian war relief. The event was not sponsored by the D. A. R., which merely made its hall available. The list of patrons was headed by the President and Mrs. Roosevelt, the Vice-President and Mrs. Wallace.

There were important names and important wealth in the sell-out audience that came to hear Serge Koussevitzky conduct the 115-piece orchestra in a programme all-Russian with but one exception—The Star Spangled Banner.

The American national anthem opened the concert, and standing to hear were Mrs. Roosevelt and a party from the White House.

The diplomatic colony turned out. In the audience—the hall seats 3844—were names top-notch in society and politics. Koussevitzky, now an American citizen but born a Russian, and the orchestra members contributed their performance. Some box tickets brought from $50 to $100.

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

APR 2 - 1942

Shostakovitch Sixth Symphony Presented by Boston Orchestra

Rutgers Concertgoers Enjoy Soviet Composer's Work Under Baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

By MARY PURNELL

Yesterday was April Fool's Day and appropriately enough, the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its eighth appearance at Rutgers University gymnasium, played a trick on the audience. The orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, presented the recently composed Sixth Symphony No. 6 Op. 53 of the young Soviet composer Dmitri Shostakovitch, and the 3,300 concertgoers, known to squirm, fidget and cough in the presence of works composed later than 1912, took to the new composition admirably and enjoyed it, a tribute to Shostakovitch, the conductor and the orchestra. The symphony, first performed in Russia in 1939, was introduced in the United States in 1940 and received its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston less than two weeks ago.

Fairly short, the symphony is in three movements. Perhaps not as immediately appealing as the distinguished Fifth Symphony of the same composer, it nevertheless possesses an engaging zest and sparkle.

Shostakovitch WorkPresented By Bostonians

April 3 1942

Koussevitzky Leads Group in Offering Brahms and Prokofieff Symphonies

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last concert of this season's New York evening series yesterday in a fully populated Carnegie Hall. Serge Koussevitzky, who had conducted Prokofieff's Classical Symphony and Dmitri Shostakovitch's sixth symphony in Tuesday's Russian War Relief benefit concert in Washington, offered both works before the intermission, and closed the program with the first symphony of Brahms.

This was the first time that the latest but one of Shostakovitch's symphonies had been played here by this orchestra, but it has had three previous New York performances within the last seventeen months, by the Philadelphia Orchestra and NBC Symphony, under Leopold Stokowski, and the National Orchestral Association, under Leon Barzin. Dr. Koussevitzky, who will repeat it here tomorrow afternoon, undoubtedly thinks well of it, and the performance, in its vividness of color and mood, expressive intentness and vitality, was remarkably persuasive, and left the reviewer, who had heard it before, feeling that he would like to hear it again.

It is an effective score, and one which poses no problem for its hearers. The first movement, with its prevailing broad, soaring main theme, has considerable impressiveness as well as solemnity, although, in the latter part its course, there are some measures where the music marks time. The short second movement is usually light and buoyant, but sometimes turns to a sardonic vein; the third equally short, has much color and an infectious rhythmic vigor, and the closing tune (which reminded one hearer of a popular Victor Herbert number) can be readily whistled. Meanwhile, it is reported, Shostakovitch's seventh symphony is on the way here.

The twenty-five-year-old Prokofieff work, already played here this season by the Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Orchestra, needs no comment on its own account; it is a pleasant tour de force and very handy as a curtain raiser. It was well played, and yet performed as a work which the orchestra was conscious of having performed several times before; it gave a sense of admirable routine, but not of freshness. The case was very different with the fervent interpretation of the Shostakovitch work, and also with the performance of the Brahms symphony. Here one might not be in accord with every detail of the Koussevitzky reading—feeling, for instance, that the speed with which the conductor took the first theme of the main body of the finale lost for it some of its breadth and dignity. There were a few other unorthodox points here and there, but such matters remained in the background of the general impression of expressive conviction and exceptional vitality brought by the performance as a whole. The closing measures had a memorable resplendence, and were followed by correspondingly ardent applause.

Russian Music Featured by Bostonians

April 3

By GRENA BENNETT

Russian music dominated last evening's program presented by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall. The Russian works consisted of Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony and Shostakovich's Symphony No. 6, and Conductor Serge Koussevitzky evidently aiming to maintain the same horizon in his list, ended the program with Brahm's First Symphony.

In considering the Prokofieff work some music-lovers have gone far afield in their admiration while others insist upon discovering the fly in the ointment, affirming that it mocks its "classic" claim. Yet its delicate charm, the grace and beauty of its melodies; the frank humor that is incorporated into many of its pages have outranked in popularity all of that composer's previous achievements.

Even the most satiated of concert patrons confess without restriction that the "Classical" Symphony retains all of its refreshing appeal at each repetition and if the enthusiasm of last night's audience is evidence, that number was without doubt one of the most enjoyable of the concert.

This was not due entirely to the enchanting score and its excellent craftsmanship but also to the polished brisk and scintillating interpretation by the Boston Band.

Although of vast contrast to the Prokofieff number the Shostakovich Symphony brought a diverting reaction to the auditors.

Its polyphonic arrangement of melodies and the individuality that marks the harmonizations and rhythms are in themselves evocative of interest.

It is a difficult work to elucidate but seemed an easy conquest for last evening's performers.

The music of Brahms' C minor Symphony has seldom sounded so eloquent or has been disclosed in so glowing and masterly a manner.

The import of the superb pages was revealed as a rare blend of romanticism and reflective beauty invested with impetuous drive and emotional appeal.

The hall was completely filled and the generous applause that followed each number was a deserved tribute to the conductor and to the instrumentalists.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

APR 3 - 1942

Koussevitzky Plays New Russian Work

The combination of Koussevitzky and Shostakovitch, music lover's delight and headline writer's nightmare, was the attraction in Carnegie Hall last evening, where the Boston Symphony paid its last visit but one of the current season.

Although last night's was not its first American or even first local hearing, the Shostakovitch Sixth Symphony is still new enough to be mildly controversial. Last evening it was for this observer quite good listening, well-constructed and with admirable contrast between the grave, contemplative opening, the allegro, a bit of musical roguishness in the best Shostakovitch manner, and the carnival atmosphere of the finale. It seemed transparent as to orchestration and abounding in good tunes.

At intermission three bystanders, presumably all musically literate, gathered for a post mortem. The man who had heard the Shostakovitch three times liked it least; No. 2 found his original good opinion weakened at a second hearing; and this reporter, who was catching the work for the first time, was most enthusiastic. So whether the above opinion is confirmed at future hearings is for Time to decide.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra contributed a performance of the Shostakovitch that presented the work in the most favorable light imaginable. Also heard were the "Classical" symphony of Prokofieff and Brahms' First Symphony.

J. B.

Koussevitzky Plays Shostakovitch 6th

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Shostakovitch's Sixth Symphony was the real spice in Koussevitzky's program with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night. The other two items were standard fare for both conductor and orchestra: Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony and the Brahms' First. To report that all went according to Bostonian routine is almost sufficient comment on the proceedings of the evening.

There is no denying the individuality of Shostakovitch's latest work: unorthodox in form, personalized in orchestration, and unique for the moment in effect. It is spell-making rather than spell-binding music. At no time does the composer lose the listener's attention nor his interest, in spite of the fact that the first movement is a Largo as long as the other two movements of the work combined.

From the outset, when the theme is stated in unison, interest quickens. Then as the other instruments come in and the music falls into a style that is unmistakably Shostakovitch, the listener realizes how the composer has matured and that he is writing music of significance. After several hearings this work holds up well, while the variety of solos which occur in the first two movements continue to exert a certain fascination. It might be said that Shostakovitch goes "Russian" completely in the final movement which runs rampant in a folk-lore atmosphere.

JUDY KANE is being held over at the Tic Toc Club for sixth week.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
APR 3 - 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN VARIED PROGRAM

The Koussevitzky Orchestra Stirs Enthusiasm of Packed House in Brahms Work

SHOSTAKOVICH IS FEATURE

Elegance Seen in Playing of the 'Classic' Composition of Prokofieff

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, returned to Carnegie Hall last night and played its very best. This means almost the acme of virtuosity and of tonal luster in performance. It also means that Dr. Koussevitzky was addressing himself with every intuition and artistic energy he possesses to the unfoldment of the music. And finally, it means that the music chosen by him for the occasion was of a sort to display to the utmost advantage the qualities of his distinguished band.

Added to this we have the fact that Dr. Koussevitzky can be such an able advocate of a score that the brilliancy of his performance bestows a deceptive value upon the music. And this, for the present writer, was the case last night.

The concert started with the Prokofieff "Classic" symphony. Of course, that is an old, yet not unamusing story. One is always impressed with the slickness of this score; no one denies or resists the polish and elegance of the Boston Symphony performance. We listen to an uncommonly good show; we are duly diverted as the composer and his accomplice, a past master of the virtuoso conductor's art, pull the rabbits out of the hat.

But the feature of the occasion upon which most stress was laid was the Sixth symphony of Dmitri Shostakovich, which Leopold Stokowski performed in this city on Dec. 3, 1940, and which has had hearings in the concert hall and by radio since. It is evident that Dr. Koussevitzky believes strongly in this score. This is shown by the communicative ardor of his interpretation, and also by the fact that he will repeat the Sixth symphony at his final New York concert of the season tomorrow afternoon. Nor is Dr. Koussevitzky alone in his admiration. Mr. Stokowski, whose description of the work is printed in the Boston Symphony program book, is equally certain about it, and the audience applauded vigorously when it had ended last night.

Was this applause for the performance or the work? Or was the audience favorably disposed in advance, on account of the interest of the Fifth Symphony by the same composer, which has gained wide approval and acclaim? For us, the Sixth Symphony is beyond doubt a much weaker creation.

It is shorter, yes, and more condensed, at least in its ostensible proportions. The first movement is a kind of combined allegro and slow movement in one, and here there are certain interesting ideas, unusually and not always impressively handled. The preliminary statements in this movement, the original coloring of the later pages are the most arresting passages. The scherzo movement impressed us as being unoriginal and repetitious of the same thing, better done, in Shostakovich's previous symphony. The finale of the Sixth is nimble, lively in rather trivial ways. It ends brilliantly. It shows off the orchestra. The symphony affects us, as a whole, as a patchy, uneven and prevailingly theatrical score—its confident craftsmanship, its shadow and glitter notwithstanding. We have here an extremely talented composer who has yet to find himself.

The concert came to an end with the epical First Symphony of Johannes Brahms, an enduring masterpiece. The hall was packed and enthusiasm ran high.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
APR 3 - 1942

A Session of Boston Virtuosity

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky at its head, went into a full-length session of virtuosity in Carnegie Hall last night.

Virtuosos usually go in singles, but there's no other word in musical parlance to cover the Bostonians' electrically charged playing last night. The orchestra was one undivided virtuoso.

When it comes to smartly groomed personality, Mr. Koussevitzky's unit is the glamour band of symphonic ensembles.

The three listed symphonies—Prokofieff's Classical, Shostakovitch's Sixth and Brahms' First—unrolled in regal sequence, one better than the other, with Mr. Koussevitzky firmly at the controls in all three sharply contrasted styles.

The orchestra tiptoed nimbly through Prokofieff's "old-style" brevity, romped brightly all over Shostakovitch's picnic grounds and went arm-in-arm with Johannes Brahms exploring the broad vistas of noonday classicism.

* * *

The Prokofieff.

The miniature symphony is old Prokofieff in two ways, dating back in composition to 1916 and in form to a revived Haydn-Mozart elegance. Of course nobody regards it as a poor counterfeit. No imitation was intended.

Prokofieff merely let his slick young fancy flit agilely through outmoded patterns.

He makes no apology, adopting a take-it-or-leave-it attitude, instead. Some melodic ideas struck him which fitted best in classic molds. The wine is his, the bottle Mozart's. Of course, it smacks classical and modern by turns, though in the end the sauciness is all Prokofieff's.

Mr. Koussevitzky brought out every detail with silk-glove punctilio. Orchestral diction was polished to finicky finesse. The tiny, 13-minute symphony rippled crisply along in a matchless reading reflecting glory on personnel and conductor both.

* * *

A Rollicking Clip.

The Shostakovitch Sixth brought on a demonstration, and no wonder! The Presto finale is unique in symphonic annals for carnival-like exhilaration. Mr. Koussevitzky took it at a rollicking clip, with the orchestral choirs lustily poking fun at each other and Shostakovitch's gargantuan guffaws rocking the hall.

Compared with the broad-sweeping epic Fifth, Shostakovitch's Sixth is in frank holiday vein, despite the grave mood of the opening Largo. Whether the fun is satire or pure comedy is Shostakovitch's secret. The tieup with the gargoylish gibes of the Golden Age Ballet seems clear in spots.

A genius for the unexpected rips through the last two movements. Shostakovitch pipes a solemn theme and then chides it imitatively from all quarters. A cumulative zest sets the orchestra quivering to high-pitch. In places the music even goes unabashedly rowdy. But so does life at times.

Mr. Koussevitzky's zeal in putting the symphony over was clear as day. No amount of intellectual force would have done it without real fervor. The performance really caught most of the audience off its guard. The serious opening Largo gives no hint of the fun to come. The applause was really terrific.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 3 - 1942

Shostakovitch WorkPresented By Bostonians

Koussevitzky Leads Group in Offering Brahms and Prokofieff Symphonies

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last concert of this season's New York evening series yesterday in a fully populated Carnegie Hall. Serge Koussevitzky, who had conducted Prokofieff's Classical Symphony and Dmitri Shostakovitch's sixth symphony in Tuesday's Russian War Relief benefit concert in Washington, offered both works before the intermission, and closed the program with the first symphony of Brahms.

This was the first time that the latest but one of Shostakovitch's symphonies had been played here by this orchestra, but it has had three previous New York performances within the last seventeen months, by the Philadelphia Orchestra and NBC Symphony, under Leopold Stokowski, and the National Orchestral Association, under Leon Barzin. Dr. Koussevitzky, who will repeat it here tomorrow afternoon, undoubtedly thinks well of it, and the performance, in its vividness of color and mood, expressive intentness and vitality, was remarkably persuasive, and left the reviewer, who had heard it before, feeling that he would like to hear it again.

It is an effective score, and one which poses no problem for its hearers. The first movement, with its prevailing broad, soaring main theme, has considerable impressiveness as well as solemnity, although, in the latter part its course, there are some measures where the music marks time. The short second movement is usually light and buoyant, but sometimes turns to a sardonic vein; the third equally short, has much color and an infectious rhythmic vigor, and the closing tune (which reminded one hearer of a popular Victor Herbert number) can be readily whistled. Meanwhile, it is reported, Shostakovitch's seventh symphony is on the way here.

The twenty-five-year-old Prokofieff work, already played here this season by the Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Orchestra, needs no comment on its own account; it is a pleasant tour de force and very handy as a curtain raiser. It was well played, and yet performed as a work which the orchestra was conscious of having performed several times before; it gave a sense of admirable routine, but not of freshness. The case was very different with the fervent interpretation of the Shostakovitch work, and also with the performance of the Brahms symphony. Here one might not be in accord with every detail of the Koussevitzkyesque reading—feeling, for instance, that the speed with which the conductor took the first theme of the main body of the finale lost for it some of its breadth and dignity. There were a few other unorthodox points here and there, but such matters remained in the background of the general impression of expressive conviction and exceptional vitality brought by the performance as a whole. The closing measures had a memorable resplendence, and were followed by correspondingly ardent applause.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
APR 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Here This Evening

The final program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, this season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music takes place this evening. The program will be devoted to Mozart's Symphony in C major the "Jupiter," Overture Fantasia of "Romeo and Juliet" by Tchaikovsky, and Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C minor.

The series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
APR 3 - 1942

BOSTONIANS PLAY THREE SYMPHONIES

Prokofieff, Shostakovich and Brahms Given.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Three symphonies, two of them by living composers, were brilliantly set forth by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony at the last of the visitors' evening concerts of the season, given before a packed house in Carnegie Hall last night. In the order of their performance they were the "Classical" of Serge Prokofieff, the Sixth of Dmitri Shostakovich and the First of Johannes Brahms. Of these the last was of particular importance in righting the perspective, and this because of its immeasurable superiority as music, and not (as there might be a tendency in some quarters to maintain) because the composer has been a long time dead.

Perhaps no one plays the music of either Prokofieff or Shostakovich as Dr. Koussevitzky plays it, whatever the lingering differences of opinions there may be about his Brahms. Never has the "Classical" Symphony flashed its bright little message of nothing at all more scintillantly than it did last night. Its many rehearings long since tended to strip its title of meaning, save as it was designed to point up a neat and distinctive bit of workmanship, something in the spirit of a cartoon. It is not "classical" and it barely qualifies as a symphony. But it invites playing of just the virtuoso flip that the Bostonians know so well how to impart to it.

If the Shostakovich Sixth—first performed here by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra on December 3, 1940—begins by taking itself much more seriously, it ends on a note scarcely more earnest—and certainly much less fastidious—than the Prokofieff opus. The long opening largo (which consumes more time than the entire "Classical" Symphony) has moments of genuine emotional tension. The broad, long-breathed theme at the outset is a very promising one and thereafter are passages of soaring lyricism, seasoned with sharp-edged dissonance, that take on something of glassy ecstasy. The close of this movement again has a rapturous sheen. But intervening is much that is static and remote, when, to repeat what was said about this work at its New York premiere, there is less heart than piccolo.

The two succeeding movements—allegro and presto—are almost devoid of material worth the pother of elaboration into a symphonic structure. But so slick a technician is Shostakovich that he contrives to make them thoroughly alive and even interesting for the sake of his circus orchestration. Though probably not so intended, it was good program making to bring on the profoundly human Brahms C minor as a corrective. Enthusiasm ran high as conductor and orchestra took their bows.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
APR 3 - 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN VARIED PROGRAM

The Koussevitzky Orchestra Stirs Enthusiasm of Packed House in Brahms Work

SHOSTAKOVICH IS FEATURE

Elegance Seen in Playing of the 'Classic' Composition of Prokofieff

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, returned to Carnegie Hall last night and played its very best. This means almost the acme of virtuosity and of tonal luster in performance. It also means that Dr. Koussevitzky was addressing himself with every intuition and artistic energy he possesses to the unfoldment of the music. And finally, it means that the music chosen by him for the occasion was of a sort to display to the utmost advantage the qualities of his distinguished band.

Added to this we have the fact that Dr. Koussevitzky can be such an able advocate of a score that the brilliancy of his performance bestows a deceptive value upon the music. And this, for the present writer, was the case last night.

The concert started with the Prokofieff "Classic" symphony. Of course, that is an old, yet not unamusing story. One is always impressed with the slickness of this score; no one denies or resists the polish and elegance of the Boston Symphony performance. We listen to an uncommonly good show; we are duly diverted as the composer and his accomplice, a past master of the virtuoso conductor's art, pull the rabbits out of the hat.

But the feature of the occasion upon which most stress was laid was the Sixth symphony of Dmitri Shostakovich, which Leopold Stokowski performed in this city on Dec. 3, 1940, and which has had hearings in the concert hall and by radio since. It is evident that Dr. Koussevitzky believes strongly in this score. This is shown by the communicative ardor of his interpretation, and also by the fact that he will repeat the Sixth symphony at his final New York concert of the season tomorrow afternoon. Nor is Dr. Koussevitzky alone in his admiration. Mr. Stokowski, whose description of the work is printed in the Boston Symphony program book, is equally certain about it, and the audience applauded vigorously when it had ended last night.

Was this applause for the performance or the work? Or was the audience favorably disposed in advance, on account of the interest of the Fifth Symphony by the same composer, which has gained wide approval and acclaim? For us, the Sixth Symphony is beyond doubt a much weaker creation.

It is shorter, yes, and more condensed, at least in its ostensible proportions. The first movement is a kind of combined allegro and slow movement in one, and here there are certain interesting ideas, unusually and not always impressively handled. The preliminary statements in this movement, the original coloring of the later pages are the most arresting passages. The scherzo movement impressed us as being unoriginal and repetitious of the same thing, better done, in Shostakovich's previous symphony. The finale of the Sixth is nimble, lively in rather trivial ways. It ends brilliantly. It shows off the orchestra. The symphony affects us, as a whole, as a patchy, uneven and prevailingly theatrical score—its confident craftsmanship, its shadow and glitter notwithstanding. We have here an extremely talented composer who has yet to find himself.

The concert came to an end with the epical First Symphony of Johannes Brahms, an enduring masterpiece. The hall was packed and enthusiasm ran high.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
APR 3 - 1942

A Session of Boston Virtuosity

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky at its head, went into a full-length session of virtuosity in Carnegie Hall last night.

Virtuosos usually go in singles, but there's no other word in musical parlance to cover the Bostonians' electrically charged playing last night. The orchestra was one undivided virtuoso.

When it comes to smartly groomed personality, Mr. Koussevitzky's unit is the glamour band of symphonic ensembles.

The three listed symphonies—Prokofieff's Classical, Shostakovitch's Sixth and Brahms' First—unrolled in regal sequence, one better than the other, with Mr. Koussevitzky firmly at the controls in all three sharply contrasted styles.

The orchestra tiptoed nimbly through Prokofieff's "old-style" brevity, romped brightly all over Shostakovitch's picnic grounds and went arm-in-arm with Johannes Brahms exploring the broad vistas of noonday classicism.

* * *

The Prokofieff.

The miniature symphony is old Prokofieff in two ways, dating back in composition to 1916 and in form to a revived Haydn-Mozart elegance. Of course nobody regards it as a poor counterfeit. No imitation was intended.

Prokofieff merely let his slick young fancy flit agilely through outmoded patterns.

He makes no apology, adopting a take-it-or-leave-it attitude, instead. Some melodic ideas struck him which fitted best in classic molds. The wine is his, the bottle Mozart's. Of course, it smacks classical and modern by turns, though in the end the sauciness is all Prokofieff's.

Mr. Koussevitzky brought out every detail with silk-glove punctilio. Orchestral diction was polished to finicky finesse. The tiny, 13-minute symphony rippled crisply along in a matchless reading reflecting glory on personnel and conductor both.

* * *

A Rollicking Clip.

The Shostakovitch Sixth brought on a demonstration, and no wonder! The Presto finale is unique in symphonic annals for carnival-like exhilaration. Mr. Koussevitzky took it at a rollicking clip, with the orchestral choirs lustily poking fun at each other and Shostakovitch's gargantuan guffaws rocking the hall.

Compared with the broad-sweeping epic Fifth, Shostakovitch's Sixth is in frank holiday vein, despite the grave mood of the opening Largo. Whether the fun is satire or pure comedy is Shostakovitch's secret. The tieup with the gargoylish gibes of the Golden Age Ballet seems clear in spots.

A genius for the unexpected rips through the last two movements. Shostakovitch pipes a solemn theme and then chides it imitatively from all quarters. A cumulative zest sets the orchestra quivering to high-pitch. In places the music even goes unabashedly rowdy. But so does life at times.

Mr. Koussevitzky's zeal in putting the symphony over was clear as day. No amount of intellectual force would have done it without real fervor. The performance really caught most of the audience off its guard. The serious opening Largo gives no hint of the fun to come. The applause was really terrific.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 3 - 1942

Shostakovitch Work Presented By Bostonians

Koussevitzky Leads Group in Offering Brahms and Prokofieff Symphonies

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last concert of this season's New York evening series yesterday in a fully populated Carnegie Hall. Serge Koussevitzky, who had conducted Prokofieff's Classical Symphony and Dmitri Shostakovitch's sixth symphony in Tuesday's Russian War Relief benefit concert in Washington, offered both works before the intermission, and closed the program with the first symphony of Brahms.

This was the first time that the latest but one of Shostakovitch's symphonies had been played here by this orchestra, but it has had three previous New York performances within the last seventeen months, by the Philadelphia Orchestra and NBC Symphony, under Leopold Stokowski, and the National Orchestral Association, under Leon Barzin. Dr. Koussevitzky, who will repeat it here tomorrow afternoon, undoubtedly thinks well of it, and the performance, in its vividness of color and mood, expressive intentness and vitality, was remarkably persuasive, and left the reviewer, who had heard it before, feeling that he would like to hear it again.

It is an effective score, and one which poses no problem for its hearers. The first movement, with its prevailing broad, soaring main theme, has considerable impressiveness as well as solemnity, although, in the latter part its course, there are some measures where the music marks time. The short second movement is usually light and buoyant, but sometimes turns to a sardonic vein; the third equally short, has much color and an infectious rhythmic vigor, and the closing tune (which reminded one hearer of a popular Victor Herbert number) can be readily whistled. Meanwhile, it is reported, Shostakovitch's seventh symphony is on the way here.

The twenty-five-year-old Prokofieff work, already played here this season by the Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Orchestra, needs no comment on its own account; it is a pleasant tour de force and very handy as a curtain raiser. It was well played, and yet performed as a work which the orchestra was conscious of having performed several times before; it gave a sense of admirable routine, but not of freshness. The case was very different with the fervent interpretation of the Shostakovitch work, and also with the performance of the Brahms symphony. Here one might not be in accord with every detail of the Koussevitzkyesque reading—feeling, for instance, that the speed with which the conductor took the first theme of the main body of the finale lost for it some of its breadth and dignity. There were a few other unorthodox points here and there, but such matters remained in the background of the general impression of expressive conviction and exceptional vitality brought by the performance as a whole. The closing measures had a memorable resplendence, and were followed by correspondingly ardent applause.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
APR 3 - 1942

BOSTONIANS PLAY THREE SYMPHONIES

Prokofieff, Shostakovich and Brahms Given.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Three symphonies, two of them by living composers, were brilliantly set forth by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony at the last of the visitors' evening concerts of the season, given before a packed house in Carnegie Hall last night. In the order of their performance they were the "Classical" of Serge Prokofieff, the Sixth of Dmitri Shostakovich and the First of Johannes Brahms. Of these the last was of particular importance in righting the perspective, and this because of its immeasurable superiority as music, and not (as there might be a tendency in some quarters to maintain) because the composer has been a long time dead.

Perhaps no one plays the music of either Prokofieff or Shostakovich as Dr. Koussevitzky plays it, whatever the lingering differences of opinions there may be about his Brahms. Never has the "Classical" Symphony flashed its bright little message of nothing at all more scintillantly than it did last night. Its many rehearings long since tended to strip its title of meaning, save as it was designed to point up a neat and distinctive bit of workmanship, something in the spirit of a cartoon. It is not "classical" and it barely qualifies as a symphony. But it invites playing of just the virtuoso flip that the Bostonians know so well how to impart to it.

If the Shostakovich Sixth—first performed here by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra on December 3, 1940—begins by taking itself much more seriously, it ends on a note scarcely more earnest—and certainly much less fastidious—than the Prokofieff opus. The long opening largo (which consumes more time than the entire "Classical" Symphony) has moments of genuine emotional tension. The broad, long-breathed theme at the outset is a very promising one and thereafter are passages of soaring lyricism, seasoned with sharp-edged dissonance, that take on something of glassy ecstasy. The close of this movement again has a rapturous sheen. But intervening is much that is static and remote, when, to repeat what was said about this work at its New York premiere, there is less heart than piccolo.

The two succeeding movements—allegro and presto—are almost devoid of material worth the pother of elaboration into a symphonic structure. But so slick a technician is Shostakovich that he contrives to make them thoroughly alive and even interesting for the sake of his circus orchestration. Though probably not so intended, it was good program making to bring on the profoundly human Brahms C minor as a corrective. Enthusiasm ran high as conductor and orchestra took their bows.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
APR 3 - 1942

Boston Symphony Here This Evening

The final program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, this season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music takes place this evening. The program will be devoted to Mozart's Symphony in C major the "Jupiter," Overture Fantasia of "Romeo and Juliet" by Tchaikovsky, and Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C minor.

The series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
APR 3 - 1942

Dmitri Speaks To the Cabots

"I think an artist should serve the greatest possible number of people. I always try to make myself as widely understood as possible, and if I don't succeed I consider it's my own fault."

So said Dmitri Shostakovich to Ralph Parker a couple of years ago. Last night when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony played his Sixth Symphony at Carnegie Hall, the audience seemed to agree that this time he had succeeded. Possibly the composer had Soviet Russians in mind when he said "the greatest possible number of people," but the aristocratically informal Boston subscribers took the work to heart just as enthusiastically as the aristocratically formal Philadelphians had done last Winter when Leopold Stokowski introduced the work here—before we were an official ally of Russia.

The appeal of the second and third movements is obvious—good strong rhythms, stunning orchestration, and whistlable tunes, some of them pretty folksy. The first movement is less easy to like. It is more serious music, its themes shorter and more earnest, its orchestration less glittery. It is as long as the other two movements put together and last night seemed twice as long.

This was my third hearing of the work. Its lack of balance between parts and even the parts themselves seem to me to make the symphony less satisfying that it sounded on first hearing. Less satisfying, too, than either the composer's first or fifth symphonies. These earlier ones appear to have won for themselves a pretty secure place in U. S. symphonic reportoire. Whether the Sixth will, still remains to be seen.

The concert opened with a fine, clean performance of the elegant Classical Symphony by Prokofieff—a juxtaposition that made the older Soviet composer's influence on the younger fairly apparent, especially in the last movement of the Shostakovich.

It closed with the Koussevitzky version of the Brahms First, a rousing, well integated reading even when it takes some drastic liberties with Brahms's own tempo indications in the score.

It was the last Thursday night Boston Symphony concert of the year—a sign that the season is waning.—H. S.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
APR 4 - 1942

BROOKLYN CONCERT BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Many Members of Society Are Guests in Boxes at the Academy of Music

Brooklyn society was represented at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's final concert of the season in the Broooklyn Academy of Music last night. In Box 1 Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay entertained for Mr. and Mrs. Burt Foss Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Greenwood, Mrs. Edward Fuller, Mrs. Seymour K. Fuller and Mr. and Mrs. George Czarnikow.

Guests of Mrs. Dean C. Osborne in Box 2 included Mr. and Mrs. Donald G. C. Sinclair, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Fawcett, Mrs. James M. Fawcett, Justice Lewis L. Fawcett and Mrs. Theodore Frohne.

Mr. and Mrs. James G. McDonald, Walter Golde, Miss Irene Golden, Charles R. Brewer and Edwin Hughes were in Box 3 as guests of Mrs. Benjamin Prince.

In the Brooklyn Woman's Club box were Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Oscar W. Swift, Mrs. T. S. Vossler, Dr. and Mrs. George H. Iler and Mrs. Oliver G. Carter. Mrs. William B. Parker, Miss Rosalie Parker, Mr. and Mrs. Harold C. Amos and Miss Emma Jessie Ogg were in the Adelphi Academy Alumnae box.

Mrs. Thomas W. Lauderdale was hostess in Box 6 to Mr. and Mrs. George W. Felter, Mr. and Mrs. Otto E. Reimer and Mr. and Mrs. Thomas H. Roulston. Rear Admiral E. J. Marquart and his party occupied the Army and Navy box.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
APR 4 - 1942

Bostonians Complete Brooklyn Concerts

Koussevitzky Conducts Time-Honored Music in Final Academy Program

By MILES KASTENDIECK

As something of an antidote to his previous program, Koussevitzky presented only time-honored music at the final concert of the Boston Symphony at the Academy of Music last night. There were two great symphonies: The Mozart C Major, "Jupiter," and the Brahms' First, and a great symphonic overture, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet." All of these are staple items in the Bostonians' repertory, so they were played with that sense of mastery peculiarly identified with this orchestra.

Time and again throughout the evening the listener was made conscious how well these musicians play. It was a matter of detail, clearly executed and fastidiously polished. Yet the hearing of this detail was the more marked because of the deliberate tempos which Koussevitzky so often chose. In spite of excellent playing, there was often more vitality in the music than the interpretations last night brought forth.

For instance, the Mozart was hardly more than a serviceable performance, resolving itself into admirable routine, less of a drawback, of course, than if some other orchestra were playing. The Andante was too slow, and there wasn't much "lift" to a good deal of the rest of the symphony. While there was plenty of stirring drama in the Tchaikovsky (the themes alone never fail to move the listener), again the slowing down of the lovers' music robbed it of some of its fire. Koussevitzky has conducted this work with greater brilliance here.

The Brahms' was the culminating performance of the evening where the greatness of the music and the greatness of the orchestra merged into impressive sonorities. One would differ with the conductor in the noticeable extremes of tempo, but succumb to the breadth and the power of a majestic reading, topped off with a sure-fire finale.

'Parsifal' Matinee

Quite in accordance with tradition, Wagner's "Parsifal" had its Good Friday matinee at the Metropolitan Opera House yesterday afternoon. It was the third performance of the work this season and differed little from the others except for better integration of all the parts. Aside from Melchior's notable interpretation of the title role, the honors of this performance belonged to Alexander Kipnis, whose Gurnemanz is surely one of the memorable portrayals of this role. Kerstin Thorborg's Kundry held its own in this company, while Julius Huehn's Amfortas was wholly acceptable. Mr. Leinsdorf's workmanlike interpretation gained substance as the opera progressed, but this was not a penetrating or deeply-moving presentation. The audience packed the hall and took its opera in the consecrational mood so characteristic of this particular occasion.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 4 - 1942

Shostakovitch Work Presented By Bostonians

Koussevitzky Leads Group in Offering Brahms and Prokofieff Symphonies

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last concert of this season's New York evening series Thursday in a fully populated Carnegie Hall. Serge Koussevitzky, who had conducted Prokofieff's Classical Symphony and Dmitri Shostakovitch's sixth symphony in Tuesday's Russian War Relief benefit concert in Washington, offered both works before the intermission, and closed the program with the first symphony of Brahms.

This was the first time that the latest but one of Shostakovitch's symphonies had been played here by this orchestra, but it has had three previous New York performances within the last seventeen months, by the Philadelphia Orchestra and NBC Symphony, under Leopold Stokowski, and the National Orchestral Association, under Leon Barzin. Dr. Koussevitzky, who will repeat it here this afternoon, undoubtedly thinks well of it, and the performance, in its vividness of color and mood, expressive intentness and vitality, was remarkably persuasive, and left the reviewer, who had heard it before, feeling that he would like to hear it again.

It is an effective score, and one which poses no problem for its hearers. The first movement, with its prevailing broad, soaring main theme, has considerable impressiveness as well as solemnity, although, in the latter part its course, there are some measures where the music marks time. The short second movement is usually light and buoyant, but sometimes turns to a sardonic vein; the third equally short, has much color and an infectious rhythmic vigor, and the closing tune (which reminded one hearer of a popular Victor Herbert number) can be readily whistled. Meanwhile, it is reported, Shostakovitch's seventh symphony is on the way here.

The twenty-five-year-old Prokofieff work, already played here this season by the Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Orchestra, needs no comment on its own account; it is a pleasant tour de force and very handy as a curtain raiser. It was well played, and yet performed as a work which the orchestra was conscious of having performed several times before; it gave a sense of admirable routine, but not of freshness. The case was very different with the fervent interpretation of the Shostakovitch work, and also with the performance of the Brahms symphony. Here one might not be in accord with every detail of the Koussevitzkyesque reading—feeling, for instance, that the speed with which the conductor took the first theme of the main body of the finale lost for it some of its breadth and dignity. There were a few other unorthodox points here and there, but such matters remained in the background of the general impression of expressive conviction and exceptional vitality brought by the performance as a whole. The closing measures had a memorable resplendence, and were followed by correspondingly ardent applause.

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL
APR 4 - 1942

17

Bolshevik Battle-Hymn Cheered

WITHIN THE STATELY walls of Constitution Hall, in Washington, D. C., where the Daughters of the American Revolution have vigorously denounced the Red Menace of World Bolshevism over a period of many years, the lilting strains of the "Internationale" (battle hymn of Red revolutionists) rang out, last week, at a "Russian relief benefit concert" played by the Boston Symphony under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

The affair was personally sponsored by President Roosevelt, and was attended by Mrs. Roosevelt, Russian Ambassador Litvinoff, and many top-flight "social personages" of the Nation's capital, including Joseph E. Davies, former U. S. Ambassador to Russia, who has lately put out a book in which he endeavors to whitewash the Reds.

During the concert's intermission, Sen. "Dear Alben" Barkley, of Kentucky, made a rip-snorting plea for more aid to Russia, while hundreds of persons battled for standing-room because the big hall's 3,000 seats had been taken very early in the evening.

The atheist Reds' marching song, the "Internationale," was lustily cheered by the assembled multitude, gathered in the very heart of the city named for George Washington, who once knelt in the snows of Valley Forge and prayed for guidance at the hands of the God Whom the Kremlin revolutionaries and their followers throughout the world have contemptuously and obscenely rejected.

And, while American socialites and their Communist buddies were cheering the "Internationale," the Vice-President of the United States was tearing into Martin Dies, of Texas, for having revealed a number of Leftists on Mr. Wallace's Board of Economic Warfare, ambitious to handle our post-war planning and reconstruction.

One of these chaps, you will remember, is a Mr. Maurice Parmelee (native of Constantinople) who, in a book ardently advocating the general practice of nudism, declared, away back in 1931 that "the present system [for which we are now fighting all over the world] is hastening toward its dissolution."

And in 1931, Mr. Parmelee predicted:—

"Looming up in the near future [1933?] is the New Social Order. . . . The liberal-democratic state is not so much attacked from without as it is disintegrating from within."

Well, as Al Smith used to say—"Here we are!" So let's stop the disintegration!

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
APR 4 - 1942

THESE DAYS By George E. Sokolsky

Away From the Madding War.

Something has been troubling me these past two years which may not be as serious as war and politics but is just as bothersome. Whenever I am told by a dramatic critic that a play is very bad I go to the theater and enjoy it extravagantly. For instance, most of the critics said that "Sunny River" was awful and the people accepted their verdict. I have not in years enjoyed a light opera more. The music was to my liking; the book was interesting and amusing. One of the criticisms was that the plot was thin, which might be said of nearly all plots except that of "Hellzapoppin," which was too thick.

Nepenthe for Mr. S.

I have the same trouble about music. I am not a professional musician. I play no musical instrument and sing only to annoy my family. But I like to listen to music. And when I listen to such a Tschaikowsky program as the Philharmonic provided last Sunday I can forget politics, hatreds, annoyances for the moment.

Were you to ask me why I gain such joy from Tschaikowsky, I cannot tell you. Nor can I explain why I will listen to Beethoven's Sixth hour after hour, grinding the records until I am called away from them by something called "important" or "urgent." I have not the slightest technical notion about it. Now my objection to the musical critics is that they always tell me that what I enjoy is no good and that I should not have enjoyed it.

The New York Philharmonic is my favorite orchestra. I listen to it every Sunday afternoon, either at Carnegie Hall or over the radio. It satisfies me as a listener. Sometimes I also listen to other orchestras, but they provide no thrills for me which are lacking in the Philharmonic. I suppose if I were Olin Downes of the Times I might know what the essential difference is between the conducting of Koussevitzky and Barbirolli, but being just a listener I frankly admit that when both of them conduct some of the modern noise it sounds to me like the rhythm bands which they have in the lower grades of the elementary schools.

So I read a piece by Mr. Downes saying that my favorite orchestra, the Philharmonic, about which I am so enthusiastic that I joined an organization to boost it, was fairly lousy because the conductor wasn't up to the job, the men worked too hard. They were tired out, he said. Well, I don't know what they do to be tired. They don't even have to work a forty-hour week. Most of them, I discovered on inquiry, only work eighteen and a half hours a week for the Philharmonic during the winter season and have a three months' vacation on top of that. I don't know how it goes with music critics, but in my department it takes me pretty close to eighteen hours a day to get through with my stint, which I never get through with because I never have eighteen hours a day to give to it. I should imagine that these musicians ought not to be tired on their schedule. Of course I have no information on how many hours are devoted to pinochle.

How Old Is Enough?

Furthermore, Mr. Downes suggests that the Philharmonic fire Barbirolli and hire somebody else. Barbirolli, he admits, is all right but he is young and inexperienced, not like Toscanini, who was old and experienced. Most people were once young, although the fable goes that Lao Tze was 90 years old when he was born. Also, most people at some stage in life lack fame and glory and glamour. Then the spotlight strikes at them and the multitude shrieks, "How marvelous!" I am old enough to remember when Stokowski was not famous. What Mr. Downes wishes us to believe is that the Philharmonic should wait until a conductor is so famous and experienced that he is ready to die and then they should employ him as an afterthought. Certainly neither business nor Government takes them on when they have one foot in the grave. They start them young these days and let them grow into the jobs. Besides, if the music is good, what difference does it make to the listeners how old and famous the acrobat is who keeps the boys together?

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last New York concert of the season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, with the following program.

Overture—Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikovsky
Prelude to the opera "Khovanstchina," Moussorgsky
Symphony No. 3.....Roy Harris
Symphony No. 6.....Shostakovitch

Harris and Shostakovitch

AMERICA'S most popular symphonist, Roy Harris, and Russia's best known one (and we gather he is as popular at home as abroad), Dimitri Shostakovitch, shared honors and applause at yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. Both composers are disputed about in professional circles, but the fact is scarcely controvertible that they have won the affection of a large musical public. The fact that yesterday's performance of Harris's Third Symphony was the third-third in three seasons means that the work has passed out of the novelty stage and that it is something more than a fillip to the musically curious.

* * *

Since any programmatic juxtaposition renders comparison inevitable, it is fair, I think, to consider yesterday's two symphonies and their authors as at least momentarily parallel. Mr. Harris's work appeared to me yesterday as the more original of the two, Mr. Shostakovitch's as the more facile. Harris's Third Symphony has superb melodic material; but its structure and instrumentation, though in no way banal, are somewhat naive. Their naivete, indeed, is the source of much of their intensity of expression. Shostakovitch's material is less noteworthy, and his contrapuntal style lacks tension. But he orchestrates with some brilliance, and he builds a climax with professional smoothness. The notes of Harris are more significant than they sound, for their resonance is, even in the loudest tuttis, always muffled by unidiomatic instrumental writing and ungrateful chord dispositions. The Shostakovicht score sounds at all times sonorously confident; but the notes themselves, though charming enough in the animated passages, are not nearly so convincing to this listener as the sound they make is agreeable.

* * *

It is possible that my greater interest in the music of Harris is due to nothing more recondite than the fact that we are fellow-countrymen and that his musical thought is consequently more deeply in accord with my own instincts and sentiments than that of any Russian could possibly be. Even the greatest of the Russian musicians (and I do not consider Shostakovitch one of these) owe much of their power over us ot certain strangeness of thought and manner. Harris's work is not strange at all, or if it is, it is only so because of its rather unprofessional surface tension. Inside, it is as familiar and as welcome as something that oft was felt (and deeply) but never said before.

* * *

There has been a great deal of effort made to interpret Harris as an American master of the (essentially European) heroic style. I think the idea is false, because I do not consider him a master of anything, least of all of that facile and decadent manner. Grandiloquent he is, and clumsy as a technician and hopelessly lacking in objectivity of mind. Heroics are a form of theater, and Harris is wholly without theatrical instinct. His one film score proved that. His is a reflective nature, lyrical and introspective and quietly fanciful. My interpretation of his qualities is, of course, no better than anybody else's; but I am moved by his music; and I feel, therefore, an obligation to describe it in my own way. But whatever its exact nature is, I believe it to be beautiful and more than skin deep. I am not so convinced in the case of Shostakovitch, for all his gayety and gusto and sound facility.

* * *

The Boston orchestra played superbly, as usual. It occurred to me, listening to the Tchaikovsky "Romeo and Juliet" that Mr. Koussevitzky's way of playing the works of this composer is more eloquent than what the others do with them, because, in addition to his consistent avoidance of forced instrumental tone, he makes practically no alterations of the basic rhythm. Such as he does make are of a formal nature, like a slight retard before a new section. He never allows the expressive nature of a Tchaikovsky melody to interrupt the firm rhythm over which it flows. This reticence seems to me to clarify and to augment the significance of the music.

Roy Harris

Whose "Third Symphony" was played yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Final Concert Given By Boston Symphony

Society Attends Brilliant Closing Event; Ottilie Marquard Wed to R. P. Floyd Today

Playing to a crowded house which included many standees, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night brought its 56th season in Brooklyn to a brilliant close with the fifth and final performance of the current season in the Opera House at the Academy of Music.

Prominent Brooklynites occupied the boxes as usual. Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay entertained the following guests in Box 1: Mr. and Mrs. Burt Foss Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Greenwood, Mrs. Edward Fuller, Mrs. Seymour K. Fuller and Mr. and Mrs. George Czarnikow.

After a dinner party at her home, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne brought her box guests on to the concert. Her guests were Mr. and Mrs. Donald G. C. Sinclair, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred L. Fawcett, Mrs. James M. Fawcett and Judge Lewis L. Fawcett, and Mrs. Theodore Frohne.

In Box 3 were Mr. and Mrs. James G. McDonald, Walter Golde, Miss Irene Golden, Charles R. Brewer, Miss Helen Wright and Edwin Hughes, guests of Mrs. Benjamin Prince. Mrs. Prince entertained her party at dinner at the Bossert preceding the concert.

Members and firends of the Brooklyn Woman's Club, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Wilson Briggs Zimmer, Mrs. Oscar W. Swift, Mrs. T. S. Vossler, Dr. and Mrs. George H. Iler and Mrs. Oliver G. Carter occupied Box 4.

The Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy were represented in Box 5 by Mrs. William B. Parker, Miss Rosalie Parker, Mr. and Mrs. Harold C. Amos and Miss Emma Jessie Ogg.

Mrs. Thomas W. Lauderdale was hostess in Box 6 to Mr. and Mrs. George W. Felter, Mr. and Mrs. Otto E. Reimer and Mr. and Mrs. Thomas H. Roulston.

The Army and Navy Box was occupied by the commanding officer of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, Rear Admiral E. J. Marquart, and Mrs. Marquart and their party.

Students of Brooklyn schools, the Packer Collegiate Institute, Brooklyn Friends School and Poly Prep Country Day School occupied Boxes 7, 9 and 11.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
(B'klyn, Queens Sect.)
APR 5 - 1942

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLANS NEW SEASON

Its 57th Series in Brooklyn Announced—Conductor to Be Serge Koussevitzky

WEEK OF 'POP' OPERAS

Salmaggi to Present Them at Academy—Doctors Society Preparing for Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will give its fifty-seventh series of concerts in Brooklyn next season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, it was announced yesterday. The dates are Nov. 20, 1942, and Jan. 8, Feb. 11, March 22 and April 2, 1943.

Performances in Brooklyn were started in the orchestra's first years.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
APR 5 - 1942

Boston Symphony Plans to Return

Arrangements have been completed for next season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, according to the announcement made at this season's last concert on Friday evening, April 3.

This will mark the 53d season by this major orchestra in Brooklyn. Performances take place on Nov. 20, 1942, Jan. 8, Feb. 11, March 12 and April 2, 1943. The series will again be under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

The orchestra was first heard in Brooklyn in 1889. It began its regular series of concerts here in 1891 when the Brooklyn Philharmonic ceased to function after Theodore Thomas resigned his position as conductor to take up activities in Chicago. Since that time the Boston Symphony Orchestra has continued to present five concerts in Brooklyn each year.

The prospectus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, written in 1881, called for "an orchestra of 60 men and a conductor . . . to give as many serious concerts of classical music as were wanted, and also to give at other times, and more especially in the Summer, concerts of the lighter kind of music in which should be included good dance music." Patron of the orchestra for almost half a century, Henry Lee Higginson, selected George Henschel to be the first conductor. Henschel organized the musicians and dropped the "dance music."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 5 - 1942

Boston Symphony

Announces Its Usual Series Here Next Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will give its usual series of five evening and five afternoon concerts at Carnegie Hall and five evening concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next season. The dates for the evening Carnegie Hall series are Thursdays, Nov. 19 and Jan. 7; Friday, Feb. 12, and Thursday, March 11 and April 1; for the matinees, Saturdays, Nov. 21, Jan. 9, Feb. 13, March 13 and April 3. The Brooklyn concerts will be held on Fridays, Nov. 20 and Jan. 8; Thursday, Feb. 11, and Fridays, March 12 and April 2.

The Cecilia Society Chorus, directed by Arthur Fiedler, will sing wth the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky in Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," Villa-Lobos's "Rasga o coracao" and Scriabin's "Prometheus," which is usually presented as a work for orchestra alone, next Friday afternoon and Saturday night in Boston's Symphony Hall. Stravinsky will also be represented by "Apollo Musagetes."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
APR 5 - 1942

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will return next season to the Brooklyn Academy of Music for its fifty-seventh series of concerts in Brooklyn.

Shostakovitch Sixth Symphony Scheduled Here

April 5

Leningrad, 1924—Shostakovitch is standing fourth from left. Second from left is Prof. Jacob D. Tamarkin of Brown University, who knew Shostakovitch in Russia. Small boy is violinist Raphael Hillyer, former pupil of Shostakovitch, who will play in the orchestra Tuesday night.

Shostakovitch in 1927

Shostakovitch as a small boy

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
APR 5 - 1942

KOUSSEVITZKY ENDS BOSTON CONCERTS HERE

Capacity Carnegie Audience Greets Finale of Series; Plays Work of American

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought its current series of concerts in New York to and end with yesterday afternoon's event at Carnegie Hall.

The popular response to their local performances was maintained, the customary capacity audience, both seated and standing, being recorded.

PLAYS HARRIS WORK.

Serge Koussevitzky prepared a program in which Russian compositions predominated, the single exception in the four numbers being the Third Symphony by the American, Roy Harris. That work, departing from the usual form of having pauses between the sections, was played in one movement, the various graphic indications being "Tragic," "Lyric," "Pastoral," "Fugue-dramatic" and "Dramatic-tragic." Its interpretation was an eloquent, full-bodied revelation of the intent of the composer.

SHOSTAKOVICH'S SIXTH.

The concert began with Tschaikovsky's Overture Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet," in which outstanding episodes in the Shakespearean play were musically proclaimed; treating with languorous sentiment, warm-blooded romanticism and tumultuous tragic inference the progress of the story of the young Italian lovers.

Shostakovich's Sixth Symphony, held over from Thursday night's program, was the final offering.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
APR 5 - 1942

OVERTONES

Birthday of Philharmonic Raises Question of Its Policy Next Year

By MILES KASTENDIECK

One hundred years ago last Thursday the Philharmonic Society was founded. On its birthday it gave its 3,858th concert, as the Philharmonic-Symphony Society. In a message of congratulation Frederick Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony said: "This will be a very happy celebration, especially in consideration of the fact that the first 100 years are the hardest to face by any major symphonic organization. From now on you will find yourself traveling the rosy paths of even greater and higher achievements than those which have pleased your glorious past."

All of that is true, except, perhaps, the rosy paths. Turning from its centennial season, the Philharmonic-Symphony faces one of the thorniest briar patches in its whole career. The question is: Who is to conduct the orchestra next year, and what is to be the musical policy?

One recalls what Theodore Thomas once said about how a great orchestra should be run. His platform was threefold: First, the conductor was to decide what the orchestra would play; second, he was to decide who would play, and third, he was to say how the music should be played. It was solid advice. How much has it been followed? The centennial parade of eight conductors, with Toscanini in the offing, hardly conforms to these principles. Will those who control its destiny face the facts regarding New York's Orchestra?

No one envies those who must make the decision, but everyone knows that now is the time to face the issue squarely and start rebuilding for the second century. In her book, "Music With a Feather Duster," Elizabeth Mitchell has made some pointed remarks about the orchestra's dilemma. They are worth quoting in part:

"The Philharmonic is the only orchestra that has ever earned the title of 'The Graveyard of Conductors.' At a fairly close distance I have watched the Philharmonic's clientele win for it this macabre pennant. It was not until the society launched its policy of engaging world-champion conductors that the merry business began . . . In the excitement the familiar idea of going to concerts to hear the music got lost somewhere outside of the four boroughs. Forgetting it, the audiences went to the symphony to sit in on a good show conducted by some glamorous fellow. As long as the glamorous fellow was a novelty, everyone loved him. But this usually lasted but a short time, for all too soon hero worship turned to satiation and enthusiam to ennui . . . But I never heard concern expressed about the possible havoc that might be done to our orchestra by having the Philharmonic podium operate like a swinging door at Altman's—through which conductors flew in and flew out."

There are many who agree with these observations. It is to be hoped they will all be taken into account. The example of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is ever with us. Can we not settle upon a conductor who will do for the Philharmonic and music in New York what Koussevitzky has done in Boston?

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I. JOURNAL
APR 5 - 1942

Tuesday Night's Program Will Also Include Works of Brahms and Prokofieff

First Providence Performance of Russian Composer's Sixth Will Be Presented by Boston Orchestra Under Koussevitzky.

THREE symphonies — the first of Brahms, the "Classical" of Prokofieff, and the sixth of Shostakovitch —will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra program in Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday night.

Of these, perhaps the Shostakovitch arouses the most interest; at least it is the newest of the three, being the last but one that he has written. It will be the first Providence performance.

The composer became a person of particular extra-musical interest when, during the siege of Leningrad, he served as a fireman with the Leningrad Conservatory brigade and said he was as willing to serve his country and his political faith in that way as with the "sharpened creative pen."

Has Local Interest

There is a measure of strictly local interest, too, in Tuesday night's concert, which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. In the audience, very likely, will be one listener, Prof. Jacob D. Tamarkin of Brown University, who knew Shostakovitch rather well in Russia before he had become famous as a composer. And in the orchestra will be a violinist, Raphael Hillyer, who studied solfeggio under Shostakovitch, then 18, in Leningrad.

Prof. Tamarkin remembers Shostakovitch as "a pleasant talker, who entered into no deep conversation but who had fresh and immediate ideas and spoke with assurance."

"He was shy toward others, but he had confidence in himself," Prof. Tamarkin says. "Once I heard him play the solo part of the first Tchaikovsky piano concerto., with an orchestra that used to be good. But this time the performance suffered several interruptions. One would have supposed it was a rehearsal. But Shostakovitch didn't lose his self-possession. He showed no excitement and he didn't grumble.

Heard Him in Piano Recitals

"I heard him in a number of solo piano recitals, too. He played Beethoven, Schumann, Scriabin, and things of his own. Nobody would have predicted a brilliant future for him as a piano virtuoso.

"I remember that he was at my house for occasional musical evenings in Leningrad about 16 or 17 years ago. He was 19 then, pink-cheeked, baby-faced, a student at the Conservatory. He was studying composition with Glasovsky and piano with Nicolaef. He was working on his first symphony at the time and played excerpts from it. I was impressed by the good humor of it, which is uncommon in Russian symphonic music, but it seemed childish, or should I say simple?

"Schumann was one of the composers he was fond of at the time, and he liked Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff, also. But he disliked Wagner."

Young Hillyer was also a guest at the party, as was his father, who is now a professor of mathematics at Dartmouth.

Shostakovitch's aunt, Mme. Nadejda Shohat, now lives in Upper Darby, Pa., whence she has sent the following recollections of her nephew:

Born in 1906

"Shostakovitch was born Sept. 25, 1906, in Leningrad. His father, Dmitri, was a business man. His mother, Sophia, born Kokowlina, studied music in the Leningrad Conservatory but dropped her studies after marriage. Both father and mother were born in Siberia. His father was also very musical; he had a tenor voice and sang very beautifully. He also played the piano. Dmitri Shostakovitch has two sisters: The eldest, Maria, a laureate from Leningrad Conservatory, is married to Freedericksz, professor of physics in the Polytechnic Institute of Leningrad; the youngest sister, Zoya, is married to Khruschev, professor of histology at the University of Moscow. Dmitri Shostakovitch married Nina Varzar in 1933.

"At the age of seven, Shostakovitch started his piano lessons from his mother, who also taught music to his sister Maria. At the very beginning he has shown unusual musical talent. Hardly was he taught the notes when he started at once to read scores without any difficulty, memorizing music at once. He also showed an absolute pitch. Once his mother took him to the opera in Maryinsky Theatre (Tales of Czar Saltan). He was very impressed by the music and the next day he could repeat by heart all the melodies asked from him. It appeared to us as a sign of extraordinary ability.

"In 1916 (or 1917) he entered with his sister the private musical school of Glasser, which was considered the best school of music in Leningrad.

"At the age of nine he wrote his first composition for piano, 'Theme with Variations.' The Revolution of 1917 inspired him to write his next compositions: 'Hymn to Liberty,' and 'Funeral March to the Victims of the Revolution.' At the school of Glasser his first public appearance on an examination created a great impression when he played a little piece from one of the Haydn symphonies (Largo). I remember that the audience was quite fascinated by the very first chord of Mitya (the diminutive of Dmitri) and there was much talk about him.

Attended Conservatory

"In 1919 he left the school of Glasser and entered the Conservatory of Leingrad, where he studied first under Rosanova and later under Nicolaef. It was Glazounov who, after listening to his compositions, advised him to enter Steinberg's class of composition. After a few lessons, Prof. Steinberg once said, 'It is not for us to teach Shostakovitch but to learn from him.' His next composition was 'Hopak'; he wrote it for his youngest sister to dance. Then followed 'Three Fantastic Dances,' 'Suite for Two Pianos,' the song 'Grasshopper and Ant,' 'Scherzo' for orchestra, and tone poem, 'Mermaid,' based on Andersen's fairy tale. It is my impression that the last three pieces were incorporated in his First Symphony.

"In 1922 his father, whom the whole family adored, died suddenly from pneumonia; this was a terrible shock to the family. Mitya continued his study at the Conservatory and at the same time passed his graduation examination from high school (gymnasium). In 1923 he graduated from the Conservatory as pianist, and from the class of composition in 1925.

"In 1923 I left Russia for the United States, and all I have known since about Mitya is from the letters of my sister. Since 1935 I have not heard from the family.

"Mitya was a very serious and sensitive child, often very meditative, very modest about his music and rather shy. He liked fairy tales and often asked me to tell them to him. He liked to discuss his music with his mother, asking her whether she approves his interpretations. His favorite composer at the very beginning was Liszt. He liked to read and his favorite author was the great Russian novelist Gogol. His first opera, 'The Nose,' is based on Gogol's story of the same name.

First Played in Philadelphia

The Philadelphia Orchestra, with Stokowski conducting, was the first to play the Sixth Symphony in this country, on Nov. 29, 1940. At that time Stokowski was quoted in the printed program, comparing the Fifth and Sixth Symphonies, as follows:

"In his Fifth Symphony Shostakovitch painted in tone the inner and outer experiences of an artist's life—sometimes expressing the boisterous humor of crowds in the street, as in the fourth part—sometimes painting with ironic splashes of color a gamin-like humor, as in the second part—and sometimes telling by the simplest orchestral means the innermost reveries of his spirit in dark and melancholy coloring, or rising to sublime heights of ecstasy, as in the third part.

"In his Fifth Symphony Shostakovitch has composed music in the usual sequence of symphonic form, but in his Sixth Symphony he has become more individualistic. It is in three parts, instead of four, and the first part is the slow movement, the second the scherzo, the third is based on dance rhythms and later has themes inspired by the popular folklore of Russia. These three parts are strongly contrasted and are remarkable for the firmness of their melodic outline, rhythm and musical character. In each symphony Shostakovitch shows himself to be more of a master, to be ever growing, ever expanding in his imagination and musical consciousness. In his Sixth Symphony he has reached new depths, especially in the first part. Here are harmonic sequences, and several melodies sounding at the same time, making modern counterpoint, which are of great originality and intensity of expression. At the first hearing they sound strange and even obscure, as if the meaning was concealed and hidden. But after hearing this music three or four times it suddenly becomes clear and has great depth of expression."

The symphony had its first Boston performance on March 20.

Ernest B. Dane, 73, Philanthropist, Dies

Ernest Blaney Dane, 73, of 360 Heath st., Brookline, president of the Brookline Trust Company and former member of the Brookline Board of Selectmen, died suddenly yesterday at his Summer home at Center Harbor, N. H. He had gone there last Tuesday for a rest.

Ernest B. Dane Banker, Dies

Continued from the First Page

Born in Brookline in 1868, the son of Edward S. and Emma C. (Blaney) Dane, he was educated at Hopkinson's School and at Harvard University from which he was graduated in 1892. He was known as a philanthropist and was active for many years in the affairs of several charities.

Immediately on graduation from college he entered a trustee's office where he remained until 1905 when he opened his own office. Gradually he became interested in many charities and organizations. Among them were the Boston Floating Hospital, Milk and Baby Hygiene, Massachusetts Forestry Association, of which he was treasurer for many years, and Home for Aged Women.

He was active in town affairs for over 35 years. He was a member of the Board of Selectmen from 1912 to 1923 and again from 1926 to 1928. He was a town meeting member since 1916 and a member of the tree planting committee for 38 years. He was chairman of that committee for 34 years. He was also superintendent of the moth work for the town.

Mr. Dane was long connected with the Brookline Trust Company. In 1913 he became president of the company. He was a director of many banks and corporations, among them the Merchants National Bank of Boston, Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Company, John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company, Tamarack Mining Company, Isle Royale Mining Company, Punta Alegre Sugar Company and Northern Texas Electric Company.

He was a member of the board of governors of the Harvard Club of Boston and a member of the Boston Yacht Club, University Exchange, Algonquin, and Union Clubs of Boston, New York Yacht Club, Eastern Yacht Club of Marblehead and The Country Club. He was president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

His favorite recreation was yachting and he owned some magnificent craft, among them the 240-foot Diesel-engined Vanda, launched in 1928. He had Summer homes at Seal Harbor, Me., and at Center Harbor, N. H.

Mr. Dane was married in 1903 to Helen Folsom Pratt, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Pratt of Glen Cove, N. Y. In addition to his wife, he is survived by two sons, Ernest B. Dane Jr., formerly of Brookline, now of Newport, R. I., and Edward Dane, a member of the Board of Selectmen in Brookline.

Funeral services will be held at the First Church in Chestnut Hill, Suffolk road, tomorrow at 12 noon.

Ernest B. Dane Funeral Held

1000 Pay Tribute To Brookline Man

More than 1000 persons prominent in the civic, business, music and social spheres of Boston and Brookline yesterday attended funeral services for Ernest B. Dane, 73, at First Parish Church, Brookline.

The Rev. Dan Huntington Fenn, former minister of the First Church in Chestnut Hill, of which Mr. Dane was a member, officiated at services for the late banker, business man, philanthropist and civic leader. Masses of flowers from the Dane estate were used to decorate the church and a delegation of employes from the estate attended the funeral.

HONORARY BEARERS

Honorary bearers were Nathaniel F. Ayer, Allston Burr, Philip Gardner, Jerome D. Green, Francis J. Oakes, Jr., Elwyn G. Preston, Alfred L. Ripley, Charles F. Rowley, Charles Stetson and Albert R. Whittier.

Ushers were Charles E. Cotting, John Dane, Lawrence H. H. Johnson, Jr., and Sidney N. Shurcliff.

Ernest Mitchell, organist of Grace Church, New York city, and a group of Boston Symphony members under Concertmaster Richard Burgin and George Valkenir, provided music. The string group played Handel's "Largo" and the brass choir played a Bach Chorale.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the following Symphony trustees attended the services in recognition of Mr. Dane's long association with the orchestra: Henry B. Sawyer, Dr. Roger I. Lee, Henry B. Cabot, Richard C. Payne, N. Penrose Hallowell, Reginald C. Foster, A. DeWolfe Howe, Alvan T. Fuller and Bentley W. Warren.

Others attending included: Charles Francis Adams, Col. Theodore Baker, Edward Baker, Col. Thomas J. Moran, L. J. Webster, Edwin S. Webster, A. D. Hill, Guy W. Cox, Christian A. Herter, Frederick Pratt, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Mrs. Charles S. Weld, Harold Murdock, Neal Rantoul, Mrs. James Dean, John Grandin, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Ewell, George Rick, Charles Whittier, Mrs. Richard M. Saltonstall, Mr. and Mrs. Delphin F. Young, Fred Mougey and Richard C. Floyd.

Also Mrs. Harold Pratt, Mrs. John Bryant, Mrs. Arthur Williams, Mrs. Francis J. Oakes, Mrs. Charles E. Cotting, Mrs. Henry Hornblower, Raymond Lapham, Mrs. Elwyn Preston, William R. Cordingley, Mrs. Grace W. Rollins, Mrs. Horace Soule, Alfred Ripley, Daniel Lacy, Robert S. Weeks, Herman F. Clarke, Mrs. Olga Noumoff, Mr. and Mrs. Ward Gaston, Theodore Lyman, G. Peabody Gardner, Raymond Royce and Charles Slattery.

Others were Brookline Selectmen William J. Hickey, Jr., Daniel G. Rollins, Daniel Tyler, Jr., and Eugene P. Carver, Jr. The many banks and corporations with which Mr. Dane was affiliated were all represented at the services. Sessions of Brookline court were suspended to permit presiding justices to attend.

Burial was in Walnut Hill cemetery, Brookline.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y. TIMES
APR 5 - 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINAL CONCERT

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Group in Last Appearance of the Season Here

TCHAIKOVSKY WORK HEARD

'Romeo and Juliet' Overture, Mussorgsky Prelude and Harris's Third Given

By OLIN DOWNES

The final New York concert of the season by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall was an unconditional triumph, so far as the reception of the performances by the audience and the performances themselves were concerned. There remains the relative merit of the compositions.

Here were some very interesting comparisons. It was shown at the beginning, for example, in the performance of the Tchaikovsky "Romeo and Juliet" overture, how much a composition that every one likes can suffer by the very reason of its popularity. Conductors do not feel that they have to bother about it. The orchestra knows it and it will bring a hand. But yesterday the overture was played as if the life of the conductor and orchestra depended on the issue, and then we realized again what poignant and inspired music it is.

Far nearer the Russian soil, and also far better concentrated, was the wonderful little tone picture that unfolded with the performance of the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantohina." And here is a perfect form, derived from Russian folksongs and the Russian people's ways of singing them—the emergence, indeed, from the crucible of an individual genius, of the genius of his race.

This was only the opening of a program which consisted with a single exception of Russian music. The exception, a notable one, was Roy Harris's Third Symphony. This symphony has gone well since its première at the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men in February of 1939, and it holds up, for the present commentator, as the strongest, most concise and unified score of Harris that he knows. The opening theme, indeed the whole opening section, is admirably planned and developed—and we intentionally say "planned" rather than "inspired." It has a fine, strong line and a potentiality that may derive in part from Mr. Harris's studies, at one time extensive, of plain chant.

This sense of line, however, is not completely sustained through the whole one-movement symphony. It sags in places because, in spite of sections welded carefully together, the sense of uninterrupted and organic development does not invariably obtain. The fugue that the composer specifies as Section IV peters out pretty quickly. When it comes to canonic treatment of a motif from it (Section V) there is much pulling and hauling, much invective of the brass—which sounds like a man who swears around the room without making much progress with his argument.

But in the last pages, over a pedal point emphasized by the drum, a thematic fragment is chanted by the brass with true and tragic grandeur. The utterance has spaciousness and power. As a whole the symphony impresses one by its sincerity and the thought put into it. It illuminates a corner of Harris's soul.

And more that was illuminating followed.

The concert ended with a repetition of Shostakovich's Sixth Symphony, which Dr. Koussevitzky had already played once this week at his New York concert of Thursday night. And again the symphony reaped tumultuous applause. Mr. Harris, whom Dr. Koussevitzky brought to the stage after his symphony, received a big hand. The Shostakovich received a bigger one. It is easy to see why.

He can do anything he pleases, anything he can conceive. His technic is swift, facile, incisive. He has always an instinct for dramatic effect. But this Sixth Symphony is in part inspired, in part very empty of real ideas, in part buncombe and pose.

We greatly prefer the symphony of Harris; not at all for the reason that he is an American, nor yet for the reason that he has written a wholly articulate symphony. But of the two composers, in the works heard yesterday, Harris, not Shostakovich, has the more important things to say, and says them with considerably better thematic material and consistency of style and purpose. He has produced a more sincere, unified and —despite defects noted — coordinated expression. The inevitable comparisons of yesterday afternoon brought him high honor, though this was not of his seeking.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 5 1942

Miss Posselt Says She Was A Prodigy Too Long

Ruth Posselt, famous violinist who is to appear as soloist with the New Haven Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall tomorrow evening, advises the aspiring young musician to avoid acquiring a reputation as a child prodigy. It will be a handicap, she says, making it difficult for one to win recognition as a mature artist. For years performances will be greeted by such remarks as this: "Marvelous. Simly superb. But just a child prodigy, you know."

Miss Posselt learned that lesson by personal experience. So great was her early facility with the violin that it was a long time before she could down the "prodigy" reputation. It began when, at the age of three, she perched atop a piano at a church fair in her home town of Medford, Mass., and astonished every one by playing "Tipperary" with contagious vigor and sweep. At six she was touring the state, giving performances for the Red Cross relief drive. At fourteen she was appearing as soloist with the New York Symphony under Walter Damrosch.

Finally Recognized

That was all very nice—for a while. But when she was approaching maturity and went to Europe for final study and extensive concert tours, she found that her "prodigy" reputation had preceded her. Everywhere she won enthusiastic ovations, but always she was regarded as merely a precocious youngster. It was not until one memorable evening in Utrecht, Holland, that she was finally and completely recognized as one of the ablest and finest violinists in the world today.

"In the first place," she says, "I had a severe cold and all I wanted to do that night was to stay in bed. The conductor had said that I needn't play until the second half of the program and could go on at 9:30. I had planned to arrive about 45 minutes earlier so I could practice a bit. When I reached the hall the manager came running up. 'You go on in three minutes!' . . . I put on my evening dress there backstage and hurried on to the platform smoothing my hair. I played Dvorak's Concerto and when I had finished, although there was a wonderful ovation, I was thankful it was over and I could go back to bed.

Tough Evening

"But my troubles were just beginning. In the wings the conductor rushed up to me. 'Miss Posselt,' he begged, 'Will you help me out? My concertmaster s too sick to continue. Will you take his place?' I told him I had never been a concertmaster and had never seen the music of the Franck Symphony they were to play. He told me I would have time during the 10-minute intermission to look over the difficult passages and that he would show me the tempi. He was so distressed that I couldn't refuse."

The audience was astonished when she took the concertmaster's chair . . . then thundered applause at the close of the performance. The next morning the musc critics declared in the Utrecht papers that they had never heard a finer rendition of the Franck Symphony. It was the presence, they said, of such a truly great artist, such a mature mistress of her art, that had made it possible.

Koussevitsky Praises

From that evening forward, Ruth Posselt has held a firm place among the world's greatest musicians. And the ultimate accolade was given by Serge Koussevitsky after a performance wth the Boston Symphony: "Ruth Posselt is one of the greatest violinists of our time, and her inexhaustible repertoire, ranging from classic to contemporary works, gives her a distinguished place in the world of musical art."

Tomorrow evening with the New Haven Symphony Orchestra, Miss Posselt will present Lalo's "Symphonic Espagnol." She will also introduce a new composition by David Stanley Simth, "Requiem, for Violin and Orchestra." The remainder of the program includes two movements from the "Coq d'Or" Suite by Rimsky-Korsakov and Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B Flat.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 5 1942

Serge Koussevitsky, Prokofieff Defended

Correspondent Scored For Condemning Contemporary Composition—Kirkpatrick Offers Bach Program

By H. EARLE JOHNSON

New Haven's reactionaries are not few nor far between. They attend concerts in droves! Proximity to a center of learning, to cultural enlightenment, and wartime activity designed to ameliorate the world upheaval touch some of us but little. Sunk in stolid complacency we are mentally asleep, refusing to heed the challenge of a world which needs alert and constructive thought and action.

A member of the Yale University staff has written this department a bitter complaint on the first half of the last Boston Symphony program which contained the "Requiem" by Benjamin Britten, written in memory of his parents, and the Scythian Suite by Prokofieff as "not worth sitting through—distracting in artistic noise—geometric, nerve-racking, bludgeoning." Further comparison is made to works in the Whitney Gallery and Modern Museum (foremost contemporary centers of art) which are "merely one lunatic's expression of his own peculiar eccentricities; mechanically perfect, but art—never!" Our dear Victorian includes the William Schuman Symphony played at the first Bostonian concert and mentions the young composer taking his bow "with smug satisfaction."

"Musica"—for that is the name signed to the epistle—asks the critic for help, but the critic must plead at the outset that the case is quite far gone, although not hopeless. It would be easier to ridicule the complacency, self-satisfaction, and unreasoning denunciation which the writer of this epistle shows. But that would get us nowhere. One may with greater reason point out one or two essentially delusive attitudes.

Lesson One

In the first place, "Musica" demands that all art make a direct and immediate appeal to the layman. Faith, we might suggest, is a fine thing, but how much more worthwhile is understanding. Shakespeare, Shelley, many parts of the Bible, and countless other works of art hold little attraction by a single reading. It is not often the handsome person who becomes our best friend. One brief hearing of a style, individual voice or period will not suffice for intelligent appreciation of a great work which requires open-minded and intelligent co-operation. Secondly, "Musica" implies insincerity in the works of these contemporaries. That, I submit, is a dangerous attitude in these days whether applied to works of art, acts of statesmen, or the practice of a profession. To imply that an artist is a charlatan is unfair to the individual artist and untrue to the principles of art. This point need not be labored; it is plain.

Thirdly, "Musica" makes a grave philosophical error in judging works of art on the basis of his own preconceived and limited understanding. In education, religion and elsewhere our attitude is often one of seeking enlightenment through the channel which is open to us when we are receptive. It should be so in art, which is revelatory in varying degrees, having given mankind inspiration and comfort from earliest times. As in all education and religion, the amount varies with the individual giving and receiving. The great musicians are those who have been near to the spiritual reality of their own times—not of past times, note!—and most coherent in expressing it. This is true of those who interpret the past, for that must be done in terms of present needs.

Beethoven was roundly criticized by the people of his own day for the modernism of his symphonies; all artists worthy the name have been similarly mistrusted by lesser minds. Perhaps Mr. Britten, Mr. Prokofieff and Mr. Schuman have little to which we can respond; it is not possible to know for certain until time has tested them. One might mention in passing, however, that Prokofieff's Suite (composed in 1914) has become widely accepted, that Mr. Schuman's Symphony has been termed by very respectable men as a superior work, and that Mr. Britten's voice is considered to be worth listening for. Doctor Koussevitsky's record in encouraging the best talents of the day is a notable one. He has a humility of approach which "Musica" lacks.

To "Musica," who concludes his burning words with this sentence, after giving praise to the Boston Symphony: "Why waste its tremendous power and beauty to introduce crackpots to an already nauseated public?" one can only note Doctor Johnson's rebuke to a critical friend: "I have found you a work of art; I am not obliged to find you an understanding," and avoid any further issue.

Mr. Kirkpatrick

Lest you think Mr. Ralph Kirkpatrick an odd stick who can amuse himself alone with that dry-as-du pedagogue, Johann Sebastian Bach let me help in correcting such a unfortunate impression. There are lots of people who can become quite excited over an entire program of this particular master, for Bach has proved his value by selling out the house on several occasions of late.

In New York's Town Hall Fritz Busch and Rudolph Serkin have gathered a chamber orchestra to perform the six Brandenburg Concertos. The final concert last week caused the audience to applaud between movements and to stand up and cheer at the end. Of course everybody played well, but old J. S. deserves a little credit too. Personally, I am glad that Mr. Kirkpatrick is turning to the Two Part Inventions and will play all 15 of them. So often these are thought of as exercises for little fingers preparatory to the Well-Tempered Clavier; actually they have a musical value for they are possessed of a charming simplicity which the more formidable preludes and fugues must of necessity sacrifice in the interest of advanced scientific revelation. Played ingratiatingly, as they will assuredly be by Mr. Kirkpatrick, we shall find in them a considerable delight. There are three Preludes and Fugues on the program, and two fanciful Partitas, plus the dazzling Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue by which Bach rang popularity's bell loudly.

The Friends of Music in New York presented Bach's "Musical Offering" a week ago in an orchestral version, again winning an ovation for Fritz Stiedry and the young players. While on the subject, one should say that the Annual Bach Festival at Bethlehem, Pa., will be along the first of May and that there are other Bach Societies from Boston to Pasadena. Come to think of it New Haven has a Bach Cantata Club which was making glad promises to do something noteworthy for the public this season. Mr. Kirkpatrick will be at Colonial Williamsburg from May 4 to 9 as instigator of another series of Concerts in the Governor's Palace. He will play an all-Bach program. That's all for today; Bach Wednesday.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 5 1942

Artist To Be Honored

In honor of Miss Ruth Posselt, violinist, who is to be the assisting artist this evening at the concert by the New Haven Symphony Orchestra in Woolsey Hall, Prof. and Mrs. David Stanley Smith will give a small reception, following the concert, in the Faculty Club. Mr. Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and husband of Miss Posselt will attend the concert and reception.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

APR 6 1942

Ernest B. Dane, Industrialist, Dies at 75

CENTER HARBOR, N. H., April 6 (AP).—Ernest Blaney Dane, 75, Massachusetts industrialist and prominent in many philanthropic and civic activities, died yesterday at his Summer home.

He was president of the Brookline, Mass., Trust Co., and of the Ernshaw Knitting Co., Watertown, Mass., and Ernshaw Publications, Inc., and was president-treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He held directorships in numerous companies, including the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co., Tamarack Mining Co., Isle Royal Mining Co., Punta Alegre Sugar Co. and Northern Texas Electric Co.

Born in Brookline, Mass., Mr. Dane was educated at Hopkinson's School and at Harvard University. He was active in town affairs and served on the Board of Selectmen from 1912 to 1923.

He was a well known yachtsman. He leaves his widow, the former Helen Folsom Pratt, of Glen Cove, N. Y., and two sons.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

APR 6 - 1942

ERNEST DANE DIES, BROOKLINE BANKER

President Since 1913 of Trust Company, Who Headed Boston Symphony Group, Was 73

KNOWN AS A YACHTSMAN

Chief Executive of Earnshaw Knitting Co.—Trustee of New England Conservatory

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BROOKLINE, Mass., April 5—Ernest Blaney Dane, banker, trustee, yachtsman and patron of music, who was president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Brookline Trust Company, died at noon today at his Summer home in Center Harbor, N. H., where he was spending the week-end. He was 73 years old.

Mr. Dane, president of the Earnshaw Knitting Company, was a director of the Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Company, the Earnshaw Publications, Inc., the Greater Boston Community Fund, the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company, the Northern Texas Electric Company and the Tampa Electric Company. He became a director of the Brookline Trust Company about 1905 and in 1913 became its president. Mr. Dane was a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music and the Provident Institution for Savings.

Graduate of Harvard

He was born in Brookline, the son of Edward S. and Emma C. Blaney Dane, attended Hopkinson's School, Boston, and was graduated from Harvard in 1892. He became associated with a trustee's office, where he remained for thirteen years, then relinquished his interest and opened his own office at 6 Beacon Street, which he maintained until his death.

He also had been a director of the Merchants National Bank of Boston, the Tamarack Mining Company, the Isle Royale Mining Company, the Punta Allegre Sugar Company and the Northern Texas Electric Company. Mr. Dane had served in different capacities the Boston Floating Hospital, the Milk and Baby Hygiene, the Home For Aged Women, the Danvers State Hospital and the Garland School, and had been treasurer of the Massachusetts Society for Social Hygiene and the Massachusetts Forestry Association. He had served also on the board of governors of the Harvard Club of Boston.

In 1905, Mr. Dane was elected a member of the Brookline Tree Planting Committee and was its chairman for thirty-four years. He was a selectman form 1912 to 1923 and from 1926 to 1928, and had several times declined the chairmanship.

Donated Thanksgiving Baskets

He distributed several hundred Thanksgiving baskets to underprivileged families in the town for more than thirty years. During the first World War, he was chairman of all war activities in Brookline, including the Red Cross and Liberty Loan campaigns.

Mr. Dane was a yachtsman and was owner of the steam yacht Vanda, which is widely known along the New England and New York coast. He was a member of the Harvard and New York Yacht Clubs.

He leaves a widow, the former Helen Folsom Pratt of Brooklyn, N. Y., whom he married in 1903; two sons, Ernest Blaney Jr. of Newport, R. I., and Edward Dane, Brookline Selectman and executive vice president of the Brookline Trust Company, and six grandchildren.

A funeral service will be held at 12 noon on Tuesday in the First Church, Chestnut Hill.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 5 - 1942

Miss Posselt Says She Was A Prodigy Too Long

Ruth Posselt, famous violinist who is to appear as soloist with the New Haven Symphony Orchestra at Woolsey Hall tomorrow evening, advises the aspiring young musician to avoid acquiring a reputation as a child prodigy. It will be a handicap, she says, making it difficult for one to win recognition as a mature artist. For years performances will be greeted by such remarks as this: "Marvelous. Simly superb. But just a child prodigy, you know."

Miss Posselt learned that lesson by personal experience. So great was her early facility with the violin that it was a long time before she could down the "prodigy" reputation. It began when, at the age of three, she perched atop a piano at a church fair in her home town of Medford, Mass., and astonished every one by playing "Tipperary" with contagious vigor and sweep. At six she was touring the state, giving performances for the Red Cross relief drive. At fourteen she was appearing as soloist with the New York Symphony under Walter Damrosch.

Finally Recognized

That was all very nice—for a while. But when she was approaching maturity and went to Europe for final study and extensive concert tours, she found that her "prodigy" reputation had preceded her. Everywhere she won enthusiastic ovations, but always she was regarded as merely a precocious youngster. It was not until one memorable evening in Utrecht, Holland, that she was finally and completely recognized as one of the ablest and finest violinists in the world today.

"In the first place," she says, "I had a severe cold and all I wanted to do that night was to stay in bed. The conductor had said that I needn't play until the second half of the program and could go on at 9:30. I had planned to arrive about 45 minutes earlier so I could practice a bit. When I reached the hall the manager came running up. 'You go on in three minutes!' . . . I put on my evening dress there backstage and hurried on to the platform smoothing my hair. I played Dvorak's Concerto and when I had finished, although there was a wonderful ovation, I was thankful it was over and I could go back to bed.

Tough Evening

"But my troubles were just beginning. In the wings the conductor rushed up to me. 'Miss Posselt,' he begged, 'Will you help me out? My concertmaster s too sick to continue. Will you take his place?' I told him I had never been a concertmaster and had never seen the music of the Franck Symphony they were to play. He told me I would have time during the 10-minute intermission to look over the difficult passages and that he would show me the tempi. He was so distressed that I couldn't refuse."

The audience was astonished when she took the concertmaster's chair . . . then thundered applause at the close of the performance. The next morning the musc critics declared in the Utrecht papers that they had never heard a finer rendition of the Franck Symphony. It was the presence, they said, of such a truly great artist, such a mature mistress of her art, that had made it possible.

Koussevitsky Praises

From that evening forward, Ruth Posselt has held a firm place among the world's greatest musicians. And the ultimate accolade was given by Serge Koussevitsky after a performance wth the Boston Symphony: "Ruth Posselt is one of the greatest violinists of our time, and her inexhaustible repertoire, ranging from classic to contemporary works, gives her a distinguished place in the world of musical art."

Tomorrow evening with the New Haven Symphony Orchestra, Miss Posselt will present Lalo's "Symphonic Espagnol." She will also introduce a new composition by David Stanley Simth, "Requiem, for Violin and Orchestra." The remainder of the program includes two movements from the "Coq d'Or" Suite by Rimsky-Korsakov and Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B Flat.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 6 - 1942

Artist To Be Honored

In honor of Miss Ruth Posselt, violinist, who is to be the assisting artist this evening at the concert by the New Haven Symphony Orchestra in Woolsey Hall, Prof. and Mrs. David Stanley Smith will give a small reception, following the concert, in the Faculty Club. Mr. Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and husband of Miss Posselt will attend the concert and reception.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
APR 6 - 1942

ERNEST DANE DIES; BROOKLINE BANKER

President Since 1913 of Trust Company, Who Headed Boston Symphony Group, Was 73

KNOWN AS A YACHTSMAN

Chief Executive of Earnshaw Knitting Co.—Trustee of New England Conservatory

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BROOKLINE, Mass., April 5—Ernest Blaney Dane, banker, trustee, yachtsman and patron of music, who was president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Brookline Trust Company, died at noon today at his Summer home in Center Harbor, N. H., where he was spending the week-end. He was 73 years old.

Mr. Dane, president of the Earnshaw Knitting Company, was a director of the Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Company, the Earnshaw Publications, Inc., the Greater Boston Community Fund, the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company, the Northern Texas Electric Company and the Tampa Electric Company. He became a director of the Brookline Trust Company about 1905 and in 1913 became its president. Mr. Dane was a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music and the Provident Institution for Savings.

Graduate of Harvard

He was born in Brookline, the son of Edward S. and Emma C. Blaney Dane, attended Hopkinson's School, Boston, and was graduated from Harvard in 1892. He became associated with a trustee's office, where he remained for thirteen years, then relinquished his interest and opened his own office at 6 Beacon Street, which he maintained until his death.

He also had been a director of the Merchants National Bank of Boston, the Tamarack Mining Company, the Isle Royale Mining Company, the Punta Allegre Sugar Company and the Northern Texas Electric Company. Mr. Dane had served in different capacities the Boston Floating Hospital, the Milk and Baby Hygiene, the Home For Aged Women, the Danvers State Hospital and the Garland School, and had been treasurer of the Massachusetts Society for Social Hygiene and the Massachusetts Forestry Association. He had served also on the board of governors of the Harvard Club of Boston.

In 1905, Mr. Dane was elected a member of the Brookline Tree Planting Committee and was its chairman for thirty-four years. He was a selectman form 1912 to 1923 and from 1926 to 1928, and had several times declined the chairmanship.

Donated Thanksgiving Baskets

He distributed several hundred Thanksgiving baskets to underprivileged families in the town for more than thirty years. During the first World War, he was chairman of all war activities in Brookline, including the Red Cross and Liberty Loan campaigns.

Mr. Dane was a yachtsman and was owner of the steam yacht Vanda, which is widely known along the New England and New York coast. He was a member of the Harvard and New York Yacht Clubs.

He leaves a widow, the former Helen Folsom Pratt of Brooklyn, N. Y., whom he married in 1903; two sons, Ernest Blaney Jr. of Newport, R. I., and Edward Dane, Brookline Selectman and executive vice president of the Brookline Trust Company, and six grandchildren.

A funeral service will be held at 12 noon on Tuesday in the First Church, Chestnut Hill.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 5 - 1942

Serge Koussevitsky, Prokofieff Defended

Correspondent Scored For Condemning Contemporary Composition—Kirkpatrick Offers Bach Program

By H. EARLE JOHNSON

New Haven's reactionaries are not few nor far between. They attend concerts in droves! Proximity to a center of learning, to cultural enlightenment, and wartime activity designed to ameliorate the world upheaval touch some of us but little. Sunk in stolid complacency we are mentally asleep, refusing to heed the challenge of a world which needs alert and constructive thought and action.

A member of the Yale University staff has written this department a bitter complaint on the first half of the last Boston Symphony program which contained the "Requiem" by Benjamin Britten, written in memory of his parents, and the Scythian Suite by Prokofieff as "not worth sitting through—distracting in artistic noise—geometric, nerve-racking, bludgeoning." Further comparison is made to works in the Whitney Gallery and Modern Museum (foremost contemporary centers of art) which are "merely one lunatic's expression of his own peculiar eccentricities; mechanically perfect, but art—never!" Our dear Victorian includes the William Schuman Symphony played at the first Bostonian concert and mentions the young composer taking his bow "with smug satisfaction."

"Musica"—for that is the name signed to the epistle—asks the critic for help, but the critic must plead at the outset that the case is quite far gone, although not hopeless. It would be easier to ridicule the complacency, self-satisfaction, and unreasoning denunciation which the writer of this epistle shows. But that would get us nowhere. One may with greater reason point out one or two essentially delusive attitudes.

Lesson One

In the first place, "Musica" demands that all art make a direct and immediate appeal to the layman. Faith, we might suggest, is a fine thing, but how much more worthwhile is understanding. Shakespeare, Shelley, many parts of the Bible, and countless other works of art hold little attraction by a single reading. It is not often the handsome person who becomes our best friend. One brief hearing of a style, individual voice or period will not suffice for intelligent appreciation of a great work which requires open-minded and intelligent co-operation. Secondly, "Musica" implies insincerity in the works of these contemporaries. That, I submit, is a dangerous attitude in these days whether applied to works of art, acts of statesmen, or the practice of a profession. To imply that an artist is a charlatan is unfair to the individual artist and untrue to the principles of art. This point need not be labored; it is plain.

Thirdly, "Musica" makes a grave philosophical error in judging works of art on the basis of his own preconceived and limited understanding. In education, religion and elsewhere our attitude is often one of seeking enlightenment through the channel which is open to us when we are receptive. It should be so in art, which is revelatory in varying degrees, having given mankind inspiration and comfort from earliest times. As in all education and religion, the amount varies with the individual giving and receiving. The great musicians are those who have been near to the spiritual reality of their own times—not of past times, note!—and most coherent in expressing it. This is true of those who interpret the past, for that must be done in terms of present needs.

Beethoven was roundly criticized by the people of his own day for the modernism of his symphonies; all artists worthy the name have been similarly mistrusted by lesser minds. Perhaps Mr. Britten, Mr. Prokofieff and Mr. Schuman have little to which we can respond; it is not possible to know for certain until time has tested them. One might mention in passing, however, that Prokofieff's Suite (composed in 1914) has become widely accepted, that Mr. Schuman's Symphony has been termed by very respectable men as a superior work, and that Mr. Britten's voice is considered to be worth listening for. Doctor Koussevitsky's record in encouraging the best talents of the day is a notable one. He has a humility of approach which "Musica" lacks.

To "Musica," who concludes his burning words with this sentence, after giving praise to the Boston Symphony: "Why waste its tremendous power and beauty to introduce crackpots to an already nauseated public?" one can only note Doctor Johnson's rebuke to a critical friend: "I have found you a work of art; I am not obliged to find you an understanding," and avoid any further issue.

Mr. Kirkpatrick

Lest you think Mr. Ralph Kirkpatrick an odd stick who can amuse himself alone with that dry-as-du pedagogue, Johann Sebastian Bach let me help in correcting such an unfortunate impression. There are lots of people who can become quite excited over an entire program of this particular master, for Bach has proved his value by selling out the house on several occasions of late.

In New York's Town Hall Fritz Busch and Rudolph Serkin have gathered a chamber orchestra to perform the six Brandenburg Concertos. The final concert last week caused the audience to applaud between movements and to stand up and cheer at the end. Of course everybody played well, but old J. S. deserves a little credit too. Personally, I am glad that Mr. Kirkpatrick is turning to the Two Part Inventions and will play all 15 of them. So often these are thought of as exercises for little fingers preparatory to the Well-Tempered Clavier; actually they have a musical value for they are possessed of a charming simplicity which the more formidable preludes and fugues must of necessity sacrifice in the interest of advanced scientific revelation. Played ingratiatingly, as they will assuredly be by Mr. Kirkpatrick, we shall find in them a considerable delight. There are three Preludes and Fugues on the program, and two fanciful Partitas, plus the dazzling Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue by which Bach rang popularity's bell loudly.

The Friends of Music in New York presented Bach's "Musical Offering" a week ago in an orchestral version, again winning an ovation for Fritz Stiedry and the young players. While on the subject, one should say that the Annual Bach Festival at Bethlehem, Pa., will be along the first of May and that there are other Bach Societies from Boston to Pasadena. Come to think of it New Haven has a Bach Cantata Club which was making glad promises to do something noteworthy for the public this season. Mr. Kirkpatrick will be at Colonial Williamsburg from May 4 to 9 as instigator of another series of Concerts in the Governor's Palace. He will play an all-Bach program. That's all for today; Bach Wednesday.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
APR 6 - 1942

Ernest B. Dane, Industrialist, Dies at 75

CENTER HARBOR, N. H., April 6 (AP).—Ernest Blaney Dane, 75, Massachusetts industrialist and prominent in many philanthropic and civic activities, died yesterday at his Summer home.

He was president of the Brookline, Mass., Trust Co., and of the Ernshaw Knitting Co., Watertown, Mass., and Ernshaw Publications, Inc., and was president-treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He held directorships in numerous companies, including the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co., Tamarack Mining Co., Isle Royal Mining Co., Punta Alegre Sugar Co. and Northern Texas Electric Co.

Born in Brookline, Mass., Mr. Dane was educated at Hopkinson's School and at Harvard University. He was active in town affairs and served on the Board of Selectmen from 1912 to 1923.

He was a well known yachtsman. He leaves his widow, the former Helen Folsom Pratt, of Glen Cove, N. Y., and two sons.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
APR 6 - 1942

102

Barbirolli Conducts All-Wagner Program

Julius Huehn Is Soloist, Westminster Choir in Choruses

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Wagner occupied the Philharmonic-Symphony's program all by himself in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The first half presented the Prelude, Transformation Scene and Grail Scene from Act I of Parsifal, a holdover from the earlier concerts last week, and several excerpts from Die Meistersinger constituted the closing half. Julius Huehn was the soloist and the Westminster Choir, Dr. John Finley Williamson, director, also participated.

In setting forth the excerpts from the lordly Meistersinger John Barbirolli made it clear that the arrangement was not meant to be a synthesis, nor a potpourri, but rather a series of episodes banded together for concert purposes. No note was changed or added to the master's original, a few minor cuts being made for the sake of continuity.

* * *

Stormy Applause.

It was good to hear again the music of Wagner's Divine Comedy, especially since the opera was not given at the Metropolitan this last season. The sequences played were the Prelude to Act III; Sachs' Monologue, Wahn, Wahn; the Procession of the Guilds; the Dance of the Apprentices; the Procession of the Masters; the Homage to Sachs and the Finale.

It is more than likely that the large audience's demonstrative approval took in the music itself and the performance given it by the considerable forces on the stage. There were cheers and stormy applause at the conclusion. Mr. Huehn sang his lines capably and the choir labored diligently and well at their particular task.

Mr. Huehn and the choir, however, were less effective in the Parsifal offering, a matter which soon made the leap from the vocal to the orchestral mass. The whole thing did seem a bit lengthy, perhaps because it was a concert version. Yet Wagner himself authorized the very sequences offered yesterday.

* * *

Boston Symphony Concert.

Under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last local concert of the season in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. A huge audience heard a program consisting of the Tschaikowsky Romeo and Juliet Overture, the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera Kovantschina, the Third Symphony of Roy Harris and the Sixth of Shostakovich.

The playing was up to usual Boston standards, coming to its high point in the delivery of the Harris Symphony. Obviously this work is here to stay, since it has made the rounds of the nation's orchestras and with favorable effect everywhere, they tell us. This listener still finds some unattractive moments in it, though the work as a whole is one of the best yet produced by a contemporary American. Needless to say, the gathering responded nobly to the afternoon's music.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 6 - 1942

RUTH POSSELT IN CONCERT AT WOOLSEY HALL

Noted Pianist to Feature Tonight's Program of N. H. Symphony

The April Concert by the New Haven Symphony Orchestra offers a rich and varied musical menu at Woolsey Hall tonight. This is the seventh of the current concert series, which has already proved to be the most successful in the orchestra's history. Conductor Hugo Kortschak, who last took the stand for the January concert, has looked forward to this performance with unusual pleasure. He is to introduce as soloist with the orchestra the famous violinist, Ruth Posselt, and with her is to present for the first time a new composition, "Requiem, for Violin and Orchestra," recently written by his colleague, David Stanley Smith.

Miss Posselt, perhaps the foremost woman violinist of today, needs no introduction to New Haven concert-goers. Last season she appeared here as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky, who regards her as "one of the greatest violinists of our time." During recent years she has played with virtually every major orchestra in the United States. Tonight's performance is, however, her first with the New Haven Symphony. In addition to the Smith "Requiem," she is to present the rhythmic and stimulating "Symphonie Espagnol" by Lalo.

Appropriate to the season is Schumann's Symphony No. 1 with which Mr. Kortschak plans to open the program. "Could you," suggested Schumann himself to a conductor about to perform it, "infuse into your orchestra a sort of longing for the spring, which I had chiefly in mind when I wrote? The first entrance of trumpets, this I should like to have sounded as though it were from high above, like unto a call to awakening, and then I should like reading between the lines . . . how everywhere it begins to grow green, and, in the allegro how little by little all things come that belong to spring."

The remainder of the program includes two movements from the perenially popular "Coq d'Or" Suite by Rimski-Korsakov as arranged from the original opera by Glasounov and Steinberg. The two chosen are based upon the most colorful aspects and spontaneous melodies of the introduction and first act and the final dramatic climax.

This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
APR 6 1942

Ernest Blaney Dane, Prominent In East, Dies

Center Harbor, N.H., April 5.—(AP)—Ernest Blaney Dane, 75 years old, Massachusetts industrialist and prominent in many philanthropic and civic activities, died today at his summer home.

He was president of the brookline (Mass.) Trust Company and of the Ernshaw Knitting Company, Watertown, Mass., and Ernshaw Publications, Inc., and was president-treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
APR 6 - 1942

BOSTONIANS IN LAST CONCERT HERE; OTHER WEEK-END MUSIC

By Edward O'Gorman

There was a liberal exchange of enthusiasm between audiences and performers at Carnegie Hall over the week-end. The Boston Symphony, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave their last local concert of the season Saturday afternoon. John Barbirolli, extending his half-Wagnerian program of last week's concerts to an all-Wagnerian program of excerpts from "Parsifal" and "Die Meistersinger," conducted the Philharmonic-Symphony, the Westminster Choir and baritone soloists Julius Huehn and John Baumgartner yesterday afternoon. Enthusiasm and ardor were the most felt characteristics in the conducting of both Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Barbirolli, and the applause of the audience in both cases bordered on the ecstatic. Whether this acclaim went for fine music, fine playing, or was something half-engendered by fine weather was not always easy to answer.

Dr. Koussevitzky's final program was typical. It was largely Russian, half modern, including Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture - fantasy, the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantschina," the third symphony of Roy Harris, and the sixth symphony of Shostakovich.

The conductor worked up his complexion to a standing crimson by his zeal for the dramatic effect of the "Romeo and Juliet." It was not a performance to stand up under severe critical attention, but it was one to bring down the house. Both Romeo and Juliet came off well, Juliet perhaps with a lingering affection that put a slight strain on the general balance of the tempo; the warring factions conducted themselves with an immensity of sound and effectiveness very much of this age; but the exceedingly quiet, punctilious manner of Friar Lawrence in the opening bars needed either a conductor with a less ambiguous beat or a psychic wood-wind section. Here there were many uncertain attacks.

All was loveliness in the playing of the Moussorgsky prelude, a treasure of its kind. From this Dr. Koussevitzky turned to a splendid, tense performance of the still debatable but sturdy third symphony of Mr. Harris, and finally to the Shostakovich symphony, which had been given at Carnegie Hall Thursday night.

More Wagner

It was the "Die Meistersinger" excerpts, including the third-act prelude, Sachs' monologue, procession of the guilds, dance of the apprentices, procession of the masters, homage to Sachs and finale, which were new to the Philharmonic program. These enlisted the services of Mr. Huehn, who sang the music of Sachs seriously and intelligently but with little of Hans Sachs' expansiveness of character, and the choir, which sang with its usual accuracy and enthusiasm but with less than its usual good quality of tone. The "Parsifal" excerpts were those heard at last week's concerts, the first-act prelude, transformation music and grail scene. Mr. Huehn, however, was heard for the first time in the music of Amfortas. Mr. Baumgartner repeated as the voice of Titurel.

The Harvard Glee Club and the Sarah Lawrence College Chorus gave a joint concert at Town Hall Saturday night. It was the yearly visit for the men's chorus but a first appearance here for the women. The Glee Club was conducted by G. Wallace Woodworth, the Sarah Lawrence College Chorus by William Schuman.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 6 - 1942

Ernest B. Dane, 73, Dies; Boston Symphony Head

Banker Served on Boards of Several Corporations

Special to the Herald Tribune

CENTER HARBOR, N. H., April 5.—Ernest Blaney Dane, banker, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died here today at his summer home. He was seventy-three years old, and also maintained a home at 360 Heath Street, Chestnut Hill, a suburb of Boston.

Mr. Dane had been president since 1913 of the Brookline (Mass.) Trust Company, and was engaged in many other activities. He was president of the Earnshaw Knitting Company, and a director of the Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Company, Earnshaw Publications, Inc., Greater Boston Community Fund, John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company, Northern Texas Electric Company and the Tampa Electric Company.

Besides being president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mr. Dane was also its treasurer and trustee. He was formerly treasurer of the Massachusetts Society for Social Hygiene and the Massachusetts Forestry Association and governor of the Harvard Club of Boston.

Mr. Dane was also interested in yachting and owned the Vanda, built at a cost of $750,000 in 1928. He was a member of the New York Yacht Club. Surviving are his wife, Mrs. Helen Folsom Pratt Dane, and two sons, Ernest Blaney Dane jr., of Newport, R. I., and Edward Dane, selectman of Brookline.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
APR 6 - 1942

Ernest B. Dane.

Center Harbor, N. H., April 5.—(AP.)—Ernest Blaney Dane, 75 Massachusetts industrialist and prominent in many philanthropic and civic activities, died today at his summer home.

He was president of the Brookline, Mass., Trust Company and of the Ernshaw Knitting Company Watertown, Mass., and Ernshaw Publications, Inc., and was president-treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He held directorships in numerous companies, including the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company, Tamarack Mining Company, Isle Royal Mining Company, Punta Alegre Sugar Company and Northern Texas Electric Company.

Born in Brookline, Mass., Dane was educated at Hopkinson's School and at Harvard University.

He leaves his wife, the former Helen Folsom Pratt of Glen Cove, N. Y., and two sons.

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
APR 6 - 1942

Edwards Troops Demonstrate War Tactics In Boston

BOSTON, April 6. (UP)—Picked troops of the 181st Infantry from Camp Edwards today demonstrated modern warfare tactics on Boston Common as part of celebrations throughout the state in observance of Army Day.

Antitank guns, heavy and light machine guns and field mortars were used in the simulated attack on the Common which was witnessed by state, city and Army officials including Gov. Saltonstall, Mayor Maurice J. Tobin, regional Defense Director Joseph M Loughlin, and Maj.-Gen. Sherman L. Miles, First Corps Area commander.

Open house was held at both Camp Edwards and Fort Devens and the air force displayed three fighters at Boston's commonwealth airport.

Boston's celebration started when a convoy of Army trucks rolled up to the Common with the crack Camp Edwards troops. After pitching tents and setting up Army equipment, the soldiers presented a close-order drill.

Other demonstrations were given by ordnance and signal company personnel while the infantry unit donned masks for a simulated gas attack. Model gas chambers were put on display and civilians were allowed to whiff various types of gas from special "sniff sets."

Mobile kitchens also were shown and Army chefs prepared meals for the troops. Among other exhibits was a chaplain's truck and trailer complete with altar, organ and flags.

The Boston program was to close with a second drill and a band concert. A concert also featured the Camp Edwards celebration where Director Arthur Fiedler conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR
APR 6 - 1942

E. B. Dane, Financier, Dies in Center Harbor

CENTER HARBOR, N.H., April 6—(A.P.)—Ernest Blaney Dane, 75, Massachusetts industrialist and prominent in many philanthropic and civic activities, died yesterday at his summer home.

He was president of the Brookline, Mass., Trust Company, and of the Ernshaw Knitting Company, Watertown, Mass., and Ernshaw Publications, Inc., and was president-treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
APR 6 - 1942

Koussevitzky Offers Modern Works; Barbirolli, Wagner

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Half of the music in the orchestral concerts of the weekend were repetitions of works heard earlier in the week. Most intcresting were the contrasts presented by the Boston Symphony performance in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon and that of the Philharmonic-Symphony yesterday afternoon, together with Koussevitzky's "modern" program and the all-Wagner offering by Barbirolli. Since the Bostonians were at their very best, theirs was the concert of the week-end.

Repeating Tchaikowsky's overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," from the program heard at the Academy of Music the night before, and the Shostakovitch Sixth Symphony from Thursday's program, Koussevitzky offers in addition Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera, "Khovanstchina," and Roy Harris' Third Symphony, both works standard with the Boston Symphony.

That the Harris symphony should have gained a secure foothold in the orchestra's repertory is heartening. There is no doubt that in his third try Harris wrote music of consequence and that, while he gropes falteringly in finding just the right way to express himself, he has something to say which goes beyond whatever technical handicaps the music encounters in its course. Koussevitsky's belief in the work and his penetrating mastery of the score have done much for the symphony.

He must also think highly of the Shostakovitch symphony, which, curiously enough, reveals just the technical mastery that Harris needs, especially in matters of orchestration. Its Russian background poses questions of material and commonplace effects not too easily pushed aside in the light of the public favor with which the music has been received. Koussevitzky has always stated the case well for this composer and been convincing in the process.

Repeating the excerpts from Wagner's "Parsifal," Barbirolli added excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" to complete his Easter Day concert. Julius Huehn sang acceptably as Amfortas and the Westminster Choir again exhibited its fine singing. The pacing of the music was somewhat deliberate and the effects were solemn and sometimes heavy, but the Wagner music wove its customary spell.

Dane Rites Tomorrow In Brookline

Civic Leader Dies Suddenly

Funeral services for Ernest B. Dane, 73, prominent Brookline banker and Boston business man and leader in numerous civic and philanthropic activities, will be held at noon tomorrow at the First Parish Church, Walnut and Warren streets, Brookline. The Rev. George Parker, minister, will officiate.

Mr. Dane, who died suddenly yesterday at his summer home at Center Harbor, N. H., where he was on a brief vacation, was one of Brookline's most widely known citizens. He had been president of the Brookline Trust Company since 1913 and had served many years as a selectman. Town officials last night ordered flags at half-mast throughout the town until after the funeral.

He was actively engaged in many important and widespread business interests at the height of his career, and at the same time devoted much of his time to many charitable and philanthropic groups.

He began his business and banking career soon after graduating from Harvard University in 1892. He prepared for college at Hopkinson's School, Boston, and after graduating from college he became associated with a trustee's office, where he remained for 13 years. He later opened his own office at 6 Beacon street, which he maintained to the time of his death.

He was president, treasurer and a trustee of the Boston Symphony Inc., and president of the Earnshaw Knitting Co. of Watertown. He was a director of the Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Co., Earnshaw Publications, Inc., Graeter Boston Community Fund, John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co., Northern Texas Electric Co., and the Tampa Electric Co. He became director of the Brookline Trust Co., about 1905 and later became its president. He was a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music and the Provident Institution for Savings.

Born in Brookline, he was the son of Edward S. and Emma C. Blaney Dane, and lived at 360 Heath street, Brookline.

He had been affiliated with other business enterprises during the years as a director of the Merchants National Bank of Boston, Tamarack Mining Co., Isle Royale Mining Co., Punta Alegre Sugar Co. and Northern Texas Electric Co.

INTERESTED IN CHARITIES

Mr. Dane was interested in various charities, serving in different capacities the Boston Floating Hospital, Milk and Baby Hygiene, Home for Aged Women, Danvers State Hospital, Garland School, and had been treasurer of the Massachusetts Society for Social Hygiene and the Massachusetts Forestry Association. He also had been a member of the board of governors of the Harvard Club of Boston.

He began a long term of service in various Brookline town offices in 1905, when he was elected a member of the town tree planting committee. He served as chairman for 34 years and for more than a score of years had received the highest number of votes given to any candidate on the town ballot.

Mr. Dane donated and maintained the Horace James circle at Hammond street and the West Roxbury parkway. This circle, which was covered with beautiful flowers and shrubs taken from the gardens of the Dane homes, served as a traffic island.

He was a selectman from 1912 to 1923 and again from 1926 to 1928, and had several times declined to be named chairman. He had also been superintendent of moth prevention and had been a town meeting member since 1916.

His distribution of several hundred Thanksgiving baskets to underprivileged families in the town for more than 30 years had become a Brookline institution. During the world war he was chairman of all war activities in the town, including the Red Cross, and Liberty loan campaigns.

He was a widely known yachtsman, being the owner of the palatial steam yacht Vanda, which was known along the New England and New York coast.

His clubs included Harvard, Boston Yacht, University, Exchange, Algonquin and Union clubs, all of Boston; Harvard and New York Yacht clubs, New York; Eastern Yacht Club, Marblehead, and The Country Club.

He leaves a widow, the former Helen Folsom Pratt of Brooklyn, whom he married in 1903, and two sons, Ernest Blaney Dane, Jr., of Newport, R. I., and Edward Dane, Brookline selectman and executive vice-president of the Brookline Trust Company, and six grandchildren.

ERNEST B. DANE

This Clipping From
HYANNIS, MASS.
CAPE COD STANDARD TIMES
APR 7 - 1942

103

Buzzards Bay U.S.O. Serves Supper for Boston Symphony

BUZZARDS BAY, April 7—Army Day found the Buzzards Bay U.S.O. staff geared to meet the exigencies of the day.

In addition to making all the necessary arrangements to entertain visitors and escort them through the club, volunteer workers under the direction of Mrs. Austin Walker, club hostess, prepared supper for nearly 70 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra enroute to Camp Edwards for an evening concert at the Connery Avenue Theater.

The group was led by Arthur Fiedler, noted conductor, and Roger L. Voison, manager.

A gala party was conducted last night in the Sagamore Grammar School gymnasium for members of the Sagamore Detached Service Unit. More than 75 girls attended from Bourne, Sandwich, Pocasset, Onset, Wareham, Marion and New Bedford. The program was under the direction of Bramwell Gabrielson, program director, and Mrs. Austin Walker, hostess of the Buzzards Bay U.S.O. Club.

The 369th Orchestra provided music. Refreshments, transportation, checking hostesses, program and recording were handled by volunteer workers. Mr. Gabrielson acted as master of ceremonies and directed the radio recording program.

Corporal Joseph Brisa sang and recorded with the band.

Arrangements for the party were made by Captain Whitley Ackroyed, commanding officer; Sergeant F. Richards, Sergeant J. McLean, Sergeant F. Schroeder and Corporal V. Buscanera.

Ralph Anderson, snack bar operator of the U.S.O. Club, prepared refreshments.

Volunteers under the direction of Mrs. Walker were Mrs. Muriel Crabe, Mrs. Clara Gabriel, Mrs. Lester Smith, Mrs. Evelyn Hunter and Mrs. Bramwell Gabrielson.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 8 - 1942

MUSIC

Man Changing Flat Tire After Boston Symphony Orchestra's Last Concert of Season Here Is Well Pleased with Program at Metropolitan Theatre.

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

After the concert last night, there was a man in a dinner-jacket changing a tire on a parking lot near the theatre.

"Sir," we said to him, "presumably you have just come from the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre. Do you find that great music is really worth anying to you in daily life? Does it bear you up in times of trial such as this?"

He gazed rather sadly for some moments at the tire, which was what amounts to a new one these days, and as flat as an opera hat, and he said, "Yes."

"Do you mind going into more detail?"

"Not at all," he said, as he fiddled about in the dark trunk trying to loosen the nut that held the spare tire. "Tonight's program, for example, was to my liking, and I thought that the orchestra and its conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, exhibited their eminent talents with remarkable force. Who could ask for a more delightful welcome to an evening of music than Prokofieff's 'Classical' symphony? And who could ask for a more deft, supple, zestful, and thoroughly captivating performance of it? Here, be a good fellow and give me a hand with this tire. But mind, I have my eye on you. Don't try to roll it away."

While he was prying the hub cap loose with his fingernails, he went on, "Now, for the sixth symphony by Shostakovitch, that is another matter. Until tonight I had heard it only on records. A face-to-face performance is much better. Not that I am yet ready to clasp it to my bosom, but I could not fail to be aware of the power in it and to admire it as a product of a man who is, at least, a master of the means. What does this long, slow, predominantly melancholy and even tragic opening movement mean? I don't know. But the mournful melodies, the effective instrumentation, the tensing and relaxing of the fabric fascinated me. And I cannot imagine a more potent and expressive orchestral tone."

He had by now got the hub-cap off and was loosening the nuts with a wrench. The wrench slipped and he took a yard of skin off his knuckles.

"It is only a yard of skin," he said philosophically. "Now, the second and third movements are quite different. They sound as though the composer himself, overcome by the poetic gloom of the beginning, felt the need to rush about in the sunlight, dance, leap up and down, and generally assert the resilience of humankind. This he does. Dr. Koussevitzky gave these sections great verve and physical dash, I thought, without being noisy about it. Here was a performance in which both the general outlines and individual contributing passages, pronounced by flute, clarinet, English horn ,and so on, were excellent. The ecstatic applause of the audience was justified. Get the jack, will you?"

While adjusting the bumper-jack, removing the flat tire, and putting the spare in place, he expatiated upon the delights of the Brahms first symphony, with which Dr. Koussevitzky had closed the program and the season. He said that he thought the orchestra had given its best in the symphony of Shostakovitch and that it was perhaps a trifle tired at the end. Or perhaps he was tired himself. Nevertheless, the appearance of the familiar melodies, the beautiful tone of the horn, and the twilight glow that Dr. Koussevitzky imparted to the music gave him great satisfaction, he said. He tossed the tools and the flat tire into the trunk, wiped his hands on his shirt-front, and drove happily away.

and its auxiliary services to Negro recruits has been worked out after careful study, Knox said, and "the whole thing will be carried along in a cordial spirit of experimentation to make the maximum use of Negroes in the most effective way to avoid difficulties of racial character."

Negroes will get the same ratings and pay as white enlisted men and may be assigned to a variety of duty, including a special Negro outfit in the Marines, employment in Navy yards, and work on construction crews, probably small outfits similar in purpose to the Navy construction battalions.

The Navy announcement made clear that "recruiting of Negroes for service in the messman branch is to continue without change or interruption."

Naval officials said that the "same physical and mental entrance standards required of all Navy personnel is to be required of Negroes."

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 8 - 1942

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Offers Shostakovitch Piece in Concert Here

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

After the concert last night, there was a man in a dinner-jacket changing a tire on a parking lot near the theatre.

"Sir," we said to him, "presumably you have just come from the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre. Do you find that great music is really worth anying to you in daily life? Does it bear you up in times of trial such as this?"

He gazed rather sadly for some moments at the tire, which was what amounts to a new one these days, and as flat as an opera hat, and he said, "Yes."

"Do you mind going into more detail?"

"Not at all," he said, as he fiddled about in the dark trunk trying to loosen the nut that held the spare tire. "Tonight's program, for example, was to my liking, and I thought that the orchestra and its conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, exhibited their eminent talents with remarkable force. Who could ask for a more delightful welcome to an evening of music than Prokofieff's 'Classical' symphony? And who could ask for a more deft, supple, zestful, and thoroughly captivating performance of it? Here, be a good fellow and give me a hand with this tire. But mind, I have my eye on you. Don't try to roll it away."

While he was prying the hub cap loose with his fingernails, he went on, "Now, for the sixth symphony by Shostakovitch, that is another matter. Until tonight I had heard it only on records. A face-to-face performance is much better. Not that I am yet ready to clasp it to my bosom, but I could not fail to be aware of the power in it and to admire it as a product of a man who is, at least, a master of the means. What does this long, slow, predominantly melancholy and even tragic opening movement mean? I don't know. But the mournful melodies, the effective instrumentation, the tensing and relaxing of the fabric fascinated me. And I cannot imagine a more potent and expressive orchestral tone."

He had by now got the hub-cap off and was loosening the nuts with a wrench. The wrench slipped and he took a yard of skin off his knuckles.

"It is only a yard of skin," he said philosophically. "Now, the second and third movements are quite different. They sound as though the composer himself, overcome by the poetic gloom of the beginning, felt the need to rush about in the sunlight, dance, leap up and down, and generally assert the resilience of humankind. This he does. Dr. Koussevitzky gave these sections great verve and physical dash, I thought, without being noisy about it. Here was a performance in which both the general outlines and individual contributing passages, pronounced by flute, clarinet, English horn ,and so on, were excellent. The ecstatic applause of the audience was justified. Get the jack, will you?"

While adjusting the bumper-jack, removing the flat tire, and putting the spare in place, he expatiated upon the delights of the Brahms first symphony, with which Dr. Koussevitzky had closed the program and the season. He said that he thought the orchestra had given its best in the symphony of Shostakovitch and that it was perhaps a trifle tired at the end. Or perhaps he was tired himself. Nevertheless, the appearance of the familiar melodies, the beautiful tone of the horn, and the twilight glow that Dr. Koussevitzky imparted to the music gave him great satisfaction, he said. He tossed the tools and the flat tire into the trunk, wiped his hands on his shirt-front, and drove happily away.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
APR 8 - 1942

New Symphony Gets Hissed and Applauded

By Henry Simon

"I don't think I've ever heard anything I liked less," said a gray-haired lady near by. There were also some hisses.

The Philadelphia Orchestra last night under Eugene Ormandy had just given a New York premiere to William Schuman's Fourth Symphony, and I thought the unequivocal disapproval as much a compliment as the lengthy applause. For, like it or not, you can never doubt that Mr. Schuman has something to say and the technique to say it forcefully. In fact, he is bursting with so many ideas that, on first hearing, the opening movement almost falls into pieces that never quite jell until the last few pages. Then loose ends are gathered into an eloquent close.

The second movement, better integrated, contains the lyric melodiousness sometimes wanting in his earlier works, and the last movement has strong, infectious rhythms—even traces of humor. It all leaves an impression of unforced yea-saying we can well use in these times.

It was the second Schuman symphony to receive a New York premiere at the hands of a major orchestra this season, Koussevitzky and the Bostonians having played his Third Symphony a few months ago. I don't know when, if ever, an American composer has earned such recognition. The Fourth seems to me less well conceived than the Third but equally skilful with orchestral technique and bolder.

It received a fine performance, for Mr. Ormandy was in the vein last night, giving performances of the Brahms Haydn Variations, the Beethoven Seventh Symphony and the second Daphnis and Chloe Suite by Ravel with a straightforward eloquence that does not always mark his work.

This Clipping From
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL
APR 10 1942

Critics Praise Harris Work

An American symphony, played on the same program with a symphony by a European composer, was given the higher praise when Serge Koussevitzky, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played Roy Harris' Third Symphony recently in Carnegie Hall and previously in Boston at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Hall.

Composer-in-residence at Cornell, Dr. Harris acknowledged the applause given his composition at the Carnegie concert, which featured also the Symphony No. 6 by Shostakovitch.

Olin Downes, writing in the New York Times, and Virgil Thomson, in the New York Herald Tribune, came to the conclusion that the Harris work was the finer.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played Harris' Third Symphony in one of its regular concert series in Boston, simultaneously with the playing of the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch, and also with Copeland's Quiet City. "LAS," writing for the Christian Science Monitor and discussing Harris' work, asserted that in the opinion of this commentator this is the most significant symphonic work yet written by an American." Alexander Williams, commentator for the Boston Herald, wrote that "the Harris Symphony was much the strongest and most interesting work on the program. It has all that the composer might claim for it—originality, contrast, and something which Dr. Harris has always painfully avoided—charm."

While in New York for the Easter holiday, Dr. Harris was accompanied by his wife, Mrs. Johanna Harris, instructor in music at Cornell. They were the guest of W. W. Norton, a book publisher, and Mrs. Norton while in that city.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 11 1942

In PERSPECTIVE

Ivory Tower

AN open mind isn't all it's cracked up to be. At a concert, for instance, it's not always so advisable as a closed mouth.

Consider the case of a Man with an Open Mind who, unburdened by borrowed opinion, unfettered by ideological obligation, and unacquainted with the opus in question, settled down the other night to hear Shostakovich's Sixth Symphony as played by the Boston Orchestra.

For an untiring comment on that work, consult the music column of last Wednesday. For musings of a listener who too liberally unlocked the doors to the sub-leased mansions of the mind, continue reading this morning's column:

This Man with the Open Mind resolved not to be swayed pro or con by the supposition that Comrade-Composer Dmitri Shostakovich is Communist from core to coda, and a Russian whose approach is revolutionary in more ways than one.

Having thus annihilated all possible obstacles to a calm and considered evaluation of the hitherto unheard sounds or symbols, the Man with the Open Mind became utterly unconscious (an exceedingly neat trick if you can stay awake simultaneously) to all surroundings, sympathies, sentiments or sophistries that might prevent him from giving the symphony a polite reception and a fair break in his ivory tower, alias head. The Man with the Open Mind was—

Sh! Sh! Here comes Shostakovich. The first movement is about to begin with "an expressive theme stated by the woodwinds and low strings, carried by the violins into the high register." (Courtesy, Boston Symphony Orchestra program notes.) The Man with the Open Mind has completely let down the bars in front of all his brain cells. He is intellectually free to judge with equanimity, uninhibited by any fear of entangling alliances. . . .

But, after all, what are entangling alliances? . . . Having Soviet Russia on our side against the Axis doesn't destroy our democratic institutions and ideals . . . In fact, our nation would be in even graver danger than it is if the Russians weren't fighting Hitler as valiantly as they are . . . That doesn't mean we need or want the Soviet theory of government . . . Could George Washington and Thomas Jefferson have been thinking of political ideologies rather than primarily of diplomatic or military concernments when they warned us against foreign entanglements? . . . Could they have been trying to isolate us not from our world responsibilities but rather from all outside claims made and things done in the name, but not the spirit, of liberty? . . . It has been said that we Americans are too easily swept along in sympathy for any people which asserts it fights—or murders—for its freedom . . . And we've often been told during the past 20 years that we too readily believe all peoples and races are automatically and instantly capable of orderly, self-government and democratic processes such as ours . . . Maybe those charges have had some foundation. . . . In any event, and especially in view of current events, Hitler's blitz achievements to date couldn't excuse a "little" Fascism in the United States . . . The same goes for any taste of Communism, sugar-coated or rationed . . . Democracy isn't a chemical substance to be diluted or colored to suit the fancy . . . Like a symphony, it's not an end in itself but a good means to a fundamental and individual human need . . . Calling music the universal language doesn't mean everything called music is all-inclusive—or music, for that matter . . . The fellow who boasts he doesn't know a thing about music but knows what he likes has at least one leg to stand on . . . Actually he doesn't know what he really likes but there's always a chance he can love real music if he tries to understand it . . . But the American who doesn't know a thing about democracy but picks what he likes out of it to suit his own purposes is in a pretty bad way . . . And so is democracy if too many have that same outlook . . . The well-qualified musician must practise constantly . . . The symphony composer may have all sorts of other theories and quirks but if he doesn't know music and feel music he's no composer . . . The well-tempered listener, as described by Deems Taylor, may not know all the fine points but he must have qualities of sympathy and tolerance . . . The open mind—

Applause crashes through the Open Mind. The Sixth Symphony of Shostakovich has ended. But don't ask the Man with the Open Mind about it. He escaped so successfully from the cerebral concentration camp that the music completely escaped him.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 11 1942

MUSICAL EVENTS

Longs and Shorts

"Boston Symphony Orchestra program notes.)

EVERY so often, Serge Koussevitzky puts on a sales campaign for a certain composition, and last week he promoted Dmitri Shostakovich's sixth symphony, which was played at the two closing concerts of the Boston Symphony's local season. A Koussevitzky drive for a work doesn't consist only of repeat performances; it means super-playing by the band, and something of the effect of a celebrated host ceremoniously bringing out a special vintage, whose appearance at the table is both a compliment and a challenge to the guest's good taste.

The Shostakovich sixth seemed more impressive last week than it had previously. At least the long, subtle first movement did. The short second and third movements, however, still sounded as if they had no relation to the opening section. They were brilliant, clever, and entertaining, and you couldn't help enjoying the composer's immense abilities. Only, why were these nifties placed in the same symphony with that brooding, somewhat enigmatic first movement? Shall we leave the matter with this rhetorical question?

Dr. Koussevitzky prefaced the Shostakovich music with Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," one of the most ingenious and durable of twentieth-century orchestral inventions. It was done handsomely, although I seem to remember earlier hearings in which there was more humor.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 8 - 1942

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Offers Shostakovitch Piece in Concert Here

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

After the concert last night, there was a man in a dinner-jacket changing a tire on a parking lot near the theatre.

"Sir," we said to him, "presumably you have just come from the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre. Do you find that great music is really worth anything to you in daily life? Does it bear you up in times of trial such as this?"

He gazed rather sadly for some moments at the tire, which was what amounts to a new one these days, and as flat as an opera hat, and he said, "Yes."

"Do you mind going into more detail?"

"Not at all," he said, as he fiddled about in the dark trunk trying to loosen the nut that held the spare tire. "Tonight's program, for example, was to my liking, and I thought that the orchestra and its conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, exhibited their eminent talents with remarkable force. Who could ask for a more delightful welcome to an evening of music than Prokofieff's 'Classical' symphony? And who could ask for a more deft, supple, zestful, and thoroughly captivating performance of it? Here, be a good fellow and give me a hand with this tire. But mind, I have my eye on you. Don't try to roll it away."

While he was prying the hub cap loose with his fingernails, he went on, "Now, for the sixth symphony by Shostakovitch, that is another matter. Until tonight I had heard it only on records. A face-to-face performance is much better. Not that I am yet ready to clasp it to my bosom, but I could not fail to be aware of the power in it and to admire it as a product of a man who is, at least, a master of the means. What does this long, slow, predominantly melancholy and even tragic opening movement mean? I don't know. But the mournful melodies, the effective instrumentation, the tensing and relaxing of the fabric fascinated me. And I cannot imagine a more potent and expressive orchestral tone."

He had by now got the hub-cap off and was loosening the nuts with a wrench. The wrench slipped and he took a yard of skin off his knuckles.

"It is only a yard of skin," he said philosophically. "Now, the second and third movements are quite different. They sound as though the composer himself, overcome by the poetic gloom of the beginning, felt the need to rush about in the sunlight, dance, leap up and down, and generally assert the resilience of humankind. This he does. Dr. Koussevitzky gave these sections great verve and physical dash, I thought, without being noisy about it. Here was a performance in which both the general outlines and individual contributing passages, pronounced by flute, clarinet, English horn, and so on, were excellent. The ecstatic applause of the audience was justified. Get the jack, will you?"

While adjusting the bumper-jack, removing the flat tire, and putting the spare in place, he expatiated upon the delights of the Brahms first symphony, with which Dr. Koussevitzky had closed the program and the season. He said that he thought the orchestra had given its best in the symphony of Shostakovitch and that it was perhaps a trifle tired at the end. Or perhaps he was tired himself. Nevertheless, the appearance of the familiar melodies, the beautiful tone of the horn, and the twilight glow that Dr. Koussevitzky imparted to the music gave him great satisfaction, he said. He tossed the tools and the flat tire into the trunk, wiped his hands on his shirt-front, and drove happily away.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
APR 8 - 1942

New Symphony Gets Hissed and Applauded

By Henry Simon

"I don't think I've ever heard anything I liked less," said a gray-haired lady near by. There were also some hisses.

The Philadelphia Orchestra last night under Eugene Ormandy had just given a New York premiere to William Schuman's Fourth Symphony, and I thought the unequivocal disapproval as much a compliment as the lengthy applause. For, like it or not, you can never doubt that Mr. Schuman has something to say and the technique to say it forcefully. In fact, he is bursting with so many ideas that, on first hearing, the opening movement almost falls into pieces that never quite jell until the last few pages. Then loose ends are gathered into an eloquent close.

The second movement, better integrated, contains the lyric melodiousness sometimes wanting in his earlier works, and the last movement has strong, infectious rhythms—even traces of humor. It all leaves an impression of unforced yea-saying we can well use in these times.

It was the second Schuman symphony to receive a New York premiere at the hands of a major orchestra this season, Koussevitzky and the Bostonians having played his Third Symphony a few months ago. I don't know when, if ever, an American composer has earned such recognition. The Fourth seems to me less well conceived than the Third but equally skilful with orchestral technique and bolder.

It received a fine performance, for Mr. Ormandy was in the vein last night, giving performances of the Brahms Haydn Variations, the Beethoven Seventh Symphony and the second Daphnis and Chloe Suite by Ravel with a straightforward eloquence that does not always mark his work.

This Clipping From
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL
APR 10 1942

Critics Praise Harris Work

An American symphony, played on the same program with a symphony by a European composer, was given the higher praise when Serge Koussevitzky, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played Roy Harris' Third Symphony recently in Carnegie Hall and previously in Boston at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Hall.

Composer-in-residence at Cornell, Dr. Harris acknowledged the applause given his composition at the Carnegie concert, which featured also the Symphony No. 6 by Shostakovitch.

Olin Downes, writing in the New York Times, and Virgil Thomson, in the New York Herald Tribune, came to the conclusion that the Harris work was the finer.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played Harris' Third Symphony in one of its regular concert series in Boston, simultaneously with the playing of the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch, and also with Copeland's Quiet City. "LAS," writing for the Christian Science Monitor and discussing Harris' work, asserted that in the opinion of this commentator this is the most significant symphonic work yet written by an American." Alexander Williams, commentator for the Boston Herald, wrote that "the Harris Symphony was much the strongest and most interesting work on the program. It has all that the composer might claim for it—originality, contrast, and something which Dr. Harris has always painfully avoided—charm."

While in New York for the Easter holiday, Dr. Harris was accompanied by his wife, Mrs. Johanna Harris, instructor in music at Cornell. They were the guest of W. W. Norton, a book publisher, and Mrs. Norton while in that city.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 11 1942

In PERSPECTIVE

Ivory Tower

AN open mind isn't all it's cracked up to be. At a concert, for instance, it's not always so advisable as a closed mouth.

Consider the case of a Man with an Open Mind who, unburdened by borrowed opinion, unfettered by ideological obligation, and unacquainted with the opus in question, settled down the other night to hear Shostakovich's Sixth Symphony as played by the Boston Orchestra.

For an untiring comment on that work, consult the music column of last Wednesday. For musings of a listener who too liberally unlocked the doors to the sub-leased mansions of the mind, continue reading this morning's column.

This Man with the Open Mind resolved not to be swayed pro or con by the supposition that Comrade-Composer Dmitri Shostakovich is Communist from core to coda, and a Russian whose approach is revolutionary in more ways than one.

Having thus annihilated all possible obstacles to a calm and considered evaluation of the hitherto unheard sounds or symbols, the Man with the Open Mind became utterly unconscious (an exceedingly neat trick if you can stay awake simultaneously) to all surroundings, sympathies, sentiments or sophistries that might prevent him from giving the symphony a polite reception and a fair break in his ivory tower, alias head. The Man with the Open Mind was—

Sh! Sh! Here comes Shostakovich. The first movement is about to begin with "an expressive theme stated by the woodwinds and low strings, carried by the violins into the high register." (Courtesy, Boston Symphony Orchestra program notes.) The Man with the Open Mind has completely let down the bars in front of all his brain cells. He is intellectually free to judge with equanimity, uninhibited by any fear of entangling alliances. . . .

But, after all, what are entangling alliances? . . . Having Soviet Russia on our side against the Axis doesn't destroy our democratic institutions and ideals . . . In fact, our nation would be in even graver danger than it is if the Russians weren't fighting Hitler as valiantly as they are . . . That doesn't mean we need or want the Soviet theory of government . . . Could George Washington and Thomas Jefferson have been thinking of political ideologies rather than primarily of diplomatic or military concernments when they warned us against foreign entanglements? . . . Could they have been trying to isolate us not from our world responsibilities but rather from all outside claims made and things done in the name, but not the spirit, of liberty? . . . It has been said that we Americans are too easily swept along in sympathy for any people which asserts it fights—or murders—for its freedom . . . And we've often been told during the past 20 years that we too readily believe all peoples and races are automatically and instantly capable of orderly, self-government and democratic processes such as ours . . . Maybe those charges have had some foundation . . . In any event, and especially in view of current events, Hitler's blitz achievements to date couldn't excuse a "little" Fascism in the United States . . . The same goes for any taste of Communism, sugar-coated or rationed . . . Democracy isn't a chemical substance to be diluted or colored to suit the fancy . . . Like a symphony, it's not an end in itself but a good means to a fundamental and individual human need . . . Calling music the universal language doesn't mean everything called music is all-inclusive—or music, for that matter . . . The fellow who boasts he doesn't know a thing about music but knows what he likes has at least one leg to stand on . . . Actually he doesn't know what he really likes but there's always a chance he can love real music if he tries to understand it . . . But the American who doesn't know a thing about democracy but picks what he likes out of it to suit his own purposes is in a pretty bad way . . . And so is democracy if too many have that same outlook . . . The well-qualified musician must practise constantly . . . The symphony composer may have all sorts of other theories and quirks but if he doesn't know music and feel music he's no composer . . . The well-tempered listener, as described by Deems Taylor, may not know all the fine points but he must have qualities of sympathy and tolerance . . . The open mind—

Applause crashes through the Open Mind. The Sixth Symphony of Shostakovich has ended. But don't ask the Man with the Open Mind about it. He escaped so successfully from the cerebral concentration camp that the music completely escaped him.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 11 1942

MUSICAL EVENTS

Longs and Shorts

EVERY so often, Serge Koussevitzky puts on a sales campaign for a certain composition, and last week he promoted Dmitri Shostakovich's sixth symphony, which was played at the two closing concerts of the Boston Symphony's local season. A Koussevitzky drive for a work doesn't consist only of repeat performances; it means super-playing by the band, and something of the effect of a celebrated host ceremoniously bringing out a special vintage, whose appearance at the table is both a compliment and a challenge to the guest's good taste.

The Shostakovich sixth seemed more impressive last week than it had previously. At least the long, subtle first movement did. The short second and third movements, however, still sounded as if they had no relation to the opening section. They were brilliant, clever, and entertaining, and you couldn't help enjoying the composer's immense abilities. Only, why were these nifties placed in the same symphony with that brooding, somewhat enigmatic first movement? Shall we leave the matter with this rhetorical question?

Dr. Koussevitzky prefaced the Shostakovich music with Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," one of the most ingenious and durable of twentieth-century orchestral inventions. It was done handsomely, although I seem to remember earlier hearings in which there was more humor.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony is played at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week in memory of Ernest B. Dane, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, who died last Sunday. The program has also been changed to include a work that Mr. Dane much admired, the D minor Concerto of Vivaldi in the edition of Siloti. Just before performance of the Beethoven excerpt yesterday afternoon Serge Koussevitzky asked the audience to stand in silence, both in memory of the man who, as the conductor said, had done much for the orchestra and as an expression of sympathy to Mrs. Dane.

The Cecilia Society chorus, trained by Arthur Fiedler, assists in the other three scores of the program, "Symphony of Psalms" by Stravinsky, the Choros No. 10, "Rasga o Coracao" by the Brazilian composer, Heitor Villa-Lobos, and Scriabin's "Prometheus, a Poem of Fire." Jesus Maria Sanroma is pianist in Scriabin's music.

While the work of Stravinsky has been heard here a number of times, and that of Villa-Lobos was introduced to Boston a year ago last February, "Prometheus" was almost a novelty. It had been performed in Boston only twice before, in 1925. Villa-Lobos is to be credited with the most inspiriting music of yesterday afternoon, which was otherwise a bit dull. Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Sanroma and the orchestra and chorus bestowed upon Scriabin a performance of care and virtuosity, but the score belongs to an esthetic dream world which existed only for a few ivory-tower "mystics."

"Rasga o Coracao" is a living work of art, savage and primitive, but living. Between the musical art of Europe, its roots deep in centuries past, and the tribal energy of the Choros is a great gulf. A lot of good people accustomed to the niceties of European music which forms our American background will be disturbed by Villa-Lobos' crowding rhythms and jagged sonorities, no matter how often they may hear the "Rasga o Coraaco." But it is not unlikely that these elements of South American Indian and popular music which Villa-Lobos has put to such exciting use will eventually form the tissue of South American tonal art.

Melody, rhythm and harmony are, to be just a little trite, a medium of intercourse between peoples of vastly different temperament and culture. Younger people, especially, can respond to such an exotic score as this without the slightest knowledge of Brazilian language or customs.

Read the words of the Choros printed in the program book, and they don't make a great deal of sense apart from some rather vague images. But the ear and the spirit will be attracted to what the brain, selective and concrete, does not necessarily grasp. For this reason it is possible to speak with instinctive certainty of the folkish nature of Villa-Lobos' work. His idiom, to be sure, is sophisticated because it involves complication and dissonance, but under the sophistication lies human directness not limited by race or cultural history.

Of either the "Symphony of Psalms" or "Prometheus" it is not possible for this reviewer to speak enthusiastically. In the more than 11 years since the "Symphony of Psalms" was introduced here, it has become faded and more lugubrious than ever, and Stravinsky's adventurous contrasts of tones and color have lost their appeal.

Scriabin's pseudo-mystical poem must be listened to purely as music. His confused ideas of art, religion and philosophy were sheer nonsense. And as music, "Prometheus" shares the virtues and failings of Scriabin's "Divine Poem" and "Poem of Ecstasy." All are large and imposing works, intricately constructed, scored with a gifted and a lavish hand, and without musical substance of any importance whatsoever. No amount of glittering orchestral color can compensate for lack of essential ideas.

The program next week: Beethoven: First Symphony; Lopatnikoff: Violin Concerto (first performances, Richard Burgin soloist); E. B. Hill: "Lilacs"; Strauss: "Death and Transfiguration."—C. W. D.

This Clipping From
NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE
APR 11 1942

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give a special performance on April 26 for the benefit of its pension fund. The program will comprise Bach's "Magnificat" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society will assist in the performance, and the soloists will be Zina Lisichkina, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; William Hain, tenor, and Julius Huehn, bass.

Jacques De Menasce, musical refugee from Europe, will make his debut as pianist and composer at a concert on April 13 at the New York Times Hall in New York. He will present his Sonata for Violin and Piano, in collaboration with Louis Krasner. The two will also play works of Paul Hindermith and Bela Bartok.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A stimulating program in which familiarity was pleasurably balanced by novelty was that offered last night at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's final Monday concert of the season. The novelty was the Sixth Symphony of Shostakovitch, a work which evidently has made considerable headway into popular esteem since Serge Koussevitzky introduced it to Boston about a month ago. The work was preceded by the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff, and was followed by Brahms' First Symphony.

This concert was one in which the famed and fabulous virtuosity of the Boston Symphony's conductor, strings, wood, brass and percussion were always evident. Shostakovitch's exacting music was superbly done, with the orchestra showing razor-sharp precision and all its deep, clear, richness of tone. As for Mr. Koussevitzky, he seemed to be more enthralled by the music than at any of the two previous performances one had heard. And when the conductor is enthralled, the result is bound to be a reading of utmost keenness, not to say excitement.

Memory can be unreliable when it dwells upon musical performances far in the past. Yet one ventures that Mr. Koussevitzky used to play the "Classical" Symphony more delicately, a few seasons ago, than today. Last evening Prokofieff's tonal embroidery was fleet and piquant, but seemingly not so clear as formerly. No matter. The performance was one of which only a great orchestra and a conductor of wit and imagination can be capable.

The evening ended with a beautifully romantic, exciting account of Brahms' C minor Symphony. That glorious brass "chorale" which is the summit not only of the last movement but of the whole Symphony again deserved the word magnificent.

The Monday subscribers were, as usual, noisily demonstrative in their applause, and that was as it ought to have been. With repetition of the program at 3 this afternoon, the Monday-Tuesday series will be ended.—C. W. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLINTON, ILL.
JOURNAL - REPUBLIC
APR 14 1942

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give a special performance on April 26 for the benefit of its pension fund. The program will comprise Bach's "Magnificat" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral Society will assist in the performance, and the soloists will be Zina Lisichkina, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; William Hain, tenor, and Julius Huehn, bass.

* * *

JACQUES DE MENASCE, musical refugee from Europe, will make his debut as pianist and composer at a concert on April 13 at the New York Times Hall in New York. He will present his Sonata for Violin and Piano, in collaboration with Louis Krasner. The two will also play works of Paul Hindemith and Bela Bartok.

This Clipping From
BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN
APR 12 1942

Manhattan Musical Events

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

NEW YORK.

THIS has been rather a slim week for recitals and the orchestras have had things more or less their way, what with the Philharmonic and visits from both the Bostonians and the Philadelphians.

The Philadelphians, with Ormandy conducting, gave Brahms' Haydn Variations, the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, the second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite of Ravel and a new symphony, the fourth, by William Schuman. Interest, more or less, centered in the final work. The composer's third symphony had been given earlier in the winter. This one is less interesting. He seems to waver too much and too long between inspiration and form and, a great deal of the time, to be writing down exercises in free counterpoint, good in themselves but leading nowhere. None the less, the young composer will bear watching.

Koussevitzky Mixture

Admirers of Koussevitzky, and of the tripe that he often plays, had their fill this week. Fancy on one program a symphony by Roy Harris and one by Shostakovitch! As a bonne bouche, this program also included the Prelude of Mussorgsky's "Khovantchina" and the Tchaikovsky "Romeo and Juliet," the first not especially interesting and the latter better conducted by other leaders. The magnificent orchestra is kind to its conductor. Mr. Harris' opus had all the characteristics common to the composer's efforts and it does not improve particularly on acquaintance. The juxtaposition of the two works seemed also as if the conductor were trying to show that if the Russia of today is composing singularly bad music, America, like spring, cannot be far behind. At the other of his pair of concerts, the same Shostakovitch symphony, his sixth, was played, together with the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff. Mr. Koussevitzky is nothing if not a propagandist, but he did, on this program, play the first symphony of a promising composer named Johannes Brahms!

Damrosch On Podium

Walter Damrosch took the podium at a Philharmonic-Symphony concert and was greeted with much ceremony. He began with excerpts from the "Romeo and Juliet" of Berlioz (whom a recent writer referred to as "that old stuffed owl!"), a Bach Pastorale arranged for orchestra by himself, and his ballad, "The Looking Glass," a poem of Kipling's from, if memory serves, "Rewards and Fairies," sung by Kerstin Thorborg. Of course, there had to be some Beethoven on any program led by Damrosch so, this time, it was the "Egmont" Overture. Mme. Thorborg also sang two of Berlioz's songs. Unfortunately the orchestra did not play up and the sum total was not as good as it should have been. Also, Mme. Thorborg, for all her artistry, was somewhat out of her element. However, a crowded and enthusiastic house was loud in its applause.

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Monday Symphony

The sixth and final concert of the Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Classical Symphony Op. 25.....Prokofieff
Symphony No. 6 Op. 53.....Shostakovitch
Symphony No. 1 in C minor Op. 68.Brahms

Not a great deal need be said in review of this concert, which will be repeated tomorrow afternoon, inasmuch as Dr. Koussevitzky chose to repeat verbatim one of the regular programs of a few weeks back and the Shostakovitch 6th Symphony was even at that time repeated from the week before. Such devotion argues a great faith in the new work in question. There is no question that the Symphony is a much finer work than the same composer's 5th, to which also in the past seasons rather excessive attention has been paid. But we doubt if it is worth quite as much fuss as all this; or at the least it is possible to claim that there are other modern works which are fully as meritorious and which meanwhile have to stand aside while Shostakovitch gets all the limelight.

In extenuation it may be advanced that Dr. Koussevitzky makes a wonderful effect with the 6th Symphony, that the last two movements are dazzling by the brilliance of their execution and that the opening largo is impressively solemn in the Boston Symphony's performance. But when has Dr. Koussevitzky so signally failed to bring out hidden merits in other modern scores? There are many virtues in the Shostakovitch 6th Symphony, which were duly acknowledged on all sides; but the qualities of the slow movement, which at first seemed most remarkable, are wearing dangerously thin and it is, after all, a perfectly simple matter to assimilate them and the wit of the scherzo and finale without the special benefit of repeated hearings. It is high time to put both the 5th and 6th Symphonies aside for a space and turn our ears toward other masterpieces. Did not Dr. Koussevitzky promise us the 3rd Symphony of Prokofieff, for example, which is as yet unheard here and would fully as well celebrate the achievements of our Russian allies?

Prokofieff's Classical Symphony and the Brahms No. 1 are old and familiar stories on Boston Symphony programs and no less welcome for that in these days. They were beautifully read and superbly played and renewed the impression of a few weeks ago that this was a memorable concert.

Lopatnikoff Violin Concerto With Mr. Burgin for Soloist

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Nicolai Lopatnikoff, a composer of Russian birth and childhood, of refugee-European youth, and of immigrant - American maturity, sends to Serge Koussevitzky from New York a violin concerto which he has lately written. He has contributed a work or two before for presentation by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and now he comes with his latest, designated Opus 26, to be produced at this week's concerts, with Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, taking the solo part.

This means an adventure for Dr. Koussevitzy of the sort he seems to crave about once a fortnight, or once a month at any rate—the study and mastery of a new score, and an adventure also for his players in organizing their sonorities into combinations unknown before and in solving problems of execution posed to them for the first time. Further considered, it means a call on the judgment of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening listeners, along with a challenge to their zeal for novelty.

* * *

Necessarily it means, too, a cut-down in the classic ration. But in a larger way, it signifies that the community grants the modern period opportunity to be heard and allows present thinking a voice as well as that of times gone. For musical expression has altered much in recent decades, and composers are saying things perhaps imagined though hardly uttered before. As for conductors, they have a versatility of interpretation that even their most brilliant predecessors knew not; and in regard to instrumentalists, they have both individual and ensemble capacities that men of a while ago in their various lines may have hoped for but certainly failed to attain.

* * *

Briefly said, an orchestra no longer plays pieces; it promulgates idea. Why, then, should such a force not be permitted full rein? Here is the Boston Symphony trained to the last demand for taking up a work like the Lopatnikoff concerto just as it comes off the writing desk and for rendering its pages into living sound. Go ahead, of course; and to take an advance look at the notes as they stand in the manuscript, we find something not so irregular, after all, as we might suppose. Three movements — Allegro, Andante, and Allegro con brio non troppo. Nothing could be more within the bounds of propriety as regards form; and nothing, moreover, in the instrumental layout could be less pretentious or further removed from the sensational.

Naturally, the complete twentieth-century orchestra is called for. Nothing could be more bumptious and affected than to reduce the tone coloring of the accompanying choirs to an old-school grayness and neutrality, lest the light tint of the solo violin should be obscured. That is where modern knack and style come in. The scoring must meet the problem; and to judge by appearances, Mr. Lopotnikoff's scoring does meet it with eminent success.

Take the fashioning of the first movement. The violin plays against a full orchestra, but the scoring is open. Much pizzicato in the strings and a general staccato in the woods and brasses let the solo melody through. Then, when arrives an interlude for orchestra without the solo instrument, all sections let go in full resonance.

* * *

Talk about percussion, a passage well along in the opening Allegro is set for violin and drums, big drum as well as the kettles, which should give a pulsating effect of a lively sort, suppose the players attend to what they are doing, each one maintaining the right proportion of sound.

The solo part in the Allegro is very active, inclining not a little to the showy and exploring the lower portions of the violin's scale no less than the upper. A cadenza of alluring outline confirms the idea that the composer intends his enterprise to be characterized by display.

The Andante wears the look of gentle music, conceived in a lonesome vein. A mournful ditty for the solo violin runs along to a generally subdued accompaniment in a rhythm of threes. An extremely moderate pace and a mood of quiet raises question whether romanticism is not here having momentary revival.

Attempts at the comic are hardly expected in a concerto, yet something of the sort occurs in the last movement of this one. As in the first movement, the composer employs a pizzicato and staccato technique, and so secures a very open texture. The soloist is indulged with but scant rest; glockenspiel and even cymbals rush in on him in a startling, though not an unsettling fashion. When interest does shift to the orchestra, the composer again goes sentimental. At the end he gets matters into a whirl; and yet, no ponderous or laborious coda for him. He closes brilliantly and with decision.

Lopatnikoff's Violin Concerto

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Nikolai Lopatnikoff heard his Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, Opus 26, performed for the first time at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky directing and Richard Burgin taking the solo part. He had the satisfaction not only of listening to a careful and interested presentation by conductor and players, but that also of having his work attentively considered and applauded by the discerning Friday matinee audience.

Such an event ought to be plenty for a composer who has resided in America a mere three years and who has completed his work within but a few months. That is the way, however, with Boston Symphony policies. Music that bears marks of authentic craftsmanship is not allowed to lie around neglected but is seized upon and put to public test without delay. The artists of the organization are, on their side, keen to have some fresh reading and interpreting to do, and the subscribers, on theirs, are as cordial toward what speaks for the present moment as they are toward what tells a familiar story.

Given conditions of the sort, a new piece has a fair chance and it goes well at its première. We do not have to look ahead to a second trial to make up our minds. Reasonably, then, we may call the concerto, for the time being at least, a success. Should it stick by us and seem to want another turn, let us, in all convenience, have it over again. If, on the contrary, it should slip out of recollection, sufficient the day and the deed.

Primary query, is the Lopatnikoff work really a concerto?

In the old notion of the term—signifying a florid study for solo instrument with accompaniment scored for orchestra—it is something more than, or at any rate something else than, a concerto. For here the two elements, the violin in the principal role of song and recitation, and the orchestral choirs in the secondary role of support, relief, and contrast, are inseparable. The music is one; nothing double about it.

In fine, the work is a concerto in a very modern definition. Discussion by way of preview took place earlier in the week, and the outcome verifies for the most part what was then noted. As to what passages are the most pleasurable, perhaps most approval belongs to the second movement, the Andante, which is written in a truly lyrical style and is imagined in an unusual mood. The Andante seems truly to possess the charm of novelty and originality, though possibly the charm appears only here and there, and scatteringly rather than pervasively. Next in uncommon effect is the opening of the third movement, which is all wit and snap.

Broadly, sentiment and comedy are the striking traits of the composition, and suffice to remark of Mr. Burgin as soloist that he brought out these qualities most admirably. For program setting, the concerto was preceded by Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C major, Opus 21; and was followed by Edward Burlingame Hill's "Lilacs," Poem for Orchestra, Opus 33 (After Amy Lowell), and Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" Tone Poem, Opus 24. Both the composer of the concerto and the composer of "Lilacs" were in attendance, and each in his turn was led out on the platform by Dr. Koussevitzky to receive the plaudits of the house.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

Boston Symphony

"Magnificat" and 9th Symphony for Pension Fund

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the twenty-third pair of regular subscription concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, offering Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, Nicolai Berezowsky's viola concerto, for the first time in Boston, and Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy." Louis Bailly will be the viola soloist in the Berezowsky and Berlioz works. The concerto was played here by the National Orchestral Association under Leon Barzin at Carnegie Hall Feb. 28, with the composer as soloist.

The orchestra will give its ninety-third Pension Fund benefit concert next Sunday afternoon, April 26, at Symphony Hall under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth. The program consists of Bach's "Magnificat" in D and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The vocal soloists will be Zina Lisichkina, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; William Hain, tenor, and Julius Huehn, barytone.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 19 1942

CONDUCTING REVIEWED

By VIRGIL THOMSON

EXCEPT for the regular visits of the Boston and the Philadelphia orchestras, New York has heard no outside symphonic ensembles this season. But we have heard conductors from everywhere. We have heard none of these (excepting Koussevitzky and Ormandy and possibly Barbirolli) under ideal conditions. By this I mean that they have mostly been heard conducting orchestras they had not selected or trained; orchestras that are not their orchestras. Under such circumstances the finer details of execution, if not absent altogether, are always lacking in the spontaneity that is a product of long association between the musicians and their leader. On the other hand, the leaders (and the musicians, too) have all been heard under identical conditions; so that comparisons of musicianship and of style are more fairly based than usual. The Philharmonic and the City Symphony have been running what it is legitimate to consider as a kind of competition which, if it did not exhibit everybody at his best or anybody completely, did show them all playing the same game with the same equipment.

* * *

The Philharmonic's Guests

THERE is no question, I think, that with standard Philharmonic equipment, Mr. Koussevitzky has produced the best all-around result of the year. His work and that of the orchestra sounded assured, sensible, eloquent, correct. No air of improvisation and no unexpected technical emergencies marred its musicality or interrupted its flow. It was calm and powerful and efficient and well bred. Its most impressive quality was its dependability. One knew from the beginning it was going to be all right, and it was. Buying a ticket to one of his concerts was like buying a ticket to a concert by Toscanini or buying a record by Beecham, a wholly calculable investment.

Everybody else who has led the Philharmonic this season has been, by comparison, a blind date. The great Stokowski, ordinarily a conductor of high technical finish, did some good work and some very bad. Rodzinski, of Cleveland, a most efficient workman on the whole, did brilliant renditions of Hindemith and of Berlioz; but having spent more time rehearsing one of these than was proportionally allowable, he gave an unprepared reading of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" that was higgledy-piggledy. Busch's work was neither musically nor technically quite up to big-time standards; and the same is true, I understand (I unfortunately missed his concerts), of Goossens's. Damrosch was variable in his readings, but he got the loveliest sound out of the Philharmonic I have ever heard anybody get. Mr. Barbirolli, the Philharmonic's titular conductor, was conducting his own orchestra and so not fairly admissable to the guest competition. His work was very much as it always is, competent but a little rough, and his musical conceptions somewhat lacking in nobility.

The Mitropoulos concerts were wholly dependable technically. Musically they varied a good deal. Some of them were nervous and violent, others calm almost to the point of platitude. He played more of the important new music than any of the other leaders did, played it clearly and efficiently and for the most part convincingly. Of them all, his case remains the least decisive. He is a great workman, certainly. He is an interesting musician, certainly. The exact nature of his musical culture and personality remains, however, vague. He seems to be oversensitive, overweaning, overbrutal, overintelligent, underconfident and wholly without ease. He is clearly a musician of class, nevertheless, and a coming man of some sort in the musical world.

The contrary from every point of view is Bruno Walter. Musically he is most dependable, though his effective range of repertory is small, being limited chiefly to the German Romantics. His specialty is the late German Romantics, Bruckner and Mahler, though his Schumann is equally fine and his Beethoven has juice. At one time he enjoyed considerable prestige for his conducting of Mozart, though his readings in this repertory have never been able to stand competition with Beecham's. Nevertheless, in the narrow field of his specialization, Walter is a rich musical mind, a conductor whose work has breadth and depth and a certain grand sincerity. He is also a technician of high quality. Unfortunately, he is undependable technically. His concerts, even the best of them, are marred by a sloppiness of beat and a general indifference to shipshapeness of execution that tend to alienate those elements of the public that are not wholly absorbed by the music he is playing. At his best he is one of the great living interpreters of music. When not at his best, he is still an authentic musician and worth hearing. But the concentration of thought and energy that underlies his best work seems not always to be wholly at his command.

* * *

The Mayor's Guests

THE CITY SYMPHONY has worked under a great variety of leaders this year, and I have not been able to hear them all. The great ones, of course, have been Beecham and Reiner. The former is a flood, a volcano, an earthquake, and as unpredictable as any of these. The latter is as calculable as the stars and about as distant. It is too bad we didn't hear them both with the Philharmonic, instead of several of the lesser musicians whom we did. But it was an invaluable privilege, of course, for the Mayor's boys to play under them. It is invaluable also to have two orchestras in New York completing each other's repertory and playing to somewhat different musical publics. The City Symphony has produced a great deal of new music and has been honored by the appearance of hitherto little known soloists and conductors. Among the latter, all of whom I have not heard, Mr. Henri Pensis impressed me as being extraordinarily dependable both technically and musically and an artist of high intelligence and power. I fancy he, too, is some kind of coming man and that we shall be hearing more and more of him.

* * *

Chamber Concerts and Single Works

AT ORCHESTRAL concerts of less than heroic pretensions it is not fair to match conductors, because on these occasions the music itself is more the subject of everybody's interest than the finest executant style. But in a seasonal review of conducting one does remember, all the same, the excellent work of Stiedry and Szell at the New Friends of Music, the liveliness of Saidenberg with his Little Symphony and of Farbman with his so-called "Symphonietta," the thoroughly intelligent programing of new music by Miss Petrides at the concerts of her "Orchestrette Classique," and the elegant renditions of classic small scores by Adolf Busch and by the French flutist, René Leroy. All these one is thankful for, all these and Alfred Wallenstein, too, who plays reams of fine music, new and old, over the radio and plays it admirably.

The season's finest orchestral playing, as a whole, has been done by the Boston Symphony. The most satisfactory renditions I have heard of modern pieces were Mitropoulos's readings of Aaron Copland's "Statements" and of Hindemith's Symphony No. 1 at the Philharmonic. The most revelatory of an older work I should say was Beecham's rendering of Haydn's Ninety-ninth at a concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra, though his playing of the Berlioz Chasse Royale from "The Trojans in Carthage" at a concert of the City Symphony will run his Haydn a close second for vigor and finesse and sheer musical grandeur.

The best single conducting job I heard at the Metropolitan Opera this winter was Beecham's "Faust." The best dramatic conducting I have heard outside the Met. was Smallens's "Porgy and Bess," though Fritz Busch's "Macbeth" at the New Opera Company merits a memento. For these and all similar blessings may we ever remain duly thankful.

Boston Symphony to Fill Worcester Date of Philadelphia Group

WORCESTER, April 21—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to the rescue of the 3561 Worcester residents who, for 24 hours ending late tonight, were confronted with a sudden gap in their musical nourishment.

These residents had purchased tickets, 13 months ago, for a concert Thursday night by the Philadelphia Orchestra to be held at the Worcester Memorial Auditorium. They had bought out the house.

Then last night the Philadelphia Orchestra cancelled its concert because Pullman cars were not available for transportation owing to Army priorities.

In making the announcement that the concert was cancelled, Arthur J. Dann, president of the Worcester Civic Music Association, sponsoring the concert, the last of its season's series of four, said that the orchestra was perfectly willing to come to Worcester in day coaches, but that the rules of the musicians' union prevented its members taking a trip except in Pullmans.

As soon as Dann was notified that the Philadelphia Orchestra couldn't come, he appealed to the Boston Symphony to play instead, or at least enlist the help of some other orchestra.

At a late hour tonight he was notified that the Boston Symphony would be there en masse—so everybody's happy.

Change in Boston Symphony Program for This Week

The program for the 23d pair of concerts this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be altered, to begin with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major for string orchestra.

The remaining numbers—Berezowsky's Viola Concerto and Berlioz' Symphony, "Harold in Italy," with Louis Bailly as viola soloist—stand as previously announced. Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, originally planned for this week, will be performed next week instead.

Change Announced In Symphony Program

The program for the 23d pair of concerts this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be altered to begin with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major for string orchestra. The remaining numbers, Berezosky's Viola Concerto, and Berlioz's symphony, "Harold In Italy," with Louis Bailly as viola soloist, stand as previously announced. Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, originally planned for this week's concerts, will be performed next week instead.

Worcester to Hear Symphony Tuesday---'No Substituting'

[Special Dispatch to The Herald]

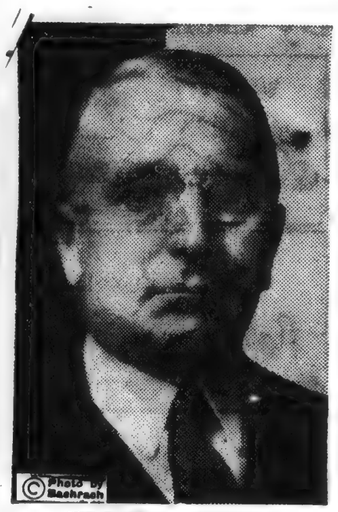
WORCESTER, April 21—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at the Municipal Auditorium, April 28 as a result of the cancellation of a concert Thursday night by the Philadelphia Orchestra, whose members could not get Pullman accomodations because of war transportation problems.

This was announced tonight by Arthur J. Dann, president of the Worcester Civic Music Association. Aat the same time Dann denied there was a union rule involved in the cancellation, explaining it was a "general understanding that symphony musicians could not expect to be in their best trim if permitted to travel by day coaches."

Dann added he had not heard of any offer by the Philadelphia musicians to travel by coach in order to keep the engagement here Thursday night. He pointed out the orchestra undoubtedly could not be in good condition to play in Philadelphia Friday afternoon after traveling by day coach at the conclusion of their scheduled appearance here late Thursday night.

In announcing the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Tuesday night at 8:15 o'clock, Dann asserted: "This is in no case a substitution. The Boston Symphony Orchestra does not substitute for anyone.

He added arrangements for the appearance of the Boston group were made during the day with George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct.



JEROME D. GREENE

Greene Elected Head Of Symphony Trustees

Jerome D. Greene of Cambridge, secretary to the Harvard University corporation, was elected yesterday president of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with whom he has served since 1938.

He became the fourth president of the trustees since the orchestra was incorporated in 1918 and succeeds the late Ernest B. Dane of Brookline, who died April 5. He is a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music, the Cambridge Hospital and other institutions.

Othere elected were Henry B. Cabot, treasurer, and Henry B. Sawyer, vice-president. Remaining trustees are Reginald C. Foster, Alvan T. Fuller, N. Penrose Hallowell, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Roger I. Lee, Richard C. Paine and Bentley W. Warren.

Greene Heads Boston Symphony

BOSTON, April 23 (AP)—Jerome D. Greene of Cambridge, Mass., secretary to the board of overseers of Harvard University, has been elected president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed the la Ernest B. Dane.

Jerome D. Greene Succeeds Dane as Symphony Head

Boston Banker, Harvard Secretary, Is Elected President of Trustees

Jerome D. Greene, Boston banker and educational administrator, was elected president of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a special meeting of the Board yesterday afternoon.

Greene is the fourth to hold this position since the orchestra was incorporated in 1918 on the retirement of Henry L. Higginson. He succeeds Ernest B. Dane, who held the office from 1938 until his death April 5.

Greene has been a trustee of the Boston Symphony since 1938. For the same period he has been secretary to the Corporation of Harvard and was director of the Harvard Tercentenary Celebration.

He is a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music, the Cambridge Hospital and many other institutions. For years he was trustee of the Rockefeller Foundation. He lives at 54-A Garden st., Cambridge.

Henry B. Cabot was elected treasurer; Henry B. Sawyer is vice president. The remaiinng trustees include Reginald C. Foster, Alvan T. Fuller, N. Penrose Hallowell, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Roger I. Lee, Richard C. Paine and Bentley W. Warren.

Jerome Greene Heads Boston Orchestra

Succeeds Late Ernest B. Dane As President

BOSTON—Jerome D. Greene, of Cambridge, was elected president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a special meeting of the board this afternoon.

Mr. Greene, the fourth who has held this position since the orchestra was incorporated in 1918 at the retirement of Henry L. Higginson, succeeds Ernest B. Dane, who held this office from 1938 until his death April 5. Mr. Dane had long served on the board.

Henry B. Cabot was elected treasurer; Henry B. Sawyer retains his office as vice-president. The remaining trustees include Reginald C. Foster, Alvan T. Fuller, N. Penrose Hallowell, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Roger I. Lee, Richard C. Paine and Bentley W. Warren.

Mr. Greene has been a trustee since 1938. From the same year he has been secretary to the board of overseers of Harvard University, is secretary to the corporation, and was the director of the Harvard tercentenary celebration. He is likewise a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music, the Cambridge Hospital and other institutions. He was trustee of the Rockefeller Foundation for a number of years.

This is the final week of the regular orchestra season. The 57th Pops season at Symphony Hall opens May 5.

REVIVE BERLIOZ AT SYMPHONY

"Harold in Italy" Touch of Excitement

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A Symphony season that of late had begun to droop sadly from lack of musical interest (something quite distinct from the nature of the performances) got straightened up quite a bit yesterday by a long-overdue revival of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" Symphony. The pretext of this, our first hearing of "Harold" since the fall of 1919, was the the presence of Louis Bailly as viola soloist. Besides playing the important obligato in the Symphony Mr. Bailly assisted in the Boston premiere of the new Concerto of Nicolai Berezowsky. A programme that ran wholly to B's began with Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto with the usual Koussevitzkyan interpolation of the Sinfonia from the Cantata, "Christ Lay in Bands of Death," between the two Allegros.

Since novel music should claim first consideration, let it be said that Mr. Berezowsky, a fertile and resourceful composer who has been well represented at Symphony Hall, has put together a Viola Concerto of no great moment with some dry and labored pages, and some that are quite diverting. The introductory Recitative and Variations is mostly on the dry side. The succeeding Allegretto rubato, in the style of a "clumsy country dance," is genuinely amusing and actually caused laughter, something rare at a Symphony concert. The next two movements are up and down, but the last is mostly gay and ends quite fetchingly.

An admirable musician and virtuoso, well known here if only through his connection with the Flonzaley quartet of blessed memory, Mr. Bailly apparently was doing all that could be done for Mr. Berezowsky, and his contribution to the remarkable performance of Berlioz' Symphony was notable.

If Mr. Berezowsky has his ups and downs, so does Berlioz, though the latter's ups are considerably higher up and the downs are very different. It has been said that "Berlioz' best is wonderful; his worst is appalling—and the twain, with the degrees between them, are inextricably confused together." In the case of "Harold," however, we have there movements that may be accepted in toto and a fourth, the "Orgy of Brigands," that in spots is pretty dreadful. (Berlioz was never an advocate of half measures, but it did seem yesterday as though Dr. Koussevitzky made matters worse than need be in the brass and percussion sections. This reviewer's ears are still ringing.)

But when we realize that this symphony, so prophetic of later musical ways—in places it sounds almost contemporaneous—was composed in 1834, we are filled with wonder and amazement. Consider that at that time Liszt had written no orchestral music and Wagner nothing of the slighest consequence.

This historical angle aside, "Harold" contains enough of charm and imagination, of picturesqueness and poetry to keep it alive for many a decade to come.

Except for his perhaps pardonable dynamic excesses in the Finale, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted "Harold" with such sympathy, such burning eloquence that his previous neglect of the work is hard to understand. The Bach, as always, was played superbly.

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

APR 24 1942

NAMED TO BOARD

Boston, April 23—(AP)—Jerome D. Greene, of Cambridge, Mass., secretary to the board of overseers of Harvard university, today was elected president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He succeeds the late Ernest B. Dane.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

APR 24 1942

Greene Heads Boston Symphony

BOSTON, April 23 (AP)—Jerome D. Greene of Cambridge, Mass., secretary to the board of overseers of Harvard University, has been elected president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed the late Ernest B. Dane.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A Spring afternoon like yesterday is an ideal time to revive Hector Berlioz' romantic Symphony, "Harold in Italy." There is something about warmish, sunlit weather that lends added excitement to music already so colorful and passionate. Exciting the Symphony was indeed, challenging Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to an astonishing show of interpretive warmth and technical brilliance. Such a performance you will remember for years. While the revival went without much advance heralding, it turned out to be one of the major accomplishments of the season.

Both for "Harold in Italy" and Nicolai Berezowsky's Viola Concerto, Op. 28, which was performed for the first time in Boston, the orchestra had the able collaboration of Mr. Louis Bailly as viola soloist. The Third Brandenburg Concerto of Bach began the concert.

"Harold in Italy" refutes the standard argument that there is usually a reason for music of the past not being played in the present. Here is a score just as much alive today as ever. It demands a first-rate orchestra, of course, and a conductor who can sail into its ardors and pictorial details with absolute conviction. These conditions met, the Symphony is, as they say, a knockout! It is incredible that the Boston Symphony had neglected it since 1919!

Don't try to analyze the score intellectually. That can't be done. "Harold In Italy" is pure feeling, pure romanticism, and you have to meet Berlioz on his own terms. It is to be heard through the ears and the senses, not through the brain. The colors are lavish, the passion unrestrained.

If you happen to be fond of Byron, don't attempt to associate the music closely with the Italian canto of "Childe Harold." Berlioz appropriated the name of the hero of Byron's poem, but went no further. All the rest came from the composer's imagination, and from his memories of Italy when he was a young student on a Prix de Rome from the Paris Conservatory.

Far ahead of his time, Berlioz made exceptional demands on the orchestra. There are passages for brass, in the first and last movements, of utmost speed and difficulty. They must be played with hair-trigger accuracy. The precision and the quality of those instruments, also their phrasing, were a conspicuous glory in yesterday's performance. All the other sections have to meet similar exactions. To these ears the Boston Symphony never sounded more brilliant, nor was its tone ever more round and plangent. As for interpretation, Serge Koussevitzky is just the man for Berlioz. One hopes he can find his way to give us more unfamiliar Berlioz next season.

It was too bad the Symphony overshadowed Mr. Berezowsky's Viola Concerto, which is engaging and pleasant. The Russo-American composer evidently had no intention of writing either a show-piece for the soloist or a large-scaled symphonic work. It is all diminutive and pleasant, the second and fourth movements definitely waggish. Four movements, instead of the conventional three for a concerto, are a departure in form, and so is the inner construction of the first movement, involving an introduction, a distinctive recitative for the solo viola, and a set of variations. Mr. Berezowsky likes tunes and mild dissonance, which complement each other quite nicely.

Louis Bailly is a great musician. His technic may be declining—he was just a shade below the pitch a good deal of the time—but even so, he traversed both Symphony and Concerto with notable success. The slow movements of each he phrased beautifully. And the tone, so rich and pure and warm, which he obtains from the viola, is something to be enshrined in aural memory.

As for Bach, the Third Brandenburg Concerto went its genially mechanistic way as it always does.

This program will be repeated tonight at 8:15. Next week's concerts are the last of the season. The program assembles the Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, by Vaughan Williams; Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy; the second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite by Ravel, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.—C. W. D.

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN
SUNDAY HERALD

APR 26 1942

PERMANENT

VIVALDI: CONCERTO GROSSO — The Venetian composer wrote a number of concerti grossi, works for a group of instruments and orchestra. The concerto in D minor, eleventh of a set of a dozen known as the Harmonious Rapture, is performed by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the orchestration by the Russian musician Siloti. This is rich, live music, showing off the Boston strings. On the fourth side is The Last Spring, the second of Grieg's Two Elegiac Melodies, and elegiacally poured by Koussevitzky & Co. (Victor.)

THIS CLIPPING FROM KEY WEST, FLA.
CITIZEN

APR 27 1942

RED FLAG IS IN D.A.R. AUDITORIUM

INTERNATIONALE', HYMN OF OF REVOLUTION, PLAYED IN WASHINGTON

(Associated Press dispatch in "New York Journal-American, April 1)

WASHINGTON, April 1.—It really did happen, and 4,000 people today can testify it did.

Amid applause from a fashionable audience, the Red banner of Soviet Russia was brought onto the platform of Constitution Hall, built and owned by outspoken opponents of Communism, the Daughters of the American Revolution.

The presentation of the flags of the twenty-six United Nations —the Soviet banner among them —was an impressive high spot on the Russian War Relief program given last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sponsors rented the stronghold of the DAR, the Capital's large auditorium.

Included in the rental fee were ushers with DAR armbands. They stood at attention as did Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Maxim Litvinoff, the Soviet Ambassador, and Madame Litvinoff; Mrs. Woodrow Wilson and the audience as Serge Koussevitsky conducted the playing of the Internationale and the Star Spangled Banner.

It was the first time the Soviet national anthem had been played in the American Capital by a major orchestra and certainly the first time by any one from the platform of Constitution Hall.

The list of patrons was headed by President Roosevelt, who seldom lends his name to a cause and Mrs. Roosevelt.

ANNA KASKAS, soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Pension Fund Concert to be given at Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3:30. She will sing both in the Bach "Magnificat" and in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Beethoven's 9th Symphony, Amaya in Flamenco Dances

THE soloists are announced for the Pension Fund Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, April 26, at at 3:30. Serge Koussevitsky will then conduct the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven in D minor. Before the Symphony, excerpts from Bach's "Magnificat," unheard here for a number of years, will be performed. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, will join the orchestra in the "Magnificat" and in Beethoven's setting of Schiller's "Ode to Joy" in the Finale of the Symphony. The quartet of soloists to be heard in both numbers will be as follows: Zina Lisichkina, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; William Hain, tenor, and Julius Huehn, baritone.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra is entering upon the last week but one of its 61st season, and will give its 23d pair of concerts in Symphony Hall under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Louis Bailly, the French virtuoso of the viola, will be the soloist at this pair of concerts. Mr. Bailly was a member of the Capet Quartet of France and is remembered in this country particularly as a member of the Flonzaley Quartet. He will be heard at the coming concerts in two numbers. A new concerto for viola and orchestra by Nicholai Berezowsky will be one of them. Composed last summer, it has been performed in Chicago and New York.

Dr. Koussecitsky will revive the Symphony of Berlioz, "Harold in Italy," for orchestra with viola solo. "Harold in Italy" has not been performed at these concerts since 1919.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Louis Bailly, violist, was the soloist, and the program was as follows:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major for stringed orchestras ..... Bach
Concerto for Viola and Orchestra, Op. 28 ..... Berezowsky
"Harold in Italy," Op. 16 ..... Berlioz

A splendid concert from practically any point of view was this next-to-last concert of the Boston Symphony. Excepting, of course, for the marvelous mathematics of the 3d Brandenburg Concerto, there was little music revealing the self-discipline of the truly great, but this is no time of year for discipline, and few could deny the instantaneous appeal of the new Berezowsky concerto for viola, or the hectic intoxications of the Berlioz symphony "Harold in Italy."

It is becoming increasingly apparent that Berezowsky's talents are to be seriously considered among his American contemporaries. Yet the viola concerto does not rank with other of his works, and is very much in the nature of a rather sportive interlude between more serious efforts. Its two fast movements (there are four movements in place of the usual three) are outright burlesques, and although they are undeniably amusing, they are also undeniably close to being unabashed bids for favor. The allegretto rubato section, indeed, would bring down the house at a Pops concert. Not that there's anything wrong in that, of course, but it does seem odd to include two such hilarious sections in what is otherwise a fine, if overly romantic, piece.

At any rate, the concerto is a welcome addition to the greviously slim repertoire for the viola, which, although it lacks the extreme flexibility and the brilliant tone of the violin, can be one of the noblest of solo instruments. Such an instrument it was yesterday in the hands of the eminent French violinist, Louis Bailly, who made his debut in Boston at this concert. His mastery of the technical aspects was equalled only by the ravishing tone colors at his disposal, but he did, however, err frequently in matters of pitch. His style was that of the perfect ensemble musician rather than that of the virtuoso, a fact which had a tendency to diminish his effect upon the audience more than it should have.

"Harold in Italy" turned out to be a gratifying revival. Its bombast may be naive to an audience aware of the stupendous effects of the orchestra of Stravinsky or Prokofieff; its tonal palette may be pale beside the gorgeous hues of Scriabin or Ravel, and its uninhibited lyricism may be embarrassing to a Hindemith ir a Piston. It is nonetheless an effective and lovely composition, and we cannot bue be indebted to Mr. Koussevitzky for letting us hear it, especially as his flair for Berlioz is so intense as to reduce the potential tiresomeness of the music to fractions for the receptive members of the audience to cancel out for themselves. This they did, going so far as to demonstrate the fact between the movements.

The orchestra's playing, as always, was practically flawless. The Brandenburg concerto had bite and verve; the Berlioz had tenderness and violence by turns, and the Berezowsky had all its composer put into the score, which was certainly enough to capture quick favor, if no more. Next week the orchestra presents the final concert of the season, consisting of Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis; Debussy's Prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe," and Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor. Tomorrow, the orchestra's Pension Fund concert offers Bach's Magnificat and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and soloists.

JAM HALL FOR PENSION FUND

Throng Hears Symphony Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The conventional phrase, "large and enthusiastic," well applies to the audience which at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon attended the annual spring concert in aid of the Symphony Orchestra's pension fund. With the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe and four solo singers assisting, Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra offered yesterday Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with Bach's Magnificat, in D major, as a preliminary and somewhat unusual attraction. Of late years in such special performances the Ninth has been preceded only by an overture.

To get back to the audience, it filled every seat and overflowed into the aisles and at the conclusion of the symphony it gave vent to some of the lustiest cheering that this particular auditorium has heard in some time. Just how long this demonstration lasted may not be stated here—the closing hour for an afternoon concert was full late, but it gave promise of going on for quite a while.

In that it is comparatively short, as full-fledged choral works go, and not too often performed, the Magnificat made an excellent opening number. Moreover, it afforded opportunity for each of the four soloists. These last were Zina Lisichkina, soprano, Anna Kaskas, contralto, William Hain, tenor, and Julius Huehn, bass. The orchestral and vocal forces were also augmented here by Putnam Aldrich, harpsichordist, and E. Power Biggs, organist. Louis Speyer provided the oboe d'amore obligato required by the soprano aria, "Quia respexit humilitatem."

This is as good an opportunity as any to discuss these solo singers. In the music of Bach Mr. Hain seemed more at home than the others, though Miss Kaskas ran him a close second. Mr. Huehn was much happier in the symphony, while Mme. Lisichkina seemed hardly to belong in this particular company. Her voice is not especially large and when forced, inclines to shrillness.

It is an old complaint that the massed voices of the Harvard and Radcliffe singers succeed better in producing tonal volume than they do yielding tonal richness. Yesterday their youthful freshness served Beethoven better than it did Bach, who seemed to require a bit more solidity than was vouchsafed him. But these young people sing the exacting choral portion of the Ninth with a degree of elation that their elders might find difficult.

Orchestrally, the performance of the symphony was a notable one. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men have never been more eloquent with the three instrumental movements. The choral finale has been called music's most glorious page and dismissed as an esthetic blunder. You may find yourself looking at it either way or being torn between the two points of view. However, there was no mistaking its effect on yesterday's audience as a whole.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Pension Fund Concert

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was given the best performance one has ever heard of that vast work, at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. It was one of those rare, inexplicable occasions when high ability and careful preparation are transcended by a force that seems to grow out of the music-making, so that a great masterpiece is revealed in full stature. The audience must have realized the event, for at the end noisy applause and, many cries of "Bravo!" brought repeated acknowledgment from the artists.

The Ninth Symphony was preceded by the Magnificat of Johann Sebastian Bach, not performed by the Boston Symphony since the Bach Festival during the orchestra's 50th anniversary season in 1930-31. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The choruses, as usual at pension fund concerts, were the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists were Zina Lisichkina, soprano, who made her Boston debut; Anna Kaskas, Metropolitan Opera contralto; William Hain, tenor, and Julius Huehn, bass-baritone of the Metropolitan Opera. For the music of Bach, Putnam Aldrich was harpsichordist, E. Power Biggs the organist, and Louis Speyer played the oboe d'amore.

If so great a performance can be defined in cold type, the essence of it was clarity and passion and breadth, absolutely controlled by the zeal of the conductor. Never before had one heard such full, resonant tone from the Harvard and Radcliffe singers, or so well-balanced a quartet of solo voices. The Olympian grandeur of the first movement was followed by a Dionysiac force in the scherzo; opposed to the heavenly grace of that cantilena which is the adagio, was the utterly glorious power of the finale. For the first time one heard in actuality what Beethoven may have imagined as he put notes on paper. Fine words these, every one deliberately chosen and thoroughly deserved.

Miss Lisichkina has a strong and clear, though not rich, voice splendidly adapted to the soprano part of the Ninth Symphony. She became shrill in those places where Beethoven asks the impossible of a human voice, but it is not likely that the part can be better sung by any but a superwoman. The other soloists, familiar by virtue of past appearances here, distinguished themselves with intelligent, artistic work.

To be exact, most but not all of Bach's Magnificat was presented. The aria "Et exultavit," the trio "Suscepit Israel" and the chorus "Sicut locutus" were omitted. Where extraordinary choral tone was perfect for Beethoven it seemed too big for Bach. Fewer voices are probably the answer to the problem of singing Bach's counterpoint with the crystal clarity which ought to be a prime object in Bach. Yet the churchly impressiveness of the Magnificat was not measurably diminished.

Pension fund concerts in the recent past have not always been largely attended. It is a pleasure to report that the house yesterday was sold out.

C. W. D.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Pension Fund Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave a concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to benefit its Pension Fund. The assisting artists were the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society (G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor); Zina Lisichkina, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; William Hain, tenor; Julius Huehn, bass; Putnam Aldrich, harpsichord; E. Power Biggs, organ and Louis Speyer, oboe d'amore. The program consisted of Bach Magnificat in D major and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in D minor, Op. 125.

We might as well make it clear here and now that yesterday's Pension Fund concert cannot be discussed without the use of super-superlatives in frantic abundance, so those with a constitutional aversion to them are advised to consider that we have taken leave of our critical faculties and so turn to Dahl for re-examination and a second chuckle. It was, in all fact, a perfectly glorious concert and there, for all we can add or detract, the matter must rest. Our duty then, in the following sentences, is clearly to add a few programmatic remarks about the Bach Magnificat (which hasn't been done here since the Bach Festival of 1931) and bestow hosannas upon all concerned en route.

The great D major Magnificat came into being in the early months of Bach's services at the Thomaskirche in Leipzig. Written during the Christmas season of 1723, the composer inserted four Christmas hymns in the work in such a way that they could be omitted (as they regrettably were yesterday) during performance at other festival seasons. A composition of inimitable perfection, it conveys as only the St. Matthew Passion does a profoundly moving religious exaltation. Nowhere is Bach's matchless tenderness or imagination or piety more marvelously displayed than it is in the four choruses and five arias of which the Magnificat is composed.

As is often the case with Bach, the melodic substance is but a detail of the rich contrapuntal fabric, yet what could be more beautiful than the aria for soprano with its oboe d'amore obbbligato, or the bass aria with its ostinato accompaniment of the low strings, or the alto aria with its enchanting duet for flutes? You might well answer the duet for alto and tenor; it is all the same. The vocal soloists (and there's no sense in singling them out), were all excellent, and, in some cases, extraordinarily so. Coming in for quite as much praise, however, are the instrumentalists in various combinations who supplied the accompaniment to the solos. Putnam Aldrich at the harpsichord, Louis Speyer, oboe d'amore; Georges Laurent and James Pappoutsakis, flutists; Georges Mager, trumpet; and Messrs. Bedetti, Zighera (cellos), Moleux and Dufresne (basses) for their immaculate continuo—all these must be mentioned for their splendid work.

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society never sounded fresher or more disciplined. Only once in the entire concert (in the second chorus of the Bach—and they weren't to blame for that) was there the slightest error of attack. The Magnificat is not so elaborately fugal as other of the Bach choral works, but it's fiercely difficult to sing even so. Suffice it to say the soloists and chorus sang it thrillingly well; the orchestra performed it wonderfully, and Dr. Koussevitzky gave it the ultimate of design and expression.

Bach's Magnificat Presented, With the Beethoven Ninth

By L. A. Sloper

The Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, proved to be one of the high lights of the musical season. The program, Bach's Magnificat and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, drew an audience that filled all the seats and overflowed into the aisles. It was the largest audience that a Pension Fund concert has attracted in years, and its appreciation of the superb performances it heard was lively. At the close of the long afternoon there was a prolonged ovation for conductor, orchestra, chorus and soloists.

The Bach Magnificat was virtually a novelty. It had been presented by this orchestra only once before, at the Bach Festival of 1931, and the only previous Boston performance then discoverable was a half-century earlier. Yesterday it was reduced to practicable length, on a program that contained also the Ninth Symphony, by omission of the aria, "Et exsultavit;" the trio, "Suscepit Israel," and the chorus, "Sicut locutus."

* * *

Even so curtailed, it is revealed as a grand work, in which Bach's genius is visible throughout in the treatment of the voice, in the use of the instruments, and, above all, in the stripped beauty of the musical form. It is a work composed in simple sincerity to the glory of God, and gloriously fulfilling its mission.

Endless details might be mentioned—the majesty of the opening chorus, "My soul doth magnify the Lord;" the moving quality of the soprano aria, "Quia respexit," with its oboe d'amore obbligato, breaking suddenly into the overwhelming chorus, "All generations;" the power of the bass aria, the tenderness of the duet for alto and tenor; the fervor of the final chorus, "Glory be to the Father."

Nor should we overlook the delicious humor of the unresolved suspersion in the flutes at the end of the alto aria, "He hath filled the hungry with good things, and the rich he hath sent empty away;" for Bach did not find humor inconsistent with his reverence, and he evidently, as Tovey pointed out, saw nothing tragic in the rich being sent empty away—they would eat in any case.

* * *

Under Dr. Koussevitzky's inspiring baton, the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, trained by Mr. Woodworth, sang with a fine thrust. The soloists (Zina Lisichkina, soprano; Anna Kaskas, contralto; William Hain, tenor, Julius Huehn, bass) gave a good account of themselves, Louis Speyer played with taste the oboe d'amore obbligato, Putman Aldrich provided the continuo on the harpsichord, and E. Power Biggs was at the organ console.

After Bach's paean to the fatherhood of God came appropriately Beethoven's hymn to the brotherhood of man, and this too was magnificently realized in the performance. The first three movements were played with an eloquence extraordinary even for Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the final chorus was thrillingly proclaimed by the fresh and eager voices of the undergraduates. In this movement there were one or two instances of orchestral raggedness which probably passed unnoticed by the majority of the audience and Mme. Lisichkina in the high tessitura of her solo part forced her voice to the shrillness which seems to be characteristic of Slavic sopranos. The other soloists sang creditably; but it is the chorus that matters most in this movement, and there could be no complaint about their contribution.

Premature Season Survey; Music in Boston in Wartime

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

If we are going to conduct our annual survey of Boston's musical season, we shall have to do it now or not at all. It is, of course, too early to do it properly, for the season has some weeks to go with some interesting concerts in prospect. But there it is; the times don't wait for individuals any longer, so that we shall have to make shift as best as possible.

It is always amusing to predict what you think the Boston Symphony's achievements added up to and then compare your general, vague impression with the facts. We should have said beforehand that the programs were made up of a number of repetitions of controversial works—Shostakovitch, naturally—and a great number of war-horses. This is true only so far as it goes. Actually there was fully as much new and unfamiliar music played as in any recent season. What fell in abeyance was the revival of music no longer new, but also not too well known by the public.

The following were some of the larger war-horses: Beethoven's Symphonies Nos. 1, 3, 6, 7, the Violin Concerto and Piano Concerto No. 5; Brahms' Symphonies Nos. 1, 2 and 4; Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 and Piano Concerto in B flat minor; Sibelius' Symphonies Nos. 1 and 5; Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Death and Transfiguration"; Dvorak's "New World" Symphony and Franck's in D minor. That is a formidable list of tried and true symphonic friends; and, were it not counterbalanced by a long list of modern scores, would constitute something of an indictment. By contrast the less familiar works by these and other established composers were meagerly represented. We must remember, though, that in trying times like these the public may cry out more than ever for the old favorites and accordingly resent experiments on its patience more acutely.

NEW SCORES

Modern music had, as we have said, a good showing from the Boston Symphony so far this season. Some of it—such scores as Roussel's 3d Symphony, Prokofieff's Scythian Suite and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms—is already pretty well known. Other works were considered by Mr. Koussevitzky of sufficient interest to give them an early repetition. Such were Harris' 3d Symphony, Shostakovitch's 5th, Villa-Lobos' Choros No. 10 and Copland's "Quiet City." Two works, heard for the first time here, were repeated at subsequent concerts, namely Shostakovitch's 6th Symphony and Martinu's Concerto Grosso. The list also included William Schuman's Symphony No. 3; Arthur Lourie's "Kormtchaia" Symphony No. 2; Benjamin Britten's Sinfonia da Requiem; Walter Piston's Sinfonietta; Aaron Copland's "Billy the Kid"; Hindemith's Symphony; Violin Concertos by Samuel Barber and Nicolas Lopatnikoff; Gliere's Symphony No. 3, "Ilia Mourometz."

The remarkable thing about all the new music heard was that none of it was undisguisedly poor, with the possible exception of Gliere's long and indigestible symphony. (And, in any case, that work, though unfamiliar in Boston, is not a fresh piece of musical composition.) Of the brand new works those by William Schuman, Martinu, Hindemith and Britten seemed to us the most interesting; and, war or no war, there do not seem to be any signs of that drying-up of the stream of musical inspiration which a certain school of criticism professes to find on every side.

OTHER ASPECTS

Aside from the Boston Symphony the musical season of the city progressed much as usual. The customary series, no more curtailed than they were in 1940-41, came off on schedule and with no less of a public than before. There were probably fewer recitals, debuts and so forth, than in a peacetime season, but by compensation there were a large number of free concerts in the schools and museums of a high caliber. On the other hand there were no visiting orchestras, which in view of the fact that Boston is most inhospitable to any orchestras other than its own is not surprising; but it can hardly be considered encouraging.

One curious thing did occur, and that was an increase in the quantity of opera—the very last tendency one would have predicted. The Metropolitan came as usual, and its visit has been thoroughly discussed. The enterprising, young Philadelphia Opera Company, which gave five performances, was the main reason for this; but we should also not forget the very successful revival of Gershwin's folk opera, "Porgy and Bess," which brightened the theatrical season no end. Furthermore, the Worcester Festival mounted Douglas Moore's operatic version of Benet's "The Devil and Daniel Webster" and Ravel's L'heure espagnole." Out in Harvard some students put on Randall Thompson's diverting "Solomon and Balkis" last week; and on April 30 the New England Conservatory will present Pergolesi's "La Serva Padronna" and Puccini's "Suor Angelica." That, considering the lamentations on the future of opera, is a pretty good record.

109

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
APR 29 1942

Boston Symphony Warmly Received

By WALTER W. FARMER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was presented last evening in the Auditorium by Worcester Civic Music Association as the last of this season's concerts. The program consisted of Bach's "Third Brandenburg Concerto," Overture-Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky, and Brahms' "First Symphony."

The unsurpassed artistry of this superb organization is so well-known and so greatly admired that little new can be added in describing the overpowering effect of such a concert as that heard last night. The near-capacity audience was unusually enthusiastic, and recalled the conductor many times at the conclusion of every number. Writing while still under the spell of inspired music gloriously performed, this reviewer makes no apology for the free use of superlatives, realizing, however, that no adjectives can convey the full meaning of great music.

Bach's six "Brandenburg Concertos" were so-called because they were commissioned by Margraf of Brandenburg, a young prince, who deeply was interested in music. These compositions are regarded as the purest products of Bach's many-voiced style, because only the orchestra allows him perfect freedom in the leading and grouping of the different parts. Also, they represent "what the philosophy of all ages conceives as the fundamental mystery of things—the self-unfolding of an idea which creates its own opposite, then becomes reconciled to it." The "Third Concerto" originally had no slow movement, but last night, the introduction to a Bach cantata was inserted with marvelously poignant effect. The first and last movements are filled with pure, exultant joy that is still fresh and vital after two centuries. The orchestra's magnificent string section revealed this immortal music with amazing clarity and compelling eloquence.

A recent music historian has referred to Tschaikowsky's symphonic poems as "noisy and hysterical beyond measure." If this writer could have heard the overwhelming dramatic presentation given the overture by the Boston Symphony, it is probable he would agree with the estimate of another critic who finds that the composer "put his heart into the work, which seems to throb with youthful passion and tenderness." In reality, it is much more than this, for it gives powerful and vivid expression to the great Shakespearean masterpiece of passion and death. The Friar Laurence theme, the strife between the rival houses of Montague and Capulet, the melodies that have "the sweetness of love, its tenderness, its longing," and the tragic conclusion—all these were revealed with true imaginative insight.

The performance of Brahms' "Symphony" provided a supreme spiritual experience, a summit only occasionally attained in years of concert-going. To the responsive listener, this noble work may represent the struggle of the contending forces of light and dark, or good and evil. Whatever its ultimate meaning, it is one of the greatest masterpieces of intellectual thought and beauty ever conceived in symphonic form.

From the tragic opening chords that surge above the throbbing kettle-drums to the mighty transfiguration of the last pages, one is shown an epic conflict with a victorious conclusion. Among the many inspired passages is the memorable introduction to the finale, where the horn and flute call to each other from the heights against the shimmering strings, like an Alpine sunrise. The perfect performance, with its expressive themes for solo instruments, the glowing orchestra color, and the grandeur of conception will not be forgotten soon.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
APR 29 1942

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN 'MEMORABLE' CONCERT

By RAYMOND MORIN

A memorable musical event took place last night in Municipal Auditorium. Worcester Civic Music Association completed its current series of concerts with the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. Richard Burgin was concert-master. A capacity audience expressed its complete devotion by hearty applause and mute attention.

Worcester has always been willing to listen attentively to contemporary works and to acknowledge whatever merit they might possess. However, during these turbulent times, we turn to music not only for intellectual stimulation but for refuge. So it was that we gratefully found the names of Bach, Tschaikowsky, and Brahms on last night's program. The saneness and sanctity of the "Brandenburg Concerto No. 3" by Bach seemed singularly logical and reposed even through the sharp angular phrases of the final "allegro".

Stimulating Bach

We have many times spoken of the eloquence of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretations, the almost ethereal beauty of the violins, the precision and discipline with which it obeys, and the inspiration with which it seems inexhaustibly supplied—we can only repeat that all these qualities were abundantly present last night. The efforts of Bach in "testing the colors of various instrumental combinations" were amply rewarded by the rich timbres and stimulating rhythms of this favorite of the six "concertos"—or "symphonies" as they are sometimes called.

The massive "C minor Symphony" with which Brahms tried out his symphonic wings at the age of 43 is a frank favorite of the Boston orchestra. This is understandable to those who have heard them play it on numerous occasions for they always make it musically statuesque.

Symphony of Strife

One could disregard all academic knowledge and conclude from last night's performance that, as a unified group of four movements, this is a symphony of human strife. From the passionate opening sequence which seems to try to tear itself from its C minor origin, Dr. Koussevitzky conveys in full measure the gloom and struggle of its first movement. This intensity is dispelled by the "andante sostenuto" which contains a high point in first violin performance. To those who are analytically minded it could be identified as the subordinate theme. In any event it gives a lasting impression of exquisite tonal quality and precision of bowing. The third ("allegretto e grazioso") movement was bucolic in its light-heartedness, while the "finale" which passes through several stages of despair and imminent catastrophe, finally brought the concert to a close majestically and with dignity.

"Specialty of House"

We are not speaking last of the "Overture-Fantasia, Romeo and Juliet" by Tschaikowsky because we enjoyed it least. We must confess we did listen to it with added interest because Dr. Koussevitzky told us recently in an interview that he and the Boston Symphony regarded Tschaikowsky as "specialty of the house." Of course, there is the interesting narrative to guide one—themes of Romeo, Juliet, Montague and Capulet, Friar Laurence. The elements of conflict are less rugged than in Brahms. There is an undeniable emotionalism in Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this opus that should not be confused with sentimentality. His is a calculated, unhurried approach to the generating theme. These sweeping lines were brilliantly preceded by the vigorous, rebellious "strife" theme. One need search no further for greater Tschaikowsky excitement. It was a concert of superlative execution by all divisions of the orchestra, but special mention should be made of absolute precision of the violin "pizzicato" passages in the first portion of the Tschaikowsky overture and the final movement of the Brahms symphony—as well as the excellent percussion and brass choir in the last symphony movement.

The Civic Music Series ended with a broadcast war message by President Roosevelt which many remained in the auditorium to hear. The transportation problem which is hindering the concert schedules of many symphony orchestras was solved by busses which transported the Boston members back to the Hub. We wish to acknowledge our thanks to the members of the talent committee, headed by Arthur J. Dann for the high quality and policy of these splendid concerts.

SYMPHONY IN DANE TRIBUTE

Half of Concert Dedicated to His Memory

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The first half of yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert was dedicated to the memory of Ernest B. Dane, president and treasurer of the orchestra, who died last Sunday.

Following the performance of "The Star Spangled Banner," in which the chorus of the Cecilia Society, assembled for this programme, took part, Dr. Koussevitzky paid eloquent tribute to Mr. Dane and requested the audience to stand for a moment in silent appreciation of his worth.

In place of Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollon, Leader of the Muses," the orchestra played the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony (as far as the Trio) and Vivaldi's D minor Concerto, as edited by Siloti, said to have been one of Mr. Dane's favorite pieces. Although on the original programme, the next number, Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," constituted part of this memorial.

For the rest, the first list was also adhered to. These remaining numbers, both with chorus, were Villa-Lobos' Choros No. 10, "Rasga o coracao," introduced to Boston last season, and Stravinsky's "Prometheus," the Poem of Fire," unheard at Symphony Hall since the two performances by which it was first made known to us in the spring of 1925.

Regrettable as was the cause of these changes, the programme gained in variety and hence in interest through the substitution of Vivaldi's Concerto, for the anaemic "Apollon." Consulting his files, this reviewer discovered that when the "Symphony of Psalms," was last heard here in December, 1939, with the composer conducting, he blamed the dryness of the music upon the performance and yearned for the "fervor and elevation" that Dr. Koussevitzky was wont to impart to it. Yesterday, for some reason, the music seemed drier than ever, more arid in its invention, more rasping in its dissonance. Ungrateful music to sing, if ever there was any, its difficulties were ably surmounted yesterday by Arthur Fiedler's chorus.

By contrast, Villa Lobos' music seemed all light and color; though good fun as it is, it would be better fun if it were somewhat compressed. The long orchestral introduction is not only rhapsodic, but amorphous, and once the chorus enters, its portion tends to be repetitious. As it fell on these particular ears yesterday "Prometheus," seemed futility itself, a mere posturing and pirouetting on a single harmoy (a harmony that has lost its savor) and without resolution or progression.

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 22d concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Richard Burgin, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 1 in C major Op. 21
Lopatnikoff, Concerto for Violin and Orchestra Op. 26
Hill..."Lilacs," Poem for Orchestra Op. 33
Strauss....."Death and Transfiguration," Tone Poem Op. 24

Quite a variety of music was played yesterday afternoon and beautifully played, too, every note of it. Beethoven's First Symphony is clearly a great favorite with Mr. Koussevitzky, and he does it superbly. His phrasing is exquisite, and the impeccable instrumentalists at his command interpret his wishes perfectly. It was an ideal performance of this delightful symphony.

If it did not seem like writing down an always excellent violinist, we should say that Mr. Burgin surpassed himself yesterday. Certainly his playing of this first performance of the Lopatnikoff Violin Concerto was in every way admirable. Mr. Lopatnikoff was also on hand to acknowledge the applause for his work. The new Concerto has a lot of merit, though it is not as good as the recent violin concertos of Prokofieff, Hindemith, Walton and Piston. (We have practically memorized that sentence, having used it several times before and most recently in connection with Samuel Barber's Concerto.)

Emotionally the finest movement is the andante, which is almost romantic and very charming, though a bit long drawn out. The first movement is more intellectual, and the finale is lively and full of rhythmic strength. Just why the Concerto is not as good as those we named above is difficult to determine. Both Mr. Piston and Mr. Hindemith, for example, write the kind of music of the first movement rather more easily and with more distinction. Prokofieff in high spirits is more entertaining.

We do not wish to imply that Mr. Lopatnikoff is not an original composer, for as a matter of fact his music is individual and does not remind you of anyone else's. It is only that his is not a tremendously striking individuality. The same was true of his Symphony, heard here a few years ago. It had many virtues, but it was not an arresting work. This Concerto is better than the Symphony, and we should accordingly be much more favorably disposed to hear it again.

Mr. Hill's piece in memory of Amy Lowell is lovely music. It is very French in character, as are many of Mr. Hill's other scores, but it is no worse for that. A man must write as he feels, and all we ask is that he do so with distinction. The tone poem is not a note too long—by contrast with Mr. Strauss' opus—and is music of great freshmen and grace. Mr. Hill was in the audience and came forward to acknowledge the applause.

We looked up what we had said about "Death and Transfiguration" the last time it was played in 1937 and found that our opinion of it has not altered. It stands about midway in Strauss' works, not so bad as the worst and yet considerably below "Zarathustra," "Till" and "Don Juan." It is bombastic and sentimental, interminably so at the end. But it has lovely passages very characteristic of Strauss, and Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra presented it superbly.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week he will conduct the following program, with Louis Bailly, violist, as soloist: Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme of Thomas Tallis; Berezowsky's Viola concerto: Berlioz Symphony, "Harold in Italy."

Berkshire Festival Board to Decide on Tanglewood Concerts

PITTSFIELD, April 30—Berkshire Symphonic Festival trustees announced today that no decision was reached yesterday in New York on the question of canceling this year's Tanglewood concerts because of the war.

At the New York meeting were members of the festival's finance committee and Jerome D. Greene, N. Penrose Hallowell and Henry B. Sawyer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees.

The Festival board will meet late next week for a decision.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
APR 29 1942

Koussevitzky Says War Will Inspire U. S. Composers

By WALTER MERKEL

The war will prove an inspiration to American composers, says Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He expressed his conviction firmly in the Green Room of the Auditorium after last night's concert by the orchestra. It was a special concert in the Worcester Civic Music Association series, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

"American composers," he amplified, "have been given a background which will help them to produce music of depth and

Tragedy of French

He expressed the opinion that although tragedy often inspires great compositions in music and literature, the famous contemporary composers of Europe, particularly of France, will have no opportunity to leave great works to posterity. Many of them have been killed by the Nazis, he said, and others have been enslaved

He predicted, however, a bright future for the music of Russia, his native land.

Dr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver, North Russia, in 1874. With his own orchestra, he sailed the Volga, appearing in many cities and villages. He understands the temperament of the Russian composer—the background which has inspired his music.

The Russian composer has the chance to develop continually his ideals, he said, because he has lived in a land of consistent development.

Proud of Native Land

Dr. Koussevitzky was told that the President in his radio address had credited Russia with destroying more Nazi armies, tanks and guns than all the other allies.

His face lighted and he smiled broadly.

"That is fine," he said, "Fine!"

Although he has been in this country for many years, he is still intensely interested in the development of Russia and its status as a great world power.

Ready To Serve

The war has made no inroads on the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky says rather triumphantly, "We haven't lost a man." But he adds that any of them would be ready and willing to go at the country's call.

A number of autograph seekers gained admittance to the Green Room during the evening, but Dr. Koussevitzky waved them aside.

He was gracious about it, but he was obviously tired from a strenuous handling of the baton.

"My arm's weary," he explained.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
APR 30 1942

Boston Pops Open Tuesday

The opening program of the Boston Pops concert Tuesday evening at Symphony Hall, Boston, strikes a patriotic note by including Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever" and "Salute to Our Fighting Forces" arranged by Peter Bodge. The latter composition includes "Halls of Montezuma," "Keep 'Em Flying," "Anchors Aweigh," and "When the Caissons Go Rolling Along."

Lending a Berkshire touch will be an original composition, "Tanglewood Pool," a pastel sketch, by Chase.

The program will close with "God Bless America."

Arthur Fiedler will again conduct the Pops series. The final concerts of the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra season will be given this afternoon and tomorrow night under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

MUSIC REVIEW

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin played the solo part in the first performance of the new Violin Concerto by Nikolai Lopatnikoff at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

The remainder of the program consisted of Beethoven's First Symphony, the orchestral poem, "Lilacs," by Harvard's Professor-Emeritus Edward Burlingame Hill, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

Lopatnikoff is a Russian who, after residence in sundry countries of Europe, settled in New York just three years ago. His orchestral Scherzo and Second Symphony have been performed by the Boston Symphony. On the strength of a single hearing, his Violin Concerto has everything to recommend it except distinction.

The writing for solo violin is clever: that instrument always stands out from the orchestra and the composer does not demand from it more than the violin is capable of yielding. The solo violin is also treated melodically and in a bright, rhythmic style. The orchestra provides a continuous, pleasantly dissonant background.

On the whole, Lopatnikoff's Concerto is nice, and probably will ingratiate itself with all but the most conservative listeners. There is a lot of orchestral color, a certain Slavic atmosphere, and a tune at the beginning of the finale that might be one of those deliciously satirical banalities of Shostakovitch. But the work just doesn't have much to say. In this respect it is hardly to be compared to the Prokofieff, Hindemith or Piston Violin Concertos.

Mr. Burgin contributed a virtuoso performance which must have put the music in the best possible light. His part looks and sounds difficult, both rhythmically and in technic. Mr. Lopatnikoff appeared on the stage and shook hands all around.

This reviewer left Symphony Hall convinced that he will never hear a more eloquent reading of "Death and Transfiguration." But dissenting voices were audible: saying that the Koussevitzky interpretation is too slow in the first scene of the dying man's uneasy sleep, and in the pages of Transfiguration; also that the victim's delirious ramblings through life already lived were too melodramatic.

This all may be true. Mr. Koussevitzky does take those sections very slowly, but the result is increased dignity and dramatic tension. As for melodrama, what, in comparison to this world, is more melodramatic than death itself, and lurid visions of time that is past?

No doubt a slow pace is hard on wind players, especially brass, through that loud, majestic peroration just before the end. Yet one is still convinced there will never be a more richly-toned or compelling performance of "Death and Transfiguration."

Mr. Koussevitzky adds a virtuoso sparkle to Beethoven's First Symphony that does the work no harm except in the last movement, which ought to go a little slower than he conducts it. Mr. Hill's "Lilacs," a distillation of French Impressionism, was again decorative and completely without emotional power. The composer bowed from the stage.

The program next week will assemble Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis; Nicolai Berezowsky's Viola Concerto (first time in Boston), and, praise be!, the long neglected "Harold In Italy" Symphony of Berlioz. Louis Bailly will be soloist in the latter two scores.—C. W. D.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 21st concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Assisting the orchestra were the Cecilia Society Chorus, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist. The program was follows:

Marcia funebre from Symphony No. 3 ..... Beethoven
Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ, arranged by A. Siloti ..... Viva di
Symphony of Psalms ..... Stravinsky
Choros No. 10 ..... Villa-Lobos
"Prometheus, a Poem of Fire" Op. 60 ..... Scriabin

Yesterday's concert began fittingly with a tribute to the late Ernest B. Dane, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony and its generous friend. The audience at Mr. Koussevitzky's suggestion stood in silence for a moment; and then the funeral march music from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony was played. After this a rather blown-up version of a Vivaldi concerto was given, since the originally scheduled "Apollon Musagete" of Stravinsky would have been too frivolous for the occasion.

It is unfortunate that symphonic music requiring a chorus usually comes to the public in big doses. It is a nuisance to put a chorus on the stage for just one number, so that, when you do at length plan for one, it is advisable to get as much work out of it as possible. But the result in the public's mind is to compare the works on the program in a fashion which it would never do ordinarily.

For example, falling into this error ourselves, we could not enjoy the Villa-Lobos and the Scriabin quite as much for recollection of the superior merit of the Stravinsky. Why a non-choral program should not affect us in the same way, we cannot imagine. It is one of the mysteries of man. At any rate, perhaps this is the moment to say that the Cecilia Society Chorus seemed to us to do much better work than it has in some time.

Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms is probably the finest work of his later career and one of the most interesting scores of the last twenty years. It wears well, as we in Boston have had an opportunity of proving. There were some at first who pronounced it meretricious, but that has been a common critical error with regard to any new religious music. It is, on the contrary, a deeply moving, not to say solemn, piece. The third section has always been the most impressive and the one that most quickly catches the ear. But the first two also are strangely beautiful and fascinating music.

It is easy to see that Stravinsky achieves his effect largely through his orchestration and the welding of this to the chorus's singing of the words. The omission of all the high strings and the clarinets produces an eerie effect which is just right for the music. We should have had the words, as is customary, in the program book. Surely we are not supposed to know our Psaltery that well? Choral diction at best is obscure, and in addition in this case the text is in Latin. You miss some of the music's best tricks by not having the words. It is wonderful, for instance, to observe what the composer does with the praising of the Lord with cymbals and how he avoids the obvious.

Villa-Lobos's Choros No. 10 has been done enough now so that we ought to be sure of it one way or another. Its fault is that it brings up some striking and curious things which it proceeds to run into the ground. But at that it ranks as a singularly interesting piece.

To be quite frank Scriabin's orchestral works all seem to us to be so much empty rhetoric. (His piano music is something else again.) The mysticism, etc., of "Prometheus" strikes us as so much balderdash. There is quite a lot of lovely noise as why shouldn't there be when you get the Boston Symphony, a chorus, piano and organ building up a grand climax for all they are worth? But real eloquence is not in it.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky will offer: Beethoven's 1st Symphony; Nicolas Lopatnikoff's Violin Concerto, with Richard Burgin as soloist; Edward Burlingame Hill's "Lilacs" (not the Achron piece as announced); Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration."

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 19th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 6 ..... Shostakovitch
Violin Concerto in D, Op. 61 ..... Beethoven

Shostakovitch's Sixth Symphony is so much better than his Fifth, that it is difficult to understand how the same composer could have written and approved of both. The Sixth is never cheap, except for a bit of circus-parade fun at the end of the finale which is perfectly justifiable for purposes of wit. This symphony also has a lot to say and when it is imitative of Prokofieff as in the fast movements it is, at least the imitation is good.

There is no first movement in the ordinary symphonic sense, but the serious things Shostakovitch has to say are all packed into a long slow movement. This done, the music is all high spirits and entertainment. We have a few doubts about the opening largo, but for the moment the music is fresh enough to thrust these into the background. The first part of it is most impressive and sincere. In the last 10 minutes of it, however, we can not help wondering how those immensely long pedal points, over which the themes hover and almost stop, like fish in a stream on a hot day, are going to wear as we come to hear the symphony more often. But for the time being Shostakovitch seems to have expressed whatever he wanted to say with considerable eloquence.

When the Sixth Symphony was first played in New York the critics were rather supercilious about the last two movements and dismissed them as not of much account. But after the largo they really provide just the contrast that is needed. The scherzo is the best that Shostakovitch has yet written, much tighter knit and more individually his own than the same movement in the Fifth.

The finale is a wonderful romp that never lets up in pace or spirits and winds up with a grandstand finish. It needs virtuoso playing and conducting, and this is just what it got. Mr. Koussevitzky has done a superb job of getting this symphony ready for performance. His interpretation has twice the life that the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski has imparted to it on the recently issued records. The whole orchestra deserves individually to be congratulated.

The concert was actually one of the most memorable of the season. There were shouts and whistles after the Shostakovitch and an even more prolonged ovation for Mr. Menuhin. It would not be too much to say that his playing yesterday was perfect in every respect. He was technically brilliant, tossing off the first movement cadenza with nonchalance; his tone was lovely and made the slow movement even more ethereal than usual. Moreover he was admirably assisted by the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky. There are many remarkable violinists before the public today, and yet, even considering them all, Mr. Menuhin's playing yesterday was extraordinary.

We shall not say much about Beethoven's Violin Concerto in the abstract, for it happens to be one of our blind spots among the masterpieces. Somerset Maugham once remarked that, when you come to think of it, beauty was rather a bore. The observation was not intended to be flippant, for he expanded it into an argument on aesthetics. As far as we are concerned it is the "mot juste" for the Beethoven Concerto.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week is not what is announced in this week's book, except that the Brahms First Symphony will still occupy the last half. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the Fourth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach and Debussy's "Iberia" from "Images" in the first half.

FINAL CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Three Stirring Pieces Make Up List

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The audience that stood for "The Star Spangled Banner" at the beginning of yesterday's final Symphony matinee heard another national anthem before it, the Polish "Poland is Not Yet Lost," played in recognition of Polish Constitution Day, which befalls tomorrow. Dr. Koussevitzky then addressed himself to the audience and once more, to the best of its collective abilities, the assembled company sang "The Star Spangled Banner," aforesaid.

These double rites accomplished, the concert went on its way. It is not Dr. Koussevitzky's wont to place upon his 24th programme either novelties or important revivals. Rather, is the occasion one in which high-mettled steeds of battle are put through their paces. There were three of these yesterday, DeBussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" and the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky. As preface to these familiar numbers came Vaughan-Williams' Fantasia for double string orchestra on a theme by Thomas Tallis. This "Tallis Fantasia," as it is often called, does not sound quite as well as it did when we first heard it 20 years ago. The part-writing now seems unnecessarily thick, with too many doublings, while the unorthodox parallelisms in the harmony have lost some of their once arresting quality. These considerations aside, the piece, still impressive in its own right, again served to display the richness of our orchestra's string section.

Not long ago in New York this reviewer heard Dr. Koussevitzky perform the "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite with the Philharmonic Orchestra of that city and at the time he imagined that the Philharmonic has succeeded in sounding almost exactly like the Boston Symphony. Yesterday he realized that that could not have been so. The tonal qualities of the Boston Symphony remain peculiar to it. Other orchestras have their virtues. The one at Symphony Hall retains clear ascendency over them all in this matter of tone, and that has been largely Dr. Koussevitzky's doing. The performance of DeBussy's Prelude had been properly exqisite, but this superb projection of Ravel's music completely overshadowed it.

It is a relief to have a Symphony season close with some work other than the First Symphony of Brahms. Tchaikovsky's Fifth has its banal pages, plenty of them, but for all occasional vulgarities and unabashed sentimentalities, it is honest, sincere, red-blooded music and put together with masterly skill. The voltage of the Koussevitzkian performance is extremely high. Yesterday it provoked the inevitable stamping and cheers. Tonight the season-proper ends. Certain reflections upon it may be found in these columns tomorrow.

COMPOSERS AT THE SYMPHONY

Lopatnikoff and Hill Hear Works Performed

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Two composers were present at yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert to hear their productions played and to acknowledge from the stage the answering applause. One of these compositions, Nikolai Lopatnikoff's Violin Concerto was enjoying its first performance, with Richard Burgin as soloist.

The other, Edward Burlingame Hill's "Lilacs," after the poem of that name by Amy Lowell, is neither unfamiliar nor over-familiar. Beethoven's First Symphony and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" respectively, began and ended the programme. Like his Second Symphony, played here in December, 1939, Mr. Lopatnikoff's new Concerto is in general reminiscent of the Russian music of an earlier day than ours. The more extreme tendencies of modernism Mr. Lopatnikoff avoids altogether.

Like the Symphony this Concerto, at least in the two Allegros, is energetically rhythmed. There is a touch of poesy in the slow movement, and while by no means distinguished, the entire work makes agreeable listening. Mr. Burgin played the solo part with conviction and with his usual taste and skill. His popularity with the public of these concerts was again made clearly manifest. As assistant conductor, admirable concert master and occasional soloist he is indeed a valuable member of the organization.

Hill's Tone Poem

When it was first heard at Symphony Hall 15 years ago Mr. Hill's deeply-felt and richly sounding music seemed suspiciously French in quality to be the tonal commentary on a poem that celebrates New England in accents unmistakeably American. This impression was both renewed and deepened yesterday. As an idiom, this speech of the French composers of the late 19th and early 20th centuries seems now distinctly dated, though certain works composed in it still have a stronghold on life. In Mr. Hill's case, however, it was an acquired, not a native musical utterance, and its use in "Lilacs" makes that tone poem, for all its charm of melody and of sound, seem rather outmoded.

Oddly enough, Beethoven's First Symphony wears better than some of the later and "greater" ones and Dr. Koussevitzky's handling of it has invariably been felicitous in the extreme.

Some yesterday were impressed with his reading of "Death and Transfiguration" which, like that of the last previous performance of the tone poem here in October, 1940, tended to underscore the music at every point and in every way. The beginning and the end were played as slowly as they could be played and maintain any relation to Strauss' intentions, while the melodrama of the middle section was pointed up in true Koussevitzkian fashion. The reception accorded the performance was a most enthusiastic one.

Polish National Anthem Opens Last of Symphony Concerts

Mrs. John C. Phillips, Miss Elizabeth Sears, Mrs. Francis P. Sears in Audience

By ALISON ARNOLD

The playing of the Polish national anthem at the opening of yesterday's Symphony Concert was a grim reminder of the seriousness of the times. And the Friday afternoon subscribers, realizing that much may happen before they occupy their accustomed seats in Symphony Hall next fall, applauded with unusual warmth this last concert of the orchestra's 61st season and gave a rising welcome to its beloved conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky.

Besides the anthem, "Poland Is Not Lost," played in commemoration of Polish Constitution Day, which comes tomorrow, the orchestra played "The Star Spangled Banner," as it has at each concert for many months now, before starting the program of music by Debussy, Ravel, Tchaikovsky and Vaughan Williams.

Fragrant bouquets of Mayflowers on sale outside the hall attracted many of the concert-goers who, with them, added an appropriate May Day touch to their light Spring costumes. Mrs. John C. Phillips was one of those who carried a nosegay of the pale pink arbutus. Her pink and black print frock was topped by a black redingote with which she wore a wide-brimmed black hat, shiny satin ribbon encircling its tiny square crown.

Prints or pin-striped suits were the choice of most of the audience. Miss Elizabeth Sears, fiancee of Mr. Benjamin Gardiner, wore a frock which combined a printed skirt of purple, white and green with a plain purple bodice on which she had pinned a pink carnation. Her mother, Mrs. Francis P. Sears, had a white maline scarf at the neckline of her dark frock. Miss Gertrude Storey wore a navy and white print, while Miss Polly Curtis chose a silk suit of navy printed with clusters of pink mayflowers.

With a rose felt hat to match her printed frock, Miss Barbara Bremer was chatting at intermission with Mrs. Alfred Kidder, 2d and others in attractive prints were Mrs. Edward B. Simmons, Miss May Bottomley, Miss Carey Ware, and Miss Elise Cunningham, whose frock was made dirndl fashion.

Just back from a winter in California, Mrs. Robert Treat Paine was being greeted by many friends. Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, another who had pinned a cluster of Mayflowers to her gown, was talking with Mrs. Charles A. Wessell whose daughter, Mrs. Dudley L. Pickman, had yellow narcissi on her navy coat. Still others noted in the audience, saddened by the rumored cancellation of the Berkshire Festival, were Mrs. Allan Forbes, Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson, Mrs. Robert W. Knowles, Mrs. Edward A. Taft and Mrs. Arthur Allen.

The Francis I. Amory's young daughter, Miss Mary Amory, wore a visored cap of gray flannel to match her trim suit. Miss Jean Q. Clark, who attended with her mother, Mrs. Paul Clark, and was talking before the concert with Mr. Maxim Karolik, wore a striped suit of oxford gray brightened by a yellow blouse. Another attractive tailored suit was worn by Miss Nancy Tucker, who carried a red bag as Mrs. Edward J. L. Ropes did with her navy suit.

In navy with red epaulets was Mrs. Henry K. White, while Miss Priscilla Thorndike, in a reverse color scheme wore a navy hat and veil with her reddish suit. Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike, Jr., wearing a hat of pink flowers, attended with her mother, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, and her sister, Mrs. Henry A. Murray, Jr. Still others glimpsed were Mrs. Henry P. Benson, Mrs. Paul T. Haskell, Mr. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. Frederick Munroe, Mrs. E. Taylor Crowninshield, Mrs. Malcolm Bradley French, Mrs. Harris J. Nelson and Miss Jane Megrew.

READY!—Arthur Fiedler raises the baton and the famous Pops Orchestra prepares to go with the ensuing downbeat. The Pops begin again at Symphony Hall on next Tuesday night.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, presented the 24th and final concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, with the following program:

Vaughan Williams
Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis for Double String orchestra
Debussy
Prelude a "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune"
Ravel ..... "Daphnis et Chloe"; 2d suite
Tchaikovsky
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64

Granted it is a long way from the ultra-refined musical atmosphere of Debussy and Ravel to the overpoweringly lush sonorities of Tchaikovsky, when the most familiar music of all three appears on one program, no matter how much we may admire each separately, the result is a shade too giddy for comfort. Thus, for all the tonal glories that sounded through Symphony Hall yesterday and for all the incredible virtuosity of orchestra and conductor, we must confess to a slight vertigo at the richness of the diet.

Still it was a "last concert," and far be it from us to decry discreet emotional revelation under the circumstance, for there's absolutely no denying that such an occasion belongs to the conductor, and if he sees fit to indulge in a magnificent tour de force, we are with him all the way. And no man ever deserved his ovation more than Dr. Koussevitzky did yesterday, finishing, as he has, his 18th season, his stature among his contemporaries more gigantic than ever.

Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by the 16th century English composer Thomas Tallis provided the one intellectual moment on a program otherwise given over entirely to sensuality. There are few examples in contemporary music of such mastery of the string band as Vaughan Williams has demonstrated here. With the string orchestra divided into three sections, used now as solo ensembles and again as a whole, the composition is boldly original in all but the austere theme itself. Yet there is within its fabric the unmistakable evidence of the composer's early compulsion to create or at least point the way to a specific musical idiom deriving from the English folksong.

After the breath-taking performance of the Debussy and the Ravel, the Tchaikovsky came as anti-climax. Yet we have never heard the finale of it taken at such a driving pace, nor have we ever heard it resemble great music more than it did yesterday. The concert will be repeated tonight, of course, at which time we venture to prophesy an even greater ovation than that which took place yesterday.

THE STRADIVARIUS OF ORCHESTRAS

"If the house caught fire" is the way we would have said it formerly. Now it is "if we were to be bombed," everyone must have considered what he would try to save. Lives first, of course; but after that, some possession of unique value—a Stradivarius violin, for example, worth thousands or hundreds of thousands in dollars, yet worth far more in the hands of a Kreisler or a Heifetz for the joy and solace its music can bring to multitudes of men and women.

This allegory goes on all fours. Our world of the mind and spirit is being bombed; we do consider which prized possession we can save; this city, this region, yes, and this nation have a musical instrument as valuable to us in mere dollars, as unique in tonal quality, as impossible to duplicate, and, in the hands of its virtuoso conductor, as capable of bestowing peace and happiness upon multitudes as a Cremona fiddle. It is the Boston Symphony Orchestra which today completes its 61st season.

The time has long since gone by (if indeed such a time ever was at all) when our orchestra was a possession of the few. It now belongs to the many. Like a miracle of the loaves and fishes, it feeds not the five thousand only, but tens and hundreds of thousands. At home and on tour it makes great the name of Boston in the most enviable form of high repute—that of a cultural center, which this city has for generations been reputed to be. For within the past dozen or fifteen years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become not only the finest in America but the greatest musical instrument in existence.

It will be wanted more rather than less as the war goes on. Good music is not an "escape"; it is an ultimate reality. A year ago at the Pension Fund concert (Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis") there were empty seats; at last Sunday's Pension Fund concert (Beethoven's 9th Symphony and Bach's "Magnificat") every seat was filled, the walls were lined with standees, one saw men in uniform whichever way he looked, and old-timers comparing notes afterward agreed that they had never heard as moving a performance of these two great hymns to human brotherhood, not even in Symphony Hall itself.

Institutions may be as mortal as men. Their survival, even in normal times, depends on their adaptability to an ever-changing environment. The alert public spirit and the quiet tact with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra welcomes opportunities for service to the larger community and the flexibility of thought which guides its conduct of these occasions are probably its best guarantee of survival.

Our orchestra is a proving ground for works by American composers (Barber, Berenzowsky, Copland, Harris, Hill, Schuman, Taylor—these in the past season alone); it is dispenser of free concerts of the classics to the multitude on the Esplanade in July; it steps forward as pinch-hitter for an orchestra unable to appear in our neighboring city of Worcester; it devised the brilliant and timely concert for Russian Relief in the nation's capital last March; and it is prepared to continue, if conditions permit, its annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival and Music School this Summer; or, if unforeseen events should prevent this, it contemplates a more local event not so expensive of tires and gasoline. Wherever the want is, there is the orchestra, ready and willing.

Any live institution is forever at crossroads. Ability to cope with situations which now change from month to month, from week to week, and resourcefulness to meet the unknown are qualities which have been for now nearly two decades the good genius of Symphony Hall. Let them continue and our orchestra will find the way not to rust but to rustle, and to "rustle" in the rugged sense of frontiersmen's ponies who could forage for themselves and keep alive by gnawing the bark off trees. But such a last resort is not likely. We Bostonians and New Englanders know how to value our great Stradivarius violin.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

The Boston Symphony Season

Monitor May 2

By L. A. Sloper

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's sixty-first season is closing with this week's pair of concerts (May 1-2). It has been an interesting and stimulating season, with about the usual number of novelties; this in face of difficulties brought about by the action of the American Federation of Musicians in forbidding certain soloists and conductors to appear with the orchestra.

The heaviest blow was the barring of Bruno Walter. Mr. Walter was to have directed two pairs of concerts during Dr. Koussevitzky's winter vacation. The union's ruling, made at the eleventh hour, necessitated the picking up of the baton by Richard Burgin, assistant conductor and concertmaster, who as a result remained in charge for three weeks running. Mr. Burgin is an excellent musician and an accomplished conductor, and he has maintained program and performance interest; but it would be idle to pretend that Mr. Walter was not missed. The only consolation for Bostonians was that he directed two performances of the Metropolitan Opera later in the season.

* * *

For soloists, although it was not permitted to engage some of the most illustrious artists, the orchestra did very well indeed, calling on Emanuel Feuermann, Claudio Arrau, Louis Bailly, Yehudi Menuhin, and Ruth Posselt, among others.

What the outcome of this labor problem will be, no one can say. There are those who believe that the Boston organization cannot hold out indefinitely as the only non-union major orchestra in the United States. But there is no sign now that it will submit to union control. Under the stress of conditions today, it may well become more difficult for the orchestra to maintain its independence, especially since it has recently lost a generous benefactor through the passing of Ernest B. Dane, late president of the board of trustees. But present indications are that the orchestra will resume operations next fall, after its usual full summer schedule, with the same personnel, the same conductor, and the same policy.

* * *

Four works were performed this season for the first time anywhere: Lopatnikoff's Violin Concerto; Lourié's "Kormtchaia," Symphony No. 2; Martinů's Concerto Grosso for chamber orchestra, and William Schuman's Third Symphony. Of these the most impressive was the Schuman "symphony," which, though it bore small relation to the classic symphony in form, contained some interesting ideas, and some good craftsmanship. It would have been better worth a rehearing, in my opinion, than the two works which Dr. Koussevitzky did repeat; the Martinů Concerto Grosso, and Shostakovitch's Sixth Symphony.

The latter, which had its first Boston performance, was heard twice within a March week. It seems to me even less worth so much attention than the Fifth of the same composer, which Dr. Koussevitzky has pressed upon us of late. It consists of a long opening Largo, followed by two short lively movements. There are many charming pages in the Largo, and there are amusing passages in the other two sections, but the work is badly proportioned.

Paul Hindemith's Symphony in E flat conforms to the classic structure, but here there is an impression of more scholarship than inspiration. The symphony is not so much an individual work as a Teutonic production in which the thematic dryness, the heavy humor, and the occasional bombast are all reminiscent of Mahler. This symphony was introduced by Mr. Burgin.

Other works new to Boston which held special interest for one reason or another were Britten's Sinfonia da Requiem, the Berezowsky Viola Concerto, Barber's Violin Concerto, and Copland's Suite from the ballet, "Billy the Kid."

This year Dr. Koussevitzky broke with his own tradition and concluded the season, not with the Brahms First, but with the Tchaikovsky Fifth, a work for which he has a special affection and with which he never fails to make an overwhelming effect. It was so at the Friday concert this time. Otherwise the program consisted of Vaughan Williams' Tallis Fantasia, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Ravel's Second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite. There was the usual ovation at the close.

Gl. MUSIC May 2

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The concerts yesterday afternoon and tonight by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are the last of the season. They concluded upon the triumphant chords of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, a work which, starting in the sluggish depths of E minor, ends in the brightness of E major and a general din indicating victory. If any analogy may be drawn between this Russian Symphony and the world today, let us hope that before another Symphony season will have run its course, our victory will have been won.

According to custom, there is no new music at the opening and closing Symphony concerts, so the program this week, in addition to Tchaikovsky, consists of the Vaughan-Williams Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis; Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy, and the second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite by Ravel. But there is something novel: performance of the National Anthem of Poland, at the very beginning of the concerts, in anticipation of the 151st anniversary tomorrow of the adoption of the Polish Constitution.

The 61st season of Boston's great orchestra passes into memory with the organization still at the height of excellence where it has been secure for well over a decade. Yesterday's playing was proof, if any were needed today, of that excellence. They were gorgeous performances, despite roughnesses in the Tchaikovsky Fifth, and a perilous moment or two of technical uncertainty just after the beginning of the "General Dance" in "Daphnis and Chloe."

Serge Koussetitzky's extraordinary powers of imagination have not diminished; consider his personal, rhetorical and very free way with Tchaikovsky, which gives the Symphony unforgettable emotional glow. Consider, also, his interpretive wizardry with the Tallas Fantasia, that conjures up an English past; with the pagan languors of Debussy and the scintillant picture-music of Ravel. How well the Friday audience appreciates conductor and orchestra was obvious in the cheers and handclapping that formed a seasonal farewell when the concert was over.

By way of footnote one would like to put down here a few details that somehow were omitted, and discovered too late for correction, in the review of the Symphony season which will be printed in tomorrow's Globe. First, the ballet music "Billy the Kid," by Aaron Copland, takes its place among the best new music of the season; second, that Mr. Koussevitzky's repetition, in the same season, of the Concerto Grosso by Martinu, and the Sixth Symphony of Shostakovitch, was a departure merited by the fine quality of the scores.—C. W. D.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
MAY 2 - 1942

MUSIC IN WARTIME

Modern war involves spiritual as well as practical measures of defense. At such a time art, especially music, becomes one of the great strongholds of liberty. It is not merely a coincidence that multitudes pack Carnegie Hall and join with the maestro in singing "The Star-Spangled Banner" after Toscanini has discoursed the heroic music of Beethoven; that attendance increases at all the important musical events, and that wholly exceptional interest is manifested in the musical activities of the coming Summer. Perhaps the most striking of these manifestations is the response from every part of the United States to the announcement of the seventh annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival, which is given in late July and early August by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Stockbridge, Mass. From California and Oregon, from Georgia and Louisiana, from the Middle West and all the Atlantic seaboard—in fact, from thirty-two of the forty-eight States—orders are pouring in.

This occurs, moreover, in a year when the announcement of the definite dates of the festival was long delayed; in a year of heavy taxation, rationing of tires and gasoline and other and numerous exigencies of wartime. The evidence seems to point to a patronage satisfied with the festival's assurance that adequate means of transportation to the concerts will be provided, and determined to attend its performances with an enthusiasm transcending any difficulties that conditions of the moment may engender. Charles A. Thompson, chief of the division of cultural relations, may have been more prophetic than he knew when he said that "music is one of the great satisfactions of life that cannot be touched by rationing or priorities, cannot be sunk at sea, nor seized by conquering armies for their own use."

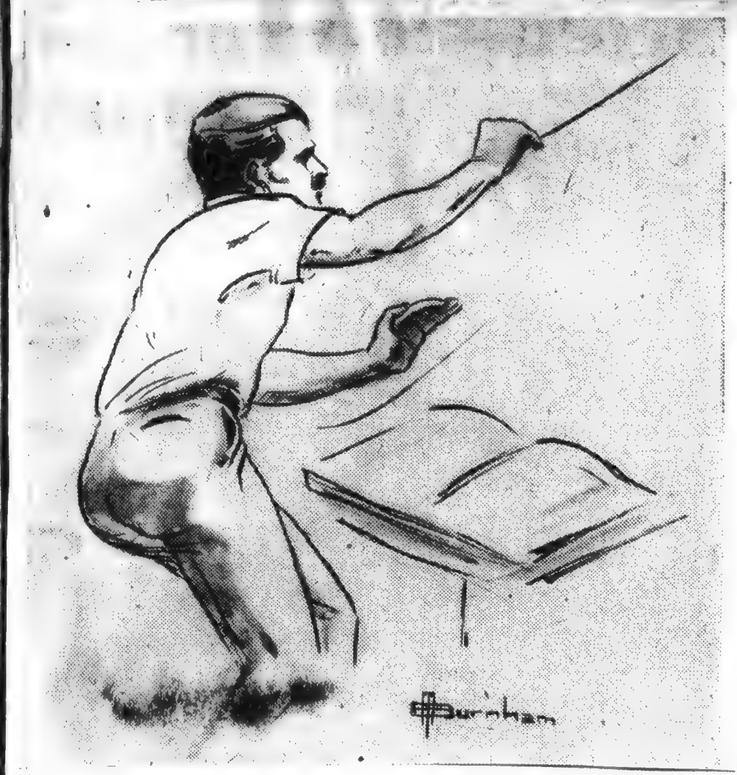
This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
MAY 5 - 1942

MUSIC IN WARTIME

(New York Times)

Modern war involves spiritual as well as practical measures of defense. At such a time art, especially music, becomes one of the great strongholds of liberty. It is not merely a coincidence that multitudes pack Carnegie Hall and join with the maestro in singing "The Star-Spangled Banner" after Toscanini has discoursed the heroic music of Beethoven; that attendance increases at all the important musical events, and that wholly exceptional interest is manifested in the musical activities of the coming summer. Perhaps the most striking of these manifestations is the response from every part of the United States to the announcement of the seventh annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival, which is given in late July and early August by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Stockbridge, Mass. From California and Oregon, from Georgia and Louisiana, from the Middle West and all the Atlantic seaboard—in fact, from 32 of the 48 states—orders are pouring in.

This occurs, moreover, in a year when the announcement of the definite dates of the festival was long delayed; in a year of heavy taxation, rationing of tires and gasoline and other and numerous exigencies of wartime. The evidence seems to point to a patronage satisfied with the festival assurance that adequate means of transportation to the concerts will be provided, and determined to attend its performances with an enthusiasm transcending any difficulties that conditions of the moment may engender. Charles A. Thompson, chief of the division of cultural relations, may have been more prophetic than he knew when he said that "music is one of the great satisfactions of life that cannot be touched by rationing or priorities, cannot be sunk at sea, nor seized by conquering armies for their own use."



Throng Attends Opening of Pops

Stirring Patriotic Medley Wins Favor

By ELINOR HUGHES

Now that the lilacs are in bloom, the bulbs flaunting their brilliant colors in the Public Garden and Arthur Fiedler has conducted the first Pops, it may officially be stated, without fear of giving away any state secrets, that spring is here and summer just around the corner. Symphony Hall was filled, as usual, with a most cheerful and enthusiastic crowd; the green and gold lattices were in place along the side walls, there were flowers on the platform and everything looked just as it usually does at this season of the year. The only unusual notes—barring a few jocose discords in Shostakovitch's "Golden Age" ballet sweet—were the presence of many men in uniform in the audience, and the absence of the colored bulbs in the overhead chandeliers, which always look like the most magnificent of diamond sunbursts. Mr. Fiedler was as good a showman as ever and the orchestra was definitely in the groove, whether for Wagner or for jazz, and the program was typically Pops, easy to digest and possessed of no startling novelties.

Put it down as a sign of the times that a sextet of young people arrived at Symphony Hall in a two horsepower taxi, but that was the only horsedrawn vehicle noticeable during the influx or departure of the audience. There was very little formal dress, and a few women were observed knitting, but plenty of pretzels were to be seen, and a pleasant popping of corks and obligatto of clinking glasses accompanied the more frivolous sections of the program. (If they hadn't, there would have been something very much amiss with the picture). Symphony officials rubbed elbows with bomber pilots, and a former usher at the Hall, Carleton Beyer, now assistant to the music librarian, provided one of the greatest hits of the evening with his arrangement of the enormously popular song hit, "Deep in the Heart of Texas," which, I venture to guess, will be the most frequently played encore of the season. Played as an encore last night, it had to be repeated, by loud and insistent demand.

Considering the times, the abundance of patriotic music on the program was not at all surprising. Mr. Fiedler—who was being photographed every other minute with the aid of flashbulbs — led off with Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever," and then, after the first intermission, played the "Star Spangled Banner," like Koussevitzky, with his back to the orchestra and leading the audience in song, but at so rapid a tempo that all but the most long winded vocalizers were left a bit breathless at the end. The concert ended with a really exciting medley, "Salute to Our Fighting Forces," arranged by Peter Bodge and consisting of "Halls of Montezuma," "Keep 'Em Flying," "Anchors Aweigh," "The Caissons Are Rolling Along," and "God Bless America," all with appropriate sound effects. The uproar of applause that followed this was abundant proof of Mr. Fiedler's skill in catching the mood of his audience.

Interspersed with such familiar friends as "Voices of Spring," the overture to "Die Fledermaus" and the "Espana" Rhapsody, there were, however, some relatively unfamiliar works, the most enjoyable of which was Shostakovitch's ballet suite from "The Golden Age," written as a burlesque on bourgeois musical taste. The audience enjoyed it as a musical joke and laughed at the composer's ingenious confusion of tempos. Another novelty was J. Newell Chase's "Tanglewood Pool," a sentimental, romantic work, reminiscent of Debussy, and presumably intended as a tribute to the Berkshire Festival. Mr. Chase was present in the audience to acknowledge the applause. Robert Guyn McBride's "Strawberry Jam" proved to be an amusing work in jazz rhythms, tossed off by the orchestra with such lively enjoyment that it set the feet of the listeners to tapping in sympathy. The encores, in addition to "Deep In the Heart of Texas," consisted of short works by Kreisler, Tchaikovsky, Kalinus and Frank Bridge.

Preparations for the Pops

The fifty-seventh season begins Tuesday night at Symphony Hall, with Arthur Fiedler conducting. (Above left) Mr. Fiedler is to be seen at rehearsal; (center) the chandelier is put in place above the platform; (top right) Julius Theodorowicz, concertmaster of the Pops orchestra; (lower right) the hall receives its summer trimming of green paint.

First Week of Pops

The Pop Concerts will open their fifty-seventh season tomorrow night in Symphony Hall. Arthur Fiedler will again conduct an orchestra of 85 Symphony players, and refreshments will be served as usual at the tables which will cover the floor of Symphony Hall, and in the balconies during intermissions. The first special night will be Harvard Night next Sunday, when the Harvard Glee Club will join the orchestra. Denise Bacon, pianist, will be soloist on Friday, and Jesús María Sanromá on Saturday. The programs of the week follow:

Opening Night, May 5, at 8:30

"Stars and Stripes Forever," March ..... Sousa
Overture to "Die Fledermaus" ..... Strauss
Raftsman's Dance ..... de Filippi
(Based on the American folk tunes "Raftsman Jim" and "Going Up the River").
"España" Rhapsody ..... Chabrier
"The Golden Age," Ballet Suite, Shostakovitch
"Tanglewood Pool," Pastel Sketch .. Chase
Overture to "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner
"Strawberry Jam (Home Made)" McBride
"Voices of Spring," Waltzes ..... Strauss
Salute to Our Fighting Forces, Arranged by Peter Bodge

Wednesday, May 6

March, "Oxford Street," from "London Again" ..... Coates
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" ..... Nicolai
"Cherry Ripe," Old Old English Song, for strings. Arranged by Frank Bridge
Fantasia, "Carmen" ..... Bizet
"Danse Macabre" ..... Saint-Saëns
"The Walk to the Paradise Garden," Intermezzo from "A Village Romeo and Juliet" ..... Delius
Finale, Fourth Symphony .. Tchaikovsky
"The Skaters," Waltzes .... Waldteufel
"Andalucia" ..... Lecuona-Gould
Russian Sailors' Dance from "The Red Poppy" ..... Gliere

Thursday, May 7

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Triumphal March from "Peter and the Wolf" ..... Prokofieff
"Soviet Iron Works" ..... Mossolov
"Peer Gynt" Suite ..... Grieg
"Deep River," Negro Spiritual Arranged by Jacchia
Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1. .... Enesco
Mechanized Forces (March Fantasy on "You're in the Army Now" ..... Lasslo
"Roses from the South," Waltzes Strauss
First Hungarian Dance ..... Brahms

Friday, May 8

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy" .. Berlioz
'Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" ..... Mozart
Slavonic Dance in C major, No. 15 Dvorak
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" .. Tchaikovsky
Piano Concerto No. 1 in G minor Mendelssohn
Soloist: Denise Bacon
Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" Tchaikovsky
"Artists' Life," Waltzes ..... Strauss
Souvenir of Vienna .. Prevost CMFWYP.
Intermezzo, Souvenir of Vienna .. Prevost
'Pomp and Circumstance," March ... Elgar

Saturday, May 9

"On the Mall," March ..... Goldman
Overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini
"Agnus Dei" from "L'Arlésienne" .. Bizet
"Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz
Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor, Schumann
Soloist: Jesús María Sanromá
Songs by the Regis College Glee Club, Conducted by Dolores Kimble
España ..... Chabrier
Serenade ..... Romberg
"America, My Own" ..... Cain
Gershwiniana, "Thunder and Lightning," Polka, Regis Hymn ..... Straus

Sunday, May 10

Harvard Night

Guest Conductor: Malcolm Holmes
"Knightsbridge" (March) from "London" Suite ..... Eric Coates
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" Mozart
Concerto for Orchestra, First Movement Walter Piston
Guest Conductor: G. Wallace Woodworth
The Harvard Glee Club
Bacchanale from "Belshazzar" .... Handel
Prisoners' Chorus from "Fidelio" Beethoven
Praestat Hoc Nobis ..... Chadwick
Guest Conductor: G. Wallace Woodworth
The Harvard Glee Club
"The Defense of Corinth" .. Elliott Carter
Written for Harvard Glee Club, 1941
Speaker: Quentin M. Hope, '42
Czechoslovakian Folk Song: "Mägdlein im Walde" ..... Arr. by Dvorak
Choruses from "The Beggar's Opera" Gay and Pepusch
Bacchanale from "La Belle Hélène" Offenbach
Choruses from The Yeomen of the Guard Sullivan
Solo: R. B. Stedman, '42
Guest Conductor: Malcolm Holmes
Tarheel Fantasy (Based on folk songs of North Carolina) ..... Melville Smith
'Tales from the Vienna Woods' Strauss
Prayer of Thanksgiving (Old Dutch Hymn) ..... Valerius-Kremser
"Fair Harvard"

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops orchestra will present the following program tonight in Symphony Hall:

March, "Oxford Street," from "London Again" ..... Coates
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" ..... Nicolai
"Cherry Ripe," Old English Song, for strings ..... arr. by Frank Bridge
Fantasia, "Carmen" ..... Bizet
"Danse Macabre"—Symphonic Poem, Saint-Saens
"The Walk to the Paradise Garden," Intermezzo from "A Village Romeo and Juliet" ..... Delius
Finale, Fourth Symphony ..... Tchaikovsky
"The Skaters," Waltzes ..... Waldteufel
Andalucia ..... Lecuona-Gould
Russian Sailors' Dance from "The Red Poppy" ..... Gliere

Boston Symphony Records Given to Camp Edwards

CAMP EDWARDS, May 6—The Boston Symphony Orchestra has donated to Camp Edwards soldiers a large library of recordings.

The records, on hand at the Buzzards Bay U. S. O. Club near the camp, may be borrowed by the soldiers. Many of the records are of symphonic arrangements by the Boston orchestra.

Funds for the purchase were raised during a benefit concert of the Berkshire festival.

Loan of the records is made through application at the recreation office of the service club.

The Red Cross House, at the Camp Edwards Station Hospital, today announced a busy schedule.

The Leland Powers School, Boston, will present "Springtime for Henry." Camp nurses will hold a dance Friday night for officers. Saturday afternoon Mrs. Florence White will bring 20 Brockton girls to entertain soldier patients. Saturday evening a group of New Bedford players will present "Night Must Fall." On Sunday evening Miss Bessie Kranz of New Bedford will conduct a recorded hour of classical music.

Eight hundred recruits, members of the 385th Engineers Battalion, are discovering what Army life is all about.

These "rookies," drafted a few weeks ago, come from New England, West Virginia, Illinois, Indiana and Arkansas.

The 385th Engineer Battalion was activated last month here and is commanded by Maj. Linwood E. Funches, Greenville, Ala., who was transferred from the 45th Engineers at Camp Blanding, Fla.

114

ARTHUR FIEDLER BOWS AND FIRST POPS CONCERT OF SEASON BEGINS

Women Knit, Uniforms in Evidence—Pops Opens New Season—"Deep in Heart of Texas" Encored

The Pops began at Symphony Hall last night, the Pops with their music and ease and smoking, their refreshments and chatter. Arthur Fiedler again presided over an orchestra of some 85 members of the Boston Symphony. The scene was familiar: The lower part of Symphony Hall transformed, gold and green the dominant colors, the big chandelier over the stage, tables on the floor, flowers on the stage.

From year to year the Pops are much the same, which is desirable. And yet, each season is in some way different. Last night there were many uniforms in the audience. Some women had brought their wartime knitting. The last number on the program was a medley of military and patriotic tunes, arranged by Peter Bodge and titled "Salute to Our Fighting Forces." Such are the Pops during war. Music, fortunately is plentiful, and does not have to be rationed. Without the Pops in Spring Boston would lose one of its prime distinctions and a source of widespread pleasure. Especially is this true at a time like the present, when it is essential to carry on as many activities of entertainment as practicable, which in their way help us all in the great effort of winning a war.

Sousa's brisk march, "Stars and Stripes Forever," appropriately started off the evening, followed by Strauss' Overture to "The Bat," the noisy "Raftsman's Dance" by Amadeo de Filippi, and the "Espana" Rhapsody of Chabrier. New to the Pops was "Tanglewood Pool," which its composer, Newell Chase, calls a "pastel sketch." Pastel is too modest a word, for the music, derivative and orchestrated in Hollywood movie style, is brightly colored. Another newcomer was Robert McBride's "Strawberry Jam Home Made," a sweet-flavored bit whose idiom suggests ragtime more than swing or a jam session.

Wagner's "Tannhauser" Overture, among the old favorites, was conspicuously applauded. So were a suite from the Shostakovitch ballet, "The Golden Age," and the Strauss Waltz, "Voices of Spring." But the biggest hand was aroused by an encore that was itself encored: "Deep in the Heart of Texas." The audience responded with that rhythmic beating of palms which is the thing to do after a certain phrase of the song. The orchestration of the number came from Carleton Beyer, formerly an usher at Symphony Hall, and now assistant to the librarian of the orchestra.

Meanwhile corks popped and glasses tinkled at the tables on the floor, and tobacco smoke rose in a cloud of contentment, and waitresses brought food and liquids.

Mr. Fiedler is evidently going to follow the admirable practice of ing the audience when he conducts "The Star Spangled Banner" and of inviting the audience to sing.

C. W. D.

ROBERT DAY

"I understand he's a scout from the Boston Symphony"

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAY 6 - 1942

Boston Hears About Texas—Loud

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, May 6. — The clap-clap of the jitterbug echoed last night in Boston's Symphony Hall as "Pops" opened its 57th season featuring "Deep in the Heart of Texas."

Arthur Fiedler conducted the 85-piece orchestra—all but a few from the regular Boston Symphony—in a rendition of the popular song arranged by a former usher at "Pops," Charleton Byer, now assistant librarian of the orchestra.

Applause of the crowd of 2500 brought an encore—and even some of the veteran musicians seemed excited.

Waitresses served beer, wine and champagne during the concert.

This Clipping From
BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE
MAY 13 1942

SYMPHONY TRUSTEES.

BOSTON, May 13.—(UP)—William Phillips, former ambassador to Italy, and John Nicholas Brown, Providence socialite, have been made trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, it was announced to-day. Brown is the first person living outside Greater Boston to be made a trustee.

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
MAY 13 1942

BOSTON, May 12. (AP)—William Phillips, of Boston, former United States ambassador to Italy, and John Nicholas Brown, Providence, R. I., corporation official, have been named trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Phillips served as a trustee of the orchestra from 1931 to 1936 prior to his appointment as ambassador.

Phillips and Brown New Trustees of Symphony

William Phillips of Boston, former ambassador to Italy and distinguished diplomat, and John Nicholas Brown of Providence, active for many years as a corporation official and trustee of institutions in Providence, have been made trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was announced yesterday.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAY 13 1942

Named Trustees of Hub Symphony Orchestra

Boston, May 12—(AP)—William Phillips of Boston, former United States embassador to Italy, and John Nicholas Brown, Providence, R. I., corporation official, have been named trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Phillips served as a trustee of the orchestra from 1931 to 1936 prior to his appointment as embassador.

This Clipping From WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS
MAY 13 1942

ORCHESTRA ELECTS

BOSTON, May 12 (INS)—Trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra tonight named William Phillips of Boston, former ambassador to Italy, and John N. Brown of Newport, R. I., to the board.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 13 1942

NAMED SYMPHONY TRUSTEE

John Nicholas Brown, of Providence, has been named a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first trustee outside of Greater Boston to serve on the board, it was announced yesterday.

First Non-Resident Trustee of Symphony

John Nicholas Brown, Providence corporation official, has been named the first non-resident trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was announced last night. Re-appointed a trustee was William Phillips of Boston, former ambassador to Italy, who resigned in 1936 when he was sent to Rome.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
MAY 13 1942

SYMPHONY TRUSTEES

BOSTON, May 13 (UP)—William Phillips, former ambassador to Italy, and John Nicholas Brown of Providence, R. I., have been made trustees of Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was announced today. Phillips formerly was a trustee five years, but his appointment as ambassador, forced his resignation. Brown is the first person living outside Greater Boston to be made a trustee.

This Clipping From
NAUGATUCK, CONN.
NEWS
MAY 13 1942

NAMED TRUSTEES

Boston, May 13—(UP)—William Phillips, former ambassador to Italy, and John Nicholas Brown, Providence (R. I.) socialite, have been made trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, it was announced today. Phillips formerly was a trustee for five years, but his appointment as ambassador to Italy forced his resignation. Brown is the first person living outside Greater Boston to be made a trustee.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
MAY 13 1942

Boston Orchestra Names Trustees

BOSTON—William Phillips of Boston, who resigned as trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1936 to accept the post of ambassador to Italy, today was re-elected to the board with John Nicholas Brown of Providence, R. I.

Mr. Phillips has a long record of service with the United States Department and in 1931-32 served as chairman of the Massachusetts Emergency Committee for Unemployment and the President's committee for Employment. He is a former regent of Harvard College and former secretary of the corporation. Mr. Brown, a corporation official, was active in the movement to repeal prohibition, is a member of the advisory and executive committee of Brown University, was first chairman of the Rhode Island Planning Board.

115

Phillips, Brown Elected Symphony Trustees

John Nicholas Brown of Newport, R. I., and William Phillips of Boston, were made trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a meeting of the board held to fill two vacancies.

Phillips has had a distinguished career in the diplomatic service. He has been attached intermittently to the Department of State and has served in various foreign legations: Great Britain, China, the Netherlands and Luxembourg, Belgium, Canada. He was a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1931 to 1936, when his appointment as United States Ambassador to Italy made his resignation necessary.

Brown is the first trustee outside of Greater Boston to serve upon the board. A resident of Newport, he has been active for a number of years as a corporation official and trustee of institutions in Providence.

The board of trustees now numbers 12, with Jerome D. Greene as president, Henry B. Sawyer as vice president, Henry B. Cabot as treasurer, Reginald C. Foster, Alvan T. Fuller, N. Penrose Hallowell, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Roger I. Lee, Richard C. Paine, Bentley W. Warren.

This Clipping From
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

MAY 13 1942

This Clipping From
SHAMOKIN, PA.
NEWS-DISPATCH

MAY 13 1942

R. I. Man Named Symphony Trustee

John Nicholas Brown of Providence, and William Phillips of Boston, former U. S. ambassador to Italy, have been made trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a recent meeting of the board which was held to fill two vacancies.

John Nicholas Brown is the first trustee outside of greater Boston to serve upon the board. He has been active for a number of years as a corporation official and trustee of institutions in Providence. His association with the Rhode Island Historical Society and the Providence Public Library are indications of his special interest in the arts and letters. Providence was the first New England city to be regularly visited by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has given series of concerts here since its second season in 1882.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

MAY 12 1942

Boston Takes Its Music Easy

While Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in annual popular program, members of the audience sit at their tables and eat or drink while listening to the music

William Phillips, former ambassador to Italy, and John Nicholas Brown, Providence (R. I.) socialite, have been made trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Phillips formerly was a trustee for five years, but his appointment as ambassador to Italy forced his resignation. Brown is the first person living outside greater Boston to be made a trustee.

This Clipping From BOISE, IDAHO
IDAHO STATESMAN

Idaho Girl Plays With Boston Symphony

A 17-year-old Meridian girl—Althea Everitt—who went a-traveling on a piano keyboard, might have been named Cinderella, for all the glamorous and exciting things that have happened to her in the last two years.

Althea, you remember, attended Meridian public school, took part in school programs, and showed an amazing versatility in several talents, especially music. Fern Nolte Davidson, Nampa piano instructor, discovered the girl's piano ability and before long Althea was astounding not only Meridian folk but the entire Boise valley with her remarkable playing.

A New York instructor, who visited friends in Nampa, heard the then 16-year-old prodigy and urged that she be sent to New York. But 16 is pretty young to go so far from home, and living and studying in New York costs money. So Althea continued her instruction under her "fairy god mother" and soon she was being featured in solo work, in recitals and in Idaho's famous Eight-Piano Symphony.

Like Cinderella

Percy Grainger heard her play and was enthusiastically encouraging. A short time later, just like the Cinderella story, she was awarded a scholarship to study piano with the nationally famous Howard Goding, guest instructor at the University of Idaho during the summer of 1939.

The following spring, the young pianist was graduated from Meridian high school — 17 and unspoiled and with sunny disposition as she practiced and helped with the housework in the little Everitt cottage in Meridian. That fall, in 1940, came a "bolt from the blue." She was offered a scholarship (including not only a $1000 tuition, but living expenses and music as well) at Colby Junior College of Women in New London, N. H.

She Had One Dream

Althea, thrilled beyond words, left the valley of her childhood and turned her shining face to new horizons. As she said goodbye to her teacher and guide, the girl confided, with blue eyes aglow, "All my dreams are coming true. If only someday—someday after I've studied and practiced hard—if only someday I could play with the Boston Symphony orchestra just once, then all my dreams would have come true."

Since then, Althea Everitt has played in concerts with Dartmouth, Bowdoin and Harvard concert groups. (At Colby, she is studying with Gladys Gleason, former Idaho girl who has made a name for herself as a concert pianist and instructor.) Now, at 19, the Meridian girl presents programs before critics and big-wigs, with a poise and confidence and easy charm that has won her many laurels.

To Play With Symphony

And the dream of playing with the Boston Symphony orchestra? Still a dream? No, indeed, a reality! That's the sum and substance of this story — that dreams do come true for real-life Cinderellas. But let's let Althea tell it in her own words, as she wrote in a letter to her family recently:

"Oh gee, family!! Guess what!!! Your little Althea is going to play with one of the most famous symphony orchestras in the world—the Boston Symphony Orchestra!! But that isn't all—let me start at the beginning.

"Last Saturday, Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony through the 'Pops' season in the spring—a very famous conductor—called Miss Gleason and told her that he wanted to hear me play the following Monday. So I practiced my Concerto and left for Boston Sunday afternoon. Well!!! Mr. Fiedler has quite a reputation for being very brusque—but he was wonderful to me. We went into Dr. Koussevitsky's room (the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony), and I began to play for him. You see, I was only auditioning to play the first movement of my Concerto, because students just NEVER play more than one movement. In the first place, students seldom play with the Boston Symphony, it seems. So it was only the first movement that I played to Mr. Fiedler.

"When I finished playing, he asked me questions about my studying, etc.—and THEN said 'How much had you planned to play?' I said the first movement, and he said, 'That isn't enough for you.'

"Oh, golly, family—Here I had gone down scared to death that he wouldn't even let me play one movement, and he ASKS me to play the whole thing!!! I still can't get over it. Because things like that just aren't done!! Students just DON'T play whole concertos—and especially at the request of the conductor. Oh, family!!—just think, on the thirtieth of May, your Althea will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall in Boston, Mass., playing the MacDowell Piano Concerto No. 2 under the direction of Arthur Fiedler!! Just like Rachmaninoff or Paderewski. Another dream come true!!"

ALTHEA EVERITT of Meridian, Idaho's youthful Cinderella of the keyboard, will be soloist May 30 when she plays three movements of MacDowell Concerto No. 2 with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the symphony hall in Boston.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
NEWS
MAY 24 1942

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT
JUN 7 - 1942

FREE AND EASY

Knit, drink, be merry and musical. That's spirit of these patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's informal but famed Pop concerts. Mrs. Charles Blanchard of Brookline, Mass., finds knitting is nice to the tune of fine music.

(By Wide World)

The tuba player comes up for—a drink! Eugene Adam rests his 35-pound instrument on a rail as he refreshes a parched throat during intermission at the annual Pop concert. Informality and excellent music are the orders of the day.

(By Wide World)

This Clipping From
BARTLESVILLE, OKLA.
ENTERPRISE
MAY 27 1942

MOSQUITO SONG (CLAP, CLAP!) GOES SNOOTY

BOSTON, May 27. — (AP) — It looks as though "Deep in the Heart of Texas" may clap its way to symphonic fame.

It's always been popular. But last night it climbed right up among the immortals as popular voting ranked it with Schubert and Wagner.

Symphony Hall attaches, counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston Symphony "Pops" concert next Sunday, lifted eyebrows in amazement and then reached for telephones.

For "Deep in the Heart of Texas" was in a triple tie with Schubert's "Ave Maria" and the "Song to the Evening Star" from Wagner's opera "Tannhauser."

Incidentally the most popular selection of all turned out to be Ravel's "Bolero."

This Clipping Fro
MADISON, WIS
CAPITAL TIMES
MAY 27 1942

Texas Tune May Clap Way to Symphonic Fame

BOSTON—(AP)—It looks as though "Deep in the Heart of Texas" may clap its way to symphonic fame.

Symphony hall attaches, counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston symphony "pops" concerts next Sunday, lifted eyebrows in amazement and then reached for telephones. For "Deep in the Heart of Texas" was in a triple tie with Schubert's "Ave Maria" and the "Song of the Evening Star" from Wagner's opera "Tannhauser."

Incidentally the most popular selection of all turned out to be Ravel's "Bolero."

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N.Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
MAY 27 1942

Heart of Texas Aims For Symphonic Career

Boston, Mass , May 26 (AP)—It looks as though Deep In The Heart of Texas might clap its way to symphonic fame.

It's always been popular. But tonight it climbed right up among the immortals as popular voting ranked it with Schubert and Wagner.

Symphony hall attaches, counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston Symphony "pop" concerts next Sunday, lifted eyebrows in amazement and then reached for telephones, because Deep In The Heart of Texas was in a triple tie with Schubert's Ave Maria, and the Song To The Evening Star, from Wagner's opera Tannhauser.

Incidentally, the most popular selection of all turned out to be Ravel's Bolero.

This Clipping From
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM
MAY 27 1942

Symphony Lovers Clap Texas Song

BOSTON, May 27.—(AP)—It looks as though "Deep in the Heart of Texas" may clap its way to symphonic fame.

It's always been popular. But last night it climbed right up among the immortals as popular voting ranked it with Schubert and Wagner.

Symphony Hall attaches, counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston Symphony "Pops" concerts next Sunday, lifted eyebrows in amazement and then reached for telephones.

For "Deep in the Heart of Texas" was in a triple tie with Schubert's "Ave Maria" and the "Song of the Evening Star" from Wagner's opera "Tannhauser."

Incidentally the most popular selection of all turned out to be Ravel's "Bolero."

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
MAY 27 1942

That 'Deep' Song Heads for Fame

Ties with 'Ave Maria' And Wagner Classic in Boston 'Pops' Poll

Boston — (AP) — It looks as though "Deep in the Heart of Texas" may clap its way to symphonic fame.

It's always been popular. But last night it climbed right up among the immortals as popular voting ranked it with Schubert and Wagner.

Symphony Hall attaches, counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston Symphony "pop" concerts next Sunday, lifted eyebrows in amazement and then reached for telephones.

For "Deep in the Heart of Texas" was in a triple tie with Schubert's "Ave Maria" and the "Song to the Evening Star" from Wagner's opera "Tannhauser."

Incidentally the most popular selection of all turned out to be Ravel's "Bolero."

This Clipping From
TAMPA, FLA.
~~TRIBUNE~~
Times
MAY 27 1942

That Texas Lilt Voted Into Ties With Classics

Boston, May 27 (AP). It looks as though "Deep in the Heart of Texas" may clap its way to symphonic fame.

It's always been popular. But last night it climbed right up among the immortals as popular voting ranked it with Schubert and Wagner.

Symphony Hall attaches, counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston Symphony "Pops" concerts next Sunday, lifted eyebrows in amazement and then reached for telephones.

For "Deep in the Heart of Texas" was in a triple tie with Schubert's "Ave Maria" and the "Song to the Evening Star" from Wagners opera "Tannhauser."

Incidentally, the most popular selection of all turned out to be Ravel's 'Bolero."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAY 27 1942

Wagner, Schubert Revolve in Graves

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, May 27.—It looks as though deep in the heart of Texas may clap its way to symphonic fame for today. It had climbed right up among the immortals as popular voting ranked it with Schubert and Wagner.

Symphony Hall attaches, counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston Symphony pop concerts next Sunday, lifted eyebrows in amazement, then reached for telephones. For Deep in the Heart of Texas was in a triple tie with Schubert's Ave Maria and the Song to the Evening Star from Wagner's Tannhauser.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD
MAY 27 1942

WHAT! AIN'T THEY GOT JUKE BOXES IN BOSTON

BOSTON, May 26 (AP)—It looks as though "Deep in the Heart of Texas" may clap its way to symphonic fame.

Symphony Hall employes counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston Symphony "Pops" Concert next Sunday, found it was in a triple tie with Schubert's "Ave Maria" and Wagner's "Song to the Evening Star."

(Ed note: Boston claims to be the "Athens of America.")

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N.Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
MAY 27 1942

'Deep in the . . .' (Clap, Clap) Rivals Wagner

Boston — (AP) — It looks as though "Deep in the Heart of Texas" may clap its way to symphonic fame.

It's always been popular. But last night it climbed up among the immortals as popular voting ranked it with Schubert and Wagner.

Symphony Hall attaches, counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston Symphony "Pops" concerts next Sunday, lifted eyebrows in amazement and then reached for telephones.

For "Deep in the Heart of Texas" was in a triple tie with Schubert's "Ave Maria" and the "Song of the Evening Star" from Wagner's opera "Tannhauser."

Incidently, the most popular selection of all turned out to be Ravel's "Bolero."

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 27 1942

'Deep in the Heart' Clapped Into 'Pops' All-Request Program

Boston, May 27.—(INS)—Classical compositions usually played at "Pops" concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today moved over to ~~make room~~ for "Deep in the Heart of Texas," which has clapped itself to favor.

A poll was taken among audiences to determine the annual "Pops" request night program. "Texas" finished in a triple tie with Schubert's "Ave Maria," and the "Song of the Evening Star," from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

Most popular selection was Ravel's "Bolero."

This Clipping From SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT
MAY 27 1942

Boston Folk Like Deep In the Heart

BOSTON, May 27—(AP)—"Deep in the Heart of Texas" may clap its way to symphonic fame.

Symphony hall attaches, counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston symphony "pops" concerts next Sunday, lifted eyebrows in amazement last night when "Deep in the Heart of Texas" was in a triple tie with Schubert's "Ave Maria" and the "Song to the Evening Star" from Wagner's "Tannhauser."

Incdentally the most popular selection of all turned out to be Ravel's "Bolero."

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
MAY 27 1942

POPULAR TUNE INVADES BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, May 27. — (INS) Classical compositions usually played at "Pops" concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, today moved over to make room for "Deep in the Heart of Texas," which has clapped itself to favor.

A poll was taken among audiences to determine the annual "Pops" request night program. "Texas" finished in a triple tie with Schubert's "Ave Maria," and the "Song of the Evening Star," by Wagner's "Tannhauser."

This Clipping From TULSA, OKLA.
TRIBUNE

'Deep in the Heart of Texas' Is Rival of Schubert, Wagner Fame

BOSTON, May 27.—(AP)—It looks as though ...eep in the Heart of Texas" may clap its way to sym...onic fame.

It's always been popular. But today it climbed ...t up among the immortals as popular voting ranked ...ith Schubert and Wagner.

Symphony hall attaches, counting votes for the ...al request night program of the Boston Symphony ..." concerts next Sunday, lifted eyebrows in amaze- and then reached for telephones.

For "Deep in the Heart of Texas" was in a triple ...ith Schubert's "Ave Maria" and the "Song to the ...ing Star" from Wagner's opera "Tannhauser."

Incidentally, the most popular selection of all ...d out to be Ravel's "Bolero."

This Clipping From
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE
MAY 31 1942

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD
MAY 31 1942

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 31 1942

Hale's Volumes Donated

University of New Hampshire Gets His Program Notes

Philip Hale's own bound set of Boston Symphony program notes, written by the late music critic of "The Boston Herald" over a period of thirty-three years, has been presented to the Hamilton Smith Library of the University of New Hampshire by the author's widow. The set has been placed in the Philip Hale Room in the art division of the library, where the volumes rest in the same bookcase and near the same desk the critic used when he wrote them.

Mr. Hale began the program notes for the Boston Symphony in the fall of 1901 and continued the assignment through the spring of 1933. This gift to the University of New Hampshire includes not only the thirty-three volumes covering this interval but also the notes for the previous ten years which Mr. Hale had collected and had bound, and which he used frequently for reference.

This Clipping From WILKES BARRE, PA.
RECORD
MAY 27 1942

'Deep in the Heart of Texas' for Symphony

Boston, May 26 (AP)—It looks as though "Deep in the Heart of Texas" may clap its way to symphonic fame.

It's always been popular. But tonight it climbed right up among the immortals as popular voting ranked it with Schubert and Wagner.

Symphony Hall attaches, counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston Symphony "pops" concerts next Sunday, lifted eyebrows in amazement and then reached for telephones.

For "Deep in the Heart of Texas" was in a triple tie with Schubert's "Ave Maria" and "Songs to the Evening Star" from Wagner's opera "Tannhauser."

Incidentally the most popular selection of all turned out to be Ravel's "Bolero."

This Clipping From WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS
MAY 27 1942

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
MAY 27 1942

Symphony Finds "Deep in the Heart Of Texas" Popular

BOSTON—"Deep in the Heart of Texas" has climbed right among the immortals, including the works of Schubert and Wagner, at least by popular vote.

Officials of Symphony Hall, counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston Symphony "pops" concert Sunday, discovered to their amazement that the song was in a triple tie with Schubert's "Ave Maria" and "Song to the Evening Star," from Wagner's opera, "Tannhauser."

The most popular selection of all, however, was Ravel's "Bolero."

HEART OF TEXAS' JOINS SYMPHONIC FAVORITES

BOSTON, May 26 (AP)—It looks as though "Deep in the Heart of Texas" may clap its way to symphonic fame.

It's always been popular. But tonight it climbed right up among the immortals as popular voting ranked it with Schubert and Wagner.

Symphony Hall attaches, counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston Symphony "pops" concert next Sunday, lifted eyebrows in amazement.

For "Deep in the Heart of Texas" was in a triple tie with Schubert's "Ave Maria" and the "Song to the Evening Star" from Wagner's opera "Tannhauser."

This Clipping From VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAY 27 1942

This Clipping From DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
MAY 27 1942

Deep in Heart, Etc. Claps Its Way to Symphony Claim

BOSTON, Mass., May 26 (AP).—It looks as though Deep in the Heart of Texas may clap its way to symphonic fame.

It's always been popular. But Tuesday night it climbed right up among the immortals as popular voting ranked it with Schubert and Wagner.

Symphony Hall attaches, counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston Symphony Pops concerts next Sunday, lifted eyebrows in amazement and then reached for telephones.

For Deep in the Heart of Texas was in a triple tie with Schubert's Ave Maria and the Song to the Evening Star from Wagner's opera Tannhaeuser.

Incidentally the most popular selection of all turned out to be Ravel's Bolero.

Providence Businessman A Boston Orch. Trustee

Boston, May 26.

John Nichols Brown, Providence corporation official, has been named the first non-resident trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Reappointed a trustee was William Philips, of this city, former ambassador to Italy, who resigned in 1936 when he was sent to Rome.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAY 28 1942

'Heart of Texas'

Boston— (INS) —Classical compositions usually played at "pops" concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today moved over to make room for "Deep in the Heart of Texas," which has clapped itself to favor.

This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
MAY 31 1942

Choo-Choos, Blues and Texas

THE CABOTS and LOWELLS, not to mention the ADAMSES and the PUTNAMS, undoubtedly gazed through their lorgnettes in patrician amazement, as Deep in the Heart of Texas landed on the Boston Symphony's annual "request night" program in a tie for first place in popularity with SCHUBERT'S Ave Maria and WAGNER'S Song to the Evening Star. Back Bay must have felt the foundations of civilization crumbling, when the votes came in.

For Deep in the Heart of Texas, is a tune so proletarian and elementary as to be intelligible to anybody who has ears. There are only 30 notes in the whole thing, and the melody has to be repeated, to an obligato of Texan handclapping and yippeeing, in order to fill out a 32-bar chorus. Just what the shades of FRANZ SCHUBERT and RICHARD WAGNER had to say, when they found this chef d'oeuvre by MR. and MRS. DON SWANDER, of the Lone Star State, vying with their masterpieces in Boston, of all places, can only be surmised.

Deep in the Heart of Texas completely eclipsed in popularity Beautiful Texas, the immortal ditty with the aid of which "Biscuit Passin' Pappy" O'DANIEL hypnotized the Lone Star voters in three different elections. Whereas Beautiful Texas never made the radio "Hit Parade," Deep in the Heart of youknowwhat was on the parade from early February until early this month, and led it for five straight weeks. It is, in fact, in the class with such deathless compositions as Blues in the Night and Chattanooga Choo-Choo. No wonder SCHUBERT and WAGNER have been thrown for a loss.

This Clipping From
TWIN FALLS, IDAHO
NEWS
MAY 31 1942

Idaho Musician Plays Concerto At Boston Hall

Althea Everitt, Nampa, was chosen by Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Pops orchestra, to appear as soloist in Symphony hall, Boston, Saturday night, May 30, at Colby Junior College Night. She played the MacDowell concerto last night.

Miss Everitt is a pupil of Miss Gladys Gleason, Jerome, who now is director of music at Colby Junior college, and has been a member of the University of Idaho summer school faculty.

She is the second Idaho girl in the past two years who has gone to Colby and been thus honored by Mr. Fiedler. Miss Maxine McCurry, Boise, played the Schumann concerto in Symphony hall two years ago. She also was a pupil of Miss Gleason. Both were discovered by Miss Gleason during her vacations, which she usually spends in Idaho.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Malkin Pops

It was Malkin Conservatory Night at the Pops last evening. Arthur Fiedler conducted and Robert Brink, a pupil of the Malkin Conservatory, was the violin soloist in Lalo's Symphonie Espagnol for violin and orchestra.

Midway in the program came Mr. Brink's playing of the Lalo Symphonie. It was a musicianly but rather tentative performance, marked at first by rather unsteady pitch and certain uneveness of bowing. But the young musician's playing gained in poise and accuracy during the following two movements. Mr. Brink has a pleasant tone and considerable facility on his instrument. His approach to music is obviously sensitive. But his performance needed more "git up and git."

The program had begun in swinging fashion with John Philip Sousa's march, "The Bride-Elect;" the Romeo and Juliet Overture-Fantasia of Tchaikovsky; the Scherzo from Mendelssohn' Octet, and Kreisler's "Tambourin Chinois." The remaining items were Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1 and shorter pieces by Strauss, Gould, and Brahms. And, of course, there were many encores. A capacity audience warmly showed its enjoyment of the whole program.—J. W. R.

HAROLD RUBENS, brilliant young Welsh pianist, who appears as soloist at Pops tonight.

Harold Rubens Pops Soloist Tonight

Harold Rubens, brilliant young pianist, will appear as soloist with the Boston Pops Orchestra tonight in Symphony Hall. Rubens, who was born in Cardiff, Wales, began his musical career at the age of 10. He made his London debut in 1930, following which he appeared in recital and as soloist with orchestras throughout England, France, Germany, Norway, Sweden and Holland. He has played before several of the royal families of Europe and also for the late Paderewski, who predicted a brilliant future for the young artist. The war interrupted plans for further extensive tours of Europe and Australia.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The Boston Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler will present the following program in Symphony Hall tonight at 8:30:

*Triumphal March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Die Fledermaus".....Strauss
"Spring," for String Orchestra.....Grieg
*Fifth Hungarian Dance.....Brahms
"El Salon Mexico".....Copland
Variations on a Nursery Song, for Orchestra and Piano Obligato...Dohnanyi
Soloist: Harold Rubens
*"Wine, Woman and Song," Waltzes.....Strauss
*"The Toy Trumpet".....Scott
Salute to our Fighting Forces—Ar. by Bodge
Halls of Montezuma (Marine Hymn)—
Keep 'Em Flying—Anchors Aweigh—
When the Caissons Go Rolling Alor
(Artillery March)—God Bless Am-

This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JUN 2 - 1942

Deep in the Heart of Youknowwhat

THE CABOTS AND LOWELLS undoubtedly were nonplussed, as the editor pointed out Sunday morning, to learn that clap-clap song, Deep in the Heart of Texas, had run a three-way dead heat with Schubert's Ave Maria and Wagner's Song to the Evening Star on the Boston Symphony's annual "request night" program. They would probably be more surprised to learn that a Bing Crosby-Woody Herman recording of Deep in the Heart of Texas, autographed by Crosby, brought $1,500 at an auction. It's a fact vouchsafed by Fred Corcoran, Tournament Bureau manager of the PGA, in this month's Golfing magazine. . . . It happened at one of the exhibition golf matches Crosby and Funnyman Bob Hope played in their campaign to sell War Savings Bonds. . . . Holding up the record, Hope said, "You can buy this record for 35 cents at any music store. Now, who'll give me $1,500 for it?" . . . "I will," spoke up a Houston sportsman by the name of George Strake. And he did.

Divot Data: Maybe golf is doomed, as Mr. Pegler declares, but the attendance at tournaments played during the Winter and Spring showed a 30 per cent increase over last year. . . . Byron Nelson has finished in the money in every 1942 tournament, running to 36 the number of successive tournaments he's taken money from. He's still a long way from Ben Hogan's record of 56, however. . . . We liked Sam Snead's answer when Laurence Leonard asked him Sunday night, "How does it feel to be PGA champion?" Slamming Sam replied: "I don't feel any different than I did last night."

This Clipping From
TULSA, OKLA.
TRIBUNE
MAY 27 1942

'Deep in the Heart of Texas' Is Rival of Schubert, Wagner Fame

BOSTON, May 27.—(AP)—It looks as though eep in the Heart of Texas" may clap its way to sym- nic fame.

It's always been popular. But today it climbed it up among the immortals as popular voting ranked ith Schubert and Wagner.

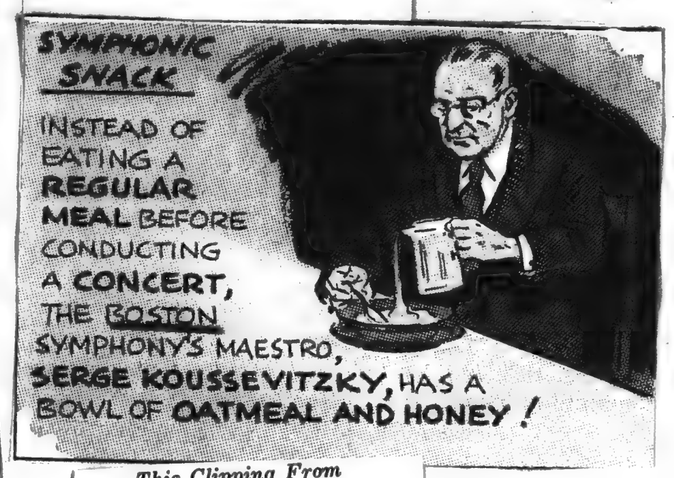
Symphony hall attaches, counting votes for the ial request night program of the Boston Symphony " concerts next Sunday, lifted eyebrows in amaze- and then reached for telephones.

For "Deep in the Heart of Texas" was in a triple ith Schubert's "Ave Maria" and the "Song to the ing Star" from Wagner's opera "Tannhauser."

Incidentally, the most popular selection of all d out to be Ravel's "Bolero."

This Clipping From
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE
MAY 31 1942

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD
MAY 31 1942



This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 31 1942

Hale's Volumes Donated

University of New Hampshire Gets His Program Notes

Philip Hale's own bound set of Boston Symphony program notes, written by the late music critic of "The Boston Herald" over a period of thirty-three years, has been presented to the Hamilton Smith Library of the University of New Hampshire by the author's widow. The set has been placed in the Philip Hale Room in the art division of the library, where the volumes rest in the same bookcase and near the same desk the critic used when he wrote them.

Mr. Hale began the program notes for the Boston Symphony in the fall of 1901 and continued the assignment through the spring of 1933. This gift to the University of New Hampshire includes not only the thirty-three volumes covering this interval but also the notes for the previous ten years which Mr. Hale had collected and had bound, and which he used frequently for reference.

This Clipping From WILKES BARRE, PA.
RECORD
MAY 27 1942

'Deep in the Heart of Texas' for Symphony

Boston, May 26 (AP)—It looks as though "Deep in the Heart of Texas" may clap its way to symphonic fame.

It's always been popular. But tonight it climbed right up among the immortals as popular voting ranked it with Schubert and Wagner.

Symphony Hall attaches, counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston Symphony "pops" concerts next [illegible], lifted eyebrows in amazement and then reached for telephones.

For "Deep in the Heart of Texas" was in a triple tie with Schubert's "Ave Maria" and "Songs to the Evening Star" from Wagner's opera "Tannhauser."

Incidentally, the most popular selection of all turned out to be Ravel's "Bolero."

This Clipping From WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS
MAY 27 1942

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
MAY 27 1942

Symphony Finds "Deep in the Heart Of Texas" Popular

BOSTON—"Deep in the Heart of Texas" has climbed right among the immortals, including the works of Schubert and Wagner, at least by popular vote.

Officials of Symphony Hall, counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston Symphony "pops" concert Sunday, discovered to their amazement that the song was in a triple tie with Schubert's "Ave Maria" and "Song to the Evening Star," from Wagner's opera, "Tannhauser."

The most popular selection of all, however, was Ravel's "Bolero."

HEART OF TEXAS' JOINS SYMPHONIC FAVORITES

BOSTON, May 26 (AP)—It looks as though "Deep in the Heart of Texas" may clap its way to symphonic fame.

It's always been popular. But tonight it climbed right up among the immortals as popular voting ranked it with Schubert and Wagner.

Symphony Hall attaches, counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston Symphony "pops" concert next Sunday, lifted eyebrows in amazement.

For "Deep in the Heart of Texas" was in a triple tie with Schubert's "Ave Maria" and the "Song to the Evening Star" from Wagner's opera "Tannhauser."

This Clipping From VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAY 27 1942

This Clipping From DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
MAY 27 1942

Deep in Heart, Etc. Claps Its Way to Symphony Claim

BOSTON, Mass., May 26 (AP).—It looks as though Deep in the Heart of Texas may clap its way to symphonic fame.

It's always been popular. But Tuesday night it climbed right up among the immortals as popular voting ranked it with Schubert and Wagner.

Symphony Hall attaches, counting votes for the annual request night program of the Boston Symphony Pops concerts next Sunday, lifted eyebrows in amazement and then reached for telephones.

For Deep in the Heart of Texas was in a triple tie with Schubert's Ave Maria and the Song to the Evening Star from Wagner's opera Tannhaeuser.

Incidentally the most popular selection of all turned out to be Ravel's Bolero.

Providence Businessman A Boston Orch. Trustee

Boston, May 26.

John Nichols Brown, Providence corporation official, has been named the first non-resident trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Reappointed a trustee was William Philips, of this city, former ambassador to Italy, who resigned in 1936 when he was sent to Rome.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAY 28 1942

'Heart of Texas'

Boston— (INS) —Classical compositions usually played at "pops" concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today moved over to make room for "Deep in the Heart of Texas," which has clapped itself to favor.

This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
MAY 31 1942

Choo-Choos, Blues and Texas

THE CABOTS and LOWELLS, not to mention the ADAMSES and the PUTNAMS, undoubtedly gazed through their lorgnettes in patrician amazement, as Deep in the Heart of Texas landed on the Boston Symphony's annual "request night" program in a tie for first place in popularity with SCHUBERT'S Ave Maria and WAGNER'S Song to the Evening Star. Back Bay must have felt the foundations of civilization crumbling, when the votes came in.

For Deep in the Heart of Texas, is a tune so proletarian and elementary as to be intelligible to anybody who has ears. There are only 30 notes in the whole thing, and the melody has to be repeated, to an obligato of Texan handclapping and yippeeing, in order to fill out a 32-bar chorus. Just what the shades of FRANZ SCHUBERT and RICHARD WAGNER had to say, when they found this chef d'oeuvre by MR. and MRS. DON SWANDER, of the Lone Star State, vying with their masterpieces in Boston, of all places, can only be surmised.

Deep in the Heart of Texas completely eclipsed in popularity Beautiful Texas, the immortal ditty with the aid of which "Biscuit Passin' Pappy" O'DANIEL hypnotized the Lone Star voters in three different elections. Whereas Beautiful Texas never made the radio "Hit Parade," Deep in the Heart of youknowwhat was on the parade from early February until early this month, and led it for five straight weeks. It is, in fact, in the class with such deathless compositions as Blues in the Night and Chattanooga Choo-Choo. No wonder SCHUBERT and WAGNER have been thrown for a loss.

This Clipping From
TWIN FALLS, IDAHO
NEWS
MAY 31 1942

Idaho Musician Plays Concerto At Boston Hall

Althea Everitt, Nampa, was chosen by Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Pops orchestra, to appear as soloist in Symphony hall, Boston, Saturday night, May 30, at Colby Junior College Night. She played the MacDowell concerto last night.

Miss Everitt is a pupil of Miss Gladys Gleason, Jerome, who now is director of music at Colby Junior college, and has been a member of the University of Idaho summer school faculty.

She is the second Idaho girl in the past two years who has gone to Colby and been thus honored by Mr. Fiedler. Miss Maxine McCurry, Boise, played the Schumann concerto in Symphony hall two years ago. She also was a pupil of Miss Gleason. Both were discovered by Miss Gleason during her vacations, which she usually spends in Idaho.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Malkin Pops

It was Malkin Conservatory Night at the Pops last evening. Arthur Fiedler conducted and Robert Brink, a pupil of the Malkin Conservatory, was the violin soloist in Lalo's Symphonie Espagnol for violin and orchestra.

Midway in the program came Mr. Brink's playing of the Lalo Symphonie. It was a musicianly but rather tentative performance, marked at first by rather unsteady pitch and certain uneveness of bowing. But the young musician's playing gained in poise and accuracy during the following two movements. Mr. Brink has a pleasant tone and considerable facility on his instrument. His approach to music is obviously sensitive. But his performance needed more "git up and git."

The program had begun in swinging fashion with John Philip Sousa's march, "The Bride-Elect;" the Romeo and Juliet Overture-Fantasia of Tchaikovsky; the Scherzo from Mendelssohn' Octet, and Kreisler's "Tambourin Chinois." The remaining items were Enesco's Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1 and shorter pieces by Strauss, Gould, and Brahms. And, of course, there were many encores. A capacity audience warmly showed its enjoyment of the whole program.—J. W. R.

HAROLD RUBENS, brilliant young Welsh pianist, who appears as soloist at Pops tonight.

Harold Rubens Pops Soloist Tonight

Harold Rubens, brilliant young pianist, will appear as soloist with the Boston Pops Orchestra tonight in Symphony Hall. Rubens, who was born in Cardiff, Wales, began his musical career at the age of 10. He made his London debut in 1930, following which he appeared in recital and as soloist with orchestras throughout England, France, Germany, Norway, Sweden and Holland. He has played before several of the royal families of Europe and also for the late Paderewski, who predicted a brilliant future for the young artist. The war interrupted plans for further extensive tours of Europe and Australia.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The Boston Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler will present the following program in Symphony Hall tonight at 8:30:

*Triumphal March from "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Die Fledermaus".....Strauss
'Spring," for String Orchestra.....Grieg
*Fifth Hungarian Dance.....Brahms
"El Salon Mexico".....Copland
Variations on a Nursery Song, for Orchestra and Piano Obligato...Dohnanyi
Soloist: Harold Rubens
*"Wine, Woman and Song," Waltzes
Strauss
*"The Toy Trumpet".....Scott
Salute to our Fighting Forces—Ar. by Bodge
Halls of Montezuma (Marine Hymn)—
Keep 'Em Flying—Anchors Aweigh—
When the Caissons Go Rolling Alor
(Artillery Marhc)—God Bless Am

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JUN 2 - 1942

Deep in the Heart of Youknowwhat

THE CABOTS AND LOWELLS undoubtedly were nonplussed, as the editor pointed out Sunday morning, to learn that clap-clap song, Deep in the Heart of Texas, had run a three-way dead heat with Schubert's Ave Maria and Wagner's Song to the Evening Star on the Boston Symphony's annual "request night" program. They would probably be more surprised to learn that a Bing Crosby-Woody Herman recording of Deep in the Heart of Texas, autographed by Crosby, brought $1,500 at an auction. It's a fact vouchsafed by Fred Corcoran, Tournament Bureau manager of the PGA, in this month's Golfing magazine. . . . It happened at one of the exhibition golf matches Crosby and Funnyman Bob Hope played in their campaign to sell War Savings Bonds. . . . Holding up the record, Hope said, "You can buy this record for 35 cents at any music store. Now, who'll give me $1,500 for it?" . . . "I will," spoke up a Houston sportsman by the name of George Strake. And he did.

Divot Data: Maybe golf is doomed, as Mr. Pegler declares, but the attendance at tournaments played during the Winter and Spring showed a 30 per cent increase over last year. . . . Byron Nelson has finished in the money in every 1942 tournament, running to 36 the number of successive tournaments he's taken money from. He's still a long way from Ben Hogan's record of 56, however. . . . We liked Sam Snead's answer when Laurence Leonard asked him Sunday night, "How does it feel to be PGA champion?" Slamming Sam replied: "I don't feel any different than I did last night."

BROOKLINE, MASS
CHRONICLE
6/4/42

118.

Brookline Personalities

by inez lind

Arthur Fiedler, famous Boston Symphony Pops conductor, says war over here needs more music and more parades.

Arthur Fiedler, famous conductor of the Boston "Pops" and the Esplanade concerts, is of the opinion that the war over here needs more music, more parades and more hero-worship. "There is nothing like a band to arouse enthusiasm," said Mr. Fiedler during a recent interview at his new home on Marshal Street. "Everything is drab without it. The boys need it and they need more hero-worship from our side. Every musician, young or old, who is not in the regular armed forces, can contribute to the war effort in this way."

ARTHUR FIEDLER

Arthur Fiedler might well be called Boston's own conductor because here he was born, educated and given the coveted opportunity to exercise his talent and profession so rarely offered to artists in their own home town. As the son of Emanuel Fiedler of Brookline, former first violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his musical training began at the age of six, in spite of the fact that his only ambition was to become a fireman. While young Arthur was preparing to enter college through the Boston Latin School, the family suddenly decided to go abroad to live and having to re-learn everything in another language, he became fed up on books and went to work in a publishing house. After a time, he was confronted with the problem of making a decision as to his future work and, having had a taste of something else, he was easily won over to what the family wanted —giving his all to music.

Enrolling at the Royal Academy in Berlin, he began studying conducting and made rapid progress, directing his first concert at seventeen. Returning to America, he was engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1915 as violin, viola and celesta player and pianist and organist. In 1929 Mr. Fiedler organized and began conducting the outdoor symphony concerts held during the summer months on Boston's beautiful Esplanade, where an audience of 30,000 listeners is not unusual. The new shell with improved acoustics erected last year at a cost of $300,000 has made it possible for larger areas of people to hear the concerts. "The one thing I am really proud of," admitted Mr. Fiedler, in referring to his organization of these concerts. "The idea appeals to me because it is free, in the fresh, open air, and gives everyone a chance to hear good music."

Mr. Fiedler first began conducting the Boston Pops in 1930 and each season the enthusiasm grows and attendance increases. "My job is to fill the hall," revealed Mr. Fiedler, "and I try to do it by giving programs the people like. War and rationing seems to have increased instead of decreased the attendance. I think people are so anxious to help that even should there be no gasoline by the time the regular symphony comes around out-of-towners will not mind a few inconveniences.

"The music taste of the public is constantly improving," Mr. Fiedler remarked, "and while many request numbers are the same each year anything that has been popular during the preceding months is sure to be asked for. This year it is the Nut Cracker Suite, heard all through the story of Fantasia." Mr. Fiedler would not be pinned down to naming his favorite compositions, composers or conductors. "There is so much of unknown men and works that one likes and so much of the famous that one does not like, so how can favorites be specified?" he questioned.

During the regular season, Mr. Fiedler conducts the Boston University Orchestra, the Boston Sinfonietta, the MacDowell Club Orchestra, Cecilia Society and the University Glee Club of Providence. Until recently he also conducted the Massachusetts N. Y. A. Orchestra, now disbanded because of the young men joining our armed forces. Mr. Fiedler saw a few months of service at Camp Devens during our last war. He has received an honorary M.A. degree from Tufts College and a decoration from the French government—Officer de l'Academie Francaise. He has recorded for RCA Victor about two hundred records with the Boston Symphony Pops and the Boston Sinfonietta.

His hobby is traveling and collecting ship models. "Sports I have now given up," he said, "because I get enough exercise when conducting." Arthur Fiedler's greatest interest is to help more people hear good music.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
JUN 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
JUL 5 - 1942

GIVES FIRST OF USO MUSIC CHESTS

Special to the Telegram

BOSTON, June 3.—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra, center, presents to the Army and Navy the first of a new allocation of "USO Music Chests" to be distributed throughout New England. Lieut. Col. John J. Donovan, special services officer, First Corps Area, U. S. Army, left, and Lieut. Comdr. Charles A. Paul, U. S. N. R., district welfare officer, First Naval District, represent the armed forces in the presentation made today in Symphony Hall.

Twenty music collections, with 36 records in each chest, have been distributed, and 10 phonographs, to military hospitals and USO clubhouses, with 20 more chests and 30 more phonographs on the shipping schedule this month. The New England USO music project will soon extend to Army and Navy centers outside the northeastern sector.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
JUN 8 - 1942

EXTEND POP CONCERTS

BOSTON, June 8 (UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra today announced that the season of pop concerts, which usually ends early in July, will be extended into the month. It also was announced that the annual Summer season of free concerts on the Charles River Esplanade will be lengthened. The orchestra previously had cancelled its annual Berkshire Symphonic festival because of gasoline and tire rationing.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES
JUN 9 - 1942

This Clipping From
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From MOBILE, ALA.
PRESS
JUN 1 1942

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JUN 5 - 1942

Boston Symphony Manager To Receive Citation

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will receive a citation at the commencement of Oneonta State Teachers College in Oneonta, N. Y., Sunday. Mr. Judd attended the college before going to Harvard. He visited friends in the Berkshires yesterday en route to Oneonta.

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
JUN 12 1942

Concerts at Rutgers Next Winter Canceled

26-Year Series Is War Casualty as Blackout Difficulties And Gas Rationing Block Presentation; Sunday Afternoon Programs May Be Offered

After 26 successful seasons, the Rutgers University Concert Series has been canceled for next winter, according to a notice received today by subscribers.

Immediate cause of the action, it was indicated by Dr. Howard D. McKinney, head of the music department, is blackout difficulties. A recent decree issued by the university makes it impossible to use the gymnasium at night for audiences larger than those which can be properly provided for in case of a possible air raid. The large area of glass windows on three sides of the gymnasium presents formidable blackout difficulties and the 3,000-odd persons attending concerts could not be cared for elsewhere in the building during an alert.

A secondary cause is gasoline rationing, which may prevent attendance by many out-of-town subscribers.

Other Concerts Planned

While the community faces the loss of one of the best college concert series in the country, Dr. McKinney indicated that local music-lovers do not face complete lack of concerts at the university. He said the possibilities of Sunday afternoon concerts in the gymnasium are now being studied.

"All those concerned feel the utmost regret for the necessity of such a decision," Dr. McKinney said, "for they realize what these concerts have meant to the community in the past and what they might mean in terms of the present emergency. It is hoped that this cessation of concert activities at Rutgers will be temporary; plans are being made for their resumption with the same high standards prevailing, at the earliest possible moment."

In the course of a quarter century, the concerts have brought to New Brunswick the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Rochester Civic Orchestra, many remarkably fine smaller instrumental groups, and such leading individual artists as Paul Robeson, Kirsten Flagstad, Dorothy Maynor, Walter Gieseking, Lotte Lehmann, Lauritz Melchior, Yehudi Menuhin and Marian Anderson.

The attendance has usually averaged about 3,000 persons at a concert, and has reached 3,400 for such events as the annual Boston Symphony concert.

BROOKLINE, MASS
CHRONICLE
6/4/42

118.

Brookline Personalities

by inez lind

Arthur Fiedler, famous Boston Symphony Pops conductor, says war over here needs more music and more parades.

Arthur Fiedler, famous conductor of the Boston "Pops" and the Esplanade concerts, is of the opinion that the war over here needs more music, more parades and more hero-worship. "There is nothing like a band to arouse enthusiasm," said Mr. Fiedler during a recent interview at his new home on Marshal Street. "Everything is drab without it. The boys need it and they need more hero-worship from our side. Every musician, young or old, who is not in the regular armed forces, can contribute to the war effort in this way."

ARTHUR FIEDLER

Arthur Fiedler might well be called Boston's own conductor because here he was born, educated and given the coveted opportunity to exercise his talent and profession so rarely offered to artists in their own home town. As the son of Emanuel Fiedler of Brookline, former first violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his musical training began at the age of six, in spite of the fact that his only ambition was to become a fireman. While young Arthur was preparing to enter college through the Boston Latin School, the family suddenly decided to go abroad to live and having to re-learn everything in another language, he became fed up on books and went to work in a publishing house. After a time, he was confronted with the problem of making a decision as to his future work and, having had a taste of something else, he was easily won over to what the family wanted —giving his all to music.

Enrolling at the Royal Academy in Berlin, he began studying conducting and made rapid progress, directing his first concert at seventeen. Returning to America, he was engaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1915 as violin, viola and celesta player and pianist and organist. In 1929 Mr. Fiedler organized and began conducting the outdoor symphony concerts held during the summer months on Boston's beautiful Esplanade, where an audience of 30,000 listeners is not unusual. The new shell with improved acoustics erected last year at a cost of $300,000 has made it possible for larger areas of people to hear the concerts. "The one thing I am really proud of," admitted Mr. Fiedler, in referring to his organization of these concerts. "The idea appeals to me because it is free, in the fresh, open air, and gives everyone a chance to hear good music."

Mr. Fiedler first began conducting the Boston Pops in 1930 and each season the enthusiasm grows and attendance increases. "My job is to fill the hall," revealed Mr. Fiedler, "and I try to do it by giving programs the people like. War and rationing seems to have increased instead of decreased the attendance. I think people are so anxious to help that even should there be no gasoline by the time the regular symphony comes around out-of-towners will not mind a few inconveniences.

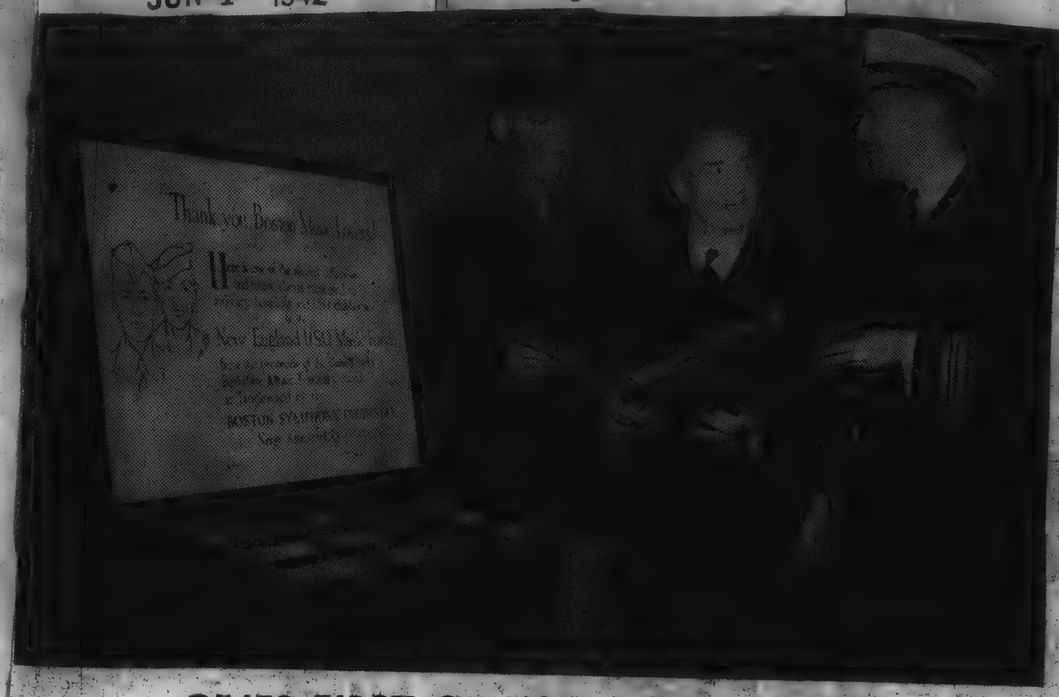
"The music taste of the public is constantly improving," Mr. Fiedler remarked, "and while many request numbers are the same each year anything that has been popular during the preceding months is sure to be asked for. This year it is the Nut Cracker Suite, heard all through the story of Fantasia." Mr. Fiedler would not be pinned down to naming his favorite compositions, composers or conductors. "There is so much of unknown men and works that one likes and so much of the famous that one does not like, so how can favorites be specified?" he questioned.

During the regular season, Mr. Fiedler conducts the Boston University Orchestra, the Boston Sinfonietta, the MacDowell Club Orchestra, Cecilia Society and the University Glee Club of Providence. Until recently he also conducted the Massachusetts N. Y. A. Orchestra, now disbanded because of the young men joining our armed forces. Mr. Fiedler saw a few months of service at Camp Devens during our last war. He has received an honorary M.A. degree from Tufts College and a decoration from the French government—Officer de l'Academie Francaise. He has recorded for RCA Victor about two hundred records with the Boston Symphony Pops and the Boston Sinfonietta.

His hobby is traveling and collecting ship models. "Sports I have now given up," he said, "because I get enough exercise when conducting." Arthur Fiedler's greatest interest is to help more people hear good music.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
JUN 4 - 1942

This Clipping From
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
JUL 5 - 1942



GIVES FIRST OF USO MUSIC CHESTS

Special to the Telegram

BOSTON, June 3.—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra, center, presents to the Army and Navy the first of a new allocation of "USO Music Chests" to be distributed throughout New England. Lieut. Col. John J. Donovan, special services officer, First Corps Area, U. S. Army, left, and Lieut. Comdr. Charles A. Paul, U. S. N. R., district welfare officer, First Naval District, represent the armed forces in the presentation made today in Symphony Hall.

Twenty music collections, with 36 records in each chest, have been distributed, and 10 phonographs, to military hospitals and USO clubhouses, with 20 more chests and 30 more phonographs on the shipping schedule this month. The New England USO music project will soon extend to Army and Navy centers outside the northeastern sector.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES
JUN 9 - 1942

EXTEND POP CONCERTS

BOSTON, June 8 (UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra today announced that the season of pop concerts, which usually ends early in July, will be extended into the month. It also was announced that the annual Summer season of free concerts on the Charles River Esplanade will be lengthened. The orchestra previously had cancelled its annual Berkshire Symphonic festival because of gasoline and tire rationing.

This Clipping From
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From MOBILE, ALA.
PRESS
JUN 11 1942

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JUN 5 - 1942

Boston Symphony Manager To Receive Citation

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will receive a citation at the commencement of Oneonta State Teachers College in Oneonta, N. Y., Sunday. Mr. Judd attended the college before going to Harvard. He visited friends in the Berkshires yesterday en route to Oneonta.

This Clipping From
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
JUN 8 - 1942

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
JUN 12 1942

Concerts at Rutgers Next Winter Canceled

26-Year Series Is War Casualty as Blackout Difficulties And Gas Rationing Block Presentation; Sunday Afternoon Programs May Be Offered

After 26 successful seasons, the Rutgers University Concert Series has been canceled for next winter, according to a notice received today by subscribers.

Immediate cause of the action, it was indicated by Dr. Howard D. McKinney, head of the music department, is blackout difficulties. A recent decree issued by the university makes it impossible to use the gymnasium at night for audiences larger than those which can be properly provided for in case of a possible air raid. The large area of glass windows on three sides of the gymnasium presents formidable blackout difficulties and the 3,000-odd persons attending concerts could not be cared for elsewhere in the building during an alert.

A secondary cause is gasoline rationing, which may prevent attendance by many out-of-town subscribers.

Other Concerts Planned

While the community faces the loss of one of the best college concert series in the country, Dr. McKinney indicated that local music-lovers do not face complete lack of concerts at the university. He said the possibilities of Sunday afternoon concerts in the gymnasium are now being studied.

"All those concerned feel the utmost regret for the necessity of such a decision," Dr. McKinney said, "for they realize what these concerts have meant to the community in the past and what they might mean in terms of the present emergency. It is hoped that this cessation of concert activities at Rutgers will be temporary; plans are being made for their resumption with the same high standards prevailing at the earliest possible moment."

In the course of a quarter century, the concerts have brought to New Brunswick the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Rochester Civic Orchestra, many remarkably fine smaller instrumental groups, and such leading individual artists as Paul Robeson, Kirsten Flagstad, Dorothy Maynor, Walter Gieseking, Lotte Lehmann, Lauritz Melchior, Yehudi Menuhin and Marian Anderson.

The attendance has usually averaged about 3,000 persons at a concert, and has reached 3,400 for such events as the annual Boston Symphony concert.

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
JUN 17 1942

BULL FIDDLE GOES TO TOWN AT POPS

BOSTON, June 16—(AP)—The bull fiddle went to town as a solo instrument at the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight—and it wasn't slapped once.

Often an object of derision—more than six feet high and either buried in a symphony orchestra or poked lackadaiscally by some jazz player between smokes—the massive double-bass has been generally neglected by concert performers.

But tonight Georges Edmond Moleux, first double-bass of the Boston Symphony orchestra, played a concerto by the famous early 19th century Virtuoso Domenico Dragonetti. It was the first double-bass concerto to be heard here in a number of years.

No concerto by Dragonetti ever has been performed at the winter concerts of the Boston Symphony, this in spite of the fact that Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, ranks with Dragonetti and Giovanni Bottesini as one of the three great masters of the double-bass.

Thus the performance was a rare musical event, even for the informal and varied programs of the Pops, as conducted by Arthur Fiedler.

There were fewer rumbling, deep tones than expected. But perhaps it was just as well. The composer, Dragonetti, once imitated the approach of a thunder storm so successfully on his double-bass that he freightened the monks of San Giustina, near Padua, Italy, so badly they rushed from their cells to see what was happening.

This Clipping From SPOKANE, WASH.
SPOKESMAN REVIEW
JUN 17 1942

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JUN 17 1942

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JUN 17 1942

This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
JUN 17 1942

This Clipping From
DAYTONA BEACH, FLA.
JOURNAL
JUN 17 1942

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JUN 18 1942

This Clipping From
READING, PA.
TIMES
JUN 19 1942

Come What May, or, A Memo to Mr. Fiedler

Herald June 21

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

In the heat of battle the other night while writing a report of Georges Moleux's performance of a concerto for double bass at the Pops, we seem to have said in passing that Arthur Fiedler had been "a little remiss" in choosing "novelties" for performance this season at those celebrated nightly affairs. "What do you want," demands a reader from Winchester, "somebody to play Mozart's Concerto for Glass Harmonica or something?" He goes on from there to defend Mr. Fiedler's choice of programs (which we've never attacked, by the way), and to inform us, rather crustily, we thought, that it is enough that the Pops should include a concerto for the double bass on its programs once a season.

Now that is an attitude we deplore. We should dearly love to hear Mozart's Adagio (not Concerto, sir) for Glass Harmonica, and a fig for those timid musical souls whose musical curiosity begins and ends with Tchaikovsky's piano concerto. It seems to us that the Glass Harmonica, of which Benjamin Franklin, Gluck, and even Beethoven were especially fond and of which it is related that people went quite mad at its ravishing tonal beauty, would be a distinct sensation at the Pops. Nor should we be in the least surprised to learn that Lawrence White, the orchestra's general handy man in the percussion section, actually does perform upon the Glass Harmonica.

Be that as it may, there are a great many virtually extinct (but certainly novel) compositions we should like to hear performed rather than hear about, and we can think of no better place than a Pops concert to hear them, and certainly no better performers than the virtuoso musicians of the Pops orchestra to play them.

We do not presume to instruct Mr. Fiedler in the art of choosing programs, since it has long been proved that his knack for making them has brought the Pops to an all-time record of public acceptance, and it is difficult to find an evening during the season when Symphonoy Hall is not sold out to the chandeliers. Nor, moreover, are we so foolish as to think that Mr. Fiedler has not considered many of the masterpieces we are about to champion. Yet there are a number of novelties we should like to hear, all of them concertos, and we venture to submit that Pops-goers, many of whom are surprisingly unfamiliar with the actual tone color of the various orchestral instruments, would like to hear them too.

EVEN A TROMBONE CONCERTO

Of course, the Pops are always doing "The Swan" or "The Lost Chord" or "Meditation" from "Thais," each of which boasts of a cello or trumpet or violin solo, as the case may be, but it is rare indeed such a momentous occasion as a double bass concerto takes place. It is true the audience did not enjoy Dragonetti's quite as much as it enjoyed "Deep in the Heart of Texas," but there is no doubt that the moré serious members of the audience were delighted with it, notwithstanding the obvious hollowness of the music itself.

So we have rummaged about and have unearthed a few things we should like the Pops and its musicians to get busy on. True, the scores of many of them may be quite unavailable and true, further, many of them may be appallingly bad as music. In any case, we should like to hear Weinberger's Concerto for Timpani and Brass Choir. It is a fairly recent composition and has had recent performances, so the score and parts must be available, possibly at a prohibitive price, but it is worth looking up. Then, since we have heard Dragonetti's Concerto for Double Bass, how about a performance of Handel's Double Concerto for Double Bass, with Messrs. Moleux and Juht?

Next, we should like to hear Alschausky's Concerto for Trombone and Orchestra. We are not familiar with this gentleman's output nor, funnily enough, is Grove, but surely no trombonist worth his salt has not mastered this doubtless sterling composition. Or, if it is irrevocably buried in history's darker pages, how about an arrangement of a standard concerto for cello and orchestra? A trumpet concerto is not quite so incongruous as a trombone concerto, and there are several respectable ones in the repertoire. Haydn wrote a charming one, but (except for one movement) it appears to be lost. However, Lecail has a double concerto for trumpet and piano which is highly spoken of by those familiar with it, and Goedicke's concerto for trumpet and orchestra, performed recently in London, is also well recommended. Another recent effort in the field is Pilss's, about which we have no information whatever.

NEVER MIND THE SAXOPHONE, THOUGH

There is a splendid literature for the bassoon; Mozart has a lovely concerto for it, Weber another (which was done in Boston some years ago), Hummel several and Wolf-Ferrari, of "Jewels of the Madonna" fame, one. Wolf-Ferrari also has an Idyll for oboe and orchestra which must be interesting, while there are fine oboe concerti by Handel and Telemann among the old composers and by Goossens and Beck among the contemporaries. There is, of course, a very large literature for flute and orchestra, not forgetting the marvelous B minor Suite of Bach and the delightful A minor Suite of Telemann. Mozart, Vivaldi and Handel have a number for that instrument, while Ibert, among the moderns, has composed for it.

On Tuesday, come to think of it, Joseph Singer of the orchestra will perform Mozart's E flat major concerto for French horn and orchestra, but there are many others; one by the above-mentioned Goedicke, for instance. The clarinet has not been neglected, either; Mozart, Weber, Rimsky-Korsakov composed for it, while Spohr industriously turned his attention to the matter. We can find no record of a concerto for bass clarinet, though, an instrument with a beautiful tone quality. There is, on the other hand, a concerto by Glazounov (not very good, either) for the E flat alto saxophon and, of course, Debussy's Rhapsody, also a distinctly inferior work. Aa s solo instrument, however, the saxophone leaves us very passive.

Well, there are probably many more novel concertos for solo instruments, including the marimba, but we defy anyone to find a concerto for the tuba. Indeed, if anyone does, we shall make such a to-do about it that Mr. Fiedler will be obliged to have it performed for us, even though we are its solitary auditor. But until it comes along, may we look forward to some of these musical treats on the Pops program next year, Mr. Fiedler?

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD JOURNAL
JUN 19 1942

Boston Conservatory Bows to 'Pops' Music

Boston, June 19 (AP).—Popular music is on the upbeat in Boston. The New England Conservatory of Music, one of the oldest independent conservatories in the United States, has announced that it will open a school of popular music in September.

Only recently, "Deep in the Heart of Texas" was played in a Boston Symphony Hall "pops" concert.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JUN 19 1942

This Clipping From
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
DAILY TIMES
JUN 19 1942

This Clipping From
CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
NEWS-FREE PRESS
JUN 23 1942

This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
JUN 19 1942

This Clipping From
MANKATO, MINN.
FREE PRESS
JUN 25 1942

The Czar's Edict

Whether the threatened relegation of juke boxes to the junk heap is a good move or a bad thing is beside the point.

There is the much more important question of whether James C. Petrillo, the all-high czar of the American Federation of Musicians, is acting in the public's or Petrillo's interest when he puts forth such an edict as he did in Dallas, Texas, where he told the union's convention that after August 1 union musicians would make no more records for juke boxes.

Petrillo's record indicates that he cares nothing about the public. Petrillo's only interest in life is to see that his musicians get as much money as possible. He shows no interest in music or the enjoyment of music. Petrillo's union forces theaters to hire and pay salaries to musicians who are not needed and who do not play a single note, which is plain racketeering. He blacklisted Serge Koussevitsky, eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony because he would not join the union.

All this is very fine for Petrillo. It keeps him in an office to which some power is attached—and he is not so big that he won't "go after" high school bands—and it assures him a very lucrative salary. Yes, it is very fine for Petrillo. But what about the public which has to pay higher prices for theater tickets because of Petrillo? And what about the musicians who are slaves of the union and are steadily losing respect as citizens and as musicians?

THIS CLIPPING FROM FULLERTON, CAL.
NEWS - TRIBUNE
JUN 22 1942

This Clipping From
McPHERSON, KANS.
REPUBLICAN
JUN 24 1942

This Clipping From
McPHERSON, KANS.
REPUBLICAN
JUN 24 1942

This Clipping From
MASSILON, OHIO
INDEPENDENT
JUL 6 1942

This Clipping From
ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA.
RECORD
JUN 23 1942
1/5

Young Artist Winner Award Is Quadrupled

4 Solos With Boston And Philadelphia Orchestras Promised

At least four solo appearances with major orchestras are guaranteed to the 1943 National Federation of Music Clubs Young Artist winner, who is fortunate enough to capture also the Schubert Memorial Award.

These are a pair of concerts with the Boston Symphony in Boston and two concerts wtih the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia.

The announcement, which is of interest not only in St. Augustine but throughout the United States, was made jointly by Bruno Walter, president of the Schubert Memorial, and Ruth M. Ferry of New Haven, Conn., chairman of Young Artist Auditions for the National Federation of Music Clubs.

The year, 1943, will be the first year in which the Boston Symphony has participated in the award, it is pointed out.

Winner of the new quadruple award will be chosen in a series of state and district contests under National Federation of Music Clubs auspices held during the winter of 1942-43, ending in the Young Artist Auditions at the biennial convention in Detroit April 28-May 5, 1943, when winners in voice, violin and piano from sixteen districts compete in the semi-finals. The two outstanding young artists in each classification meet in the finals.

Application blanks for the 1943 student musicians contests may be obtained locally from Mrs. H. P. Hahn, chairman of the South Atlantic District of the National Federation of Music Clubs. Miss Bertha Foster at Miami University, state chairman, also is disseminating information and material on this competition.

—V—

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
JUN 28 1942

POP CONCERTS NEXT MONTH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that the season of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, which usually ends at the beginning of July, will be extended into next month.

It is definitely announced that there will be a season of free concerts on the Charles River Esplanade by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, conductor. This season will likewise be extended.

The Berkshire Music Center, the school of which Serge Koussevitzky is Director, its faculty including the principal members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be held as usual at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. Although the Berkshire Symphony Festival has necessarily been cancelled for this year on account of the limitations upon transportation, facilities are adequate for the school. The Orchestra is thus fortunate in being able to give its usual full-length season of forty-six weeks, past mid-August. The sixty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin in Symphony Hall on October 9.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
JUN 28 1942

120

Listening to a number at a Boston "Pops" concert. (Left) A violinist takes time out to massage his hands.

BLENDING THE SOLACES AT Boston Pops

With Half-Century Tradition

By Martin Sheridan

SUMMER evenings in the Europe that once was, citizens of all classes would gather in halls or gardens. They would sit about board tables and drink coffee or yellow wine or beer from stone mugs. They would listen while noted orchestras mixed a program of popular favorites with classics, perhaps with bits of grand opera. Everything was friendly and informal.

Those popular concerts and friendly gatherings have been transplanted, strangely enough, to America; even more strangely, to Boston.

In the Hub City's famous Symphony Hall, Back Bay and Beacon Hill, the Cabots and Lowells gather with humbler citizens in friendly informality. For early summer customary rows of black leather seats give way to small green tables and chairs. Friendliness is promoted among the proletariat with mugs of beer, soft drinks, dishes of chocolate ice cream, a selection from about sixty varieties of wines. Beacon Street as a rule sticks to tea and cookies.

Nightly programs are presented by one of the world's most celebrated popular concert organization. It is composed of eighty-five Boston Symphony musicians and conducted by Arthur Fiedler.

In fact the continental music hall atmosphere, astonishingly varied programs, star quality of the musicians, perhaps most of all refreshments - with - music all together compose Boston "Pops," concerts which are renowned wherever music is known. They are more than a local institution because they draw people from all parts of the East; yet they never have been successful when they were tried out in other cities.

The programs are as heterogeneous as the audience. A few years ago Fiedler turned from Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture and Handel's "Largo" to lead his symphocats through some tunes from "Snow White." He then introduced a number called "Swing Stuff." During the current season interpretations of symphonies and concertos are sandwiched with "Deep in the Heart of Texas" while the audience of 2000 provides the handclaps.

Classics and Swing

UNDER the Fiedler regime the repertory features alike popular classics which have stood the test of time and musical hits of the hour with enough tunefulness or character to warrant arrangement for a full sized symphony orchestra. Cole Porter, George Gershwin, Jerome Kern rub shoulders with Wagner, Strauss, Beethoven. Audiences love the change of pace; the musicians delight in demonstrating their versatility.

"The programs of the Pops always have been planned with a view to accompaniment of tobacco and other physical solaces," Fiedler explains. "A partially different public always has been ready for the semi-classical music we have provided along with symphonic pieces."

But even though the Pops are the principal summer gathering place of Boston's entertainment seekers, he maintains that the music, not the drinks and sandwiches, attract audiences. "After all, they came to the Pops when only lemonade and ice water were served for sixteen years," he points out.

The Pops are the result of an attempt made more than fifty-five years ago to establish in Boston something similar to the popular concerts in Europe which combined beer garden and music hall. The project came into being at the end of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth season; and one of its objects was to keep intact through summer months the personnel of the orchestra. Previously many musicians had accepted engagements in other cities where they remained.

Robin Hood Dell in Fairmount Park also was founded to keep intact the personnel of the Philadelphia Orchestra. It has attracted as many as 8000 persons nighty to listen to classic and semi-classic music.

In the Waltz Era

GAY affairs through their first four years, the Boston Pops became too gay at times for artists playing in the old Music Hall. Hard liquor never was sold; but in 1890 the city licensing board refused renewal of the light alcoholic beverages license. City fathers relented the following year however.

Old timers recall that glasses of beer stood on every table in the Eighties; and that conversation continued through waltzes, gallops and marches. Many years later prohibition concentrated more serious attention upon the program. Already there had been variation in points stressed by different conductors including Franz Kneisel, Timothee Adamowski, Alfred Casella. Now Agide Jacchia made such innovations as the "Scheherazade" finale a permanent favorite.

During the prohibition era there was no popping of corks but to compensate trickily dressed pretty girls were substituted for men waiters. They served ginger beer, lemonade, ice cream and smokes.

Arthur Fiedler, who has guided the destiny of the orchestra since 1930, has drawn the largest audiences of any Pops conductor. Born in Boston, the son of Emanuel Fiedler, a first violinist of Boston Symphony Orchestra and original member of the Kneisel Quartet, he conducts the MacDowell Club orchestra in the winter and has given concerts of chamber music under auspices of the New Friends of Music in New York. At the conclusion of the Pops series in July, Fiedler moves his musicians to the Charles River Esplanade where he presents free open air concerts.

A FEW Bostonians remember a night at the Symphony Hall which was wilder even than the gay Eighties. It was when Harvard students reserved the entire first floor for "Graduation Night." At a signal the students, in turtle-necks and buttoned shoes, snake-danced around the hall, then piled tables one a-top the next until the tower all but reached the ceiling. While the astonished orchestra conductor craned to watch, a student triumphantly unfurled the Harvard banner from the pinnacle.

The huge electric marquee outside the Symphony Hall is blacked out these evenings but that doesn't matter. Boston music lovers need no reminder that this is the season of the Pops. Just as Philadelphians need no reminder of Robin Hood Dell.

Photos by Martin Sheridan

Music lovers flock to the balconies where they pay thirty to fifty-five cents for seats and have their own refreshments.

This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
JUN 30 1942

SHOSTAKOVICH SEVENTH.

The new symphony by Dimitri Shostakovich, his seventh, which was received from Russia a few weeks ago, will have its American premiere in a broadcast by the NBC Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Arturo Tosacrini on Sunday, July 19, in a radio concert to be heard from 4.15 until 6.00 p.m. The symphony will be given on a coast-to-coast hook up and will also be broadcast to the world by short-wave.

The performance will mark the symphony's premiere in the Western Hemisphere. That premiere, according to previous plans, was to have been given at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood under the direction of Serge Koussevitzki on August 8. Dr. Koussevitzky, however, will still have the honor of conducting the first concert performance of the Shostakovich work.

Arthur Fiedler, conductor, and the famous "Pops" orchestra of Boston.

KOUSSEVITZKY AT TANGLEWOOD

DR. Serge Koussevitzky's Summer school, which has been known as the Berkshire Music Center and has functioned in the past under the sponsorship of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will continue its activities this Summer at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., under a new orientation. The Berkshire Music Center has become the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation, Inc.

The foundation uses the grounds and buildings at Tanglewood through the courtesy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc. But the music school is directed by Dr. Koussevitzky and a board, and is neither financed nor in any way directed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Twenty-two first desk men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be among the members of the faculty of the school. Orchestral concerts will be given by players selected from the students enrolled, who will appear under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton. And during the last three weeks of the school's season Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct programs on Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, at which an important repertory will be performed, including Beethoven's ninth symphony and the Bach "Magnificat," in which the chorus of the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation will supplement the orchestra.

Faculty Unchanged

The instructors, classes and special lecture series will remain the same as previously announced by the school under its former name of the Berkshire Music Center.

Financial responsibilities of the school, which will hold its six-week session from July 5 to Aug. 16, will be borne principally by Dr. Koussevitzky himself, the Boston Symphony Orchestra having felt unable for financial reasons to back the organization as it did last season. Certain private persons also have promised aid and support.

The school, in spite of enlistments of a number of students of last season in the Army and Navy, will apparently have classes at least as large this Summer as last, although the students may be younger than those in attendance a year ago, whose average age was 26 years. More than 600 applications have been received, with many to follow, from those who have waited for announcement of the completed plans of the foundation. Classes for some of the departments are filled, but applications are being accepted for the fifth department, that of music and culture.

Organizes Foundation to Continue School—Concerts Planned

Operas Planned

Performances of symphonic, operatic and choral music, including presentations of Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" and Stravinsky's "Histoire d'un Soldat," by the classes of Dr. Herbert Graf of the Metropolitan Opera Association, will be given and the seats sold to the public, the financial return of these events to be devoted to the maintenance and support of the foundation.

The foundation will offer a variety of courses. These include orchestral conducting, under Dr. Koussevitzky and Stanley Chapple; choral conducting, under Hugh Ross and Ifor Jones; the advanced orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin and Mr. Chapple; chamber music, under Gregor Piatigorsky; composition, under Aaron Copland and Igor Stravinsky, and opera, under Dr. Graf, Boris Goldovsky and Richard Rychtarik.

The largest department is that of music and culture, which has no formal entrance requirements, being designed for all music students, college students, teachers and amateurs interested in Summer work in the musical field. This department includes a chorus, trained by Mr. Ross and Mr. Jones, which will prepare works to be presented under Dr. Koussevitzky, and also will sing motets, madrigals and compositions of later origin.

The department has an orchestra of its own, less advanced than the other, which will be coached by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will have rehearsals and performances under Mr. Burgin, Mr. Chapple and Leonard Bernstein. There also will be chamber music groups. The choral and instrumental works studied will be reviewed at informal lecture-concerts on Saturday afternoons. Lectures by Olin Downes, with illustrations by the students, will relate the music studied to its cultural and historical background.

Special lectures will be given by Archibald T. Davison, Howard Hanson, Lucien Price, Deems Taylor and others, which all members of the foundation are entitled to attend.

New courses in the department of music and culture include Gregorian Chant and Polyphonic Music (600-1600), under Dr. R. Mills Silby, and Twentieth - Century Music, under Mr. Copland, assisted by Mr. Chapple and Mr. Bernstein.

A new course in opera production, for stage directors, conductors, designers, composers and librettists, has been added in the opera department. Besides the performance of the operas by Nicolai and Stravinsky mentioned, the course for singers also will comprise presentations of scenes from other operatic works.

In continuance of the policy inaugurated last Summer, five scholarships have been made available to students from Latin America. These awards have been made to three composers, a violinist and a soprano.

CONCERTS IN CAMPS

USO-Camp shows presented seventy-nine concerts for the men in the armed forces during the first five months of the year. They range from one by Jascha Heifetz in Camp Roberts, Calif., on Jan. 23, to one by Rubinoff at Camp Lee, Va., on May 22. March led with thirty-two concerts, eight of which were given by Alec Templeton.

Concerts have been given all over the country and in all sorts of military stations, including the Edgewood Arsenal in Maryland, Lawton General Hospital in Georgia, Paine Field in Washington, the port of embarkation in New Orleans, the United States Military Academy at West Point, the Coast Guard Station on Ellis Island and the United States Submarine Base at New London, Conn.

POPS PREMIERE FOR CONCERTO OF NOTED COMPOSER

121

THIS column was concerned last Sunday with the problem of musical genius. The latter exhibits queer forms. If it frequently develops at a preposterously early age, it may also lie hidden until its possessor is well on the way to maturity. One of the most remarkable examples of the latter phenomenon is to be found in the case of the Armenian-Russian composer, Aram Khatchaturian, whose Piano Concerto will have its local premiere at tomorrow evening's Pop Concert, with Bernhard Weiser as soloist.

The son of a bookbinder, Khatchaturian was born at Tiflis in the now fiercely-disputed Caucasus on June 6, 1903. The date 1904 is also given, but the usually-dependable Nicholas Slonimsky ("Music Since 1900"), gives his support to the other. At the age of 19 Khatchaturian presented himself at Michael Gnessin's music school in Moscow and demanded instruction. As the story goes, he had at that time no knowledge of musical theory, no acquaintance with the standard works of music, no opinion as to what branch of the study he wished to pursue, but only a profound conviction that he was a musician. For two years he applied himself to the 'cello, after which he entered Gnessin's class in composition. In 1929 he transferred to the Conservatory, where his principal teacher was Miaskovsky, and there he remained until 1934.

Gerald Abraham, writing in the British periodical, the "Monthly Musical Record," finds in Khatchaturian's early music "a tendency to loose, rhapsodic structures, a keen rhythmic sense and a love of warm, colorful sound effects. The Khatchaturian of this period," he says, "was in the position of an eager, intelligent child who has just been given the run of a toyshop. . . . Everything was equally new to him, Bach and Ravel, Glinka and Scriabin."

* * * *

Three of Khatchaturian's works have attracted attention outside the boundaries of his own country, a Trio for Clarinet, Violin and Piano, which has been performed here at a concert of the Flute Players' Club; a Symphony, which had its first American performance last Friday evening by Dean Dixon, the talented Negro conductor, and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony at a Lewisohn Stadium Concert; and the Piano Concerto, now impending at Symphony Hall. The Concerto was introduced to London by Morna Lympany in the spring of 1940. Mr. Abraham in the article mentioned above describes it as "an extremely attractive work; it has," he continues, "abundant life and plenty of color, qualities that distinguished it from its neighbors in the programme, the fifth symphony of that over-praised talent, Shostakovitch (Hear, hear!) and the 16th of the alarmingly prolific veteran Miaskovsky."

* * * *

Later in the same article Mr. Abraham gives us a more detailed description: "Khatchaturian's next big work after the symphony was the now fairly familiar piano concerto. . . . It shows Khatchaturian learning self discipline but also losing a little of his individuality. Both the slow movement and the serene subject of the first movement are somewhat Borodinesque, while the dry, brilliant finale reminds one of Prokofieff. The first movement is quite orthodox in form." Elsewhere, Mr. Abraham remarks that the piece has already attained considerable popularity in England.

By a narrow margin Boston missed the American premiere. The Concerto was played on March 14 at a concert of the Juilliard School in New York, when the pianist was the composer's compatriot, Maro Ajemian. It was repeated on May 17 with Miss Ajemian again as the soloist at a concert sponsored by the Armenian War Relief Committee of the benefit of Russian War Relief in the Cosmopolitan Opera House. The orchestra was again that of the Juilliard School with Albert Stoessel conducting. One reviewer, who may not be identified here, declared that in time it might rival the popularity of the First Concerto of Tchaikovsky; a tall order.

